There is a portion of Scripture to which I would cite your attention, which may be found in Ezek. xvi: 53 to the end of the chapter. We have a sacred promise of the restoration of the wicked Sodomites, whom God would not permit to live on the earth, in consequence of their great wickedness. He therefore rained fire and brimstone down upon them, and destroyed them without mercy, and their lands were sunk. According to history, there is a lake of dead water now standing over the place where Sodom stood. The prophet Ezekiel is here reproving Jerusalem, and then adds, "When I shall bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them." And again, "When thy sister Sodom and her daughters shall return to their former estate, and Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate, then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate." What are we to understand by the restoration, here spoken of? shall we take it literally, and suppose that the Sodomites are to be restored to life again, and again inhabit their lands which are sunk, and again practice all their former sins, for which they were destroyed? O, no, says one, it means that they shall be restored to a resurrection state; that they may come forth to judgment, and there receive their awful sentence, "depart ye cursed into everlasting punishment"—and that means endless punishment—and there they will receive a just recompense for their wickedness. But stop, friend, whoever thou art, stop, and learn what this meaneth. "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice." Let us see what the Lord hath said relative to it. "Thus saith the Lord God, I will even deal with thee as thou hast done, which hast despised the oath in breaking the covenant. Nevertheless I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant. Then thou shalt remember thy ways, and be ashamed when thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger, and I will give them unto thee for daughters, but not by thy covenant. And I will establish my covenant with thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. That thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all thou hast done saith the Lord God."

Now, what is this covenant, that the Lord declares he will remember, which he made with Jerusalem in the days of their youth, and by virtue of which he also declares he will restore both Jews and Gentiles—yes, even the wicked Sodomites whom Jude says are suffering the vengeance of eternal fire? Was it not the covenant of promise made to Abraham, saying, "In thee and thy seed, shall all nations, and all families of the earth be blessed?" Now Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were the fathers of the Jews, and the nation, it may be said, were then in the days of their youth.

Paul says, Gal. iii: 16, "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Is the law, then against the promises of God? God forbid." Thus you will discover, that it is by this covenant which was confirmed by God, in Christ, unto Abraham, that God is to restore Sodom and her daughters; and not only so, but the whole Gentile world is included in this covenant equally with Sodom and Jerusalem—"all nations, all families, and all kindreds of the earth." Paul says, respecting those who are included therein, "After those days saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts, and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. And they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord; for all shall know me from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins, and their iniquities will I remember no more." Hence, you see, that all the promises of God in Christ, are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God the Father. Reader, do you think that God, in fulfilling his covenant in restoring Sodom, will do it in violation of his justice? O no, he does it because it is just for him to be merciful. It was upon the strength of this gracious and glorious covenant that the angels were prepared to proclaim unto the Shepherds, "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour." And again, the angel of the Lord said, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." Not in them, but from them.

It is, also, by this covenant that the lion of the tribe of Juda, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof, which no man in heaven, nor in the earth, neither under the earth, was found able or worthy to do, neither to look thereon. And it is also in the complete fulfilment of this heavenly covenant, that "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, were heard saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the lamb forever and ever." Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "death is swallowed up in victory." And thanks be to God, who giveth us this victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

DEATH.

BY WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE.

"Death is the gate to endless life,
And yet we dread to enter there."

Throughout all classes of people, and under every circumstance in life, the "stern monarch of the grave" has been viewed as the dread harbinger of some unheard-of evil; or perhaps more frequently, as the messenger of fate, commissioned by omnipotent power to execute the terrible denunciations of the offended majesty of heaven, upon the reprobate sons of men. The anticipation of the period, when this "body shall return to the dust from whence it came," has been sufficient to poison all the joys, and to render insipid all the pleasures of life.

Mankind have been taught to believe that their destination was shrouded in impenetrable gloom, and that the future is enveloped in the most awful uncertainty. They have been taught to believe, that the "Father of the spirits of all flesh" is possessed of passions that would disgrace the character of a Nero; that he will doom his erring children to the most excruciating torture which God himself can inflict, which shall continue throughout the ceaseless rounds of a never-ending eternity.

And they have been taught to believe, that this course was required by the immaculate justice of our heavenly Father; who, by the "predetermined counsel of his own will, foreordained whatsoever comes to pass." While such sentiments, and such doctrines are abroad in the world, we cannot wonder that death should ever be an unwelcome guest.

Who that believes, that when he has done with things of earth, he shall be consigned to the regions of endless wretchedness and hopeless despair, can calmly contemplate the period of his exit from this world and its pleasures, with a perfect acquiescence to the mandate of his God? And who that fancies that his neighbor, his friend, his relative, his companion, will be doomed to the same torture, can reflect upon the subject without feeling the deepest horror and dismay? Human nature must be radically changed before it can be otherwise.

Those holy affections of which we are said to be divested in a state of immortal bliss, are too deeply rooted in the human breast to yield to the tyranny of education, and the effect of a false faith. Though for a time, they may seem to be smothered, yet they will again spring up to cheer and enliven our drooping spirits as we journey through life.

But why should he, who believes that "God is good to all and that his tender mercies are over all his works"—that he will ever remain the same without variableness or shadow of turning,—why should he give way to gloomy doubts and corroding fears?

To those who look forward to the time when death shall be swallowed up in victory; when tears shall be wiped from every eye; when sin shall be finished, and transgression have an end; when every created intelligence in the universe of God shall be admitted to the company of angels, and the spirits of the just made perfect—to such individuals death can present no terrors, eternity no fears. The grim monster will be transformed to the likeness of an angel, and will be greeted by a smile of sweet resignation, as the messenger of a Father commissioned to remove them to their homes. Fully confident that "the judge of all the earth will do right," they can safely trust the issue in his hands; being assured, "that in the dispensation of the fullness of times, he will gather together in one, all things in Christ," and the ransomed universe be heard ascribing glory and honor to him that hath triumphed over death and the grave, led captivity captive, brought in everlasting righteousness, reconciled man to his Maker, and fitted him for the liberty of the children of God.

A BROTHER SAVED.

We have been much affected by the perusal of the following—one out of the many evidences that our labors in publishing a paper are not in vain—that by spreading the many able articles of our esteemed correspondents, among our thousand readers, we are doing at least some good. That our beloved brother Austin's feelings will not be less pleasing, we can well believe. The blessing of him that was ready to perish is upon him and others, who have labored in the good cause; and oh, may the spirit of our Master long continue to warm and strengthen his and their hearts to continue to make the drooping soul shout aloud for joy!

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—I have been a believer, for about twenty years, in the final holiness and consequent happiness, of all intelligences. But for the last two or three years, I have had some doubts of the truth of divine revelation, in consequence of reading some deistical and atheistical publications, in which I thought I discovered some arguments in support of their theory. I likewise have perused several articles in the Magazine, in support of Christianity, by different authors, who in my opinion, failed to answer the arguments of their opponents; not having, as I thought, commenced at the foundation. Thus I was in a manner remaining in uncertainty, till the arrival of the 15th number of the present volume, when I perused the article by Rev. J. M. Austin, headed "How did your God originate?" and I can truly say that I have discovered in his reasoning, satisfactory evidences, in my opinion, of the truths of Christianity. I consider that number of your paper worth more than the subscription price; for next to the doctrine of endless misery, the thought of the endless night of non-existence, is to me the most gloomy and dreadful.

When on the bed of death a fond parent beholds the grave yawning to receive him, and his wife, his children, his friends gather around him, then the parting scene will bring the thought—must he go without one fond hope to buoy up his spirits? must he part with all his loved ones, without the fond expectation of meeting them again? must it be an endless separation? I would not exchange the hope which I have of a happy immortality for all the wealth of worlds, and all the honors that men can bestow.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS. PART. III.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ VII. THE FUTURE WORLD: ITS WEAL AND WO. A CONJECTURE.—Not unfrequently, my dear friend, have we indulged our not uncgenial curiosities and fancies in conjecturing our future and untried modes of being—our sources of weal and wo—our engagements, enjoyments, pursuits and progress—and also our poignant regrets, our punishments and our system of discipline and discipleship. Have not our hearts, while thus occupied, “burned within us,” (Luke xxiv: 32,) as did the hearts of those who listened to the great Teacher of “life and immortality,” while, after his resurrection, he discoursed on this high theme, and of “entering into his glory”? (Luke xxiv: 26.) “Blessed indeed,” (has been our full-souled sentiment,) “blessed and praised be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy hath begotten us again to a living hope—the hope of a new life—through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and unfading, preserved in the heavens for us.” (1 Peter i: 3, 4.) Yes! without this “living hope,” (a Hebraism for “hope of life,”) of a life beyond the grave, oh! what were man?—a joyless, objectless wanderer, “a world without a sun.” Not without a full, and almost overwhelming sense of the dimness and darkness which envelop and curtain up this subject, did we, or should we venture to conjecture or explore. Yet the “place prepared for us” is not so impenetrably shrouded up, but that we may affirm or deny some propositions about it—but that we possess, or may attain to, some data wherewith to build and brighten our most consoling hopes, defend our faith, and guide our conjectures.

Recently there has occurred to my thoughts an element which will probably enter into the constitution of our next mode of being, and which will largely administer to the felicity and satisfaction of some, while to others it will be the pregnant source of “compunctious visitings,” stinging regrets, and biting remorse. What Solomon says of wine, (Prov. xxiii: 32,) may be said of this: “At last it shall bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder.” A brief sketch or bare outline of my cogitations on this topic, I now submit to your judgment, and (may I add?) your profitable meditation.

Let me ask, let me beg a well-meditated answer to the following question: How is the mind most nobly, most divinely employed? Take one mind, much or most of whose employment consists in the exercise of admiration, or gratitude, or trust, or confidence, or love, or reverence towards the Supreme Being, the “Father of the spirits of all flesh”; in the exercise of love, candor, forbearance, forgiveness, benevolence, kindness, or even courtesy towards his fellow-beings; in the exercise of love for truth, and of a resolute, undismayed pursuit of it; in the exercise of reason, of thoughtfulness, of mental occupation for some noble, some distinguished end; in the exercise of obedience to the dictates of reason, and conscience, and God, in opposition to, and in victory over the love of ease, or of pleasure, or of gain, or of distinction, or self-aggrandizement; in the exercise of fortitude, “which despises pain and tramples pleasure under foot in the pursuit of duty,” and of an independence of spirit “which no scorn can deter, and no example seduce from asserting truth, and adhering to the cause which conscience approves.” Take, on the other hand, one who forgetful or neglectful of the nobler parts of his nature, of his glorious privileges as a son of the Highest, to have communion and to cooperate with the most pure Mind and the most sublime Agent in the universe, doth yield himself a ready drudge for food and clothing, doth become a care-worn toiler for gain, for distinction, for place, for the world’s applause. Take one from that mass of whom it is not too harsh to say:—“The greater number of almost every state are sunk into a mere animal being, consuming food, propagating their kind, laboring the earth, manufacturing its commodities into various shapes, and transporting them from place to place. Few of whom remember that they are descended from the skies and instinct with ethereal being, or make account of their great Father in the heavens, and make arrangements for returning to Him at length. Narrow life spanneth their hopes and expectations, the impure earth yieldeth them all their joy; their common intercourse is in idle talk, vain parade, vulgar jest, brutal excess, and savage sports. They thirst not after immortality, they live not for things above, they meditate not on things believed; there is no eternity in their thoughts, no control over their nature, save for the convenience or by the compulsion of society; no energy of their own accord after perfection, no grandeur of character, no godlike deeds, no everlasting honor or renown. Is not every such operation and exertion of the mind as these last mentioned, more noble, more venerable, more divine than such as are called into exercise in order to supply “the housing and pasture” of our several conditions, or even to make a man rich, or even to procure an exalted and envied station in public life or popular opinion? And by which of the two characters is the greatest mental ability and power manifested? Which performs the mightiest and most difficult task? In his heart every one feels the appropriate reply, let his wishes or his self-defence either suggest or make another necessary, or let his tongue make speech as it may. And in his heart every man feels which of these opposite mental occupations brings the most of solid satisfaction, the most of cheerfulness, the most of blissful, heartfelt peace. Yet alas! which of the fruits and conditions of these opposite characters is the most generally envied and aimed at?—the condition of inward self-complacency, and peace, and serenity of the one; or the condition of outward comfort, and prosperity, and rank of the other? Acknowledgedly, though it be of a less noble nature, yet doth the latter—the outward condition—fill a larger place in man’s eye, and man’s estimation, and man’s heart. This is manifest by the motives that move men to action; it is manifest by our conversation; it is manifest to every man’s consciousness.

But suppose all this reversed—that nous avons change tout cela.^{*} Suppose man’s vision rendered purer, keener, more piercing, and that, while the qualities and exercises of the mind of which we have spoken, rivet more of his attention—fill a larger space in his mind’s eye—it doth also happen that the enviable nobility and blissful rewards of these exercises and qualities become more apparent—more “the observed of all observers.” Suppose our vision so pure and penetrating that it is not detained by the outward circumstances of a man’s condition, but “looking off” (the appropriate phrase in Heb. xii: 2,) to the inward man of the heart, doth there seek to judge of his real state by what it finds worthy or unworthy in his mental and moral habits; in his likes and dislikes; in his desires and pursuits. Suppose we estimate a man’s wealth, not by what he has acquired of gold and silver, but by the number of his victories over impure and improper desires—over the lower propensities, and by the number of virtuous deeds by which his virtuous habits have been corroborated and confirmed. Suppose that the silent, steady, and heretofore unnoticed progress made by the cultivator of his nobler nature in the improvement of his modes of feeling and of actions, stand boldly forth, luminous, bright as with a sun-beam, so that it cannot be unobserved. Beside such a one, whose exalted aim and ardent zeal has been rewarded by much progress, we suppose there stands one who knew no higher object in life than gain, distinction, the world’s applause, and that without what he may have acquired of these to abstract or detain our attention, we look upon the naked inner man of the heart. We find there,—what? monstrous enlargements of misplaced, malign, and ignoble desires, while the love of all that is most noble and most worthy, is stunted and dwarfish, and all tendencies to good, and virtuous, and Christ-like conduct overmastered by long indulged propensities to low, selfish, and ungodly gratifications.

^{*} That is—“We have changed all that.”—Ed.

I leave you to complete the picture of a mind which has passed through this world, and the present system of parental discipline, without profit or progress.

To sum up and close this outline of my views:—suppose that we are ushered upon the shores of another state of being with the full, complete, and constant persuasion that the system of discipline and the series of events, which we passed through here, were all intended to prove and confirm our virtue, and ought to have been made, daily, to contribute to the perfecting of our natures. Stripped of all other acquisitions or modes of manifestations, we stand bare and revealed to each other in the qualities and acquisitions of the mind, alone. Prominent and attention-absorbing as were the exterior circumstances of a man’s condition in this world, have now become, to the full, the powers of his intellect, the dispositions and affections of his heart, and the habits he has indulged and acquired. Then shall we judge of a man’s religion, not by his outward show of a sanctimonious face and regular church-going, but by his interior feelings of reverence and love towards God; the real amount of his spirit of brotherly kindness and charity shall then stand as manifest and revealed as formerly did his giving of alms, or his subscriptions to charitable institutions and societies. In this world it seldom happens that we take our rank and status according to the endowments and dispositions of our mental and moral natures. A man may shroud from himself and from the world, much of his poverty of spiritual wealth, by his treasures of gold and the abundance of his physical riches and comforts. But the change which I think likely to take place—the new element in the next state of being—consists in our rank and respect being altogether measured and awarded in exact ratio and proportion to the degree of excellence or perfection to which we have arrived in the cultivation of our nobler, godlike powers. With nothing but the strength and beauty of these to qualify us to take our place and station in the next stage of being, some, you will perceive, must “awake to the resurrection” of self-approval, satisfaction or “justification”; while to others their resuscitation and resurrection must be that of self-condemnation, accusation, remorse and shame; or in the words of the Scriptures, they must “awake to the resurrection of damnation.” Many, doubtless, will then, for the first time, be fully conscious of the treasures they have been amassing—of the amount of capacity for enjoyment, for loving, and being like God, and like Christ, their “elder brother,” by their repression of heaven-condemned propensities, dispositions and habits, and cultivation of the nobler instincts of our nature; while, with equal certainty, will it happen that others will stand revealed to themselves and to others, for the first time, in all their nakedness and deformity, the result of their neglect of the daily opportunities afforded them, by the arrangements of their earthly condition, to cultivate excellence, root out evil, and follow on to know and to be like the Lord. What the self-complacency and exaltation of the one, grateful at the same time for the abundant, rich harvest which God hath “graciously” given to their humble endeavors after likeness to Him! What the remorse, self-dissatisfaction, self-condemnation raging in the bosoms of the other, to find that with the very same opportunities, they are yet poor, and blind, and naked, and in want of all moral riches and righteousness! From the operation of this new element alone, I construct a felicity or an infelicity sufficient to make of any man’s bosom a heaven of peaceful delight, or a hell of tumultuous agitation and anguish.

I feel now that I have completed this sketch, that I have not, probably, succeeded in conveying to you my ideas on the subject with the fullness and force which I could wish. A title of the time required for this epistolary communication, would have sufficed in a colloquial intercourse, to have discussed this topic more fully, and to have reviewed the foundations of my credence in the verisimilitude of my conjecture. That it is analogous and conformable to the plan of God's moral government in this stage of being, and that it affords, to me at least, a rational and satisfactory explanation of many passages of the Scriptures, are among the chief of these foundations. My views of God's fatherly discipline, you know, are, in the main, those which have been so lucidly, and ably, and eloquently expounded, by one, in praise of whose many excellencies of professional skill and capacity, of private and domestic worth, of amiable and Christ-like spirit, and of public energy and usefulness, you have oft known my eye kindle, and my tongue loosen—I mean Dr. T. Southwood Smith. His work on "DIVINE GOVERNMENT" is so highly appreciated by me, that an ardent admiration of his talents, spirit and views is a ready passport to no inconsiderable portion of my esteem.

Since my adoption of the preceding views, several passages of the New Testament have been seen in a new and more satisfactory light.

THE WATERER. No. IX.
RELIGIOUS ENVY.

"And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." Luke xii: 24.

Yes, and this strife has continued ever since. It has been cherished in every age of Christianity, as well as the primitive, and is far too visible among the followers of Jesus at the present day.

It is manifested among our clergy. Why did not Br. A. attend the last session of our Convention? Because he was not appointed, the year previous, to deliver the occasional sermon, which he considered due to him. Why did not Br. B. attend our last Association? Because another Br. was selected, the year before, to deliver the last discourse and the occasional addresses. What could have prevented Br. C. attending the dedication at D. when he lives so near? He would not attend because Br. E. was called, from a distance, to deliver the dedication sermon, and himself neglected. Why did Br. F. decline the invitation of the society at G.? Because their first choice was Br. H., whom Br. G. does not consider his superior.

It is indeed true that the people have their partialities, and in gratifying them, are sometimes guilty of great injustice, as well as error in judgment. But venial partiality in the people, (if such it be,) is less reprehensible than repining envy in the preacher.

For my own part, I will endeavor to suppress all desire to be "greatest in the kingdom." I will never envy the popularity of Paul, or Peter, or Barnabas. Their popularity renders them the more extensively useful and gives additional impulse to our common cause. They have grown to be great men, and I will rejoice thereat, although I have been hidden in their shadows. God grant that they may wear their laurels with humility, and that I may bear my obscurity with contentment.

But this strife about who shall be greatest is discoverable among the laity as well as the clergy. Why did not Br. I. attend the annual meeting of our society—why is he so often absent from our Sabbath meetings, and why is so small an amount appended to his name, on our subscription list? Because he was not elected a trustee, when we organized. We made choice of less capable and influential, but more zealous and efficient brethren.

And why do Br. J. and sister K. no longer take their seats with the choir and assist in singing? Because Br. L. and sister M. have been put forward more, by the singers, than themselves; and they intend to make us sensible of their value, by showing that we cannot well do without them. I should be sorry to indulge any doubts of their piety; but they have got mad and won't praise God any more!

Brethren, "Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another." Let us not strive who shall be greatest; "For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work."

BR. GROSH:—For the information of friends abroad, and the encouragement of those in the places mentioned, I send you the following. Some other places in this vicinity, where I labor occasionally, or regularly, will be noticed hereafter.

J. BRITTON, JR.

UNIVERSALISM

IN BROWNVILLE.—In this place there is an organized society, a part of the members of which reside in the adjoining town of Hounsfield. They have not a meeting house for public worship. The members of this society honor their faith. They act consistently, regulating their lives by the precepts of the Gospel, and devoting their means and influence to the propagation of truth. They have regular preaching something more than one quarter of the time with frequent lectures. It is believed that by a different arrangement, preaching might be enjoyed one half the time, and the cause of truth more successfully advanced. Instead of pursuing the present way of holding meetings on Sundays, in the different neighborhoods, the writer would suggest the propriety of fixing upon one place where the meetings should be held on Sundays. It is confidently believed that the evils attendant on this plan, by subjecting some to a greater distance of travel, would be more than counterbalanced by the good which would arise. If the society should thus meet together, they would form, of themselves and families, a congregation respectable in numbers. A choir of singers could be organized, and this delightful and animating part of the services might, on all ordinary occasions, be enjoyed. Another advantage which would ensue, would be a more intimate acquaintance, and the cultivation of the social affections among brethren and sisters of the society. The present state of this society renders such a result highly desirable. Let some central place be fixed upon, where the members and friends of this congregation may assemble for public worship, and let those who desire the prosperity of the cause of truth be punctual in their attendance, as far as practicable, and they may soon see their fondest hopes realized; they will immediately see a congregation which shall not suffer by comparison with those of more favored sects, either in point of members or moral worth. By adopting this course, the same number of week-day or evening lectures could be still enjoyed in the different neighborhoods without any additional expense. Brethren, bring all your resources to bear upon one point, the establishment of public worship on Sundays for as great a portion of the time as your means will command; make a little sacrifice of personal convenience, and the cause you love will no longer languish; you will encourage those who labor with you in word and doctrine; success will attend their labors, and believers will be increased to partake with you, the joys of the Gospel.

IN ADAMS.—In this village and vicinity, there are a few believers in Universalism, who are among the most influential and respectable members of community. Within a few years past they have made several attempts to have regular preaching one fourth part of the time, but in every instance have failed to gather and retain any other than small congregations. Our friends here, however, should not despond on account of past discouragements. Still continue to have regular preaching at such times as your means will allow. If you cannot have it as often as you desire this is no good reason why you should not have it all. In most places where Universalism is permanently established the work has been gradual. True, it is discouraging to continue our efforts where scarcely any advance is made. The friends at Adams are aware of the nature of the difficulty with which they have to contend. They have also ample means within themselves for its removal. Popularity and fashion rule in your village, and in such a manner as is highly prejudicial to the advancement of the doctrine that "God is the Saviour of all." How shall a better state of things be brought about? Whenever you have meetings of your choice, make it a point to attend with your families. There is no real difficulty here. The members of your households will not refuse to accompany you one-fourth part of the time, at least, if they are earnestly and affectionately invited to do so. There will be a double advantage gained. Prejudice will vanish when others discover in you a warm and affectionate manner in promoting your sentiments, and your partners and children will enjoy an opportunity of joining in public worship with those whose devotion is inspired by a sense of the goodness of our Father in heaven. The result will be most happy. For, is it too much to suppose that those, in whose bosoms dwell kindness and affection, will remain uninterested and unaffected by an acquaintance with the principles of the Gospel of love and salvation, especially when such an acquaintance is accompanied by a practical exemplification of these principles in your life? Have we not sufficient confidence in the truth to believe that, to be received instead of error, it should only be known? It will especially be received by the youth, "whose affectionate confidence in the universal Father is not yet alloyed with fear or weakened by distrust."

My friends, you do not desire any greater degree of earthly happiness, than to see the time when you and those with whom you are connected by the most endearing ties, together with your friends and neighbors, shall willingly unite with you, in worshipping God for his goodness. You have already witnessed the unhappy effect of that devotion, (if it be proper to call it devotion,) which is inspired only by fear. Recall to mind past scenes. Is it not vain to suppose that the children and youth committed to your care will escape the pernicious influence of error, if they are suffered to be familiar with those places where it is disseminated, and with scarcely an opportunity to contrast it understandingly with truth? You will receive these suggestions from one who remembers with gratitude the many evidences of your friendship which he has received, and who ardently desires to see you "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNIVERSALISM IN VERMONT.

The good cause of truth and mental emancipation is going on in this place and vicinity, conquering and to victory. Cold, unyielding prejudice is fast giving place in the minds of our brethren of other denominations, to a more liberal and charitable spirit—consequently, converts are daily being "brought out"—out of the "slough of despond," into which they have been brought by following "blind leaders of the blind," who can scarcely see their own salvation, without having their mental vision interrupted by "doubts and fears" insurmountable; much less can they see how all can be saved. And those who are brought out of the horrible depths of Partialism, are put out of the churches, because they say they can "see" that all men will be eventually saved. These conversions, which are not an uncommon occurrence in this vicinity, seem to give an interest to the cause of liberal feelings and liberal practice; and our brethren here are doing more, perhaps, in the defence of our holy faith, than at any former period. In Williams-town, where I preach once a month, the good and faithful handful of brethren in that place, are building a handsome and commodious house of worship, which is in a state of active progression, and will be completed by the first of January next, in spite of all opposition. And in Randolph, our worthy brethren are taking efficient measures for the erection of a convenient meeting-house, which will soon be in a state of successful progression. Truly, "the Lord is doing great and good things for us, whereof we are glad." And we are happy to learn the same report from the East and West, the North and South, so that the poor benighted and suffering sons and daughters of a popular superstition, are beginning to see and rejoice in the great and true light of the Gospel. Amen and amen!

Yours in the bonds of the Gospel of peace.

MORAL REFORM.

A few hastily penned but long considered remarks on this subject, have, I hope, been already perused and approved by the great majority of our readers. I now notice it again for the purpose of laying before them the following extract from some excellent remarks by the Editor of the New-Yorker, one of the largest, best, cheapest and most widely circulated literary newspapers in the United States.

The issue of the affair truly depends "on the virtue and energy of the people." It is therefore, deeply to be regretted that the virtuous and amiable portions of our fellow-citizens, both male and female, do not make themselves more felt on this and kindred subjects. Their immense influence lies dead or dormant, while that of the vicious and depraved is alive and active. In many sections of the country, there are whole denominations of religionists who falsely regard all public action as irreligious—a mere scramble for office and power—and therefore seldom or never perform their highest duties as citizens of the State. Others, especially females, incapable of shaking off the ease of compliance with established sentiments and customs, suffer themselves to float on the stream, down its improper channels, when they might direct it aright if they would speak and act as conscience and duty demand. Surely nine-tenths of our female, and a large majority of our male citizens are the enemies of vice and profligacy—iniquity and ruin.

I dissent most earnestly from the advice of the New-Yorker to organize combinations of citizens to suppress the particular vices there named. Such combinations are not only unnecessary, but contrary to the principles of, and injurious in a republican government. They supersede the laws and its officers, and substitute the abstract views and irresponsible actions of combinations not established by, nor known to the government of the whole people. They are virtually a mobocracy setting aside the laws of their rule, and superseding the proper executioners of the law, by substituting the unauthorized and unacknowledged actions of their officers. Let the people govern by the laws they make through their proper representatives—and let these laws be executed by the officers the people have properly chosen and commissioned to enforce them. When a government of the people fails, it will be time to erect another of organized combinations to govern the people.

It will be seen that my opposition to temperance, anti-swearing, anti-gambling, moral reform or seventh commandment, and other societies for the suppression of any particular crime or immorality, extends not to the objects to be effected by such society, or to the members thereof. The former is good—but it should be attained by the properly and legally constituted means. The latter are a small part of the people, but they should not be separated from and made rulers over the majority. Hence in opposing these societies I do not intend to oppose the cause they were intended to advance. And if any association can be devised which will not have this deplorably injurious tendency, let it be formed. Yea, if any association could be formed which would restore the laws to their supremacy over all other general means in the government, I would advocate its establishment. But at present I deem this measure impossible. But to return from this digression.

Moral reform depends wholly on the virtue and energy of the people. It must begin in the hearts and minds of our citizens. They must see its importance—detest the vices which call for it, and hold in proper horror the consequences of their neglect to exterminate them. These views and feelings must become active, and be carried out into private, social, public and political life. Men known to practice or favor the prominent vices must, on no account—not even to save "our party" from defeat—be elected to make laws for the suppression of these vices. For when law breakers become law makers, either, no laws will be made—or the provisions contained in them will be insufficient—or the penalties will be such that people will not enforce them. Neither will people reverence the precepts of virtue which are uttered by the profligate. The bad example of the lawgiver will be of more weight than the injunctions of their laws. Hence, if we would have a moral reform, the virtue of the people, a majority of whom are the friends of virtue—must be represented in our legislative bodies. It is of no avail to send the representatives (in practice) of the vicious and immoral. Send those who will embody the sentiments and feelings of their constituents into proper laws, bearing mild penalties, and then let the executive officers of the government be selected in the same spirit. Let men be selected by both parties who will execute and enforce all proper and wholesome laws in every case—governors, judges, sheriffs and police officers of every grade, who will not practice, support, defend or connive at transgressions of the very laws they are sworn to uphold—and vice and iniquity must soon decrease. For the energy and determination of the people being embodied into the laws, and carried into action by the constituted authorities of the land, the popular will must and will be done. Our country will be truly republican. We will no longer be misrepresented in every department, by transgressors of the laws—their aiders and abettors—nor governed by an aristocracy of the vicious, the immoral and the lawless. This in my opinion is the only proper and complete remedy—proper laws faithfully executed.

In short—for I have been thrice as wordy as I intended to be when I commenced this article—let the laws properly provide for the punishment of offences against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth, and for the protection and assistance of their prosecuting officers—let every citizen report such offences to the police, and require attention to their complaints—and no societies or other means will be necessary to effect the complete suppression of intemperance, seduction, gambling, profanity and every other vice that now infests society and causes the land to mourn under the wreck of virtue and the ruin of peace. A. B. G.

"Shall the thousands of youth who are annually thrown upon the exciting tide of city novelty, with no efficient guardianship, no matured principles, and too often fitted by their very ignorance of evil to become easy victims of its snares, be still beset on every side by seductive though meretricious allurements to ruin? Shall the evil be so widely diffused that the mildew of suspicion shall rest even on the spotless in life, so that a visit to the city, shall of itself give rise to the imputation of criminal indulgence? Nay, more—shall each year witness the immolation of its thousands of female victims of reckless and fiendish depravity—first betrayed from innocence and happiness through the blackest perfidy, and then hurried through a brief career of abandoned wretchedness, to a death of inconceivable horror?—These are among the questions that now demand the consideration and the decision of the citizens of New-York; and we trust the response will be such as their duty to God, their country, and the cause of humanity, unhesitatingly dictate.

"But it may be asked, What can be done to arrest and annihilate the overshadowing evil? We shall at this time but suggest the remedy, leaving its complete development to a season of calmer consideration, or to the reflection of the upright in heart.

"I. Our laws must be strictly enforced.—Every house of ill fame in the city exists in direct and palpable violation of the laws of the land. Yet worthy aldermen, judges, justices, prosecuting attorneys, grand jurors, police officers, etc., etc., pass them cautiously by—or however otherwise the case may be—knowing well their existence, knowing their own duty, yet blind to the one and recalcitrant to the other. Occasionally, as if to make the caricature of justice more perfect, some single forlorn establishment is broken up, or some dozen or fifteen miserable libels on humanity are hurried off, with scarcely the formalities of a legal proceeding, to Bridewell or the Penitentiary. Justice is thus amply satisfied! Hercules reclines on his club, and the Hydra is bound to consider itself destroyed!—Seriously, if there were not too great reason to weep, there would be ample incitement to laugh, at such a bare-faced mockery.

"We propose, therefore, since it is obvious that our authorities will not otherwise be goaded to the faithful performance of their duty, that associations of our citizens be formed, to take care that our laws in regard to this evil be enforced to the utmost. Let but one hundred able, intelligent, and public-spirited individuals, combine for this purpose, and the evil would be immediately abated.

"II. Our laws require material amendment.—We trust that the day is not, cannot be, far distant when the friends of virtue, of morality, and the purity and trustfulness of social intercourse, will unite to demand of our Legislative authorities that aggravated seduction be placed at least as high on the catalogue of offences against the State as burglary, or robbery, instead of being indulged with a perfect and almost extraordinary impunity. We will not enlarge on this point: the mind that is not struck at a glance with the gross delinquency of our laws in this particular must be impervious to argument. A visitant from another planet, who should be informed on reaching our sphere that our laws punished with years of ignominious confinement and unrequited labor the breaker of a lock, while the crime that involved the breaking of a whole circle of happy hearts, by a long-pursued course of calculating villany and infamous perfidy, was suffered to go entirely unpunished, would be very likely to suspect that the makers of such laws were more resolutely fixed, in their own persons and principles, against the breaking of locks than of hearts.

"We might here advert to that extraordinary provision of the Revised Statutes of New-York, (perhaps we should say, want of provision,) by which the most flagrant infidelity to the marriage tie is rendered no longer a crime in this State. We sincerely believe and trust that licentiousness has not obtained so signal a victory over law in another State of the Union—except, possibly, Louisiana. But enough. We have done, in part at least, our duty to society. Whether it shall avail any thing to the great cause of moral rectitude must depend on the virtue and energy of the people."

REASONS.....NO. XII.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

"Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." 1 Peter iii: 15.

11. Because God "hath spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii: 21. Now God would never have foretold this event by all his holy prophets if it were never to be accomplished. And it is certain that the fulfilment of the predictions can only be accomplished by the salvation of all men. The learned Dr. A. Clarke, remarks on this passage as follows: "As the grace of the Gospel was intended to destroy the reign of sin, its energetic influence is represented as restoring all things, destroying the bad state, and establishing the good; taking the kingdom out of the hands of sin and satan, and putting it into those of righteousness and truth. This is done in every believing soul: all things are restored to their primitive order; and the peace of God which passes all understanding, keeps the heart and mind in the knowledge and love of God. The man loves God with all his heart, soul, mind and strength, and his neighbor as himself; and when such a work becomes universal as the Scriptures seem to intimate that it will, then all things will be restored in the fullest sense of the term."

12. Because David—an inspired prophet of the Most High, declared unequivocally that "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." Ps. xlii. Here notice that by the expression "all the ends of the world" is meant all people in all parts of the earth; and, lest the universality of the language should still be questioned, he repeats it as applying to all nations, in still stronger terms, and lest a single soul of the human family should be left out, he says, "all the kindreds of the nations." By the expression "shall remember," it is implied that they had not yet remembered: and by "shall worship before thee" is implied ultimate, hearty and sincere reconciliation and devotion.

13. Because David also declares of Christ, that "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth"—that "all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him." Psalm lxxii: 8, 11.

14. Because the Psalmist further declares, "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name." Ps. lxxxvi: 9. Now as there is no nation but what God has made, and all nations that he has made shall come and worship before him in such a manner as to glorify his name, there is no other conclusion to which we can come but this, that all shall experience a saving conversion and become the participants of salvation.

15. Because God declares by the prophet Isaiah, "Look unto me, and be ye saved all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Isa. xlv: 22-24. Who shall gainsay the irrevocable oath of the immutable Jehovah? His word and his oath are pledged, and "it is impossible for God to lie."

16. Because St. Paul reiterates the same sentiment and applies its consummation to the dominion of Christ. After speaking of the humiliation and obedience of Christ he says, "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name; that at (in) the name of Jesus every knee should bow of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth: and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Philip. ii: 9-11.

17. Because the same apostle also says, (1 Cor. xii: 3,) that "no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost." Hence, as all shall confess him Lord, and that "to the glory of God the Father," it is evident that the divine spirit must then be and abide with each and all.

18. Because God promised that in the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, all the nations, and families, and kindreds of the earth should be blessed. Gen. xii: 3; xviii: 18; xxvi: 4; xxviii: 14; Acts iii: 25.

19. Because Christ was the promised seed of the patriarchs in whom this blessing was to be bestowed and shared, and therefore the blessing was of a spiritual instead of a temporal nature, and clearly implied the salvation of those that were to be blessed. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed which is Christ." Gal. iii: 16.

20. Because God has made in Zion, a feast of fat things for all people. "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. Isa. xlv: 6, 7.

21. Because Jesus, the promised Messiah, the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in whom all nations, families and kindreds of the earth were to be blessed, has given "himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time"—"by the grace of God, has tasted death for every man"—"is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world"—and is called "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." John i: 29; 1 Tim. ii: 6; Heb. ii: 9; 1 John ii: 2.

22. Because by his death he was to conquer and destroy death, and him that had the power of death. "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject unto bondage." His triumph over death is to be so complete that the challenge may be triumphantly given, "O death where is thy sting?" "O grave where is thy victory?" Heb. ii: 14, 15; 1 Cor. xv: 55.

23. Because God hath promised not only the destruction of death and every thing that can disturb or mar the felicity of his children, but also that he will wipe away all tears from off all faces. "He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth for the Lord hath spoken it." "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." Isa. xxv: 8; Rev. xxi: 4.

24. Because God is to write his law in every heart and put it in every mind—he is to be the God of all, and all are to be his people—he is to be with and bless all—all are to know, love and serve him. Jer. xxxi: 33, 34; Heb. viii: 10, 11; Ps. lxxii: 8, 11; Rev. xxi: 2, 3.

25. Because to know and love God and Jesus Christ, as we have the assurance that all shall do at last, is life eternal—is equivalent to and synonymous with salvation. "This is life eternal that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." "Every one that loveth is born of God and knoweth God—God is love and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him," and this is salvation. John xiv: 23; xvii: 3; 1 John ii: 7, 16.

HERALD OF TRUTH.

This sister periodical has lately passed through some new arrangements in its proprietorship and editorial arrangements. Br. George Sanderson, late of Cortland village, has purchased the shares held by Brs. Chase and Prescott, removed to Geneva, and added his labors to those of Brs. Chase and Montgomery in the editorial department. It will hereafter be published by Brs. Sanderson and Miles, on its former terms, (which are the same as the Magazine and Advocate,) on every Friday, instead of Saturday, as formerly. Br. Sanderson delivered his inaugural in the last number, and promises sparingly but fairly, in such style as leads us to believe he will faithfully perform. In his intentions, goodwill, and love of the cause we have great confidence, and therefore cordially greet him as a fellow-laborer in the editorial field—wishing him a full share of all the joys it can yield to soothe him under its unavoidable cares and perplexities. As our readers are acquainted with Br. Sanderson as a writer, we deem no further assurance necessary to entitle him to their favorable regard.

APOLOGY.

I am sensible our readers have been partially neglected, in catering for their mental appetites, for a few weeks past—but it was unavoidable. Br. Skinner has to be from home for sometime, and was busily engaged in preparing his accounts for collection. Br. Smith is even now at the West. Thus the whole care has in a great measure rested on one who, as well as they, had many things to attend to beside the paper. Had it not been for our excellent correspondents, we would have been in a sad case indeed. But I trust our readers will bear with us yet a while longer—we will do all we can, until the associational meetings are over, to give them a full board, such as it is—after which all neglected matters will be more faithfully attended to.

All letters in relation to the Register and Almanac, or otherwise, and papers intended for me, must be directed to Geneva, Ontario county, N. Y. G. SANDERSON.

BRIGHAM ON RELIGION.

Our readers may remember a number of very excellent articles published last Fall and Winter, on the last of each number of this paper, credited to this work by Dr. Brigham. If they remember them, I need not spend words in assuring them that it is an excellent work—they will know it. To clergymen, especially, it is valuable—whether they are revivalists or not. This article is written to inform them that I have on hand about a dozen copies, at one dollar each, together with several other works of a similar character and value, on the influence of mental excitement. Parents and teachers of youth, as well as clergymen, should read more of such works than they now generally do. The next generation would be wiser, and better, and healthier for it, and consequently happier.

POETRY.

ART.

BY CHARLES SPRAGUE.

When from the sacred garden driven,
Man fled before his Maker's wrath,
An angel left her place in heaven,
And crossed the wanderer's sunless path.
'Twas Art! sweet Art! new radiance broke,
Where her light foot flew o'er the ground;
And thus with seraph voice she spoke,
"The curse a blessing shall be found!"

She led him through the trackless wild,
Where noontide sunbeams never blazed:
The thistle shrunk—the harvest smiled,
And nature gladdened as she gazed.
Earth's thousand tribes of living things,
At Art's command to him are given,
The village grows, the city springs,
And point their spires of faith to Heaven.

He rends the oak—and bids it ride,
To guard the shores its beauty graced;
He smites the rock—upheaved in pride,
See towers of strength, and domes of taste.
Earth's teeming caves their wealth reveal,
Fire bears his banner on the wave,
He bids the mortal poison heal,
And leaps triumphant o'er the grave.

He plucks the pearls that stud the deep,
Admiring beauty's lap to fill:
He breaks the stubborn marble's sleep,
And mocks his own Creator's skill.
With thought that swells his glowing soul,
He bids the ore illumine the page,
And proudly scorning time's control,
Commerces with an unborn age.

In fields of air he writes his name,
And treads the chamber of the sky;
He reads the stars, and grasps the flame
That quivers round the throne on high.
In war renowned, in peace sublime
He moves in greatness and in grace;
His power subduing space and time,
Links realm to realm, and race to race.

WINTER.

BY MARY HOWITT.

There's not a flower upon the hill,
There's not a leaf upon the tree;
The summer bird hath left its bough,
Bright child of sunshine, singing now
In spicy lands beyond the sea.

There's silence in the harvest field,
And blackness in the mountain glen,
And clouds that will not pass away
From the hill tops for many a day,
And stillness round the home of men.

The old tree hath an older look;
The lonesome place is yet more dreary;
They go not now the young and old,
Slow wandering on by wood and wold;
The air is damp, the winds are cold,
And summer paths are wet and weary.

REVIVALISM.

BY DR. L. REECHER.

There is nothing so powerful as the many waters of human passion, and nothing so terrible as the overflowing of such a scourge; and a dispensation so calamitous would be more intolerable, and it is so utterly needless and would come so unexpectedly in the very dawn of a bright day. The perversion of the popular taste, and the extinction of popular prejudice against learning and a learned ministry, where an enlightened public sentiment, coupled with an enlightened piety is our all, would be to us what the incursions of the northern barbarians were to the Roman empire. It would stop all our improvements, and throw us back in civilization, science and religion, at least a whole century. It would constitute an era of calamity never to be forgotten, and be referred to by future historians as the dark age of our republic. There are parts of our nation, to which I might refer you, which were burnt over by such a revival some twenty years ago, where the abiding evils may still be seen in the state of society which has followed. And these too, with all their extravagances of falling, and groaning, and laughing, and jumping, and dancing, were regarded by many, and some very good men, as a new dispensation of the Spirit—a new mode of conducting revivals with power; and those who rode on the foremost waves, thought themselves to be, and were thought to be, raised up to be reformers in their day. Oh, my brother! if a victorious army should overflow and lay us waste, or if a fire should pass over and lay every dwelling in our land in ashes, it would be a blessing to be coveted with thanksgiving, in comparison to the moral desolation of one ungoverned revival of religion; for physical evils can be speedily repaired, but the desolation of moral causes is deep and abiding.

MUSIC.

"O music! the theme of bards from time immemorial—who can sing of thee as thou deservest? What wondrous miracles hast thou not accomplished? The war drum beats—the clarion gives forth its piercing notes—and legions of armed men rush headlong to the fierce and devastating battle. Again, the drum is muffled, and its deep notes break heavily upon the air; while the dead warrior is borne along upon his bier, and thousands mingle their tears to his memory. The tender lute sounds upon the silvery waters, and the lover throws aside his ear and imprints a kiss upon the lips of his beloved. The bugle rings in the mountain recesses and a thousand spears are uplifted for a fearful and desperate combat. And now the organ peals, and with its swelling notes the soul leaps into the very presence of the Deity."—Morris Matton's Paul Urie.

WONDERS FROM CULTIVATION.

There is scarcely a vegetable which we now cultivate, that can be found to grow naturally. Buffon has stated that our wheat is a factitious production, raised to its present condition, by the art of agriculture. Rye, rice, barley, or even oats, are not to be found wild, that is to say growing naturally in any part of the earth, but have been altered by the industry of mankind from plants not now resembling them, even in such a degree as to enable us to recognize their relations. The acrid and disagreeable opium graveolens has been transferred into delicious celery, and the colewort, a plant of scanty leaves, not weighing altogether half an ounce, has been improved into cabbage, whose leaves weigh many pounds or into cauliflower of considerable dimensions, being only the embryo of a few buds, which in their natural state would not have weighed as many grains. The potato again whose introduction has added many millions to our population, derives its origin from a small bitter root, which grows wild in Chili and Monte Vidco.

THE BENEFIT OF ATTENDING CHURCH.

"Well, Laura, give me a short sketch of the sermon. Where was the text?"

"Oh, I don't know. I've forgotten—but, would you believe it? Mrs. V. wore that horrid bonnet of hers! I could not keep my eyes off it all meeting time; and Miss T. wore a new shawl that must have cost fifty dollars. I wonder her folks don't see the folly of such extravagance; and there was Miss S. with her pelisse—it's astonishing what a want of taste some folks exhibit."

"Well, if you've forgotten the sermon, you have not the audience; but which preacher do you prefer, this one or Mr. A.?"

"Oh, Mr. A.—he's so handsome and so graceful; what an eye, and what a fine set of teeth, he has!"

HOME.—The only fountain in the wilderness of life, where man may drink waters totally unminged with bitterness, is that which gushes forth in the calm and shady recesses of domestic love. Pleasures may lead the heart into artificial excitement; ambition may delude it with his golden dream; war may indurate its fine fibres, and diminish its sensitiveness; but it is domestic love that can render it happy. It has justly been remarked, by an ancient writer, that of the actions which claim our attention, the most splendid are not always the greatest; and there are few human beings who are not aware, that those outward circumstances of pomp and affluence which are looked on with admiration and envy, seldom create happiness in the bosoms of their possessors. It is in the unrestricted intercourse of the domestic circle, the heart must find that real enjoyment, if experienced at all; is not in treading the complicated labyrinth of politics; nor amidst the glare of fashion, surrounded by the toils of state.

MERIT.—A man of brilliant talents, combatting the storms of adversity and misfortunes, is like the sun behind a cloud; hid, but not impaired—obscured, not forever, but only for a time, to shine with greater splendor when those storms are over, like the sun when the clouds have passed away.

MARRIAGES.

In Hamilton, on April 19, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. DANIEL HATCH, of Eaton, to Miss LOVINA SEXTON, of Hamilton.

In Schuyler, on the 5th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. JOHN WHITING, merchant, of the firm of Jones and Whiting, of this city, to Miss JANE WOOD, daughter of Mr. Calvin Wood, of the former place.

In Canajoharie, on the 28th April, by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. GEORGE HAWN, of Fort Plain, to Miss CAROLINE CROWFOT, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In East Bloomfield, on April 8th, ANDREW F. HARRIS, after an illness of about four years continuance.

The subject of religion early occupied his attention, influenced his conduct in life, sustained him by its consolations in sickness, and he found his hope to be the anchor of his soul in the hour of dissolution. Two days before his death I saw and conversed with him; he spoke of his early religious impressions, of the restraining influence of Universalism, of its abundant consolations, and looked forward to the hour of his departure with the most perfect composure. By his own request, the writer attended his funeral. He had selected the subject, the place of his interment and a hymn to be sung at the grave. As he had lived respected, he died regretted by all, and notwithstanding the unpleasant state of the roads a large collection assembled to testify their sympathy with a bereaved wife in the loss of her husband, a father in being deprived of an only son, a sister of a brother, and a large circle of relatives who knew him well, and well knew how to esteem him, "for the memory of the just is blessed." Oh that they may imitate, and if possible excel his many virtues, drink deeply from the fountain of everlasting consolation, and attest as he did, by actual knowledge, that "Universalism is good both to live and to die by."

The funeral was attended on the 9th inst., text 2 Sam. xiv. 14. Hymn sung at the grave, 444th, Streeter's collection.

In Rush, on April 13, FIDELIA, consort of Steward Porter, aged 39 years.

The deceased was a consistent believer in the doctrine of the impartial grace of God. She knew in whom she trusted, and was always ready to give a reason for her hope. Her sickness has been long and painful, but her hope has been unwavering, her confidence unimpaired.

She has a left a large family of children to deplore their loss, and while the writer would express his sympathy with them and with the truly bereaved husband, he would commend them all to the kind care of that God who chastens only for our profit.

In Russia, on the 3d inst., in the 15th year of his age, LEONIDAS, son of Elisha Lankton. The physical infirmities of this youth had been of long and painful continuance; it should be a consolation to his friends, that he has been removed by his heavenly Father from his peculiar afflictions in this life, to that glorious state of being where sickness and sorrow never come.

In Ames, on the 24th April, MARY, daughter of Highland and Cynthia Benton, aged 14 months. The funeral was attended at the Baptist church in Ames, on the 26th, and the comforts of the Gospel tendered by the writer.

In Guilford, April 25, CHARLES A. STOCKWELL, aged 20 years and 15 days, after a severe and painful sickness of 22 days. He was patient and resigned; and was respected and beloved in life, and is lamented in death. The consolations of the Gospel were administered by the writer, from Rom. xiv. 7, 8.

G. M., Jr.

In New-York, on the 24th March last, ABRAM EHLE, of the firm of Ehle, Bailey and Co., son of widow Delia Ehle, of Minden, aged 36 years, 5 months and 28 days. His body was preserved in ice, deposited in a vault, brought to Minden, and interred on the 15th inst., and the comforts of the Gospel ministered to a numerous concourse of friends and relatives, by the writer.

THE PREACHER.

INAUGURAL SERMON.

By REV. ALFRED PECK, of Pavilion, N. Y.

I would give you this morning, a preface to my future labors. Such department of a person's labor, whether written or spoken, is intended to inform the reader or hearer, of the main design; to bring into view the object and develop the general principles, and by preliminary remarks, prepare the way for the course intended to be pursued. I have chosen a motto, for what I have to say this morning, from the 10th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, last clause of the 29th verse.

"I ask therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?"

That we may understand the use and application of which this text is capable, we will briefly present you with the circumstances of the story with which it stands connected; and which, with the apostle, gave rise to the interrogation here repeated.

The first scene of the story is laid at Cesarea, once a city, situated on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, thirty miles north of Joppa, and sixty-two northwest of Jerusalem; inhabited by Jews, Samaritans and Heathens. It was named Cesarea, by Herod, in honor of Augustus Cesar: and in the short space of ten years after laying the foundation, from an obscure fortress, it became the most celebrated and flourishing city in all Syria. It is now without inhabitant, the abode of jackalls and beasts of prey. But in the days of the apostles, there were magnificent theatres, gorgeous palaces, and splendid dwellings; and men of nobility and wealth. Here lived one of the principal characters concerned in the plot, or groundwork of this instructive chapter. His name was Cornelius, a centurion, or commander of a company of a hundred soldiers, belonging to a cohort known by the name of the Italian band. He appears from his history, to have been a man of some farther notoriety than his official title—perhaps more distinguished and venerated for his moral worth, his piety and zeal, although a Gentile.

No sooner had he learned where he could receive the necessary instruction and become wise unto salvation, than (such is his readiness, his promptitude in obedience, his zeal for religion,) he sends a deputation of his household, to call to himself the man from whose knowledge he expected to be benefited, from whose teaching, led into what was consistent, rational and true in theory; or wholesome, virtuous and commendable in practice. But Cornelius was a Gentile; whose religion, to the religious world, appeared but delusion; whose zeal, but mockery. Where could Cornelius expect to find an individual, so far out from under the influence of popularity, the world's approbation and applause, and that sentiment of exclusive piety and distinction, which had so long inflated the breasts of the teachers of a religious world? Where a man that could be made to believe that piety and devotedness to God, regard for religion, and love for mankind, could be found in one of the disesteemed and despised Gentiles? On the scale of human calculations, with the experience of past ages, and the known prejudices of men in view, it was altogether improbable. God, therefore, had taken his work into his own hands, and opened the way for the dissemination of his truth, by turning all the fancied prudent counsels of men to nought, and making the devices of the people of none effect. God had raised up Peter under the instructions of our divine Lord, and prepared him by trials of fortitude, and taught him by visions of truth; to go forward in the discharge of his duty, regardless of the prejudices or applause of men, their smiles or their frowns; to humble the haughty heart, and bring down the proud looks of the self-exalted saint, and to exalt the lowly; that mankind might associate on the broad principles of charity, and consider each other as children of one common Parent, and walk together as brethren and friends.

Peter was, then, at what is now called Jaffa—at that time Joppa. It is one of the most ancient seaports in the known world; its traditional history extending back far into the twilight of time. Some, indeed, assign it a date anterior to the deluge.—Other historians ascribe its origin to Japhet, the son of Noah, and thence derive its name. It was situated on the east coast of the Mediterranean, on a promontory, or elevated point of land extending into the sea—thirty miles south of Cesarea, and forty-five westerly from Jerusalem. Cornelius having resolved to send to Joppa for Peter, the messengers departed. But ere their arrival, Peter's prejudices were removed; his doubts were expelled; his heart was charitably affected; his mind was enlarged, and he was prepared in his views and feelings to go. He had seen in vision, "the heavens opened, and a certain vessel as it had been a great sheet knit together at the four corners, let down to the earth; wherein were all manner of four footed beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter, kill and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord: for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again, the second time, what God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. This was done three times, and the whole was received up again into heaven." Both clean and unclean beasts were present in the visionary representation.

By the Jewish law, those animals were not considered as proper for food, which were not allowed to be sacrificed; and they were restricted from offering in sacrifice, those which thus were prohibited to be eaten. Hence, Peter at first seemed to doubt whether he might offer as a sacrifice to God the universal work of his hands; or feed on the fruits of his illimitable mercy and goodness. At length, reflecting that he had seen heaven opened, he considered his vision as a development of the divine purposes of grace. All had come down from God, and were again received up into heaven. The vessel might be an emblem of the universe, with all its various nations. The Gospel was to extend and carry its rich blessings to all the inhabitants of the four corners of the earth, without distinction of nation. God had cleansed that which was common: or, in other words, had removed the distinction between clean and unclean. He had removed the Jewish covenant by which they were his peculiar people; and by the introduction of another, in which there should be neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian nor Scythian, he had broken down the middle wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles: that they all should be one flock, under one Shepherd and Bishop of their souls. Thus was Peter taught the designs of God, in saving the Gentiles as well as the Jews, through a crucified Redeemer; those who had been considered as an irreligious and unclean race, as well as those who prided themselves in their cleanness and acceptance of God. Rise, Peter; the blessed sacrifice is prepared. Go, offer it to God; no longer contend that God is partial to the work of his hands. Let thy soul feast itself on the overflowings of divine mercy. Let the desires of thy heart be satisfied with the provisions of God's grace!

Meanwhile the messengers arrive and stand before the gate. Peter goes down and says, "What is the cause wherefore ye are come?" Having learned that his presence was desired by some of the Gentiles at Cesarea, with a heart eased of doubt and elated with joy, he departed on the morrow from Joppa. Scarcely had he arrived, when Cornelius met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him. But Peter took him up, saying, "Stand up; I myself also am a man." A private interview is held. Jewish prejudices are made known. An explanation takes place. And being all assembled before God, Peter commences his instruction.

The nature of the instruction expected, may be learned by adverting to the history of the affair, as recorded in Acts x: 6, 22, 32. It amounts to this—"to hear words" of Peter, and also to learn "what thou oughtest to do." By words, we understand the words of life, the Gospel of God. By what ought to be done, we understand what is virtuous and commendable in practice. We have in this same connexion, and following in the latter part of the chapter, a summary of Peter's preaching on this occasion. And though, as an abstract, it is presented in a very condensed form; it is truly an important epitome. Let us attend to it—see how Peter succeeded in breaking off Jewish prejudices—that we may learn what is, and ought to be expected of the ministers of Christ, in virtuous contempt of the tradition of the elders, and the invidious distinctions which pride and popularity would foster among mankind.

1. The first sentiment and doctrine advanced by Peter, to this his Gentile congregation, is on the character of God. How simple, concise and beautiful—how important, interesting and consolatory! "Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, I perceive of a truth, that God is no respecter of persons." He could discover the intelligent race of men formed out of equal dust. He was convinced they were animated by an emanation, an equal spirit derived from him, who is the "God of the spirits of all flesh." He had witnessed from the providences of God, and learned from his divine Master, that he "maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and upon the unjust." Subject, as they alike are, to weakness and infirmity—alike to helplessness and dependence—they are alike the subjects of the kind care and watchful providences of God. Made "subject to vanity," "as face in water answereth to face, so does the heart of man to man." Man's helplessness constitutes his claim upon the divine munificence—his misery, his strong plea for mercy. Jesus had taught his disciples, that not a sparrow could fall to the ground without the notice of Heaven—that God's intelligent children are of more value than many sparrows—that God would more abundantly give them his good gifts, than the best of earthly parents to their own dear offspring. God, who is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, kind to the evil and the unthankful, exercises no partiality of favor. Such is the first step in Peter's preaching—such the groundwork of his religion. Unlike his countrymen, he was not disposed to admit that God regarded with peculiar favor the high professing Pharisees, even though they bowed seven times a day before "the great and fearful name, the Lord our God;" or that he denied the blessings of his providence, or withheld the riches of his grace, much less viewed with an eye of vengeance, the ignorant dupes of idolatry and the unlightened soul, for knowledge it could never attain. Nay, God is no respecter of persons.

2. Peter proceeds to declare the duty of man for the justification and approval of Heaven. "But in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." You will here discover, that Peter laid no stress on matters of faith, holding forth the inheritance of heaven to the believer; and the miseries, and the deep, dismal groans of never-dying death to the unbeliever. He did not flatter either Jews or Gentiles, his converts, that they had a prospect of heaven, merely for rejecting their former faith, and believing as he believed, and subscribing to creeds, which

"Play round the head, but come not near the heart."

Nor, on the other hand, did he represent them as imbibing dangerous and even damnable errors—errors, which unless retracted, would land them into intolerable and interminable perdition. It is not for believing in any creed or doctrine, however righteous and true, that man stands justified before God. It is in fearing God and working righteousness—venerating his name in sincerity—regarding his works, and obeying from the heart his law; in whatever religion—in whatever nation, whether Jewish or Christian, Pagan or Mahomedan; here is the acceptance and approval of God.

3. Having thus said, Peter then proceeds to lay before them the nature of the Gospel, which through Jesus Christ is preached to the world. "The word which God sent, preaching peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all.)" Strangely as the mazes of human folly had led man on from trifle to trifle, from deception to deception, and from misery to misery; until the Eden of his peace was lost, and he felt the divine verity in his own bosom, "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked;" yet still more wonderful was the love, which sent forth the attending ministers of heaven, with their songs of "peace on earth and good will to men;" or which sent forth the blessed Redeemer, to preach the peace of God to those which "were afar off, and to them which were nigh." There is an important item to be learned, in what is here brought to view. Although there are distinctions in human life, "the righteous and the wicked"—"him that serveth God and him that serveth him not;" though "great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them;" while the wicked may "treasure up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God;"—though all this may be true, it is not the word which God sent by Jesus Christ. True, as is the idea, in the nature and fitness of things; permanent and enduring as it may be in the Law; yet, though the joy of faith passes understanding, and the humane, philanthropic and righteous, may feel an inward peace of mind that is like a river; still neither the self-complacency of soul, resulting from a course of well-doing, nor the ecstasy and rapture of believing, is the word which God sent by Jesus Christ. The difference existing between the righteous and the wicked, had long existed in the Law, and been known of man. Peace in believing is not the Gospel to be believed—not the word sent by Jesus Christ. If, then, the word which God sent, was the Gospel of our salvation; it is hence evident that it is neither a reward of our works, nor to be procured by faith. That it is not procured, nor secured, by faith, is evident by the fact, that it is the very thing, which existing, is presented to the understanding demanding our faith. That it is not a reward of works, is as evident, from the fact, that it is the gift of God. Nay, whatever the works of man may be; he may love God with all his heart, and his neighbor, in deed and truth, as himself; yet even this procures not salvation. He is not saved by his righteousness, and goodness, and love to God; but by the Gospel, God's love to man;—the word which God sent by Jesus Christ.

4. Having given the nature of the doctrine he held, the faith he maintained; Peter then proceeds to adduce the evidences of his religion:—those evidences which produced conviction in his own mind, the change in his faith and his conduct;—evidences which, when carefully canvassed, are sufficient to produce faith in every candid mind, in the truth of the Christian profession. We quote. "That word I say, ye know, which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached, how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power, who went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him. And we are witnesses of all things which he did, both in the land of the Jews and in Jerusalem, whom they slew and hanged on a tree. Him God raised up the third day and showed him openly: not unto all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead."

Here is an appeal to facts—strong and indubitable facts, which were then known, and are now recorded for the conviction of our minds, of the interposition of Heaven. The apostle was an eye-witness of the facts of which he speaks. That his narrative is true, we are fully persuaded. Had it been false, it might have easily been refuted. The scenes of the most material events, are not laid in remote and unfrequented places; the time fixed, is not some distant age; nor is the account given imperfect and general. His story does not relate to an obscure personage. Jesus Christ was a subject of universal notoriety. He preached and wrought miracles in the presence of thousands. It might in truth be said, "he spake openly to the world;" he had taught in the synagogue and in the temple, "whither the Jews always resort," and in secret he had said nothing. "Ye know," says Peter, that word was published throughout all Judea. Suppose ye, that men could be made to swallow down such dogmatism!—submit to, and tacitly acknowledge, that they knew that of which they had never heard? Could he talk of miracles, and such marvellous acts, with safety to his reputation or his cause, had none ever been done? But the facts were also known. Friends had wondered, and enemies found fault; for some of his miracles came in collision with the Jewish prejudices respecting the Sabbath. And with a boldness peculiar to those who are confident of the truth of their testimony, Peter says, "we are witnesses;" and how dare he add the charge contained in the next affirmation, if it is, indeed, untrue? "whom they slew and hanged on a tree." But they could not have forgotten the crucifixion of a man, whom they considered so much a deceiver—the superscription, which, either as mere mockery, or a just need of praise, was placed over him; "Jesus, of Nazareth, the king of the Jews." Neither could they have lost the recollection, that darkness overspread the earth at his crucifixion, and that an earthquake shook the ground at the moment of his decease. Could Peter expect to persuade his countrymen of these facts, if no such had ever occurred, at the time alleged, and within the space of their recollection? And more especially, that one so notorious as Jesus was, dying with the execrations of thousands upon his head, had been raised from the dead; if it were untrue? The enemies of Christianity were able to examine into the case; they were abundantly more willing than able. And not only so; if the pretensions were false, it was their duty to expose their fallacy. But none of their contemporaries ever attempted to confute these things; for "they were not done in a corner." Thus, then, by this appeal to the understanding of his hearers, and by this mention of a concatenation of circumstances—the existence, the preaching, the miracles, the death and resurrection of our Lord—does the apostle attempt, yea farther, succeed, to convince his hearers of the Messiahship of Christ, the interposition of God, and the resurrection of the dead.

5. Let us look at the prospects of the future, held forth in Peter's religion. It is a curious fact, that one of the highest and most important truths in the whole system of the Gospel; standing as the foundation of all our hopes, our joys and our prospects; is capable of being improved, and actually is here presented by Peter, as an evidence of the truth of the system. I allude to the resurrection. The doctrine of the resurrection inspires the hope of future being. But by abolishing death, the fact was demonstrated, and life and immortality brought to light. True, we might have received the idea from the teaching of Christ. But it is its exemplification and practical illustration, which set it upon the understanding through the medium of the senses; so that even those who were not witnesses of the fact, are not dependent upon vain speculation; but have the indubitable testimony of their fellow-men. And again, the fact of his resurrection is proof of his doctrine and his truth. What more powerful argument could the apostle adduce, to establish the truth, and demonstrate the consistency of his teaching?—When he speaks of an existence beyond the grave, of life immortal: he appeals to a fact of which they had heard, a fact with which he was acquainted; a fact of which there had been above five hundred witnesses, and many of them alive at the time. Thus, one of the strongest evidences in favor of his faith, was on a subject of the most importance in his faith. Peter was no Sadducee to deny the resurrection—no skeptic to deny and ridicule the obvious demonstrations of the divinity and power of Christ—no deist to object to the Messiahship of Jesus, and reject the evidences of future being.

6. Peter brings to view the judgment of mankind by Jesus Christ, in the following words. "And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be the judge of quick and dead." Christ is here declared to be the judge of mankind; but whether literally or metonymically, I shall not now stop to inquire. In the book of Revelation it is said, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Jesus says elsewhere, "The Son of man shall come in the glory of the Father, with his angels, then shall he reward every man according to his works." There are two things which we desire to notice from the consideration of these facts. If Christ be the judge, who will reward every man according to his works; he will not—nay, he cannot be the instrument of saving them from a judgment of which he has adjudged the sinner worthy. That is to say, if Christ will reward every man according to his deeds, he cannot grant them a salvation which would defeat the purposes of his judgment. Reverse the idea. If Christ came to be the Saviour of the world; he will not adjudge them to a doom, which must effectually defeat the plan of salvation. Again, another idea may be advanced on the premises before us. Christ, in judging the quick and dead, judges according to works and deeds, not according to belief and unbelief—not according to orthodoxy and heterodoxy in faith.

But in opening the subject here embraced, we are favored with an opportunity of advancing a farther idea; and of correcting still another prevailing mistake in the Christian church. We cannot from the circumstances suppose, that Peter looked forward for the scene of his judgment into another mode of being, beyond the boundary of earthly existence; and contemplated the fearful horrors of that "awful day of judgment," conjured up in the bewildered brain of fanatics, taught by creeds and the idle dreams of visionary theologians: but that the judgment was this side the "general resurrection"—this side the spiritual world. "And he commanded us to preach and testify, that it is he which was ordained to be the judge of quick and dead." Agreeably to this command Peter not only preached, but taught in his epistolary writings. 1 Peter iv: 5. "Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and dead." Paul taught a similar sentiment to Timothy.—2 Tim. iv: 1. "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom." Paul fully explained this sentiment to the Ephesians and Colossians. "And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." "And you being dead in the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened, together with him," etc. It is here obvious, that the dead, means the morally dead; and the quick, those who are "risen through the faith of the operation of God." "And hath raised us up together," etc. See Eph. ii: 6 and Col. ii: 12, iii: 1. Such are the dead whom Christ judges at his appearing and kingdom. Such dead are judged in a state of death. But no where in the divine word, do we read of the literal dead being judged in a state of physical death. The misapprehension to be corrected, is this:—It is not generally preached or believed, that the judgment takes place until after the resurrection. According to all fair construction, they are then quick, and not dead. Hence, if men are to be judged as dead, in opposition to quick, it must be morally so: and the quick, are those who are "raised through the faith of the operation of God." Such, undoubtedly, was the doctrine which Peter was commanded to preach and testify.

7. There is still one farther idea advanced in the apostle's preaching on this occasion. That is, "To him gave all the prophets witness, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." God had declared by his prophet, that the days should come in which he would make a new covenant, not according to his former covenant; he would be his children's God, and they the participators of his grace; and their sins and iniquities he would remember no more. The apostle had seen Christ given for a covenant of the people, and a light to the Gentiles; and having believed in God, and also in Jesus Christ, with a faith that worked by love and purified the heart, and led to a life of obedience; such was his confidence in the divine mercy, he felt the witness in himself, that, he that feared God and worked righteousness was accepted or justified, and that their sins were remembered no more. He had stated that Christ was ordained to be the judge of mankind: and by the mention of remission of sins, he obviously does not mean to controvert the fact, and nullify his former statement; or even intimate that, because their sins were remitted, the decisions of the Judge in his judgment of man's works, as a sinner, should be set aside. But having ceased to do evil and learned to do well—been brought to regard God as his father and friend, and obey from the heart those injunctions which alike embrace the honor of God and the good of man—he had felt his acceptance with God. And though, formerly, he had delighted in his own devious and sinful course, and been adjudged unto condemnation; the object of Jesus in his mission, and in his judgments, to humble his heart, subdue his passions, and save and bless his soul, was so far gained. Christ would no longer condemn; but looking upon him in his present obedience with acceptance and delight, he would remit his former sins, or remember them no more.

Such is the import of the apostle's preaching on this occasion. It contains, as we might naturally expect from the circumstances of the case, a general summary of his religion. It embraces, as we have seen, the character of God—the duty of man—the mediation of Christ, and the nature of the Gospel—the evidences of his faith—the prospects it held forth to view, and the salvation it taught—the rewards and retributions of man—and, finally, the remission of sins through faith, by which the believer, in the enjoyment of special salvation, has a foretaste of heaven, and an earnest of his inheritance on high.

In making an application of this subject, and the circumstances which called it forth, to those of the present occasion; you will permit me to say in the language of our chosen motto, "I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?" I humbly hope and trust, that while, on the one hand, my friends will not feel disposed to fall down and worship me, on the other they will not need to be told, that "I myself also am a man," with the feelings and wants of other men. Was it expected that I should succumb to the arrogant claims and invidious distinctions, perpetually held up by religious sectarians? Or rather, was it not expected that, like Peter, I should make no distinction but those of virtue; and, after the instruction of his vision, call no man common or unclean: and, with his independence and fearlessness of spirit, labor to remove those unfriendly prejudices which poison the felicities of life—strive to liberalize the social feelings of community, that man should see a brother in his fellow-man, and associate with him in the fraternal regards inculcated by his religion? "I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?" Is it, alone, to hear words, or learn doctrines of me? However highly you may value the system of doctrines which your servant would fain teach—however salutary you may believe their influence in life, and however consolatory in trouble—something more may be necessary, something farther ought to be expected, than a mere proclamation of the doctrine, although true; or an argumentative warfare with the errors into which we believe our fellow-men may have fallen. Of Peter, it was also said, "he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do." What ought to be done, in a moral point of view, is of more importance, than what we ought to believe. Our order is basely charged with immorality and licentiousness.—Though immorality does not injure truth; it injures its influence. In the warfare of truth and error, we can repel argument by argument. We can take the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, and quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. But allegations against our moral standing, can only be lived down—removed by well-ordered lives and conversation.

Let us advance in this subject, and consider some of the doctrines taught by Peter, as well as the circumstances of the case. He taught to others, what his perceptions had taught him; that "God is no respecter of persons." "I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?" Will it be expected that, to please (shall I say the humble or proud hearts? of) a popular religious community, I shall represent God, as being altogether like ourselves; with the weaknesses, passions, prejudices and partialities, which sway his heart, operate upon his feelings, and move him to unwonted pity? Or rather, is it not desired that, favoring apostolical teaching, inclining to the sacred oracles of written revelation, as well as drawing from the broad page of God's unperverted providences, I should teach the boundlessness of his goodness, his illimitable and universal love, and the impartiality of his grace towards all mankind? If the latter, I come unto you without gainsaying. If the former, I have not so learned Christ.

Again, the apostle next takes up the subject of works. On this, if I might make an application of the subject by applying our motto, I would ask for what intent ye have sent for me? Is it to teach you contrary, not only to the apostle's teaching here, but the general tenor of the Scriptures; that everlasting weal or woe is suspended on faith? Is it to incite your minds to virtue or righteousness, towards those of your fellow-men, in whom your hearts have no interest; but whom you, perhaps, may view as graceless, sin-hardened enemies of yourself, your religion, and your God; merely by opening the gates of paradise with one hand, and with the other brandishing the flaming sword of wrath? Or rather, is it not by presenting you with a still higher motive, and teaching that we are all the equal children of one common and impartial Father, whose requirements are our bliss, whose will is the happiness of all; endeavor to promote love and obedience to God, honor to his name, increase to our peace, and extend the general good, by stimulating to fulfil the law of love with our kindred.

Peter next introduces the Gospel, the word which God sent by Jesus Christ. On this subject I would ask for what intent ye have sent for me? Is it to teach that rewards and punishments are Gospel? That all the bitter regrets consequent upon disobedience, or the approving sentiments of our hearts, for what we may have done right and proper, are Gospel? Shall I torture the Gospel to receive into its service, the doctrine of endless misery? Shall I pretend to teach as truth, that this is its God-honoring, heaven-descended, Christ-taught, and soul-cheering theme? Or rather, would it not be desirable, that your servant should be able to set home to the hearts of the wanting and sorrowing, faintly hoping and almost doubting children of humanity, that salvation through his love is the gift of God? That immortality and eternal life, to the lowly sons of earth, is the bequest of high Heaven:

and that the blessed Jesus hath brought life and immortality to light, by bringing it down to the human understanding, and to the capacity and knowledge of man?

In the appeal to circumstances and facts, by Peter, to show the groundwork and evidences of his faith, he has manifested a candid but uncompromising spirit of truth; which seeks no collusion, and begs no terms of conciliation, with the enemies of religion. I would ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me? On the one hand, I presume it will not be expected, that I shall be cynical and pugnacious; and oppose for the sake of opposition. On the other hand, I hope it will not be desired, that I should either first, pertinaciously refuse to give the evidences of our faith; but content myself with the old truism of unthinking ignorance and timid superstition; "it is so, because it is so;" or, secondly, suffer Christianity to receive abuse, or my faith to be classed with infidelity and irreligion, nor offer reasons to undeceive and disabuse the public. Will it not be desired that in the straight-forward course of truth, regardless of Christian opposers, or the diversities of Christian faith and Christian prejudices; I should present arguments, which with me favor Christianity in general, or the peculiar views which I entertain?

Again we see that Peter presents the consummation of his religion and religious views, in the resurrection. I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me? Do you expect that I shall carry up my views, to the grand and glorious era, when the creation which was made subject to vanity, shall be delivered from this bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God? When, though sown a natural body, in weakness, corruption and dishonor; it shall be raised a spiritual body, in power, in incorruption and glory? When they shall be equal unto the angels of God, being children of the resurrection? Or would you, my friends, wish me to speculate farther? Can it be possible that any, though not among my immediate friends, would be pleased to have me if possible cut off this cheering prospect, and freeze the soul with blank annihilation: or worse than atheism, to harrow up the feelings, and agonize the soul, with terrific scenes of hopeless misery?

Once more I ask for what intent ye have sent for me? and my inquiry ceases. You probably expect what we all so fervently desire: that though, like Peter, I should preach the judgments of Christ—the rewards of virtue, and retributions of vice; yet still maintain the final success of the wisdom of God, and the scheme of his grace; until universal submission is obtained, universal obedience is exercised, and universal remission of sins is received, and they are remembered no more. Surely none could desire me to hold forth a theory that would sink the wisdom of God in the plan of salvation into folly—defeat Almighty power with a finite arm—rob the immaculate Jesus of his purchased possession—give success, final and eternal, to the adversary of souls, and blast forever the hopes and happiness of man. Rather, who would not wish that Jesus should succeed—destroy the devil and his works—see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied—that the prayers of the saints should be answered, when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and the triumphant and joyous exclamation, to the honor of the Most High, be repeated by all the infinite host of intelligences; "Alleluia for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." If, for the joyous purposes above expressed, you have sent for me; I would have no gainsaying. I cannot believe that the gloomy reverse, formed with you a motive for your invitation.

But before I close, you will permit me to say in behalf of myself—You may not expect an exhibition of learning and a display of talent, in each and every discourse. There are diversities of capacity to instruct, and diversities of taste to gratify. Happy and successful may we consider him, who occasionally succeeds to adapt his discourses to all. Who knows whether it may not be a wise ordinance of Heaven, that teachers should, from necessity, accommodate themselves to those capacities and tastes, whom pride, perhaps, would overlook. Who knows whether God may not give strength to the weak—bless the impotent though well-intended efforts of his servants, and send home with the demonstrations of his spirit and of power, the plain unvarnished tale of truth now, as well as formerly, those of his poor, though chosen fishermen. Submitting these remarks to your candid consideration, I shall expect—nay, claim your hearty concurrence in the worthy cause, and your friendly aid in every laudable effort: and close by commending our souls to the mercy, and our cause to the care of God. AMEN.

BRIEF CRITICISMS.....No. V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly; if the assassination could trammel up the conscience, and catch with his surcease, success; that but this blow might be the be-all and the end-all here—But here, upon this bank and shoal of time—We'd jump the life to come!"—MACBETH.

Shakspeare justly ranks high in the literature of England and of the world. No uninspired writer, ancient or modern, has more perfectly painted human nature—has more thoroughly sought out and laid bare the secret springs of action, and portrayed the hidden workings of those principles and passions which sway mankind in their intercourse with one another. The above quotation is a brief exemplification of these remarks. It clearly depicts the struggle which wars in the soul, when under the influence of strong temptation—it exhibits the process of reasoning which naturally passes through the mind, when crime is contemplated—and the influence exercised under these circumstances, by belief in different modes of punishment.

The good Duncan, king of Scotland, at the invitation of his kinsman Macbeth, had consented to become his guest. At the instigation of his ambitious and wicked wife, Macbeth conceived the sanguinary design, to assassinate the king, and seize upon the crown. The deed would be foul and dastardly; but the prize at which he grasped, glittered before his eyes, and the above is a portion of his communings respecting the consequences which might flow from this bloody act. "If it were done when 'tis done"—if he was certain that every evil consequence would be done with the deed—if with the blow which should pierce the heart of his unsuspecting victim, he could sever all the claims of justice upon him—"then 'twere well it were done quickly." If he "could trammel up the conscience"—if he could drown the voice of guilt, and pluck the sting from remorse—if the crime itself "might be the be-all and the end-all here"—if he could be sure of escaping all punishment in this life, he was ready to "jump the life to come"—he was willing to run the hazard of punishment for his sin in another state of existence!

In this soliloquy of Macbeth, we have an epitome of the cogitations of every mind which deliberately meditates the commission of flagrant crime. It is in vain to endeavor to cause mankind to refrain from sin, by proclaiming the doctrine that punishment is not experienced here, but is reserved to be inflicted endlessly in another world. This sentiment does not exercise that present, controlling, restraining influence, which is necessary to crush in the bud, every prompting to transgression. In meditating upon a sinful act, the first thought which arrests the attention, is its present consequences. "Can I escape detection, and the punishment of the laws of the land? Can I avoid the many evil effects of sin, which are entailed in this world, by the laws of God, of man, and of nature?"—are questions earnestly discussed in the mind of the man who is tempted to transgression. And upon the decision of this question, turns the scale of his resolution—the purpose is formed, either to commit the crime or withstand the temptation. If he believes he can escape all present punishment—all present evil consequences—he perpetrates the wicked deed. As to the endless retribution of another world, it can have but little, if any, restraining power upon him. Only let him become fully satisfied that he can escape all punishment in this world, and however firm he may believe in endless woe, he is willing, with Macbeth, "to jump the life to come"—he is ready to hazard the retribution of another world! Why? Because, in the first place, he looks upon that punishment as removed far from him in the distant future; and, in the second place, he has always been taught, and believes, that there is a way provided by which he can easily avoid that punishment entirely, however guilty he may be! This door of escape, therefore, neutralizes all the restraining influence which the doctrine might otherwise exercise over him; for all his wicked schemes are based upon the determination, that before it is too late, he will conform to the stipulated conditions, and thus not only avoid the punishment justly due his crimes, but thereby also exalt himself to the endless joys of heaven.

How different must be the influence of the doctrine which teaches a just retribution in this world! Convince men that God "judgeth in the earth"—satisfy them that for every wilful sin, an adequate, just punishment will be inflicted, from which there is no possibility of escape, and all the influence which fear of punishment can exercise over the sinner, is thus brought to bear immediately upon him. The doctrine of retribution for sin, cannot be taught in a manner to produce a more direct and powerful restraining tendency. Had Macbeth believed this sentiment, would he have imbued his hands in the life-blood of his king? Had he believed all the evils would befall him for this dark deed, which actually did, would he have been guilty of it? He certainly would not. But in full belief of the contrary doctrine—supposing he could so arrange his plans as to escape all punishment in this life, and that there was no difficulty in averting the retribution of "the life to come," he committed the flagrant crime. And what was the result? Did he receive the enjoyment he anticipated?—did "the assassination trammel up the conscience?"—did it fill his mind with peace, serenity and joy? Let him answer for himself; for true to the life has Shakspeare painted the picture:—

"Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood Clean from my hand? No; this my hand will rather The multitudinous seas incarnardine, Making the green one red."

"But let

The frame of things disjoint, both the worlds suffer, Ere we will eat our meal in fear, and sleep In the affliction of these terrible dreams, That shake us nightly: Better be with the dead, Whom we, to gain our place, have sent to peace, Than on the torture of the mind to lie In restless ecstasy [agon]—"

When will mankind learn to become consistent in their faith and practice? All human laws are based upon the principle of punishment in this life. But if people believe sin is only punished in the world to come, why not frame their laws in accordance with this belief? Why do not legislators of this faith, attach to the laws of their penal code, a penalty something like the following:—"And every individual who shall be guilty of transgressing the above law, shall, in the future world, be tormented forever, unless they repent before death?" In this manner they would cause their faith and practice to coincide. Do they imagine they are wiser than Deity? They insist that he has made this a state of probation, and that all punishment is reserved by him to a future life. If God has adopted this as the best rule whereby to govern mankind, why do they not imitate his example, and defer all the penalties of human laws, to the coming world? Why do they violate this supposed rule of the Creator, and make this life, in regard to human laws, a state of retribution, by inflicting all their penalties? They surely will not contend they know better how to govern mankind in this world, than the infinitely wise Jehovah!

The truth is, all men, every where, discover and acknowledge the propriety and necessity of punishing the guilty in this life, where crime is committed; and all human laws are founded upon the universal acknowledgment, that this is both just and salutary—the earthly welfare of mankind demands it. But in order to contend consistently, that the laws of God are administered upon different principles—that he only punishes the transgressor in a future world—it must first be allowed that he is either unmindful of the enjoyments of his creatures in this state of existence—or, being solicitous to promote their welfare, he has manifested less wisdom in arranging his laws to that end, than frail man! Is the opposer willing to adopt either of these propositions? If not, then I cannot discover how he can avoid acknowledging, that Deity, as well as human legislators, has constituted a just retribution in this world.

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. I.

BY EVANGELIST J. LEWIS.

I have seldom known an Editor of a Partialist periodical who would publish both sides of a discussion upon the subject of Universalism.

I have seldom known a sermon preached against Universalism, in which the doctrine was not more or less misrepresented.

I have seldom known an attempt to reconcile the doctrine of endless sin and suffering with the purity and benevolence of the Creator.

I have seldom known an opposer of Universalism who really understood the doctrine.

I have seldom known a man who believed in endless misery for himself.

I have seldom known a deist, atheist, or skeptic, who was not at the same time an intolerable bigot.

I have seldom known an unbeliever in Christianity who had ever read a work in its defence.

I have seldom known a genuine and intelligent Universalist who afterwards became a convert to the doctrine of endless misery.

I have seldom known a protracted meeting carried on without personal abuse.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART III.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ VIII. PROVERBS XXVI: 23.—"Drossy silver overlaying earthen ware, and ardent lips (i. e. lips making warm and eager professions) with a deceitful heart, are alike."

§ IX. JAMES I: 8.—"A fickle-minded man is unsteady in all his ways." This I think a better translation than that of the common or authorised version, inasmuch as double minded usually denotes deceit or hypocrisy, rather than fickleness or inconstancy. The meaning of the apostle I take to be this:—A man unsteady in his opinions, is in all his actions inconstant.

§ X. EPITAPH OF ATOLUS OF RHEIMS.—Is there not much beauty in the following epitaph? Who would not wish to "die the death of the upright," and deserve such an epitaph for themselves?—"He transported his fortune before him into heaven: he has gone thither to enjoy it." He was not one of those then,

"Struck with the rage canine of dying rich!
Guilt's blunder, and the loudest laugh of hell."

YOUNG'S NIGHT THOUGHTS.

§ XI. CHARACTER OF A GOOD PREACHER BY THE ARCHBISHOP OF CAMBRAY.—"I love a serious preacher who speaks for my sake, and not for his own; who seeks my salvation and not his own vain-glory. He best deserves to be heard who uses speech only to clothe his thoughts, and his thoughts only to promote truth and virtue."

§ XII. GOSPEL BY MARK: OCCASION AND SCOPE OF.—GEHENNA.—Peter having publicly preached the Christian religion at Rome, many entreated Mark, who had long been the companion of Peter, that he would commit the particulars of Peter's discourses to writing. When Mark had finished his Gospel, he delivered it to the persons who had made this request. Such is the unanimous testimony of ancient writers, which is confirmed by internal evidence. Thus, the humility of Peter is conspicuous in every part of it; his weakness and fall being fully exposed, and the things which might redound to his honor, being either slightly touched or wholly concealed. There are numerous Latinisms which show that it was written by a person who had lived among the Romans. That it was intended principally for Gentile believers is further evident from the explanations he introduces, which would have been unnecessary had he written for Hebrew Christians. Thus, in chapter i: 5; vii: 2; and vii: 11; and instead of the Hebrew word mammona he uses chremata for riches. Again, the word gehenna, in the common version improperly rendered hell, originally signified the valley of Hinnom, where infants had been sacrificed to Moloch, and where a continual fire was afterwards maintained to consume the filth of Je-

Jerusalem—about two miles distant. As this word could not be understood by a foreigner, the evangelist or historian adds the words (ix: 43) “unquenchable fire,” by way of explanation.

§ XIII. GOSPEL BY MATTHEW: SCOPE OF.—This Gospel was written in Hebrew, A. D. 38, and afterwards in Greek, A. D. 61. It was written in Judea for the use of the Jewish nation, while the church consisted wholly of the circumcision, that is, of Jewish and Samaritan believers. It was written with a view to confirm those who believed, and to convert those who believed not; also, I think, very manifestly to remove those imperfect notions of the extent and nature of the divine law, which the Jews generally (universally?) entertained, considering the letter of the law as the complete rule and measure of duty, and placing religion in the observance of rites and ceremonies, and ascribing to themselves sufficient power of doing the divine will without the divine assistance. Matthew has chosen such parts of our Saviour's discourses and history as were best suited to the purposes of awakening them to a sense of wrong-doing and guilt—of abating their self-conceit and overweening hopes—of rectifying their errors, correcting their prejudices, and exalting and purifying their minds and moral principles. Hence the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, or reign, in opposition to their expectations of a deliverer from Roman subjugation, and a dispenser of temporal felicity, is prominently displayed; likewise the pure and perfect laws by which it is administered; and the necessity of vital and universal obedience to them, are set before them in various discourses, beginning with the sermon on the mount, to which Matthew hastens, as with a rapid pace, to conduct his reader. Christ's answers to the most considerable of the objections against him as the expected Messiah, are also here fully related.

At the time in which this Gospel was first compiled, the believers in the Messiahship of Jesus Christ were ridiculed, persecuted, and in every injurious way assailed by those who held him no better than an impostor. The Gospel bears many obvious references to such a state, and many very apposite addresses to the injured and the injurious party. Thus, the evangelist informs the injured and persecuted Christians that their afflictions are no more than they had been taught to expect, and had promised to bear when they embraced the Gospel (x: 21, 22, 34, 35, 36; xvi: 24);—that, though unreasonable as the effect of the malice of their enemies, their sufferings are yet useful, as trials of their fidelity (v: 11; xxiv: 9, 13);—that, though they were grievous to be borne at present, yet they operated powerfully to their future joy (v: 4, 10, 11, 12); that a pusillanimous desertion of their faith, so far from bettering their state, would expose them to greater calamities, and cut them off from the hopes of the promised reward (x: 28, 32, 33, 39);—that they were not, however, forbidden to use lawful means of preservation, but even enjoined to put them in practice whenever they could do it with innocence (x: 16, 17, 23);—that the due observance of the Christian precepts was an excellent way to appease the wrath and fury of their enemies, therefore, a matter of prudence as well as of duty (v: 39; vii: 12, 21–27; v: 13–20); better to suffer than by base compliance to incur their Father's displeasure (xvi: 25–27; x: 28). On the other hand, to calm the passions of the enraged Jews, and win them over to the profession of Christianity, he labors to soften and abate their prejudices, and engage them in the practice of meekness and charity (ix: 13). To this end he eulogises a benevolent disposition (v: 43–48; xviii: 23–35); and frequently insists on its rewards both here and hereafter (v: 5, 7, 9; x: 40–42; xviii: 23–35; v: 21–26; xxv: 31–46); and also upon the punishments and pains of cruelty (xxiii: 27–39; x: 14, 15; xxiv: 2,) etc. etc.

These and similar arguments which Matthew has inserted in the body of his Gospel (euangelion, or good news), by way of comfort to the afflicted Christians, and also as a warning to their injurious oppressors and persecutors, evidently refer to a state of distress and persecution. Now this Gospel was written at the time of the greatest persecution ever raised against the professors of Christianity, while composed only of Jewish and Samaritan converts. This great persecution was commenced by the Sanhedrin or supreme court among the Jews, consisting of their most powerful and influential men, and was afterwards conducted by Saul, (afterwards Paul,) with implacable rage and fury. During this calamity, which lasted in the whole about six years, until the third year of Caligula, A. D. 39 or 40, the Christians stood in need of all the support, and consolation, and assistance that could be administered to them. What could serve this purpose better than the example of their suffering Master, and the promises he had made to his faithful followers?

I recollect, my dear friend, with what increased interest, and understanding, and attention I first perused this Gospel, after having become acquainted with the principal particulars in the foregoing exposition. I trust that a knowledge and consideration of these circumstances of the people for whom this narrative was primarily composed, and of the object or scope of the writer, will throw a fresh flood of light and beauty upon the composition, and cause it to be a much-read, often-pondered, and profitable subject of study.

§ XIV. GOSPEL BY LUKE—WRITER, TO WHOM WRITTEN, SCOPE.—Luke, “the beloved physician,” was a companion of Paul. Leaving Paul he went into Greece, and there composed his Gospel, A. D. 63 or 64. That Luke wrote his narrative for the benefit of Gentile converts, is affirmed by the unanimous voice of Christian antiquity, and it may also be inferred from his dedicating it to one of his Gentile converts. This explains why he does not give the genealogy of Christ as Matthew had done, by showing that Jesus was the son of David, from whom their Scriptures taught the Jews that the Messiah was to spring; but by tracing his lineage up to Adam, agreeably to the mode of tracing genealogies in use among the Gentiles. The following passages are all obviously introduced for the purpose of encouraging the Gentiles to hearken to the “good news,” and to turn to God in newness of life, and with a pleasing prospect of pardon and acceptance (xviii: 10–14; xv: 8–10, 11–32; xix: 5; xxiii: 40–43; x: 33; xvii: 19; ix: 52–56; iv: 25–27; xxiii: 34). The scope of Luke's Gospel was to supersede the defective and unauthentic narratives which were then in circulation, and to deliver to Theophilus, (a man of rank in Greece,) a true and genuine account of the life, doctrines, miracles, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Luke appears to have derived his information rather from eye and ear witnesses than from Paul, as has been supposed.

The history by Luke may be divided into five parts. Part first contains the narrative of the birth of Christ, together with all the circumstances that preceded, attended, and followed it. (chap. i, ii: 40). Part second comprises the particulars relative to the infancy and youth of Jesus. (chap. ii: 41–52). Part third includes the preaching of John, and the baptism of Jesus, whose genealogy is annexed. (chap. iii.) Part fourth comprehends the discourses, miracles, and actions of Jesus Christ during the whole of his ministry. Sec. first—the Temptation. (iv: 1–13.) Sec. second—transactions between the first and second Passovers, A. D. 30, 31. (iv: 14 to v: 39.) Sec. third—transactions from the second Passover to a little before the third, A. D. 31, 32. (iv: 1 to ix: 50.) Part fifth contains an account of the last journey of Jesus to Jerusalem, including every circumstance relative to his passion, death, resurrection, and ascension. (ix: 51 to xxiv.)

UNIVERSALISM IN OHIO.

Should you wish to know the progress of our cause here, I can assure you that the prospects are good, although every exertion of our opposers has been put in requisition the season past, to check its spread. There are found in the ranks of our common enemy, Mormons, Campbellites, Footites, Baptists and Methodists, all of whom appear to have adopted Jedediah Burchard's high pressure for making converts, and have united heart and hand to oppose the doctrine of a world's salvation by Jesus Christ; but although this combination has raged and their converts imagined strange things in this section, during the fall and winter past, yet the march of liberal investigation is onward, and universal salvation is shining into the once benighted minds of rejoicing hundreds. Universalism has many tried friends in Madison, Perry, Le Roy, Concord, Chardon, Wellenbury, Mentor, Newbury, Windsor, Orwell, Bloomfield, Geneva, and Mesopotamia; and I believe the time is not far distant when the intelligent community of the Western Reserve will arise in the dignity of primitive Christianity, and sever the chains of ecclesiastical tyranny and oppression.

The unmerciful doctrines of endless wrath, infinite sin, and an angry God, are becoming unpopular, and the good sense of an enlightened people will soon bury such absurdities with Salem witchcraft, and never afterward pray for their resurrection, and adopt in their room the tidings of peace on earth and good will to men.

THE RISING GENERATION.

“Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.”

If this sentiment be strictly true, how comes it that so many who have been “trained up” in Partialism, when they grow older and attain to years of understanding, embrace Universalism? Because they have not been trained up in the way they should go.

The way in which we should go is undoubtedly the way of wisdom, which is pleasantness, and whose paths are peace. This way is, of all others, not only the safest, but easiest to walk in, but so perfectly agreeable that those who have been “trained up” in it, will have no inclination to “depart from it.”

Now there is only one right way, while there are many wrong ways; and hence a child, if left to his own unguided, inexperienced course, is most likely to pursue a wrong way. He should therefore be “trained.” It requires some drilling and discipline, in order to form the characters of children, and in this, I fear that we, as a people, are, in many instances, lamentably deficient—far behind our Unitarian brethren.

I would not urge the expediency of aping Partialists in every measure they may adopt; but certainly we should not let them excel us in any good thing. If sincere in their faith, it is laudable for them to endeavor to form the characters of their children according to its principles; and it must be admitted that in this, they manifest great zeal. They make Sunday, especially, a day of religious culture to their children.

The means they employ, we consider misjudged. Yet, in the motive and the perseverance with which it is pursued, methinks they are worthy of imitation. When I see the children of Universalist families, strolling at large on the Sabbath—indulging in indolence, in pastime, and what is worse, in vices, I tremble for the character of the succeeding generation. If we would have them soldiers who shall take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit, fight manfully in the Christian warfare, and overcome the world, the flesh and the devil, let us make the Sabbath a moral training-day. Let us take our children to the sanctuary, and early impress upon their minds a love of order, and a taste for worship. They will grow up the happier, the healthier, the civiler, the wiser, and the more cleanly.

I would also recommend, where it is practicable, the formation of juvenile Sunday schools and Bible classes. The apostle has exhorted, in regard to children, that we “bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.” We need not over-task their intellects, or curtail their proper freedom. We need not catechise them in mystery, or compel them to commit error to memory; but let them be "trained up in the way they should go, and when they are old, they will not depart from it."

UTICA, SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1836.

DR. SLEIGH AND THE SKEPTICS.

This gentleman is an Englishman by birth and a physician by education. In lecturing on human physiology in Philadelphia city, he asserted that true philosophy (or nature) and revelation always agreed with each other—or words to that purport. He was attacked on that proposition by Russel Canfield, Editor of a skeptical paper, (and coadjutor of Dr. Ely in the attempt to put down Universalism,) and a public debate ensued. Mr. Canfield, a Philadelphia lawyer, and a gentleman of New-York were opposed to Dr. Sleigh. After a discussion for five nights, the skeptics withdrew from the discussion, and a committee from New-York challenged the Doctor for a discussion in that city. He accepted it, and met three gentlemen there as antagonists. After a few evenings, one of them refused to continue the debate, because the Doctor turned his skeptical arguments into ridicule—that is, as supposed, pushed them to conclusions more remote and ridiculous than the skeptics were willing to admit. The other two continued till the nineteenth night, when the most prominent one declined further debate, declaring that he should never more publicly advocate his system. The Doctor, however, continued his lectures, giving one hour at the close of each for any one to propose objections. But few were offered. At the close of his last lecture, which was on the resurrection of Christ, he challenged reply. After a long pause, it was offered, by one of his late antagonists, to reply if the Doctor would postpone it for some time. The Doctor refused, and expressed his astonishment that his opposers should ask time to prepare for refuting a subject they were so frequently in the habit of lecturing against! A few objections were then made, and replied to by the Doctor, in such a manner as to silence his antagonist. And there the debate ended.

But lately, I see by several notices in the Philadelphia United States Gazette, one of the most respectable and creditable papers in that city, that the Doctor is again engaged in a discussion with the skeptics in the city of brotherly love. It is said he is, as usual, eminently successful, and that the skeptics quail before his arguments. The truth is, to refer to an old anecdote, they "caught a Tartar" when they challenged the Doctor. They supposed he knew but little about theology, being a physician, and they could have it all their own way with him; whereas it appears that Dr. S. is not only well read in the Bible, but has all the stores of Lardner, and other defenders of religion perfectly at command. Yet so long have Canfield, Olfert and others, boasted and challenged, that they must now go on from defeat to defeat as best they may—for back out they cannot without total ruin and disgrace. Have they not then re-enacted the anecdote?—"Hollo, Patrick, I've cotched a Tartar!" "Well, bring him along then." "Oh, but I cannot." "Well, then, honey, come along without him." "So I would, Pat, but then, he won't let me!"

It is said the New-York discussion is to be published in one large volume, octavo, giving all the essential arguments of the skeptics with the Doctor's replies. It will make a volume of more than 1200 pages! and if the Doctor's arguments are but half as good—half as effectual as they are said to be—it will be a highly valuable work indeed.

The account here narrated is given from memory alone, as read in the Boston Christian (Unitarian) Register, and one or two other periodicals, names not now recollected.

From what I can learn I should infer that the Doctor is an English Unitarian, and owes much of his success to the confinement of the controversy to pure, simple, primitive Christianity, as exhibited in the Bible, rather than in the thousand different creeds of a corrupted theology.

The following article is taken from a Philadelphia paper.

A. B. G.

"The discussion that has been going on for sometime between Dr. Sleigh for the authenticity of the Bible, and Messrs. Burrill, and Sinclair for infidelity, terminated last evening, the 5th inst., by adopting unanimously the following resolutions, which were submitted by Jacob Stout.

1. Resolved, That in the judgment of this meeting, Messrs. Burrill and Sinclair have departed from the rules of the discussion in refusing to answer Dr. Sleigh, when on the offensive.

2. Resolved, That in the judgment of this meeting, the Doctor has satisfactorily answered all their arguments while they were on the offensive.

3. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting, that Messrs. Burrill and Sinclair have utterly and entirely failed to substantiate any of their objections against the Bible, and that Dr. Sleigh has met and answered all their charges—and triumphantly vindicated the truth and divine origin of the Bible, and proved conclusively that the Bible is the word of God.

The above resolutions were carried without a dissenting voice.

RELIGION AND SUPERSTITION.

Widely different as are these two, no twins are oftener mistaken for each other than they. The bigot, wrapped up in self-righteousness—or the coward, trembling before the supposed vindictive wrath he deems his crimes to merit—both mistake superstition for religion, and enter into her service, believing it to be the service of God. On the other hand, the skeptic, the indifferentist or the open and licentious scoffer at all goodness, deeming all virtue a cheat and all piety a pretence, is perpetually mistaking religion for superstition.

May we not beg both parties to become well and duly acquainted with both these personages, that they may be enabled, ever after, to know one from the other, and each choose according to his liking?

Burton, in his celebrated "Anatomy of Melancholy," quaintly remarks, that "The part affected of superstition, is the brain, heart, will, understanding, soule itself, and all the faculties of it, totum compositum, all is mad, and dotes. * * * A lamentable thing it is to consider how many myriads of men this idolatry and superstition (for that comprehends all) hath infatuated in all ages, besotted by this blind zeale, which is religion's ape, religion's bastard, religion's shadow, false glasse. For where God hath a temple, the diuel will have a chapple: where God hath sacrifices, the diuel will have his oblations: where God hath ceremonies, the diuel will have his traditions: where there is any religion, the diuel will plant superstition; and 'tis a pitifull sight to behold and reade, what tortures, miseries it hath procured; what slaughter of soules it hath made," etc.

It is true, the reverend old "Democritus, Junior," appears to be not altogether free from the complaint himself, if we may judge by his firm belief in the great power of a semi-omnipotent personal "diuel;" yet it is not always a disparagement of the skill of the physician, to say he has been sick of the disease he essays to cure. The learned Burton may therefore be trusted in his description of those who most foster superstition—bad, disolute, irreligious, avaricious and selfish priests. It is true, he speaks of "the monstrous and superstitious brood," of "the bull-bellowing Pope"—sons of the Roman Catholic church; but the picture is no less true of some of the grand-children than of the children—of the brood of some of the Protestant churches holding the same doctrines. He calls them "so many whetstones, to make other tools cut, but cut not themselves; though they be of no religion at all, they will make others most devout and superstitious, by promises and threats, and compel, enforce from, and lead them by the nose like so many bears in a line."

But whoso wishes to see "all the causes, symptoms, prognostics, and several cures" of melancholy, and that disease itself, "philosophically, medicinally and historically opened and cut up," in "three partitions, with their several sections, members and subsections," must turn to the ancient work of "Democritus, Junior," entitled "The Anatomy of Melancholy." For the information of all lovers of the quaint, ancient and learned, and of ample quotations of Latin and Greek, I will merely add that an American edition, in two volumes, 8vo., has lately been published by Thomas Wardle, of Philadelphia, (15 Minor-street)—from the thirteenth English edition.

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

There have been many inquiries made for this work, by ministering and other brethren. A new and much enlarged edition has lately been issued at Boston, separate from, and connected with the Phrenological Library, of which it forms the 7th volume. We have a few copies in both forms—price single, $1.00. The Library, (Gall's works complete, and this,) $7.00 for the seven volumes. Though the price is much greater than former editions—especially than the pamphlet edition—yet for those who want a work for their libraries, this edition, so much enlarged, is offered at a fair price. The work is, one of the most valuable ever published on that subject, and has been printed in Europe for distribution, by tens of thousands of copies.

THE PHILADELPHIA DISCUSSION.

I believe this excellent work, (the discussion between Dr. Ely and Dr. Thomas,) is not kept for sale by any of our booksellers in this section of the State. Judging from my own knowledge, I am also led to believe that very few, if any, (I should say none,) of our opposers purchase it. Copy after copy is sold to Universalists—but no copies to Presbyterians, or Baptists, or Methodists. Why is this? Do they fear to read a work in which one of the most experienced, learned and talented doctors of their divinity opposes a young man who received but a common education—a printer by trade—whose experience is limited within the age of 29 years, and a ministry of eight years at most; and that under the disadvantages of several years of toil to prepare himself for the very duties he was performing?

Can this be possible? Will they admit such a fear as their reason for not purchasing and reading the Discussion? If so, what must be that system, which they profess to believe, and which cannot be successfully defended with every advantage in its favor? What must Universalism be, which is thus to be feared in its power, with all these disadvantages on the part of its defender? We pray our opposers to think of these things.

But it will be said such is not the reason. What, then, is it? Indifference to the subject? This, surely, will not be admitted by those who rejoice so much over reported conversions of Universalists, and who profess so much anxiety for our spiritual welfare and salvation.

What, then, is the cause? They are ignorant that such a discussion has ever taken place; and much more are they ignorant of its publication in a neat, well filled volume. Universalists, every where, know all these facts of the case—thirteen thousand copies of the Discussion were circulated at the time it was in progress, by our periodicals—and since then, upwards of five thousand copies have been distributed among Universalists in the book form; and all this while very few of our opposers know anything on the subject! Astonishing.

But why have our opposers been thus kept in the dark? For the same reason that their teachers and Editors have concealed, as long as they could, the fact that Universalism was the general sentiment of all Germany. They are afraid the people may lose their dread of Universalism, and be encouraged to examine it for themselves. And they know, (at least many of them do,) that if the people ever examine the subject, they will find, that the keepers of their consciences have lied to them most abominably respecting Universalism and Universalists—misrepresenting the one and slandering the other. This is plain language; but in my soul I believe it is true. Who can name a Partialist preacher—a single one of either denomination—or the Editor of a Partialist journal, that has recommended the careful perusal of this work—or the full and candid examination of both sides of the question therein discussed? Universalist preachers and Editors do and have done these things frequently—warmly—earnestly—have urged it as a duty—but Partialist Editors and preachers, with the exception Dr. Ely himself, (and I believe he does not recommend the work,) have never done it—at least, but seldom, if ever. What is the matter? Can our Partialist lay brethren and sisters tell us? A. B. G.

"GOD AND THE FATHER."

A correspondent wishes to know the meaning of this phrase, which frequently occurs in the Scriptures—whether it means two beings, one of whom is God, and the other the Father—or whether it means only one being; and if so, why such phraseology is used? I think his question is easily answered. His difficulty arises from considering "God" and "Father," to be proper names, whereas, strictly speaking, they are titles only. We say, President of the United States and Commander in Chief of our military and naval forces—meaning one and the same person, only, by both these titles. God, (Saxon, good—which is the same word, and the same meaning as our English word good,) in the original is equivalent to the same, as it means the venerable or the adorable, and goodness, only, deserves this homage. It appears to be applied as a title equivalent to judge, or ruler, inasmuch as "they were called gods to whom the word of God came," and Moses was made a god to Pharaoh—i. e., a judge, or lawgiver to him, or a ruler over him. In this sense, Jesus may also bear this title.

As the English title, Father, needs no explanation, it is believed the foregoing will be sufficient to set at rest the mind of our correspondent on this subject.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

It is a long time since I have introduced our readers into my study, and permitted them to read the letters of some of our worthy and intelligent friends and correspondents. Nor have I much time to spend now in this pleasant intercourse. I could at present, with much propriety, inscribe over my study door the motto inscribed over his by a worthy man of old—"BE BRIEF." And therefore, if the reader has no objections to being hurried, I will, without further preface, despatch the introduction and privileges to which it admits him.

The following excellent letter and better news was carefully laid aside for publication when first received; and overlooked ever since. But it is not yet too late, we trust. Br. Upson is one of our preachers who labors all the week on his farm, and can handle a pen as well as a pitchfork. As to his love for the truth, none can doubt it; for he is a volunteer in the Gospel field, laboring at his own expense. It is to be hoped, our lay brethren and sisters in that vicinity, who are "alive," will aid him to live also, according to their means—for surely, it is not well to "muzzle the ox that treadeth out the grain." At least Paul thought so, as well as A. B. G.

"Hornellsville, March 23, 1836.

"Br. GROSH—When I wrote to you a year ago, we were in an uncomfortable situation in our society. Through much labor and anxiety we brought matters of difference to a settlement. Our society came under new regulations, and we were once more a people of whom it could be said, 'they live.' We had some additions. This was accomplished in September last. Soon after we were visited by Br. Whelpley, by whom the ordinance of baptism was administered to four candidates, and the eucharist was by us received.

"We at first appointed regular meetings once in two weeks. This did not satisfy long. We must have at least conference meetings, on the alternate Sundays. And next we appointed one evening in the week, and lastly, Sunday evenings. At these our conference meetings, we 'look beyond the watchman,' for we all—yes—we all preach, read, sing or pray, as we feel inclined to do it. This evening we expect to dissolve our evening meetings—our Sunday meetings will still continue.

"We are few in number, and not wealthy—therefore, we are only able to make up a little something, now and then, when a preacher from a distance sees fit to call and preach with us, without paying anything for home business. In every other sense our cause is onward—the brethren and sisters are awake and full of life. An increased anxiety is excited; a deeper examination of our cause has taken place. Our young men have provided themselves with Pocket Testaments which they carry every day, and whenever they meet with each other, or with opponents, whether at meeting, or private house, highway, store, mill or shop, religion is the first topic, and they draw their swords and fight like soldiers of the cross, and sometimes their is a triumphant conquest.

"Good times these—I rejoice to see the Scriptures more in use; and especially when our youth take them in hand for examination, I think that something is going on.

"March 24—As I told you, our evening meetings are dissolved for the present season. Last evening we had an interesting time—we could in sincerity thank God for the happy seasons we had enjoyed, 'and trust him for what is to come.'

"A. UPSON."

The following true and faithful confession from a brother who has renounced the hidden things of darkness and dissimulation, is worthy of attention, and the advice it gives will, I trust, be practiced by many to whom it is directed. Let our redeemed Br. H. R. read Proverbs xxviii: 13. We thank him for his letter, and feel certain, if his industry keeps pace with his present honesty and independence, he will remain our patron during his natural life.

"Redford, Ohio, April 21, 1836.

"Messrs. EDITORS—Having emigrated from the State of New-York to this State about two years since, Providence placed me among a set of rigid Partialists; and being a poor mechanic and wishing to get employment, I tried to disguise my sentiments as much as possible. I thus continued to reside among them for some time, without being suspected. But the time arrived when I could no longer dissemble. The notorious Foot came into the place to hold a protracted meeting, and I was beset and compassed about for several days and nights, until I could hold my peace no longer—and blessed be the Lord that it was so! for I had no more peace of mind, while I denied the glorious truth of the Gospel, than Peter had when he denied his Lord. How many Universalists there are in our land who are in similar circumstances, I know not; but I am persuaded there are some, and I would say unto them, 'Hold your peace no longer; for if we hold our peace, the stones will cry out. Take the Magazine and Advocate and read it yourselves, and lend it to your Partialist brethren that they may know what our doctrine is; for I am persued great good can be done in this way—for there are some rational minded men among them.'

"I am a poor man, but as long as I can earn enough besides my daily bread, to pay for the Magazine and Advocate, I shall continue to take it; so when I discontinue the paper, you may know the reason. H. R."

The following extract is from the letter of a subscriber who, like many others, passed from Calvinism through Arminianism into deism—shocked at the character each ascribed to God, and the inconsistencies both views palmed off upon the Scriptures. He long lived in detestation of these once venerated abominations, wishing for more light than deism afforded, but unable to find it. Immortal life and endless joy were dreams, more beautiful, but no less false than the horrid pit filled full of sin and woe by an all holy and all benevolent Creator of the universe. But at last a change came, and—but let his letter speak for itself.

"Louisville, Ky., May 4, 1836.

"The first dawning of light that beamed across my mind, was about twenty months ago. It was my good fortune to get hold of a remnant of a volume of sermons, by Rev. H. Ballou, and you may easily guess the effect it had upon my mind. It was as a refreshing shower on a drooping flower, to my spirits. Light after light continued to break in upon the darkness of my mind, until I became an entire new man—until the fog was completely dissipated from before my view, and I was enabled to harmonize the apparently contradictory passages of Scripture in accordance with the honor and character of a wise, just and good God. I now make your valuable paper my weekly companion, and find it worthy of the name it bears. I would to God that it was more extensively and generally read than it is. S. M."

Brs. Smith and Skinner have been out West during the past and present weeks; and self will have to be absent at the Convention this week—the apology for any deficiencies that may be noticed. A. B. G.

POETRY.

FAREWELL.

The following hymn was sung by the choir at Fly Creek, Otsego county, at the close of Br. Potter's valedictory sermon, previous to his departure for Lockport. It is selected. A. B. G.

Dear brother, fare thee well,
With joy go on thy way,
The glad tidings tell
To all without delay.
Thanks to our Lord and King above,
He sends refreshing showers of love.

Let cheerful voices raise
Our hearts on wings of love,
To thank, adore and praise
Our blessed Friend above.
Thanks to the great eternal King,
With holy joy his praises sing.

Brother, farewell again,
Though sad we feel to part;
Since thou canst not remain,
Go on, with joyful heart;
And from thy consecrated breast,
Proclaim salvation to the West.

Brother, go on, we say,
Thy work is well begun,
Rejoicing on thy way,
For truth and light will run;
And thus the wicked foe repel—
And lastly, brother, fare thee well.

SUBSTANCE OF A LECTURE ON ELOCUTION.

Delivered before the Law Association of the city of New-York, April, 1836,

BY PROF. SAMUEL N. SWEET.

Elocution is doubtless a frequent subject of reflection; but it may not have occupied so much attention as its importance demands. In ancient times it implied the wording of a discourse; but since the days of Sheridan and Walker, it has been recognized as that branch of rhetoric which belongs exclusively to delivery. It means the manner of reading and speaking, and not the matter; the tongue and not the pen. This is so universally the sense in which it is now understood, that no modern author or lecturer of whom I have heard, excepting Ex-President Adams, has presented the subject in any other light. He maintains, in his lectures on rhetoric and oratory, that elocution now as formerly, refers to the diction and not the delivery.

In Greece or Rome, teachers of the science of speaking well, were called rhetoricians. They are now known by the appellation of elocutionists. In the days of Quintilian, Aristotle, Demosthenes, and Cicero, those who practiced law were called actors. They are now designated by the various appellations of lawyers, barristers, attorneys, counsellors, etc. Mr. Adams might, I think, with as much propriety, call gentlemen of the bar of our own time, play actors, as to say that elocution means, in this enlightened age and among this people, the style in which an individual writes, in contradistinction to the mode in which he reads and speaks. Let me not be understood as entertaining an unfavorable opinion of Mr. Adams's lectures. They are very excellent; superior in some respects to those of Dr. Blair. But in my opinion, the most elaborate and valuable work that has ever been issued from the press in relation to this subject, is Dr. Rush's "Philosophy of the Human Voice." All other books that have been published subsequently to that, are only "fruits of the vine which he planted."

Anterior to the publication of Dr. Rush's work, elocution was considered only as an art. He has erected its materials into a science. He has classified and divided the thirty-five elements of the English language. A knowledge of these elements as single specific sounds, is conducive to the attainment of accuracy, force, and beauty of expression. Their true pronunciation, aided by an elocutionist, may be easily acquired. And by practicing on the separate elements and in other exercises in elocution, articulation may be greatly improved and the voice rendered smooth, powerful, flexible and melodious.

On this subject, I speak, as the old Roman said, "what they do know," whose organs of speech have been submitted to the gymnastic training which Dr. Rush recommends.

Nature undoubtedly makes a great difference in the capacities with which she endows her children; but art makes a still greater difference. Cicero tells us that "the poet is born, the orator is made." Quintilian was of the same opinion. He says: "Let them enjoy their persuasion who think to be born is sufficient to make a man an orator; they will pardon our labor who think that nothing can arrive at perfection, unless when nature is assisted by careful cultivation." The truth is, that "nothing is given to mortals without indefatigable labor." So thought the late Hon. William Wirt, for he says in his excellent letter addressed to a young man, about to enter upon the study of the law, that "it is a fiat of fate from which no power of genius can absolve youth, that there is no excellence without great labor." So thought Sir Isaac Newton, who discovered the true system of the universe by constantly thinking upon it. So thought Dr. Franklin, at whose electric touch, the vivid lightnings kindled up a blazing lamp along the vaulted skies. He was a model of industry, every way worthy of our emulation. He aimed his arrow at the sun; and although it did not reach that luminary, it ascended to the clouds. Had he lived in ancient days, he would have been deified. It is well that the time has passed by, in which divine honors are paid to erring men. But "the good that men do," ought not to be "interred with their bones." It should be cherished, ever green, in the grateful remembrance of posterity. "So let it be with Franklin."

So thought Demosthenes, who, although hissed by the audiences before which he first appeared, with an ardor that could not be quenched, devoted several years to the study of eloquence, and expended some thousands of dollars in the payment of a rhetorician. After having attained accomplishment in elocution, he again appeared before the Athenians, and with what powerful eloquence did he call upon them to stretch out the mighty arm of freedom against the usurpations of Philip!

So thought Cicero, who did not attempt to address his fellow-citizens until he had superadded to well-regulated reasoning powers, the graces of a pure and polished education. He studied it thoroughly for nearly forty years, and in what an enchanting manner did he address the Roman senate against the conspiracy of Catiline! On one occasion, the eloquent lips with which he spoke, constrained "great Caesar," contrary to his predetermination, to pardon Ligarius, Cicero's client. Did not Demosthenes and Cicero, by practice long and dexterously pursued, in their favorite art, enrol their names on the temple of fame? We cannot all be great, as were those to whose history I have adverted; but without the vigorous exertion of our powers, we cannot be anything. Does not the illustrious Forrest, who in early life was without friends and without any resources excepting those of his own mind, owe his unparalleled success in the histrionic art, to his own indefatigable exertions and undying perseverance? It is an honor to our country that she gave him birth, and to this metropolis that she has liberally sustained him. How much encouragement does this single example of unwearied industry, offer to the enterprising youth of America!

In England, the language of Americans is closely watched and narrowly criticised. It seems then that the honor of our country calls on us to endeavor to be correct in our enunciation, and distinct in our utterance, every where, especially in his majesty's dominions, the king of Great Britain. When Americans call government, goverment, providence, providence, been, ben, president, presedunt, shriek, sriuk, ghosts, ghos's; when the other sex call Lord Byron's Bride of Abydos, "Lud Be-ron's Abedos," shall we charge England with undervaluing the elocution of her transatlantic brethren, because she complains that it is defective? But having looked on this side of the Atlantic, now let us look on that, and see if England is entirely free from errors in articulation. Lord Brougham pronounces Birmingham, Brunnegum, and O'Connell calls weapon, reapon. Such errors may be traced to the bad habits, growing out of ignorance of the elements of the English language, and want of particular attention to elocution.

[Concluded next week.]

MARRIAGES.

In Trinity church, in this city, on Wednesday, the 18th inst., by Rev. P. Alexis Pical, Mr. ELI MAYNARD, Proprietor of the Utica Observer, to Miss MARY L. DOWNER, of Kortright, Delaware county.

Printers generally know a thing or two. With the above came a neat, rich wedding cake, handsomely frosted, and a bottle of sparkling wine, sealed, but not so tightly but what the contents leaked out, after it had been duly handled by all connected with the office. May the fortunes thus happily locked up together in the chase of matrimony, find the index promised by hope, duly moved in the volume of life—each proof free from errors—each impression, fair—each page, in good register—and every miniature edition be a true copy of the originals.

In New-Hartford, May 19th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. JAMES MAPES, of this city, to Mrs. LYDIA KNOWLES, of the former place.

In Watertown, on the 5th May, by Rev. P. Morse, Rev. JOSEPH A. ASPINWALL, of Leyden, Lewis county, to Miss FRANCES MAINE, of Henderson, Jefferson county.

DEATHS.

At Sackets Harbor, on the 6th inst., Mr. ELIJAH HARLOW, aged 67 years. Br. Harlow possessed an unblemished moral character, a devotional spirit, and strong faith in the impartial grace and salvation of God. His faith was particularly illustrated in life, and gave him peace and comfort in sickness and death. As an affectionate husband, a kind father, a peaceable citizen and an exemplary Christian, he will long be remembered by a numerous family circle and many friends. His funeral was attended on the 8th inst., by a crowded and solemn assembly of worshippers, when a discourse was delivered by P. M.

At North Bloomfield, May 11th, Rev. ELIJAH SMITH, pastor of the First Universalist society in that place, in the 40th year of his age. His funeral was attended on the 15th, by Br. Chase of Geneva.

Br. Smith's health had been very poor for some length of time, so as to lead him to doubt, at times, at least, of his recovery. In the last letter I received from him, he remarked very feelingly on that uncertainty, and expressed his entire willingness to depart whenever it should please God to call him home, but added—"as to my continuance here, I can only say in the language of the pious Murray, as long as God has work for me to perform on earth, I am immortal." In that sentence spoke the full soul of Br. Smith, one of the excellent of the earth—mild, pious, humble, affectionate and confiding in God—talented, earnest and industrious in his endeavors to bring others to the same Christian-like spirit and enjoyment of Universalism. My acquaintance with him by personal intercourse was very brief, and imperfect, but sufficient to satisfy me that the above character given of him by those who knew him well, was richly merited on his part, and appropriately bestowed on theirs.

THE OLD MAN'S EXPERIENCE.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

"I relate what I have seen."

Say, mortal say, by Him who rules above,
Which prompts to noblest actions—fear or love?

The golden orb of heaven had retired behind the western mountains, and multitudes of light clouds overspread the horizon, through which the full moon floated in tranquil majesty, while her silver rays were reflected by every wave of the expansive "lake of a thousand islands." Gently were the waters rippled by the evening breeze, softly did the night-wind sigh in the woody bowers. All was hushed in sweet repose, save one solitary horseman, who had for sometime been leisurely pacing his way along the margin of this field of waters, as if to prolong the delightful scene; but recollecting the growing lateness of the hour, he put spurs to his horse, and with accelerated motion was dashing his way to the nearest inn, when his before sure-footed steed unluckily stumbled, and precipitated its rider with great force to the ground. Feeling much bruised and unable to continue his journey, he made the best of his way to an humble, but neat little cottage which stood within sight; where, after rapping gently at the door, it was opened by a tall, majestic figure, whose white and scattering locks and snowy beard told they had already been bleached by the frosts of seventy winters. Learning our traveller's misfortune, he very kindly offered him his hand, and bid him a hearty welcome to such as his lowly mansion afforded.

The old gentleman still retained the noble powers of intellect unimpaired; cheerful, sensible and communicative in conversation; open and consistent in his manners; in short, one of those who perform an act of kindness, not because it is esteemed good, but rather for the luxury it affords to a sensitive and benevolent heart; one of those rare spirits we sometimes meet on our journey, whom, before we know why, we feel we can trust as a friend and love as a brother, and whom no change in the fluctuating events of succeeding time can obliterate from memory's page. Such was the good, the venerable Stedman. His family consisted only of himself, wife, and a granddaughter, an interesting child aged twelve years. A soothing balm, readily administered by the hand of kindness, if not altogether calculated to make the wounded whole, served at least to alleviate pain. The refreshing meal was soon prepared, where familiarity, good sense and good will were the richest sauces.

"My friend," said the old gentleman to his guest, "you have been very unfortunate this evening—speaking after the manner of men—for so it appears to us short-sighted mortals; but doubtless it was designed to accomplish some all-wise and benevolent purpose. How frequently do we sigh over that to-day, which to-morrow, as it were, causes us to give thanks to the Most High! How strong a lesson of reconciliation! and what confidence, what trust, should we repose in the almighty Controller of events, 'who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works.'" "Such a confidence in divine protection," replied the traveller, "must be a source of much enjoyment, and I have sometimes wished that such a faith was mine, even though it were but a creature of the brain—a phantom of a heated imagination." "I see," returned the good old man, "that you are somewhat skeptical upon the subject. I rejoice the more in this meeting—such was my state—I have been there before you. If you will favor me with an audience, you shall have a sketch of my past life. But I am intruding upon the hours of rest, which your situation so much requires, to-morrow you will be better able to hear my story."

Our traveller soon found himself very comfortably lodged for the night, but the novelty of the entertainment, the prepossessing expression of countenance, and the interesting manner of his aged and sympathising host, dwelt so strongly on his mind, that it was long ere the "drowsy god" hushed him in the arms of refreshing slumber.

The next morning he arose with the rising sun, and found himself much better than he had anticipated. After the usual duties and hospitalities of the morning were over, Mr. Stedman, seating himself in the massy arm chair, while one hand gently rested on the family Bible which lay on the antiquated stand beside him, thus commenced: "Well, brother, (for such I feel that you are, in more than one sense of the term,) I will now fulfil my last evening's engagement, provided you think you can listen with patience to the religious experience of an old man." His guest assured him that he was very anxious that he should begin, and should listen with much pleasure.

"I was born," resumed Mr. Stedman, "on the banks of the far-famed Connecticut, in the State which bears its name. Of my mother I have no recollection, she having died when I was an infant; but my father, though of a feeble and delicate constitution, survived her a few years. He left two sons, Charles and James, of which I am the youngest. On his deathbed he committed us to the care of a wealthy uncle, who, having no children, seemed pleased with the charge and adopted us as his sons. He spared no pains in conducting us 'in the way in which we should go,' and being a deacon in the church in our neighborhood, a Presbyterian after the strictest sect, we were carefully indoctrinated in all the mysteries of the trinity, election and reprobation. The Sabbath, in our juvenile years, moved tardily on; a day of listlessness and inaction, when the very face of nature seemed to wear an awful solemnity! It was called 'holy time,' and to converse upon worldly matters, or read any other book than the Bible, Catechism, psalm-book or a volume of old sermons, was deemed sinful in high degree; and to have spoken a word against our minister, at any time, would have been thought as heinous as was the sin against the Holy Ghost in the apostolic age!

"When I was about eighteen, there was what was called an 'awakening' in our town, in which great numbers were added to the church. My brother and I were fully in the belief, that if we did not submit sooner or later, and join the church, we must inevitably writhe in endless flames; but being naturally gay and volatile, fond of indulging in the amusements of life, which reason told us were innocent, we remained stubborn and unyielding for some time; till one of our youthful playmates sickened and died very suddenly, who we were informed had left this world without making his peace with God, despairing of his mercy! This had the desired effect—it was too solemn a warning to withstand. We yielded ourselves implicitly, as clay in the hands of the potter, to the dictates of those whom we thought God's peculiar people, zealous of good works. I need tell you we were happy, since we then thought that God, who was before our enemy, had become our friend. At first we could pray, and pray devoutly for all mankind, and ardently desired that every wanderer might come to the fold of Christ and become the rich partakers of our heavenly Father's illimitable love! But we soon learned that we were becoming too liberal in our prayers; for in consistency we could not pray for all men, when our creed told us that the elect were a chosen few; far the greatest proportion being reprobates. How could we ask for the accomplishment of what we believed God never intended to perform, and what was in perfect opposition to his will and design? Impossible, if we would be true to the Master whom we served! When we pay our homage to a being whose love extends to a few, and whose tender mercies are never realized only by a part of the human family, shall we, weak and frail children of the dust, exercise love towards all, and be merciful to those for whom he has no mercy? Shall man be better than his Maker? If he whom we take for our guide, the object of our worship, the great standard of all perfection, hate those who rebel against him, shall we, finite mortals, cultivate feelings of pity and compassion for them? No! consistency, reason, justice forbid it!

"If we would point out a pattern of goodness and loveliness for the youth to imitate, we should certainly select one whom we thought their superior in the virtues and graces. What should we think of that parent, who could place his beloved sons under the tuition of a tyrannical despot, to learn the principles of humanity and philanthropy? We should not hesitate in pronouncing him insane; especially if he had held him up to their infantile minds as being worthy their imitation.

"Then let us cease to wonder that partiality, oppression and persecution are stalking throughout the land. I have known and 'do testify' that the narrow and cruel creed of Partialism teaches us to esteem ourselves better than others, and to despise and persecute those whom we look upon as reprobates, hated of God and created for the glorious purpose of displaying his vindictive justice in their indescribable and eternal wo! Its fruits, I have found by close observation and dear-bought experience, to be invariably the same in kind, although existing in different degrees of perfection, according as its votaries more or less faithfully imitate the God they worship. Soon after being 'born of the spirit,' and becoming one of the favorites of the Most High, I treated my former associates with cold neglect and haughty scorn, and the story that was so readily invented and propagated to their disadvantage, which before would have unsheathed my keenest weapons of defence, I could listen to with an approving smile! Nor was I alone—neither was mine an extreme case. Those of my acquaintances of the like faith, (to their honor be it said,) generally conducted with the same consistency. I ever detested hypocrisy in all its varying forms, and strange as it now seems, was at that time candid and sincere; and I am induced to believe that there are still a large majority of the many advocates of the vindictive cruelty of God, who truly suppose, while devising plans to extirpate what they term 'heresy,' and abusing and persecuting those who will not ascribe to the divinity the character of a Molech, that they are doing God service!

"But, to return. The members of our church generally consisted of the wealthier portion of community, and were abundantly able to support a priest in the best style. They did so. Our minister came amongst us poor and humble, despising wealth; but in a short time his fortune became ample, as I never knew him to refuse, at least, the conveniences of life. Large sums were frequently raised to send the Gospel to the perishing Heathen, articles of clothing without number, prepared for the suffering missionaries, and the calls of the poor within our own circle of religious faith, were punctually attended to.

"At length my uncle, whose pecuniary affairs had become somewhat embarrassed, refused to give so large donations as formerly, which created some little dissatisfaction among the brethren.—This, together with another circumstance of greater weight, which happened about the same time, eventually proved a source of jealousy, division and contention.

"A friend and relative of ours, who had always been 'kind, true and faithful' in all the afflicting events of life; under the most aggravated circumstances, was called upon to part with an affectionate wife and a beloved and only son. The bereaved husband and parent, bowed down with grief for the irreparable loss he had sustained, came and begged the use of our church in which to have a funeral discourse delivered; informing us that he had engaged a minister from a distance—a preacher of 'the restitution of all things'—a Universalist. Our minister upon hearing the request, gave a positive and flat denial—as did a majority of the members of his church. My uncle, brother and myself were among the exceptions. Listening for once, to the voice of sympathy and humanity, we warmly plead the cause of our suffering friend. The day was carried by our opponents; but a fire was kindled which could not be so easily extinguished. We were accused of promoting dissensions, and attempting to introduce 'damnable heresies' into the church of Christ. Several attempts were made to hush the disturbances among ourselves, but every effort seemed but the cause of greater animosities. Seeing no hope of again enjoying tranquillity in their borders, we requested a discharge; but they refused to grant it on any other terms than excommunication; and we were soon formally 'delivered over to the adversary,' with the most solemn warnings and the severest anathemas. We had now learned a lesson which could not easily be forgotten. Yet, although we began to doubt the infallibility of the church, we still faithfully adhered to its peculiar doctrines, amidst the envenomed darts of jealousy, falsehood and slander.

"Our uncle, who was rapidly declining into the vale of years, and who had very evidently, for some time, been much depressed in spirits, grew feeble, dejected and melancholy; which at length broke out into fits of insanity and madness! No tongue could describe the agony of our feelings, nor thought imagine, for a moment, the acuteness of his sufferings! He raved—tore the locks from his hoary head, and dashed the cup of consolation with maddening fury to the ground. At one time, he would speak in the most moving terms of the severity and cruelty of the church; at another, of his own infinite and unpardonable sins; and anon, with the most blasphemous oaths and imprecations, curse his Maker! After lingering for some months in this hopeless and excruciating state, watching an opportunity, he put a period to his wretched existence!

"No sooner was the vital spark departed, than his once loving brethren, who had proved themselves devoid of feeling previous to his death, with fiend-like malignity pursuing the fleeting spirit, pronounced its irretrievable doom!

"Is this, thought I, religion—and are these its fruits? Is this the boasted benevolence and love which its votaries possess? Is this indeed the Christian character? Then, farewell. No longer will I be deceived by your wily arts, or your fair garb which covers the basest of hearts! I have proved your charity—I have scanned your designs. So long as I was a dupe to your machinations, and a tool to assist in framing the fabric of your own contriving—so long, you gave me a gladdening smile and the warm pressure of friendship's hand. But as soon as I exercise any will of my own, discordant with yours, what a horrible reversion of the picture do I behold! Go! I will no longer be deluded by your ignis fatuus beacon. The children of this world, whom ye treat as reprobates, cannot be more cruel and heartless than you!

"Such were my thoughts, while meditating upon the unhappy close of the life of my much esteemed uncle, and that insensibility and harshness which had been manifested by those whom we once considered, above all others, our friends.

"Leaving our native State, my brother settled in the western part of New-York, while I, with a more roving disposition, contemplated a tour to Europe. I sought out new associates, and formed new friendships, chiefly among those whose prejudice and hatred towards the religionists of the day, were even greater than my own. These served to strengthen and increase my antipathy, and in a short time the very name of religion became abhorrent to my soul! I crossed the 'broad Atlantic wave,' and visited the grand metropolis of England. Here I found the merciless extortions of bigotry and superstition under the mask of the Christian religion, united with the State, and gathering tithes by the power of the civil law. Wherever I turned my eyes, I marked their blood-stained footsteps, and beheld their cruel ravages on the human mind!

"Frequently, in the hour of reflection, I contrasted my then present, with my former condition. I had enjoyed what I believed to be the 'faith once delivered to the saints'—a compound, consisting of pride, esteeming myself better than others; of charity, to those who exercised faith in things incomprehensible; and hatred, to heretics and the enemies of God, whom I believed that he always hated and determined to punish with ceaseless woe; highly seasoned with the fear of an angry Jehovah, or rather the endless hell which he had prepared for his rebellious subjects. For it is true, that though I considered myself one of the 'elect,' yet as it could not be known to a certainty, distressing doubts and tormenting fears would sometimes harass my mind almost to distraction; even though I had once flattered myself that I was 'willing to be damned for the glory of God!' My creed I found too limited to satisfy. I was now released from its contracting thralldom. Acknowledging no power higher than that of earth, I resolved to follow the light and law of nature as my only guide. Yes, I was a cold, cold-hearted skeptic; but I felt that my present belief (or rather disbelief) was preferable to my former faith.

"Why, said I, to the enthusiastic devotee, send your Gospel to the burning climes of Africa or the hostile coasts of Asia to enlighten, what you call, the perishing Heathen? Their God is as good as yours—they are as happy. If there is an endless hell prepared for them, as you say, far more horrid than they have conceived, why bear to them the appalling news? Why not suffer them to glide down the stream of time in happy ignorance of its awful termination? Far better would it have been for mankind, if what you term the Gospel, had been hidden in the inextricable labyrinths of Egypt, or sunk in the fathomless depths of the ocean! The sword, fire, rack and gibbet, have been used alternately as engines to spread your boasted Revelation over this fair, and otherwise peaceful globe!

"Three years had now rolled away since I landed in the Eastern hemisphere. That inestimable blessing, health, had been my constant attendant; and the bright sunshine of prosperity had encircled me with a perpetual halo. Save some gloomy anticipations of futurity, which, like unbidden guests, would occasionally crowd themselves upon my hours of meditation; I passed careless and reckless down the swift careering current of time, heedless of its approaching end. But there came a day of trial for my boasted philosophy, which I had vainly thought immovable as the everlasting hills. Yes, I was shortly to prove to the world that that philosophy which had been acquired by having the sensibilities blunted by continued buffeting, did not maintain such absolute dominion over the mind, but that it might be shaken. My health evidently was on the wane, my success in trade diminishing, and my associates seemed ignorant and destitute of that soothing cup of consolation which my situation so much required. My truant thoughts again winged their flight to the soil of my nativity. A thousand recollections and pleasing associations continually hovered around my weary couch, and invited me to return. I felt that I still might have a brother who would alleviate my cares, and dispel the gathering gloom which enshrouded my mind. Suffice it to say I quitted England forever; and with it, my companions, with a heavy heart—never to see them again.

"On board the ship, shut out from the changing world and its busy throng, I spent many hours in dreary solitude and reflection. Unable to repose, I frequently paced the deck the live-long night, feeling that I was an isolated being. Sprung up like the withering mushroom, like that, too, I was destined to be trodden under foot and forgotten! I gazed alternately on the twinkling stars, and on the boundless expanse of the mighty deep, and cried, Shine on, ye refulgent hosts, in all your beauty and splendor—but what, in the course of a few short days, will all your charms be to me? And thou—O, thou mighty mass of waters!—thou shalt be the same as now, when this frail, tottering fabric shall have left not a single vestige behind!

"Such were the melancholy ideas which filled my soul. I had no fear of death—no!—but then I had likewise no hope!

"Our fast sailing vessel soon wafted us o'er the boisterous sea, and her crew were safely landed on the New-England shore. My health was considerably improved by the voyage, and I hastened to settle my affairs at the East, that I might pay a visit to my brother, whom I had already apprised of my arrival. But scarcely had a week elapsed, before I received a letter in return, requesting me to make no delay, as a few short hours, or days at most, must terminate his life, he being in the last stages of that hopeless and incurable disease, the consumption. This was an electric shock which I was ill prepared to bear. I immediately set out for the West, and bracing my mind with all the arguments in my power, to promote fortitude and resignation, resolved to meet the worst, calmly and unflinchingly.

"My journey proved pleasant, the weather being remarkably fine. No lowering cloud lingered above the horizon—no chilling blast swept through the vale. My mind gradually became composed and tranquilized; harmonizing, in some degree, with the delightful season and the surrounding scenery. Here, risen Phoenix-like, from the wild morass or the impenetrable wood, smiled the gay and thriving village; there, the broad and expansive farm, with its portly mansion, met the untiring view; while anon, peeped out a rustic dwelling, which as yet, had scarce felt the scorching rays of the noonday sunbeam; but the hardy woodsman, with oft-repeated strokes of his heavy axe, foretold the speedy humiliation of the sturdy sons of the forest, while a laughing group of rosy urchins, clad in party-colored garbs, sported beneath the cooling shade, and, like the timid deer or tameless pheasant, when surprised by a passenger, slunk behind the adjacent brambles, there, with eyes wide rolling, viewed the stranger man, till the last lingering glimpse faded away.

"In the space of a few days, I found myself at the village of B—, the place of my brother's residence. It was a late hour. I approached his dwelling. All was silence within, save a soft female voice, reading the volume which I had so long despised. The words, 'we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, (for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed),' fell from her lips in an animated and thrilling tone; and the well-recognized voice of him whom I held 'most dear,' responded with emphasis, 'thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.' I felt that I would not, for worlds, excite a doubt in the bosoms which were throbbing thus with the ecstasies of hope. In a few moments I was at the bedside of my dying brother. Extending my hand, he eagerly seized it and pressed it to his bosom, with seemingly more than mortal grasp! 'Now, O my Father,' he ejaculated, raising his eyes beaming with joy and gratitude, 'thou hast answered my last prayer! Now can I truly depart in peace! My dear brother, how ardently have I prayed that I might live to see and converse with you, once more, on the shores of time. O, James, I am going—but I fear not death—my faith is founded on the immutable promises of God!—Understand me. You recollect we once predicated our salvation on particular election, foolishly believing that our heavenly Father was infinitely better to us than to a large majority of his children. Vain and blasphemous thought! Do not the Scriptures teach that he is good unto all and his tender mercies over all his works? And did he not, while we were yet sinners, give his Son to die for us? But, my brother, I have learned with regret that you deny the Lord that bought you, and are living without hope and without God in the world. I ask you not the cause—already I know the origin of your skepticism—the utter worthlessness of that faith which we once professed. But I think you have been too hasty. I beseech you to read again—and to examine attentively, candidly and prayerfully.

“He paused—for his breath came scantily, and his feeble pulse scarce told that life still lingered around its tenement of clay. After lying silent for some time, he fell into a sleep, or rather a state of torpidity, from which we feared he would never revive; but it afterwards seemed only a preparation for the closing scene; for, when the morning came, as the orient sun with his piercing rays illumed the drapery of his couch, he awoke, and pointing to its cheering beams, said with a most benignant smile, ‘See, see! he comes—the glorious emblem of the Sun of Righteousness! Happy, thrice happy dawn—typical of the great resurrection morning, when all shall know the Lord from the least unto the greatest, whom to know is life eternal! Most precious, soul-cheering faith! I can embrace all mankind in the arms of affection, and calmly bid them adieu, with the fullest assurance that I shall meet them again in a far happier state, at the final restitution of all things.’

“Yes, O my God, I come, I come!

Supported by thy arms,

And cheerful leave my earthly home

To hail immortal charms!”

“The chilly sweat of death burst from his pale and icy brow—his dark and penetrating eye, beaming with love and animation, seemed fixed with intent gaze on happier worlds than ours; piercing with more than mortal vision the hidden mysteries of futurity; while the fleeting soul, wholly collected within itself, calmly and fearlessly relying on the illimitable goodness of its divine Creator, with joy inexpressible and full of glory, passed smilingly away to that God who had made and sustained it through one stage of existence, and in whom it trusted to guide and conduct it through the countless ages of eternity.

“Such was the death of my ever kind, faithful and beloved brother. His tender and affectionate wife I expected to see inconsolable for the irreparable loss. My heart essayed to comfort her with words of consolation—but I found them not! The balm was hers. I heard her exclaim amidst her tears, ‘Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight!’

“O, my God, I involuntarily cried, let such faith and such hope be mine! I had witnessed death in almost every situation of life, but I had never beheld such a triumphant scene as this. I had never before envied the soul of the dying its happiness, or the bereft its resignation, but now, I felt that either state was far preferable to mine.

“With a trembling fervor I clasped this neglected Book, with the warmest desire to know ‘what is truth’—and blessed be God, he hath opened my eyes to behold his goodness—even given me that truth which maketh free indeed! Two score years and ten have rolled away since the era of my faith in a world’s salvation, and never for a moment has it wavered. Full well am I aware that it is every where spoken against—being termed a doctrine of licentiousness; but prejudice, not reason, has given the decision. Shall I, think you, love my God less than my neighbors, because I believe that He is infinitely better? Shall I strive the less to please

Him and obey his commands, because I believe that He is good, not only to myself, but unto all?

“My friend, let us suppose, for instance, two adjacent islands, governed by two distinct monarchs; one, affectionate, kind and indulgent, seeking the happiness of his subjects—punishing only for the purpose of reforming the offender: the other, harsh and severe, careless of their welfare; in anger, punishing crime with the most horrid and excruciating tortures for the purpose of displaying his vindictive justice; which of the two would have the least eye-service—whose subjects would be the most willing and obedient, and whose be the most devoted to the cause of their royal master?

“It has been said that ‘love, and love only, is the loan for love;’ and true it is, that hatred produces its like. If that person can love his Creator who looks upon him as his friend, with what joy, what devotion and adoration, should he love him who views him, not only as the friend of himself, but that of his kindred, his neighbor, his nation, and the whole vast family of man? It is a spark contrasted with the immensity of the sun!—a drop, compared with the waters of the mighty deep! Well might the apostle exclaim, ‘O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!’

“The doctrine of impartial grace teaches us that our heavenly Father doth not willingly afflict the children of men, but for their profit; for as gold is purged and refined from the dross by fire, so is adversity sent by Providence to try and improve the virtue of mortals, and prepare them to receive, with greater relish, the real enjoyments of life. Hence, we view the trials and afflictions of life, not as the stripes of an angry Deity, but as the well-intended chastisements of a merciful Father,

It instructs us that God is the common parent of all mankind, and that the least of us shall not fall to the ground without his notice; for he is kind to the evil and unthankful, and maketh his sun to rise on the just and on the unjust.

“This, too, was expressly taught by Christ, his well beloved Son, ‘who went about doing good,’ and commanded, ‘love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you.’ And why? ‘That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven.’ Here, then, is a noble reason—‘that we may be his children.’ He has given us a glorious example—a pattern worthy of all imitation. The consistent believer looks upon the whole intelligent creation, as members of the same family, children of the same kind and indulgent Father, sustained by the same protecting hand, and destined for the same all-wise purpose, ‘to glorify God and enjoy him forever!’ He feels that the trembling culprit on the scaffold, as well as a Washington ‘wielding the destinies of nations,’ is his brother! How, then, when acting in accordance with his faith, shall he indulge in a spirit of hatred and persecution? Impossible! as well might the lamb assume the nature of the lion, or the gentle dove the spirit of the ravenous vulture!

“But I weary your patience. Such, my friend, has been my path, and such the lesson learned—not for my sake only, but, as I humbly trust, for thine. Take this book of books—kindly accept it as coming from one who ardently desires your future welfare. I beseech you to give it a candid and serious examination—and may the great Controller of events grant you an understanding heart, which shall result in that ‘peace which passeth all understanding,’ and a faith which shall cause your soul to rejoice with ‘joy unspeakable,’ in anticipation of that era, when God shall be all in all!”

He ceased—but his manly form seemed agitated by the keenest sensibility, and in spite of his efforts to suppress it, the gathering tear bedewed his furrowed cheek. His words were not soon forgotten.

Three years afterwards, our traveller had occasion to pass the cottage of his aged friend—but it was desolate. A simple monument erected in the country grave-yard told the tale—like a shock of corn fully ripe he had fallen—was gathered to the hall of his fathers. Although affection loved to linger around the hallowed spot, and drop a tear to the memory of departed worth, yet our traveller grieved not, now, as those who have no hope beyond the dark and silent tomb.

THE CHRISTIAN HOPE.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

“If a man die, shall he live again?”

There can be no one so thoughtless, but sometimes asks himself the question, “If a man die, shall he live again?” have I a soul destined to live forever, or when this perishing body returns to dust, shall my heart’s best affections—the intellectual faculties which have enabled me to progress in knowledge and virtue—in short, every thing that elevates me above the brute creation, be as though they never had been? Annihilation! what a chilling thought: to think that a few months, or years at most, the most gifted and intelligent of God’s creatures; those whom we have looked upon as beings of a superior order; may be as the brutes that perish: it cannot be—“else why this pleasing hope, this fond desire, this longing after immortality?” Every desire of the heart, every thing in nature, forbids the thought; even if we reject the divine revelation.

Our knowledge in this world must necessarily be limited; but blessed be God, there is a brighter world beyond the tomb, where we shall be made perfect in knowledge and goodness; for the Scriptures declare that we shall be raised incorruptible and immortal, “at the last trump.” What a glorious sight, to see the ransomed universe, made pure as the angels in heaven, standing in the presence of the great Immortal—the Creator and the creature, face to face! Can we sufficiently admire and adore Him who planned such a destiny for His erring, guilty children? No wonder that Paul, when he addressed the Athenians from the Areopagus, was eloquent; for “he preached Jesus and the resurrection.”

JOY OF ANGELS.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

In Luke xv: 7, we are informed that “there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance.” This being the case, all must see that their joy will be increased in a ratio proportioned to the number of the reformed. If there is joy over one sinner that repenteth, the joy must be doubled when two repent, and so on. Not only so, but the increase of joy is made to correspond with the comparison, the other way—i. e. If there is joy over one than repenteth, more than over ninety-nine just persons who need no repentance, when all repent but one, there must be a double anxiety for the repentance of the one still left. Else the comparison holds not good.

Now the point we are after, is, to know when the joy of angels will be complete. Certainly not till the last poor wanderer is brought into the fold, that there may be one fold and one shepherd, (John x: 16.) Then, and not till then, will they be full of that joy which is unutterable. To what other conclusion can we safely arrive?

FEELINGS IN “GETTING RELIGION.”

A young lad, some twelve or fourteen years of age, after having gone through the modern mode of getting religion, “and worked out clear,” as it is termed, soon after, at one of their night meetings, arose to say a few words “to the help of the Lord.” To finish his discourse, he undertook to tell how he felt when “getting religion.” But words being too inadequate to convey his feelings, he at length concluded in the following manner:—“Oh! I know how I felt—I felt just like a dead cat.” And I should judge the lad has some of the same feelings hanging about him yet. S. M.

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.....No. III.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

"I will joy in the God of my salvation."

The reasonableness of confidence in God is plain. Life is exposed to many cares and troubles, some of which we can neither foresee nor prevent. The world is a scene of continual change, and such is the constitution of humanity, that sorrow will steal in upon the heart and cause the strongest to bend beneath its power.

When we contemplate Jehovah as the supreme parent and ruler of the universe, who has created us but to bless and beautify our existence; whose mercy is continually beaming from his presence to give glory to his reign and happiness to man; we see so much loveliness and worth in his character, that we fly to his arms and trust our all to his wise and benevolent disposal. It gives force to our minds, and inspires us with courage. It throws off the burthen of wretchedness which ignorance has placed upon us, and enables us to rise superior to adversity.

Could we but recognize in all the untoward events and discouraging circumstances of life, an overruling providence, exerting in its control to the introduction of some important good, hitherto unknown, we could rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of our salvation. Confidence like this would make us happy, though all around may be dark and cheerless; "though the fig tree should not blossom, the vines yield no fruit; though the olive should fail and no meat be in the fields; the flocks desert the folds and no herd be in the stall."

After we have performed our duty to God and our fellow-men, we should rest satisfied that there is one Being who rules all events in such a manner that our labors shall not be in vain. By trusting in God, is meant a firm conviction of his goodness and a tender regard even for individual interests.

We are sometimes called to pass through the most trying scenes of affliction; and when our weak discernment can see no utility, we begin to repine. But this is wrong.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face."

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. II.

BY EVANGELIST J. LEWIS.

I HAVE OFTEN KNOWN self-styled saints whose characters were not a whit better than the characters of one-half of those whom they stigmatized as sinners.

I have often known that to be called religion which is utterly unworthy the name.

I have often known the following to be quoted as Scripture: "As death leaves us, so judgment will find us." "No self-murderer shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." "God, out of Christ, is a consuming fire."

I have often known persons who seemed incapable of reasoning upon the subject of religion.

I have often known persons who did not dare try to use reason upon religious subjects, for fear they should reason themselves into an endless hell.

I have often known persons who were hard-hearted to the poor, unscrupulous in a bargain, and unfair in their dealings, profess great love for precious immortal souls.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART III.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XV. THE INTELLECTUAL INFLUENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.—In the course of my conversation and reading I have seldom met with this topic made the theme of discussion or illustration. It is granted, indeed, on all hands, that the influence and tendency of Christianity is to perfect our nature—our whole nature, intellectual as well as moral. But while its influence in refining, exalting, and rendering more God-like our moral nature, has not found among its many eulogists, a praise either too great or too high, its influence upon our intellectual powers and interests, judging from my present recollections of my reading and colloquy, seems not to have attracted its due share of attention, nor to have found a fitting eulogium.

You will recollect the following passages in one of our favorite authors. "I see every where in Christianity this great design of liberating and raising the human mind. I see in Christianity nothing narrowing or depressing, nothing of the littleness of the systems which human fear, and craft, and ambition have engendered. I meet there no minute legislation, no descending to precise details, no arbitrary injunctions, no yoke of ceremonies, no outward religion. Every thing breathes freedom, liberality, enlargement. I meet there, not a formal, rigid creed, binding on the intellect, through all ages, the mechanical, passive repetition of the same words, and the same ideas: but I meet a few grand, all-comprehending truths, which are given to the soul, to be developed, and applied by itself; given to it, as seed to the sower, to be cherished and expanded by its own thought, love, and obedience, into more and more glorious fruits of wisdom and virtue. I hear it every where calling the mind to freedom and power, by calling it to guard against the senses, the passions, the appetites, through which it is chained, enfeebled, destroyed. I see it every where aiming to give the mind power over itself, to invest it with inward sovereignty, to call forth within us a mighty energy for our own elevation. I meet in Christianity only discoveries of a vast, bold, illimitable character; fitted and designed to give energy and expansion to the soul." You will recollect these sentences, and my oft-expressed regret that there are not more such in the writings of one so highly gifted and so well qualified to treat such a subject worthily. Would that we had a vindication of the intellectual claims of Christianity worthy the theme!

While reading such passages as the above, I have meditated the accomplishment of some contribution to such a work as I have thought much wanted—unpossessed of the high powers, and of the literary leisure and qualifications which will yet be devoted, I hope, to this task, I never dreamed of any more worthy or efficient contribution than such as conversation, or correspondence, or a periodical might be made the vehicle of. Heretofore I have done no more than making an outline of some illustrations of these claims of Christianity. Even in this crude state I am induced to submit them, in the hope that they may call forth the attention or the contributions to this subject, of yourself, or some one whose eye they may meet. And O! for this cause let their soon arouse him some able, some gifted advocate, who, upon the source from which he had derived much of his intellectual acumen and eminence, may reflect back a lustre and a glory not altogether unworthy and unbefitting the high, the noble theme.

One way in which Christianity promotes our intellectual progress is, by filling us with the largest and loftiest ideas of the worth of our immortal and spiritual natures, as children of God, made in the likeness of our infinite Parent. Here we have a motive and encouragement to the zealous self-forgetting (Vide, Edinburgh Review, No. 108, article "Characteristics,") culture of our mental resources, which will never fail him who once knows its power. Nothing mean, nothing low, nothing dull, nothing creeping, morally or intellectually, can well harbor in a bosom glowing with the consciousness of a sonship to the great Author of universal being. As Christians we learn that "there is nothing in the world really beneficial, that does not lie within the reach of an informed understanding, and a well directed pursuit." (Burke.) By fixedly impressing us also with a sense of the probationary and preparatory nature of this world's concerns—by making it a point of duty to "rejoice evermore," "walking by faith and not by sight," it enables those who receive it, to maintain that joyous freedom of soul, that native virtuous hilarity, that cheerful confidence in "all things working together for good," which with most that adorns and blesses the spring time of life, but seldom lasts out to the sere and yellow leaf; thus harmonizing the simplicity and fire of youth with the firm wisdom of more sedate manhood.

Again, Christianity holds out sure and permanent motives to high mental exertion, in the stress it lays upon benevolence. If we consider the numberless modes in which the fulfilment of this law of love brings out and ripens the best parts of our nature; if we reflect that the desire of doing good is one which may be acted out at all times and in all places; that it is altogether independent of the accidents and caprices which are forever deadening the force of our other ruling passions (for who ever heard of a philanthropist desisting in disgust from his high and holy vocation?); if we think that no mind is so great or so small as to be above or below the sphere of its benign operation, we may form some rude estimate of the value, intellectually considered, of that religion which enjoins it under the most solemn sanctions; which encourages to it by the most sweet and tender promises; which holds forth to imitation the brightest pattern of its loveliness and power. Such a religion is that of Jesus: and "love never faileth."

Christianity inspires a most solemn and affectionate reverence for truth. Those who know in some small measure, the indescribable firmness and elevation—the sublime self-possession—the heavenly calm, which such a state of feeling diffuses throughout the chambers of the soul, will not be at a loss as to the value of that religious system which makes the love of truth a sine qua non; which teaches that it is the truth which "makes us free."

Christianity raises and enlarges the mind by familiarizing with its conceptions, and bringing home to its feelings the loftiest and the grandest objects which the universe contains. The absolute unity, the unrivalled supremacy, the awful majesty, the exhaustless benignity of the God and Father of universal being—the spotless purity, the unquenchable love, the high and holy zeal, the faith, the patience, the life and the death, the resurrection and ascension of him who is the image of the invisible God—the hopes of future happiness. Surely these are matters, the often renewed contemplation of which cannot but impress, with something of their own deep and lofty strain, the mind that makes them its own.

Finally—Christianity deeply serves our intellectual interests by simplifying the moral rule of life. Being a treasury of principles, rather than a digest of rules, it relieves us from the yoke of bondage to a multiplicity of minute, vexatious and easily forgotten regulations and restrictions. The superiority of this mode of legislating may be shown in the instance of the minor virtue of social politeness. What tone of littleness and feebleness does not the superstitious observance of an endless series of minute rules for one's deportment among one's fellow-creatures, stamp pro tempore, upon the noblest mind! How rare is it to see perfect and finished gentlemanliness in connexion with a fine, bold and free heartiness of native character! But Christianity can accomplish this junction for us. It puts out of the way, in the first place, that selfishness which is the perennial spring of the offences against politeness. If politeness, be "benevolence in little things," (Chatham,) surely that Gospel which teaches us "to love our neighbor as ourselves," "in honor preferring one another," need only be obeyed to ensure the truest politeness in our social demeanor. Christian principle, farther, frees us from vanity and bashful timidity; substituting in the place of either, a just and modest self-respect; and thus, gives a freedom, a simplicity, an easy, independent cheerfulness to our social intercourses, which the student of Chesterfield might toil æternally in vain. And it accomplishes all this, without impairing the great and sturdy features of mental power.

These, you will perceive, are mere sketches which I intended, when leisure served, to fill up with detail and illustration. But the leisure and the mood come not together: so I submit them in their present shape. May the subject receive some more efficient contributions.

MINUTES

OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE NEW-YORK CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS FOR 1836.

Met in Auburn, May 25, 1836, agreeably to adjournment, and after uniting in prayer with Br. S. J. Hillyer, proceeded to organize the Council by choosing Br. P. PRICE, Moderator, and Brs. N. Sawyer and C. S. Brown, Clerks.

2. Invited the ministering brethren present to take part in the deliberations.

3. Appointed Brs. G. W. Montgomery, C. Eldred and A. Warden a committee to arrange the public services.

4. Appointed Brs. Williamson, Chase and Hillyer a committee on fellowship and ordination.

5. Appointed Brs. M. Jennison, D. Biddlecom and N. Doolittle to nominate delegates to the United States Convention.

6. Received the Niagara Association into the fellowship of this Convention.

7. Appointed one delegate from each Association, viz.—Br. C. B. Brown, Doolittle, Williamson, D. Biddlecom, Hillyer, N. Sawyer, Chase, Waggoner, W. G. Parker and M. Jennison a committee to consider the powers of this Convention to grant letters of fellowship and confer ordination.

8. Appointed Brs. T. J. Sawyer, P. Morse and C. F. Le Fevre a committee to prepare a model or models for society or church and society constitutions—also rules and regulations for the government of this Convention in its deliberations—and report the same at our next session.

9. Adjourned till next morning, after prayer by Br. Morse.

10. May 26. Met according to adjournment, and united in prayer with Br. Chase.

11. Heard and accepted the report of the committee on fellowship and ordination, to confer ordination on Br. W. H. Waggoner.

12. Appointed Brs. W. G. Parker, Williamson and Doolittle to nominate the place for our next meeting.

13. Whereas the United States Convention of Universalists at its last session recommended "the propriety and expediency of establishing a Theological Seminary, to the consideration of the members of our denomination," therefore,

Resolved, That, although in the opinion of the members of this Council, the establishment of a Theological Seminary by the Universalist denomination, is not desirable, yet we unite in recommending the consideration of that subject to the people. Adopted—Yeas, 11—Nays, 9.

14. The committee of one from each Association reported,

Whereas some of our Associations have objected to the practice of this Convention in granting letters of fellowship and conferring ordination, and whereas the right to such practice has been denied, and whereas it is deemed important that the views of this Convention, and the course it deems proper to pursue, should be fully known and correctly understood, therefore,

Resolved, That uniform precedent warrants the conclusion that this Convention possesses the right to grant letters of fellowship and confer ordination.

Resolved, That as a matter of expediency, this Convention will not grant letters of fellowship; but it recommends all candidates for the ministry to apply for fellowship to the Associations in whose limits they respectively reside, in all cases where it is practicable.

Resolved, That in conferring ordination, this Convention will be guided by such rules and regulations as are in force in the Associations in which the applicant resides.

15. Accepted said report unanimously.

16. Heard and accepted the report of the committee to nominate delegates to represent this Convention in the United States Convention at its next session—viz: That Brs. P. Morse, I. D. Williamson, J. Chase, A. B. Grosh, (ministers,) and Hezekiah Scott, North Salem; Josiah Hart, Esq., Hartford; Ebenezer Murlock, Albany; Imley Prescott, Geneva; D. Brayton, Western; and David Brown, Oxford, (laymen,) be said delegates.

[The residences were not given me by the Clerk—I have added them according to my belief.

A. B. G.]

17. Appointed Br. Grosh to preach the occasional sermon at our next session, and Br. Chase, substitute.

18. Appointed Br. Grosh to prepare the minutes for publication, and accompany them with a circular.

19. After uniting in prayer with Br. D. Biddlecom, adjourned (agreeably to the report of the committee on adjournment) to meet in Albany, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in May, 1837.

CIRCULAR.

The New-York Convention of Universalists, to all in its fellowship, and to all the children of God universally, sendeth salutations of peace from God and good will to man.

The proceedings are commended to the careful consideration of all interested in them. They were passed with great unanimity, and where a diversity of opinion prevailed, there was still a unanimous desire to advance the cause.

The subject of establishing a Theological Seminary received considerable attention—for while all agree in the propriety and advantages of having a well-instructed ministry, there is a diversity of opinion with respect to the mode and means in which that knowledge should be obtained. It was believed that, whatever might be the opinions of each member of the Council on the good or ill, the policy or impolicy, the necessity or inutilty of a Theological Seminary, it was improper that the denomination, as a whole, should be pledged in favor of it. Any number of individuals can unite and establish one, if they please to do so, they, alone, being responsible therefor—but it is not desirable that the responsibility of the few should be urged upon the whole denomination, as a denomination, many of the members of which are totally opposed to such a measure. Hence the subject is referred to the people for their consideration, and the subsequent action of each one to whom it is referred, as seemeth good in his own mind. As one coinciding in expressed opinion of the majority, I hope it will receive the attention its importance merits, and that some means may be devised by which knowledge may be, not only increased among the teachers, but also be diffused more generally and extensively among the people, including laity and clergy—all who teach and all who are taught.

Our delegation was far from being full. Not one Association was fully represented. Some had but one delegate, either lay or ministerial—and two (the Steuben and Chautauque) Associations were not represented even in part. This remissness in attendance, (for where the delegate cannot attend, he should strive to appoint a substitute who can and will go,) is much to be regretted. A full expression of the views and feelings, and attention to the wants of our order can never be given by such an unequal and incomplete representation of the Associations. Brethren, do think of these things. If you have active, intelligent men who will make good delegates and faithful representatives, send them—see that they attend, even if you must remunerate those who cannot otherwise afford to take the journey and lose the time.

The public services of the sanctuary were very impressive, instructive and delightful. The songs of Zion sung in sweetest strains, elevated our souls to heaven; the vocal prayer emptied out the heart's best gifts of gratitude and love at the feet of the Father of all, while the preached word filled our minds anew with instruction, consolation and joy, again to bring forth the product of praise and the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

We cannot cease speaking of the delightful season enjoyed by a full house of God's children, without saying that our Auburn brethren, and friends—yea, even some of the opposers of our distinctive sentiment, have given us great cause to remember them as long as gratitude for kindness and affection forms one among the feelings of our souls. May God bless them—fill their understandings with his truth—their souls with his love, and their lives with the providential and gracious demonstrations of his wisdom, power and goodness.

Per order, A. B. GROSH.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

The formation of this body, we looked upon with the most pleasing anticipations. We thought, and still think it the most advantageous and interesting measure that has been adopted by our denomination, for many years. With these feelings, we hate to be the first to find fault. We trust, however, after this frank declaration, no one will question the sincerity of our motives.

It will be recollected that, at the last session of the Convention, a resolution was passed prohibiting all but members of the council from participating in its public deliberations. It struck us at the time, as an impolitic measure; subsequent inquiry has satisfied us that we were not alone in this opinion. It has ever been the practice, in all our ecclesiastical bodies (at least in the State of New-York) to seek by invitation, rather than prohibit the advice and counsel of all ministering brethren in attendance. This we have thought was brotherly, and in accordance with our holy religion; and why the United States Convention should be the first to recede from general usage, we were at a loss to determine. The only reason urged at the time, against the "good old" usage, was, that it would retard business by increasing the number of speakers. We answer to this, we never liked hasty legislation. Let us do business well, if we do not do so much. "In a multitude of counsellors, there is safety." I saw in the council chamber, not a few gray-headed fathers in Israel, who by the resolution referred to, were compelled to remain dumb upon subjects with which age and experience had made them familiar; and whose advice and opinions would have added profit and dignity to all concerned. The privilege of voting should most certainly be confined to the delegates; but inasmuch as the powers of the Convention are purely advisory, I should think that its measures should go forth to the public with all the advice and counsel they can well receive. As an act of courtesy, as well as safety, I hope that at its next session a general invitation will be given to all ministering brethren present and in good standing, to take part in the deliberations.

A CLERGYMAN.

BIOGRAPHY OF REV. ELIJAH SMITH.

We were under the painful necessity of announcing in our last week's paper, the death of our esteemed brother in the ministry, Rev. ELIJAH SMITH.

Br. Smith was a native of Vermont. He was born in the town of Monkton, county of Addison, December 5, 1796. He never attached himself to any religious denomination, until in October, 1829, he was received into the fellowship of one of the Associations of Universalists in the above named State—the Northern, we believe. He preached but a few times, until he removed into this State, in July, 1831, in which year he was duly ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry. At, or near this time, he commenced preaching with the societies in Henrietta and Livonia. He continued his labors with these societies for nearly three years with good success and unanimous approbation. From thence he removed at the urgent solicitations of friends to Kennedyville, Steuben county, where he remained for some considerable time, how long we are not certain. In this place he was much respected and beloved by all who knew him, and proved not a little successful in spreading and promoting the cause of impartial grace.

In January, 1835, while at Kennedyville, probably by excessive labor and study, he was attacked with an inflammation on the liver, which afterwards ran into the typhus fever, and confined him to his bed and house for several months. At length he began slowly to recover, but continued very nervous and feeble. In October, 1835, he removed to North Bloomfield, where, as always before, he found many warm and attentive friends and brethren. His health was so far improved, that through the Winter, or till February last, he succeeded in preaching to his society one sermon on each alternate Sabbath, at which time he began to decline, though moderately. His companion and friends continued to hope for his recovery until a few weeks before his death. But he was evidently in a much worse condition than they imagined, his extreme patience, resignation and cheerfulness, having deceived them.

Thus, having labored in the Gospel field most faithfully and successfully for about eight years, he fell asleep, without a struggle, a sigh or a groan, and in the fullest confidence of a holy and happy immortality for a ransomed world.

It may be proper to state, that a few hours before his death, he requested that the writer should be called to attend his funeral. And that his affectionate and beloved companion in life, might have an abiding testimony of his faith in an impartial Gospel, he penned the following lines and left them safely secured between two leaves in his Bible:—

"This Book of Truth has from my youth,
Been my great consolation;
I'm no more sad, such tidings glad,
Disclose a world's salvation."

Br. Smith has left an amiable wife and an extensive circle of warm and affectionate friends to mourn his absence from their society. But may they mourn as those who are filled with the animating hope of the Gospel, and an assurance that all shall meet where sickness, and death, and parting will never interrupt their felicity. He has gone from his toils, and his sufferings, and his pains, to participate in the unsullied joys of heaven.—Herald of Truth.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1836.

REASONS.....NO. XLII.

FOR BELIEVING IN UNIVERSAL SALVATION.

1 Peter iii: 15.

26. Because the very judgments, punishments and chastisements, which God inflicts on mankind, so far from being designed to injure, are especially designed for their benefit—to humble, subdue, correct and amend; and therefore cannot be in contravention of his numerous promises of universal salvation. "Is the law against the promises of God? God forbid?" "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye be without chastisement whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons. Furthermore, we have had fathers of the flesh, who corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? For they verily chastened us after their pleasure; but he [God] for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." "The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Gal. iii: 21; Heb. xii: 6-11; Lam. iii: 31-32. See also Isa. liv: 1-8, and lviii: 16-21, and Matt. xxiii: 34-39.

27. Because, although sin greatly abounds and subjects its infatuated votaries to great and protracted miseries, yet the apostle declares that "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign, through righteousness, unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v: 20, 21. From this testimony it must be clear, that grace shall not only reign as extensively as sin has, that is, universally among men, but more powerfully, more effectually and more lastingly. But if it does not, and if it should not remove and do away all the evils of sin, and bestow greater good than was previously enjoyed, then it cannot be true that grace abounds "much more than sin."

28. Because the same creature, (that is the whole creation,) that was subjected to vanity, frailty and bondage, shall be emancipated into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. "For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope; that the creature (hstis, creation) itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Rom. viii: 20, 21.

29. Because Christ is repeatedly called the Saviour of the world—and he cannot be the Saviour of the world if only a part of the world is ever saved. "We have heard him ourselves and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world." "And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." John iv: 42; 1 John iv: 14.

30. Because Christ is the seed of the woman which was to bruise the serpent's head, figuratively representing the destruction of evil; and it is expressly declared of him that "for this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." 1 John iii: 8.

31. Because Christ prayed not only for his friends and disciples in a special manner, but also for the world, for which he gave himself a ransom, not excepting his very murderers. John xvii: 2, 9, 21, 22, 23; Luke xxiii: 34.

32. Because Christ never prayed against, but in accordance with the will of God, and he declares that he "knew that the Father always heard him when he prayed." Matt. xxvi: 42; John xi: 41, 42, xviii: 11.

33. Because we have the promise of the fullness of the Gentiles coming in, and all Israel being saved. "It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits,) that blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in: and so all Israel shall be saved." Isa. xlix: 6; Rom. xi: 25, 26.

34. Because Paul exhorts, as the most important petition, and the "first of all" duties, that "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men;" and as a reason for this, declares this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1 Tim. ii: 1-4. And certainly such are the desires—such the prayers of all true Christians, of all benevolent hearts.

35. Because the doctrine of universal salvation alone accords with the commands and the teachings of Christ. "I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you: that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven," etc. Now, unless God loves his enemies and blesses those that curse him, etc., there certainly is no propriety in urging mankind to do it that they may be like him. Matt. v: 44-48.

36. Because God is called the Saviour of all men, and his grace is said to bring salvation to all men. "For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God; who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men* hath appeared, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." 1 Tim. iv: 10; Titus ii: 11, 12.

37. Because God has given to mankind eternal life in Christ, and unbelief cannot destroy it, nor multiply its truth and verity. "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; [i. e., treated him as such;] because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son." "For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith [fidelity] of God without effect? God forbid: yea, let God be true, though every man were a liar." 1 John v: 10, 11; Rom. iii: 3, 4. Thus eternal life is truly the gift of God to man in Christ, whether man believes it or not.

38. Because a universal resurrection of all men to life in Christ Jesus, is plainly and positively declared in Holy Writ; and furthermore, that "if any man be in Christ he is a new creature—old things are past away, and all things are become new." "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ [not out of him] shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. See the whole chapter, and 2 Cor. v: 17.

39. Because "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," shall ultimately unite in one universal anthem of praise, and exclaim, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Rev. v: 13.

40. Because in that grand and glorious consummation predicted by the foregoing Scriptures, when Christ shall livers up the reconciled kingdom to the Father, God shall become all in all, to each one of his offspring: and when he is in them all and all are in him spiritually, understandingly, and truly, then will all be perfectly holy and consequently perfectly happy. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. Death, the last enemy shall be destroyed. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." 1 Cor. xv: 14-28.

* A more literal translation than the common version.

To the above scriptural reasons we might add many more scores, or even hundreds of passages, clearly and directly proving the same cheering sentiment of the restitution of all things; but we deem it unnecessary and superfluous. The two scores of positive scriptural reasons above presented directly to the point, we believe will be sufficient, in connexion with the previous arguments drawn from acknowledged premises, to satisfy every candid and sober mind who will read and meditate thereon, that the doctrine of universal salvation is both a reasonable and scriptural theory, and as such is entitled to all acceptance. We are willing to leave the subject to the decision of our enlightened and respected readers. We commend it to their serious and prayerful consideration; beseeching the Father of lights to lead them and us all men into all truth; and sanctify and save a world with an everlasting salvation through Christ our Redeemer. MIRACLES.

By miracle is meant, simply, a wonder. The term is, however, commonly confined to those events which are out of the ordinary course of things in nature. Such events have been supposed by many, to be actual infractions or violations of the laws of nature—contrary to them, and only effected by their suspension. This, in my humble opinion, does not necessarily follow—though I have no objection to admit it, sooner than have it supposed I deny it to evade the objections of skeptics.

We are very ignorant of some of the laws and operations of nature, and hence cannot positively declare that any event deemed miraculous, was not as perfectly natural as the production of the Siamese twins, or any other lusus nature. We know that one mode of converting water into wine is to have it absorbed by the roots of a grape vine, carried up and converted into a grape, which, when ripened by the sun, may have its juice—this same water—pressed out, fermented, and it is wine. This, we know, is the usual mode pursued by nature. But do we positively know that there is no natural process by which water can be poured into a jar, and soon after drawn out wine? We do not.

But as we do not know that there actually is such a natural process—let us waive this argument, and pass on to meet the objection in its full force.

The laws of nature are self-existent, or they had a commencement. If self-existent they present us the miracle of laws without a lawgiver, or previous legislation.

If called principles, they present us the miracle of the result of wisdom, without any possible wisdom to precede that result. For a principle is the result of wisdom—of intelligence—and always presupposes a relation between two different things of which it is the perceived link.

If called nature, simply—as many say "nature is competent, within itself, for all its operations"—then we have the equally astonishing miracle of blind, unintelligent matter, acting with a depth of sagacity, intelligence and reason, which all our powers can never fully penetrate and exhaust! Do as you may—you must admit a miracle—an act, event or existence which is without a parallel in the universe, and consequently a wonder.

But admit that the laws of nature had a commencement, and you also admit the existence of miracles—you cannot avoid acknowledging them. The existence of the first object of each class of nature's materials, is a miracle—for the first animal, fish, bird, insect, reptile—the first plant, tree or shrub—was not produced by the laws of nature. I think you will now agree with me, that even taking extreme cases as a test, every one, even the skeptic, must admit the existence of miracles. Yes, the first establishment of the laws of nature, was by miracle—by a departure from the previous common order of God's government. And the creation of the first man, beast, insect, reptile, bird, fish, plant, tree—all these were by miracle—by a process different from, contrary to, and in violation of the preceding and the succeeding ordinary course of things. Having seen that at least once God was pleased, for wise and excellent reasons, and in perfect consistency with the harmony of his attributes and the immutability of his nature to change the established course of his operations, and depart from the ordinary operations of his government of the universe—we surely shall hear no more of objections to miracles, on the score of God's unchangeability, and the uniformity of his operations.

"Where is the consistency of supposing that after God had taken so much pains to make a world, and store it with every variety of vegetable and animal life, he would like a petted and spoiled child, fall to, and in a fit of passion break it up and destroy it, because he had not made it to suit himself, or had changed his liking for it?"

This, you know, is the argument of the skeptic, who admits that God acts with respect to every man, as he acted with respect to the antediluvian world. He creates, and after a time destroys. And the miracle—or change from an established course—is greater in creation than in destruction. For any of us can destroy life—the child can take the life of a giant, but cannot create even the wing of a fly! Yet the deist will admit the creation of the world, but ridicule the idea of its destruction—when it is notorious that the former is more marvellous—a greater departure from the established course of eternity, than the latter can be! But he admits; reasonably, the greater miracle; and only denies the lesser because he is mistaken respecting it.

Most skeptics suppose that miracles are believed to be provisions for unforeseen contingencies; which, having occurred quite unexpectedly to God, he is obliged, all at once, to arouse himself and put forth his omnipotence in the suspension of the laws of nature—"to mend and tinker up the flaws he was unprepared for." It is true, there are many poor, ignorant Christians who also believe so; just as many poor ignorant skeptics refuse to receive anything as evidence, save actually seeing, hearing or feeling—thus making knowledge, faith; yet such is not the view Christians generally take of miracles.

In my opinion, every miracle of Jesus was as clearly foreseen by divine Wisdom, and as amply provided for, and formed a part of God's providence in this world, as fully as did the coming of Jesus himself, or the establishment of Christianity. Let those, therefore, who object to miracles on this ground, object no longer—for as well may they object that God had to allow America to be discovered by Columbus, to prevent some difficulty in his plan, as to object to any, even the slightest miracle on this ground.

Thus even admitting miracles to be departures from, or violations of, the laws of nature—a definition I very much doubt—still they are as much parts of God's providences—as much foreseen, provided for, and calculated upon—as any event that is or can be produced by the operation of nature's prolific laws. UNCHRISTIAN CONDUCT.

On our last page the reader will find the melancholy news of the death of two children and their venerable grandmother. Let him read it, and then read the following explanation of the last sentence of the obituary notice. Such conduct as this Methodist preacher's, deserves the severe and indignant reprobation of community, for the heartless and worse than brutal barbarity it discloses festering in his heart. Especially should Christians, by crying "shame," disclaim such unfeeling conduct as being any part of the influence of our holy religion. Such men, capable of giving such advice in the hour of sorrow and death, are a disgrace to their profession, to the denomination in which they are ministers, and to the age in which they live. We wish Mr. Barney may soon be "born again," "of God," and into the kingdom of God, where Love [charity—1 Cor. xiii.] stands higher as an essential, than either Faith or Hope. A. B. G.

Br. GROSH—The last sentence of the obituary furnished by me, was added for the following reason. Rev. Mr. Barney, Methodist, in giving notice on Sunday previous, to his congregation of the time of the funeral, made use of words to the following effect. He hoped that, if an orthodox minister preached, there would be a general attendance. It will at once be perceived what was implied in this declaration. I am happy, however, in being able to state that the citizens of Carthage, did not in any way approbate Mr. Barney for this violation of the rules of propriety and decency. On the contrary, it was considered as an outrage upon the feelings of common humanity.

Affectionately yours, J. BRITTON, Jr.

Cold and unfeeling indeed must be the heart that is so destitute of the feelings of human nature as to behold with indifference the sufferings of his fellow-man! And still more unfeeling must be the wretch who can cause misery for no other object than the gratification of his own cruel, revengeful disposition! Yet there are those whose native feelings of sympathy appear to have been chilled by selfishness, frozen by revenge or drowned in intemperance to that degree that they can feast with savage cruelty on the sufferings of humanity. But beware, O man, how thou ascribest such a fiendish disposition to thy Father in heaven.

POETRY.

From the Universalist Union.

HYMN OF THE WESTERN BRETHREN.

BY MRS. J. H. SCOTT.

Air—Heber's Missionary Hymn.

Respectfully inscribed, with the best wishes of the author, to those persevering heralds of the cross, who have left home and friends to publish a free salvation in the wilds of the West.

We have left the scenes of childhood,
The friends of early years,
To journey through the wild wood,
And weep the pilgrim's tears.
We have left our own green mountains,
All gay with sunny flowers,
And our silver-glancing fountains,
For toil and lonely hours.

But shall our spirits falter,
While Jesus calls us on?
Before God's holy altar,
From error's grasp is won?
Away with grief and sadness,
Let every care depart;
We bring the oil of gladness
To many a wounded heart.

What though dark clouds are o'er us,
And angry waves beneath;
Our Master braved before us
Wild persecution's breath—
What though our zeal may lead us
O'er dangers wintry track,
Our guide will ne'er deceive us
But safely bring us back.
Then on—his footsteps follow,
Our banner waves on high—
Truth, mighty truth, shall swallow
Each culture of the sky.
On, on, till light descendeth
To every darkened heart,
And Scripture knowledge sendeth
All hope from sin apart.

On, on—we ask no guerdon,
Enough for us to know,
We take from men the burden
Of "everlasting wo"—
We bring them joyous tidings,
From God, their friend above,
And bury their backslidings
In renovating love.

Towanda, Pa., March, 1836.

SUBSTANCE OF A LECTURE ON ELOCUTION.

Delivered before the Law Association of the city of New-York, April, 1836,

BY PROF. SAMUEL N. SWEET.

[Concluded.]

It is to be regretted that while great attention is paid to song, little or none is paid to speech in this country. Music, in its perfection, is an elegant accomplishment. But what is it compared to the higher graces and more striking expressions of elocution? Vocal music is more gratifying than instrumental, because the human voice, whether its notes are heard in song or speech, is the noblest and sweetest instrument of music in existence. I agree in opinion with the Editor of the North American Review, that "the voice of song is not sweeter than the voice of eloquence."

The powers of the voice alone are sufficient to justify the exclamation of the great poet of nature, "What a piece of work is man!" When highly cultivated, it sinks to the sweetest whisper, or rises to the highest tone, without any apparent labor. Such a voice never degenerates into song or drawl! It is the music of nature.

A knowledge of the science of elocution, will give the art of conveying the sense and sentiment of discourse, not only correctly but rhetorically. In order to convey the sense and sentiment of what we read or recite grammatically, and with gratification to the ear of the hearer, it is obvious we must perfectly understand the meaning of the author.

It is easy to say that a public speaker should "hold the mirror up to nature," but it is not quite so easy to do it, for nature is a complicated machinery. Talking, although it is generally less formal and more free from affectation, than reading or speaking, is far, very far, from being truly eloquent. Men very frequently, "imitate humanity abominably," in conversation as well as in reading or speaking. Some modes of public speaking are undoubtedly injurious to health. But properly understood and pursued, it fortifies the lungs against all disease, particularly that worst of all diseases, the consumption.

Some men complain that their hearers occasionally get to sleep. The fault is in the speaker and not the hearer. It is our duty to sleep, and sleep soundly too, unless the speaker can say or do something of sufficient interest to keep us awake. There is something in true and genuine eloquence which startles the tyrant in his dreams of power, controls the surges of lawless violence, and makes "the very extremities of the earth to tremble." Can an individual sleep amidst the thunders of such eloquence? As well may he sleep amidst the clangor of the trumpet and the clash of arms.

Eloquence, in our government, is emphatically an instrument of power. There are those who indulge in the fearful apprehension, that this republic, like Athens, Sparta, Carthage and Rome, is destined soon to fall. But while we have public men of genuine eloquence who, although they differ in opinion as to the domestic and foreign policy of government, are zealously and fearlessly advocating the continued existence of the great and ennobling principles upon which it is predicated, let us not despair. Had we no such advocates I should consider our liberties no better than "painted air."

It was when Cicero's eloquence shook the forum that Rome was recognized as the mistress of the world. In vain, then, did the mighty Hannibal lift up his arm against her. But when Cicero was murdered, the "eternal city," tottering beneath the weight of her iniquities, jostled over the precipice of faction and her sun went down in blood.

The great and imperishable interest of millions of freemen are committed to the charge of the generation to which we belong. And are we not under the strongest inducements to strive for the mastery in public speaking?

If I have presented to you a single additional incitement to the many already before you, for increased exertion in restoring elocution to its former position, within the department of useful instruction, I feel amply rewarded. I cannot conclude without observing, if you will excuse the liberty, with the poet, that it is

"Praise enough
To fill the ambition of a common man
That Webster's language is his mother tongue,
And Wirt's great name compatriot with his own."

MARRIAGES.

In Boston, November 1, 1835, by Perry Cobb, Esq., Mr. WILLIAM BOWMAN, to Miss MARY DONALDSON, all of that place.

In the same place, March 24, by the same, Mr. AMMI WHITING, to Miss CLARISSA FOLSOM, all of Boston.

In Fowler, St. Lawrence county, May 1, by Rev. O. Wilcox, Mr. SIMEON HAZLETON, Jr., to Miss EMELINE COLE, all of that place.

DEATHS.

Near the village of Carthage, May 4th, JEFFERSON, aged three years and five months, and MALVINA, aged two years, only children of Allen and Susan Wait. Also, Mrs. HANNAH PRATT, aged 62 years, Mrs. Wait's mother.

These persons were drowned in a ditch, from which clay had been thrown for the purpose of making brick, and which was partly filled with water. On the morning of this day, Mr. Wait was from home, and Mrs. Wait had left the house for a few moments, to go to a neighbor's, leaving the children on the brick yard, at play. It was supposed that the children fell in, and that their grandmother came to their assistance, and in attempting to extricate them, slipped in with them, and being rather infirm was unable to get out. The width of the place was about three feet, the depth four feet, with two and a half feet of water. Mrs. Wait on returning, succeeded in removing the bodies of her children from the water, but was obliged to go for assistance to remove the body of her mother.

The funeral was attended on Monday following, by the writer, and the consolation of the Gospel tendered to the bereaved and severely afflicted parents of the children, who were the only relatives present. Under these circumstances, it was peculiarly gratifying to our bereaved friends, as well as to every person capable of feeling, to witness the large congregation assembled on the occasion. J. B., Jr.

In Richford, April 27, Mrs. ALMIRA DANIELS, wife of Capt. Heman Daniels, aged 40. By this dispensation, a husband, five children, the Harford Universalist society, (of which she was a member,) and many relatives and friends have been called to mourn the departure of one deservedly loved by them. It pleased God to remove her by a nervous affection, which was rapid in its progress, depriving her of her reason, and baffling the skill of medical assistance. The funeral obsequies were attended by a goodly number, who were addressed by the writer, from Job xiv : 10.

ADVANTAGES OF RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

A SERMON,

BY L. C. BROWNE.

"Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is." Heb. x: 25.

The practice of assembling, periodically, for religious worship, so general among Christians at the present day, is a primitive custom. Immediately after the Saviour's resurrection his followers began to assemble together on the first day of the week, the day on which he rose, to join in commemoration of that joyful event and offer up their devotions.

The author of our text, whose writings abound in wholesome instruction and judicious counsel, exhorts his Hebrew brethren not to forsake this practice. "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together." The apostle doubtless had his reasons for giving this advice. He well knew the advantages to be derived from continuing the practice, the evils which result from the neglect of it, and the causes which induced to such neglect; and these we shall endeavor, on the present occasion, briefly to consider.

I. The practice of assembling statedly for religious worship serves to create and keep alive social feeling and friendly intercourse.

It is a trite but veritable maxim, that man was made for society. Man is emphatically a social being. There is that within his nature and constitution which prompts him to seek intercourse with his fellow-beings. And the exercise of this principle is not only in accordance with the inclination of the human mind, but it is one of the principal means of human happiness. Surround an individual with all the other enjoyments of existence—bestow upon him the wealth of the Rostschilds, the learning of Cicero and the fame of Napoleon—give him access to all the records of ancient and modern literature—fix his residence in the most beautiful and fertile region, with the happiest climate in the temperate zone; and yet deny him the pleasures of society—preclude him the intercourse of a single kindred being and he will languish. "He'd sigh, he'd mourn, that he was alone."

True, there have been instances of men abdicating society, retiring to the wilderness and spinning out their existence, inmates of the desert and companions of the wolf. But such instances are far between, and have invariable been, not the voluntary choice of nature, but the effect of disappointed ambition, misanthropic fancy, whimsical caprice, or a depraved and blinded superstition. There may be now and then an individual, at the present day, in this enlightened and social country, who foregoes the charms of society, secludes himself week after week and year after year in the chimney corner of his own domicile, his powers and faculties wasting, like the unused sickle. But such instances are the morbid effect of avarice, indolence or stupidity.

Nature never made a misanthrope or a hermit;

"For know the Maker, on the human breast
A sense of kindred, country, man, impressed."

There is in nature, when uncorrupted, an involuntary uprising of the social feelings which call for intercourse with mankind. Endued with the power of thinking, the faculty of speech, and the sense of hearing, we delight, not only to reflect and meditate, but to communicate our ideas, and listen to the sentiments and feelings of others in return.

Now this object is most happily answered by the practice of "assembling ourselves together." On these occasions the social vein is opened. Old acquaintances are revived and new ones formed—neighbor recognizes neighbor, countenance greets countenance, and hand grasps hand; cheerful salutations are exchanged, hospitable invitations given, and friendly intercourse promoted.

We here anticipate an objection. We shall be met with the argument, that the practice of assembling for religious worship, instead of promoting friendship and sociability, sometimes sows discord in a community.

"Look," says the experienced father, "upon the small village in yonder valley. Some twenty years ago, a few friendly neighbors who had been reared together from their childhood, emigrated from the busy haunts of eastern population and settled on the peaceful stream that murmurs through its bosom. The drops that form its crystal current are not more congenial and united, nor the herbage that decks its banks, more green and flourishing than the sympathy we cherished. We cleared our forests, dug our wells, reared our buildings and wrought our highways in peace and unanimity. Our children were taught together in the same humble school, and playfully gambolled together beneath the same spreading tree; our youth mingled together in the same innocent amusement; and our aged sires and mothers visited each other, unceremoniously, and sat around the same banqueting table of hospitality.

"But at length there came among us a religious teacher, sent, he said, by Heaven, to save our souls from ruin. He called us together in the school-room, preached to us what he called the Gospel; and we listened to his instructions. A church was formed, a meeting-house erected, the preacher settled, and the people continued to assemble; but instead of sociality, division was sown amongst us and we became inimical. Neighbor was set against neighbor, and family against family, and even the members of the same family against each other. The cordial greeting of countenance and warm grasp of the hand were exchanged for the cold and distant side-glance of contempt and prejudice."

Father, I admit the facts; but you have imputed them to wrong causes. The harmony which characterized your new settlement did not arise from the absence of religious association, but from the fewness of inhabitants and their mutual wants. And the discord which followed the introduction of religion among you, was not the immediate effect of the people assembling themselves together; but probably of the sentiments to which they listened when assembled. Could the simple act of a little band of neighbors assembling once a week to greet each other, create disunion? Were not the instructions to which you listened designed to sow dissension? Were you not taught that some of you, in consequence of certain professions and observances, were better than others, in the sight of Deity; and were these not urged to separate themselves in feeling, and hold a less familiar intercourse? Here lay the secret of the discord. Spurious distinctions were set up among you, which flattered and stimulated the pride and the vanity of one portion, and stirred up the hatred, jealousy and resentment of the other.

But let us draw another picture. We will suppose the preacher had taught the people that one God had created them and they were all his children—that the first and great commandment was to love this God with all the heart, and the second, to love each other. We will suppose the people assembled once a week to take each other by the hand, inquire each other's health, mingle in devotion to a common Father and listen to tidings of a universal Gospel. Would the effect, in this case, have been to distract community and make the people hate each other?

On the other side, let us suppose no church had been erected and the people had not acquired the habit of assembling. The forest being cleared away, the country grown wealthy and the population increased, those mutual dependencies which attached them to each other, in the beginning, would have ceased, and no other bond of union been instituted to supercede it.

It may perhaps be argued that the people might have formed themselves into literary and scientific associations, listened to a lecture upon some branch of useful knowledge, and exercised themselves in classic recitations. We grant that information might thus have been acquired; but seriously doubt whether the object in question—the promotion of social and amicable intercourse—would have been so well secured as by assembling for religious worship. In literary and scientific associations, there arises various causes of disunion, such as the rivalry of talent and the envy of distinction.

The most auspicious, and indeed the only place, for people to assemble on a common level of equality with a common bond of union, is in the sanctuary of a common Gospel. View a band of believers in their egress from the house of worship—mark the kind attention and chaste civility which pervade the group—contrast it with the rude, uproarious jargon witnessed at a military parade or a political election; and you will acknowledge that of all occasions the assembling for religious exercises is the most favorable to the promotion of civil and friendly intercourse.

Wherever you find a neighborhood in which this practice is wholly neglected, you will, in general, find it a sordid and unsocial neighborhood. The people, in this case, particularly in an agricultural community where the population is sparse, meet so seldom, that when they happen together, even in small circles, there exists a degree of embarrassment and stiffness wholly unalloyed to free and happy intercourse.

Conversation grows smooth and easy by usage, as the spade and chisel brighten by the wearing; and, like these instruments, it rusts when long neglected. And hence, society, when mingled in but seldom, instead of being sought as an enjoyment, becomes a burden from which we seek release. If, then, we would cultivate our social and conversational faculties which are given as means of happiness—if we would cherish the acquaintance and secure the attachment of our species, whose assistance and sympathy we may need in the hour of misfortune or affliction, let us give attention to the apostle, "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together."

II. Another advantage to be drawn from the practice of assembling, periodically, for religious worship is, a relaxation from the toil and perplexity of business, and the refreshment and renovation of the mind and spirits.

After a week spent in the labor and anxiety of business or profession, how sweet and renewing is it to lay aside our cares and assemble on the Sabbath. The farmer leaves his plough in the furrow, the merchant closes his ledger, the mechanic drops the implement of his art, the man of profession puts aside his pen, the female suspends her domestic avocations and all enjoy a season of relaxation.

It not only reposes the powers of the physical constitution, but it unbends the bowstring of the mind and thus prepares both mind and body for renewed and more vigorous action. Who, that

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.....No. III.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

"I will joy in the God of my salvation."

The reasonableness of confidence in God is plain. Life is exposed to many cares and troubles, some of which we can neither foresee nor prevent. The world is a scene of continual change, and such is the constitution of humanity, that sorrow will steal in upon the heart and cause the strongest to bend beneath its power.

When we contemplate Jehovah as the supreme parent and ruler of the universe, who has created us but to bless and beautify our existence; whose mercy is continually beaming from his presence to give glory to his reign and happiness to man; we see so much loveliness and worth in his character, that we fly to his arms and trust our all to his wise and benevolent disposal. It gives force to our minds, and inspires us with courage. It throws off the burthen of wretchedness which ignorance has placed upon us, and enables us to rise superior to adversity.

Could we but recognize in all the untoward events and discouraging circumstances of life, an overruling providence, exerting in its control to the introduction of some important good, hitherto unknown, we could rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of our salvation. Confidence like this would make us happy, though all around may be dark and cheerless; "though the fig tree should not blossom, the vines yield no fruit; though the olive should fail and no meat be in the fields; the flocks desert the folds and no herd be in the stall."

After we have performed our duty to God and our fellow-men, we should rest satisfied that there is one Being who rules all events in such a manner that our labors shall not be in vain. By trusting in God, is meant a firm conviction of his goodness and a tender regard even for individual interests.

We are sometimes called to pass through the most trying scenes of affliction; and when our weak discernment can see no utility, we begin to repine. But this is wrong.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face."

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. II.

BY EVANGELIST J. LEWIS.

I HAVE OFTEN KNOWN self-styled saints whose characters were not a whit better than the characters of one-half of those whom they stigmatized as sinners.

I have often known that to be called religion which is utterly unworthy the name.

I have often known the following to be quoted as Scripture: "As death leaves us, so judgment will find us." "No self-murderer shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." "God, out of Christ, is a consuming fire."

I have often known persons who seemed incapable of reasoning upon the subject of religion.

I have often known persons who did not dare try to use reason upon religious subjects, for fear they should reason themselves into an endless hell.

I have often known persons who were hard-hearted to the poor, unscrupulous in a bargain, and unfair in their dealings, profess great love for precious immortal souls.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.....PART III.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XV. THE INTELLECTUAL INFLUENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.—In the course of my conversation and reading I have seldom met with this topic made the theme of discussion or illustration. It is granted, indeed, on all hands, that the influence and the tendency of Christianity is to perfect our nature—our whole nature, intellectual as well as moral. But while its influence in refining, exalting, and rendering more God-like our moral nature, has not found among its many eulogists, a praise either too great or too high, its influence upon our intellectual powers and interests, judging from my present recollections of my reading and colloquy, seems not to have attracted its due share of attention, nor to have found a fitting eulogium.

You will recollect the following passages in one of our favorite authors. "I see every where in Christianity this great design of liberating and raising the human mind. I see in Christianity nothing narrowing or depressing, nothing of the littleness of the systems which human fear, and craft, and ambition have engendered. I meet there no minute legislation, no descending to precise details, no arbitrary injunctions, no yoke of ceremonies, no outward religion. Every thing breathes freedom, liberality, enlargement. I meet there, not a formal, rigid creed, binding on the intellect, through all ages, the mechanical, passive repetition of the same words, and the same ideas; but I meet a few grand, all-comprehending truths, which are given to the soul, to be developed, and applied by itself; given to it, as seed to the sower, to be cherished and expanded by its own thought, love, and obedience, into more and more glorious fruits of wisdom and virtue. I hear it every where calling the mind to freedom and power, by calling it to guard against the senses, the passions, the appetites, through which it is chained, enfeebled, destroyed. I see it every where aiming to give the mind power over itself, to invest it with inward sovereignty, to call forth within us a mighty energy for our own elevation. I meet in Christianity only discoveries of a vast, bold, illimitable character; fitted and designed to give energy and expansion to the soul." You will recollect these sentences, and my oft-expressed regret that there are not more such in the writings of one so highly gifted and so well qualified to treat such a subject worthily. Would that we had a vindication of the intellectual claims of Christianity worthy the theme!

While reading such passages as the above, I have meditated the accomplishment of some contribution to such a work as I have thought much wanted—unpossessed of the high powers, and of the literary leisure and qualifications which will yet be devoted, I hope, to this task, I never dreamed of any more worthy or efficient contribution than such as conversation, or correspondence, or a periodical might be made the vehicle of. Heretofore I have done no more than making an outline of some illustrations of these claims of Christianity. Even in this crude state I am induced to submit them, in the hope that they may call forth the attention or the contributions to this subject, of yourself, or some one whose eye they may meet. And O! for this cause let their soon arouse him some able, some gifted advocate, who, upon the source from which he had derived much of his intellectual acumen and eminence, may reflect back a lustre and a glory not altogether unworthy and unbefitting the high, the noble theme.

One way in which Christianity promotes our intellectual progress is, by filling us with the largest and loftiest ideas of the worth of our immortal and spiritual natures, as children of God, made in the likeness of our infinite Parent. Here we have a motive and encouragement to the zealous self-forgetting (Vide, Edinburgh Review, No. 108, article "Characteristics,") culture of our mental resources, which will never fail him who once knows its power. Nothing mean, nothing low, nothing dull, nothing creeping, morally or intellectually, can well harbor in a bosom glowing with the consciousness of a sonship to the great Author of universal being. As Christians we learn that "there is nothing in the world really beneficial, that does not lie within the reach of an informed understanding, and a well directed pursuit." (Burke.) By fixedly impressing us also with a sense of the probationary and preparatory nature of this world's concerns—by making it a point of duty to "rejoice evermore," "walking by faith and not by sight," it enables those who receive it, to maintain that joyous freedom of soul, that native virtuous hilarity, that cheerful confidence in "all things working together for good," which with most that adorns and blesses the spring time of life, but seldom lasts out to the sere and yellow leaf; thus harmonizing the simplicity and fire of youth with the firm wisdom of more sedate manhood.

Again, Christianity holds out sure and permanent motives to high mental exertion, in the stress it lays upon benevolence. If we consider the numberless modes in which the fulfilment of this law of love brings out and ripens the best parts of our nature; if we reflect that the desire of doing good is one which may be acted out at all times and in all places; that it is altogether independent of the accidents and caprices which are forever deadening the force of our other ruling passions (for who ever heard of a philanthropist desisting in disgust from his high and holy vocation?); if we think that no mind is so great or so small as to be above or below the sphere of its benign operation, we may form some rude estimate of the value, intellectually considered, of that religion which enjoins it under the most solemn sanctions; which encourages to it by the most sweet and tender promises; which holds forth to imitation the brightest pattern of its loveliness and power. Such a religion is that of Jesus: and "love never faileth."

Christianity inspires a most solemn and affectionate reverence for truth. Those who know in some small measure, the indescribable firmness and elevation—the sublime self-possession—the heavenly calm, which such a state of feeling diffuses throughout the chambers of the soul, will not be at a loss as to the value of that religious system which makes the love of truth a sine qua non; which teaches that it is the truth which "makes us free."

Christianity raises and enlarges the mind by familiarizing with its conceptions, and bringing home to its feelings the loftiest and the grandest objects which the universe contains. The absolute unity, the unrivalled supremacy, the awful majesty, the exhaustless benignity of the God and Father of universal being—the spotless purity, the unquenchable love, the high and holy zeal, the faith, the patience, the life and the death, the resurrection and ascension of him who is the image of the invisible God—the hopes of future happiness. Surely these are matters, the often renewed contemplation of which cannot but impress, with something of their own deep and lofty strain, the mind that makes them its own.

Finally—Christianity deeply serves our intellectual interests by simplifying the moral rule of life. Being a treasury of principles, rather than a digest of rules, it relieves us from the yoke of bondage to a multiplicity of minute, vexatious and easily forgotten regulations and restrictions. The superiority of this mode of legislating may be shown in the instance of the minor virtue of social politeness. What tone of littleness and feebleness does not the superstitious observance of an endless series of minute rules for one's deportment among one's fellow-creatures, stamp pro tempore, upon the noblest mind! How rare is it to see perfect and finished gentlemanliness in connexion with a fine, bold and free heartiness of native character! But Christianity can accomplish this junction for us. It puts out of the way, in the first place, that selfishness which is the perennial spring of the offences against politeness. If politeness, be "benevolence in little things," (Chatham,) surely that Gospel which teaches us "to love our neighbor as ourselves," "in honor preferring one another," need only be obeyed to ensure the truest politeness in our social demeanor. Christian principle, farther, frees us from vanity and bashful timidity; substituting in the place of either, a just and modest self-respect; and thus, gives a freedom, a simplicity, an easy, independent cheerfulness to our social intercourses, which the student of Chesterfield might toil after in vain. And it accomplishes all this, without impairing the great and sturdy features of mental power.

THE OLD MAN'S EXPERIENCE.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

"I relate what I have seen."

Say, mortal say, by Him who rules above,
Which prompts to noblest actions—fear or love?

The golden orb of heaven had retired behind the western mountains, and multitudes of light clouds overspread the horizon, through which the full moon floated in tranquil majesty, while her silver rays were reflected by every wave of the expansive "lake of a thousand islands." Gently were the waters rippled by the evening breeze, softly did the night-wind sigh in the woody bowers. All was hushed in sweet repose, save one solitary horseman, who had for sometime been leisurely pacing his way along the margin of this field of waters, as if to prolong the delightful scene; but recollecting the growing lateness of the hour, he put spurs to his horse, and with accelerated motion was dashing his way to the nearest inn, when his before sure-footed steed unluckily stumbled, and precipitated its rider with great force to the ground. Feeling much bruised and unable to continue his journey, he made the best of his way to an humble, but neat little cottage which stood within sight; where, after rapping gently at the door, it was opened by a tall, majestic figure, whose white and scattering locks and snowy beard told they had already been bleached by the frosts of seventy winters. Learning our traveller's misfortune, he very kindly offered him his hand, and bid him a hearty welcome to such as his lowly mansion afforded.

The old gentleman still retained the noble powers of intellect unimpaired; cheerful, sensible and communicative in conversation; open and consistent in his manners; in short, one of those who perform an act of kindness, not because it is esteemed good, but rather for the luxury it affords to a sensitive and benevolent heart; one of those rare spirits we sometimes meet on our journey, whom, before we know why, we feel we can trust as a friend and love as a brother, and whom no change in the fluctuating events of succeeding time can obliterate from memory's page. Such was the good, the venerable Stedman. His family consisted only of himself, wife, and a granddaughter, an interesting child aged twelve years. A soothing balm, readily administered by the hand of kindness, if not altogether calculated to make the wounded whole, served at least to alleviate pain. The refreshing meal was soon prepared, where familiarity, good sense and good will were the richest sauces.

"My friend," said the old gentleman to his guest, "you have been very unfortunate this evening—speaking after the manner of men—for so it appears to us short-sighted mortals; but doubtless it was designed to accomplish some all-wise and benevolent purpose. How frequently do we sigh over that to-day, which to-morrow, as it were, causes us to give thanks to the Most High! How strong a lesson of reconciliation! and what confidence, what trust, should we repose in the almighty Controller of events, 'who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works.'" "Such a confidence in divine protection," replied the traveller, "must be a source of much enjoyment, and I have sometimes wished that such a faith was mine, even though it were but a creature of the brain—a phantom of a heated imagination." "I see," returned the good old man, "that you are somewhat skeptical upon the subject. I rejoice the more in this meeting—such was my state—I have been there before you. If you will favor me with an audience, you shall have a sketch of my past life. But

Our traveller soon found himself very comfortably lodged for the night, but the novelty of the entertainment, the prepossessing expression of countenance, and the interesting manner of his aged and sympathising host, dwelt so strongly on his mind, that it was long ere the "drowsy god" hushed him in the arms of refreshing slumber.

The next morning he arose with the rising sun, and found himself much better than he had anticipated. After the usual duties and hospitalities of the morning were over, Mr. Stedman, seating himself in the massy arm chair, while one hand gently rested on the family Bible which lay on the antiquated stand beside him, thus commenced: "Well, brother, (for such I feel that you are, in more than one sense of the term,) I will now fulfil my last evening's engagement, provided you think you can listen with patience to the religious experience of an old man." His guest assured him that he was very anxious that he should begin, and should listen with much pleasure.

"I was born," resumed Mr. Stedman, "on the banks of the far-famed Connecticut, in the State which bears its name. Of my mother I have no recollection, she having died when I was an infant; but my father, though of a feeble and delicate constitution, survived her a few years. He left two sons, Charles and James, of which I am the youngest. On his deathbed he committed us to the care of a wealthy uncle, who, having no children, seemed pleased with the charge and adopted us as his sons. He spared no pains in conducting us 'in the way in which we should go,' and being a deacon in the church in our neighborhood, a Presbyterian after the strictest sect, we were carefully indoctrinated in all the mysteries of the trinity, election and reprobation. The Sabbath, in our juvenile years, moved tardily on; a day of listlessness and inaction, when the very face of nature seemed to wear an awful solemnity! It was called 'holy time,' and to converse upon worldly matters, or read any other book than the Bible, Catechism, psalm-book or a volume of old sermons, was deemed sinful in high degree; and to have spoken a word against our minister, at any time, would have been thought as heinous as was the sin against the Holy Ghost in the apostolic age!

"When I was about eighteen, there was what was called an 'awakening' in our town, in which great numbers were added to the church. My brother and I were fully in the belief, that if we did not submit sooner or later, and join the church, we must inevitably writhe in endless flames; but being naturally gay and volatile, fond of indulging in the amusements of life, which reason told us were innocent, we remained stubborn and unyielding for some time; till one of our youthful playmates sickened and died very suddenly, who we were informed had left this world without making his peace with God, despairing of his mercy! This had the desired effect—it was too solemn a warning to withstand. We yielded ourselves implicitly, as clay in the hands of the potter, to the dictates of those whom we thought God's peculiar people, zealous of good works. I need tell you we were happy, since we then thought that God, who was before our enemy, had become our friend. At first we could pray, and pray devoutly for all mankind, and ardently desired that every wanderer might come to the fold of Christ and become the rich partakers of our heavenly Father's illimitable love! But we soon learned that we were becoming too liberal in our prayers; for in consistency we could not pray for all men, when our creed told us that the elect were a chosen few; far the greatest proportion being reprobates. How could we ask for the accomplishment of what we believed God never intended to perform, and what was in perfect opposition to his will and design? Impossible, if we would be true to the Master whom we served! When we pay our homage to a being whose love extends to a few, and whose tender mercies are never realized only by a part of the human family, shall we, weak and frail children of the dust, exercise love towards all, and be merciful to those for whom he has no mercy? Shall man be better than his Maker? If he whom we take for our guide, the object of our worship, the great standard of all perfection, hate those who rebel against him, shall we, finite mortals, cultivate feelings of pity and compassion for them? No! consistency, reason, justice forbid it!!

"If we would point out a pattern of goodness and loveliness for the youth to imitate, we should certainly select one whom we thought their superior in the virtues and graces. What should we think of that parent, who could place his beloved sons under the tuition of a tyrannical despot, to learn the principles of humanity and philanthropy? We should not hesitate in pronouncing him insane; especially if he had held him up to their infantile minds as being worthy their imitation.

"Then let us cease to wonder that partiality, oppression and persecution are stalking throughout the land. I have known and 'do testify' that the narrow and cruel creed of Partialism teaches us to esteem ourselves better than others, and to despise and persecute those whom we look upon as reprobates, hated of God and created for the glorious purpose of displaying his vindictive justice in their indescribable and eternal woe! Its fruits, I have found by close observation and dear-bought experience, to be invariably the same in kind, although existing in different degrees of perfection, according as its votaries more or less faithfully imitate the God they worship. Soon after being 'born of the spirit,' and becoming one of the favorites of the Most High, I treated my former associates with cold neglect and haughty scorn, and the story that was so readily invented and propagated to their disadvantage, which before would have unsheathed my keenest weapons of defence, I could listen to with an approving smile! Nor was I alone—neither was mine an extreme case. Those of my acquaintances of the like faith, (to their honor be it said,) generally conducted with the same consistency. I ever detested hypocrisy in all its varying forms, and strange as it now seems, was at that time candid and sincere: and I am induced to believe that there are still a large majority of the many advocates of the vindictive cruelty of God, who truly suppose, while devising plans to extirpate what they term 'heresy,' and abusing and persecuting those who will not ascribe to the divinity the character of a Molech, that they are doing God service!

"But, to return. The members of our church generally consisted of the wealthier portion of community, and were abundantly able to support a priest in the best style. They did so. Our minister came amongst us poor and humble, despising wealth; but in a short time his fortune became ample, as I never knew him to refuse, at least, the conveniences of life. Large sums were frequently raised to send the Gospel to the perishing Heathen, articles of clothing without number, prepared for the suffering missionaries, and the calls of the poor within our own circle of religious faith, were punctually attended to.

BRIEF CRITICISMS.....No. V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"While Religion enjoins it upon us to cover the faults of our kind with a veil of indulgence, Intolerance teaches us to transform their opinions into crimes."—Art of being Happy.

True religion is the source of kindness and good will. It is the rich gift of Heaven imparted to erring man, to enlighten his mind, strengthen his weakness, and bind him by the strong cords of fraternal affection to his brother man. In view of the frailty to which the most perfect of our race are subject, it calls upon us to exercise a forgiving spirit, and allow a sense of our failings to temper the judgment we pass upon the imperfections of others. What mortal is perfect? Who is without faults? Who has not their "weak points," through which temptation can successfully assail them? Who, in this world, is elevated above all liability to err? None. From these reflections, we discover the truth and beauty of the above words which declare that—"Religion enjoins it upon us to cover the faults of our kind with a veil of indulgence." Not to approbate their sins—not to encourage them in crime or error—not to refrain from chiding their transgressions—but rather to distinguish between wilful wickedness, and those faults which arise from the general imperfection of our race; and while we denounce and chastise the former to cast the mantle of charity over the latter. There is a vast distinction between deliberate sin, and human failings. The one is a crime which religion calls upon us to reprobate; the other is a misfortune, over which it teaches us to throw the "veil of indulgence." The Saviour, while openly rebuking sin, ever looked with an eye of compassion upon the failings incident to humanity—upon honest error and blinded delusion.

The influence of intolerance is directly the reverse of religion. So far from teaching us to cover the frailties of human nature, it influences him who possesses its spirit, to transform even the honest opinions of his fellow-beings, into crimes! And how many are there in Christian sects, under the sway of this spirit of intolerance! How many, who apparently view it as one of the most heinous crimes, for an individual to entertain a religious opinion, different from their own! Are there not professing Christians who look with suspicion and scorn upon those of another sect? who do not hesitate to cast reproach and contumely and an evil name upon them? and some even, who would be in favor of penal laws with severe penalties, to compel men to adopt their religious faith? The pages of ecclesiastical history instruct us, that in days past, such have existed in the religious community; and I think it is not violating the dictates of charity to suppose that some may be found in the present age, who cherish a similar spirit.

To the reasonable and candid professor of every sect, I would respectfully put the inquiry—Is it in accordance with the genius of Christianity, to cherish this feeling of intolerance? Is it conformable to the spirit of the Gospel of the Redeemer, to denounce and treat as enemies to religion and morality, all who cannot see with your eyes or understand with your judgment? And in so doing, would you not render yourselves liable to the censure of the Saviour—"Judge not, lest ye be judged?" You peruse the Scriptures, and honestly, no doubt, believe they teach the endless suffering of many of God's intelligent beings. With a mind, perhaps, differently constituted and enlightened, I study the same holy book, and as honestly believe it proclaims that God is the kind Father and steadfast Friend of all the human family—that he, preferring to have holiness and happiness reign universal, rather than that sin and misery should triumph forever, has determined (not to save the world in their sins, but) to save all his rational creatures from their sins and errors, raise them above imperfection, and fit them to dwell in his presence, and participate in the joys of heaven forever—and that being infinite in wisdom and omnipotent in power, this most glorious and holy determination will, in the fulness of times, be triumphantly accomplished! Now what rule of morals or equity would justify you in questioning the sincerity of my belief, or in denouncing me as a wilful enemy of religion and virtue, and yet forbid me to judge you in the same manner? "It is a poor rule that will not work both ways," says the old adage. Is it right for me to entertain feelings of disrespect and enmity toward you, for believing in ceaseless suffering? No; the spirit of the Gospel and the law of moral equity forbids it. Is it not, then, equally wrong and unjustifiable for you to cherish the same feelings toward me, for believing the Creator will bestow holiness and happiness upon all the intelligent beings he has been pleased to form? Let a pure conscience answer this question.

Why do mankind entertain various opinions upon the same subject? Simply, because our understandings are not infinite. Did our knowledge equal that of the Deity, there would be no disagreement—all would see the truth, know and acknowledge it. But inasmuch as it hath seemed good to the Creator to form us measurably imperfect in this life—as our minds possess different degrees of capability and strength, and have been variously biassed and trained—it is not reasonably to be expected that our views will coincide upon all subjects, especially upon one of the peculiar characteristics of religion. It is, therefore, equally the dictate of religion, humanity and good sense, not to allow these honest differences of opinion to mar the friendship and good will which should link man to man—and especially not to permit them to interrupt the social intercourse of neighbors, or light up the flame of enmity among professing Christians—believers in the same God and the same Mediator! We should allow the measure of our respect for our fellow-creatures to be dictated, not by the nature of their belief, but by its sincerity, and by the worth of their moral character. We can pity those whom we believe to entertain erroneous doctrines, but we have no authority or right to condemn, denounce or villify them for their opinion's sake. For let us ever remember, that "religion enjoins it upon us to cover the faults [imperfections] of our kind, with a veil of indulgence," while it is rank intolerance alone, that "teaches us to transform their opinions into crimes." While we live up to the dictates of the former, let us sedulously avoid the malign influences of the latter.

OATHS.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

Our Partialist brethren have come to the conclusion, that Universalists cannot consistently take an oath, because they do not believe in endless misery. A late writer observes, that "Universalists must, in order to act consistently with their belief, refuse to take an oath, and give their affirmation like a Quaker; and the law ought to be framed accordingly." So far, we agree this writer is correct. But when he attempts to explain the phrase "so help me God," by making it imply endless misery, I must disagree with him.

I am decidedly opposed to oaths, uttered by a person profanely, or administered by the law. "Swear not at all" is the direct command of Jesus; but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay;" i. e., speak the truth, plainly and without equivocation—speak as you mean.

Were every man a Christian, and every Christian such as his name would indicate, there would be no need of oaths. All would speak the truth, and lie not to one another. But man is a frail being, liable to err. He is often mistaken; but none the less so, although he speaks under the solemnity of an oath. The administration of oaths, with the painful penalties annexed, forms no security against falsehood and deception. Under the existing laws of our country, it is found extremely difficult to convict a man of perjury, because we cannot ascertain whether he intended to speak the truth or not.

Whoever has attended the judicial proceedings of our courts must have observed that the testimony of a witness bears a weight proportioned to the acknowledged character for veracity which he sustains. A man whose general character is bad, who has often been found guilty of falsehood, can have little influence, though he speak under oath: while the man of truth and honesty will be regarded as a safe witness, though the weight of his testimony rests on his own story, plainly told.

We should rejoice to see the time come when every witness called upon the stand, should be required to testify plainly under the penalties of perjury, without the present practice of calling on the holy name of our God to regard a case the most mean and despicable. Testimony thus given would depend on the general character of the witness as a man of truth, and not on the single fact that he has taken an oath.

On this ground Universalists could claim equal privileges with others, and I shall rejoice to see the laws so altered that honest men may testify, while the mere professor shall be rejected for the lack of that moral character necessary to give credence to his evidence. I hope all Universalists will henceforth refuse to "swear at all," and in all cases give a plain affirmation to the truth.

IMPROPER JUDGMENT.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

"Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment."—Jesus.

Mankind are very likely to become the dupes of deception, and sufferers from credulity: and though often the victims of imposition, they seem inclined to heed the suggestions of "external appearance." But in nothing are we more liable to be entrapped in the snares of treacherous duplicity, than in listening to the teachings of outside show. Aware of this, the fawning sycophant attempts to ingratiate himself into favor and confidence by the manifestation of a graceful exterior, and a polite and gentlemanly deportment. By this delusive snare, the mechanic imposes on his customer, the artist on the wondering spectator, the merchant on the purchaser of his wares, the hypocrite on the unsuspecting and credulous, and the priest on the ignorant and superstitious.

By judging from external appearances, without a due examination of things, people have mistaken their true interests, drawn improper and erroneous conclusions, and fallen victims to their own indiscretion. A superficial observer is always subject to the most impious frauds. Forming opinions without investigation, and estimating things according to external appearances, he often regards that as valuable, which is worthless; and places confidence in a treacherous character, who secures trust but to betray. The painted sepulchre appears externally like a rich and costly palace, or splendid temple, suggesting to the mind, by association the idea of gilded trappings, elegant furniture and gorgeous equipage; but on a minute inspection, it presents a scene forbidding and appalling. The penitentiary prison may resemble a well fortified castle in its outward appearance, and seem to intimate that happiness reigns within. But penetrate its walls, and what a horrid spectacle bursts on the sight! what a frightful picture is presented to view!

By clothing up error in a garb that bears the semblance of truth, she may appear beautiful and lovely; and hiding her native deformity amid the artificial attractions thrown around her person, she may deceive the world. Gazing on her external charms without inspecting her intrinsic merits and inherent qualities, and admiring her outward attractions and exterior graces, individuals may embrace her as the proximate source of their highest felicity. When in the delightful bower of Eden, the happy pair were regaling themselves on the gifts of an indulgent Providence, and tasting the sweets of a rural Paradise, the woman fixed her anxious eye on that forbidden fruit whose mortal poison supplanted happiness and introduced to their society the monster sin, with all her wretched train of fell destroyers. Judging from the "outward appearance," she imagined that "the fruit was good for food, and much to be desired to make one wise." But fatal anticipation! Most awful delusion! She learned, alas! too late in the school of experience, her sad mistake. Though pleasant to the eye—death lurked within. And all the wisdom it was capable of imparting, was the knowledge of the fatal consequences resulting to practical evil.

Such is man's predisposition to worship—to pay homage to some divinity that the very name of religion awakens in his bosom sentiments of veneration and respect. Hence, in nothing do we fall a more easy prey to deception and guile, than in matters pertaining to religion. Here the canting hypocrite has a large field open in which to practice his artful wiles in imposing on the credulity of mankind. In every thing else will a man's sincerity, honesty and integrity be sooner suspected, than on the subject of religion. And thousands taking advantage of the circumstance, make use of her sacred name in order to cloak their iniquity and overcome suspicion. Our attachment to this solace of human life—this friend of the friendless—fair daughter of heaven—our confidence in her salutary influence in rectifying moral disorders, and in regulating the lives and characters of her subjects, afford to the evil-doer, a strong bulwark against the attacks of jealousy and suspicion.

The imposing and solemn air—the scrupulous deportment and grave exterior of a formal votary of religion, readily shows the respect, the confidence, and the veneration of the observer. Do we see an individual ceremonious and punctilious, often engaged in exercises of devotion, a strict observer of ordinances, and a warm, strenuous advocate of religious duties and practices? we are disposed to recognize him without further inquiry, as a pious, godly man—a follower of the Lamb—the very child of heaven. We unhesitatingly conclude, that pure and undefiled religion dwells in his heart—that the highest of moral excellence pervades his soul. But in this, as in many things else, we are extremely liable to misjudge. "We look on things after the outward appearance," and draw inferences from data which are very likely to deceive. "The tree is known by its fruit"—and the character of the fruit is to be determined by its properties, and not by its appearance. "All is not gold that glitters."

Although the outward appearance of a person is generally regarded as the index of his character, yet in this we are frequently greatly deceived. Often mirth and guile play upon the countenance in smiles of joy and gladness, while melancholy gloom gnaws like a canker at the heart, and dark dispondency reigns over the soul. So, too, it frequently happens, that an individual manifests an outward religious mein, lays greater claims to piety and godliness, and is very punctilious in the observance of ordinances and ceremonies; and at the same time, is full of hypocrisy, iniquity and guile.

In all ages of the world, mankind have had a kind of superstitious regard for rites and rituals in religious services; and have been disposed to measure a man's piety by his attention to the externals and formalities of religion. This was particularly the case with the ancient Jews and Pagans. And since the introduction of the spiritual religion of the Gospel, whose duty consists in the devotional exercises of the mind; and in the surrender of the affections, in love to God and man, the practice seems not to have been wholly removed. Indeed the moderns are scarcely a whit behind the ancients in this respect. Christians at the present day are in the habit of estimating a man's piety and godliness, by his attention to the forms and ceremonies of religion; and by his high pretensions and boasting professions. They judge according to appearance, and consider him the greatest saint, who makes the greatest ado about rites, and ordinances, and outward well-worship. And as it is well known that Universalists are less superstitious and formal in regard to rites and ceremonies than other denominations, it is frequently said of them that they are irreligious, and unworthy the Christian name. "Judge not according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment." No people were ever more punctilious in their observance of the externals of religion than the Jewish Scribes and Pharisees. They were so outwardly pious and devotional, that they often prayed and fasted—paid tithes of all they possessed—hallowed the Sabbath—made broad the phylacteries on their garments—offered their morning and evening sacrifices, and in the most particular manner attended to all the ordinances of God's house; yet after all, Jesus says, they neglected the weightier matters of the law, such as judgment, mercy, and faith; and were hypocrites, drawing nigh unto him with their lips, and honoring him with their mouths, while their hearts were far from him; in accordance with the fear that is taught by the precept of men. Hence his remark to his disciples, "except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of God."

If we would judge discretely, we should follow the religionist to his home—accompany him in all his private walks in life—trace him through every avenue of social existence, and carefully inspect all his actions and his doings—and thus see whether all his words of prayer are the breathings of a soul baptized into the spirit of the Gospel, and exhibit marks of internal piety and devotion—whether his conversation is heavenly, corresponding with his profession—whether his conduct comports with the principles of moral goodness and genuine virtue—in short, whether he is what he seems to be, the peaceable citizen, the conscientious man of business, the confiding friend, the humane philanthropist, the benevolent benefactor, and the devout worshipper. If such be his character, he is the sincere, upright Christian; and presents an example worthy of imitation. "Judge not according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment."

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. III.

BY EVANGELIST J. LEWIS.

I HAVE NEVER KNOWN the cause of truth to suffer from fair and candid investigation.

I have never known the promises of God to fail.

I have never known the following passage of Scripture to be reconciled with the doctrine of endless, unmerciful and vindictive punishment: "For the Lord will not cast off forever: but though he cause he grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

I have never known the doctrine of total innate depravity reconciled with the doctrine that we are "probationers for eternity," and that we shall be either happy or miserable through all duration, according as we form good or bad characters in this life.

I have never known any man so bad but that he might have been worse.

I have never known any man so good but that he might have been better.

I have never known a religionist to condemn reason, unless reason had first condemned his creed.

I have never known Universalists to become bigots from being organized into societies and churches.

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.....No. IV.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

"Trust in the Lord."

There is no injunction, whether religious or moral, that is more frequently recommended than our obligation to trust in God. It is common for many of those who have been called to officiate in a clerical capacity, to assume the prerogative to exclaim, "Trust in the Lord;" and they have often exhorted their fellow-men to be resigned to the divine will, though they should be excluded from the favor of God forever. But their labor seems to have been almost in vain, and the reason is obvious. They have taught their hearers that God is their implacable foe; that he is burning with immortal vengeance toward them, and is about to consign them to an endless hell; but that they have undertaken to avert the dreadful doom, and save them from their Maker's wrath. The consequence is, the hearer at once discovers the most goodness in the creature, and consequently reposes more confidence in him than in the Creator.

The true character of God must be learned before we can feel that degree of confidence required to make us happy, and whoever learns this character as revealed in nature and revelation, must feel this degree of confidence. We shall not hesitate to trust in the providence of God, and to rejoice in his salvation, when we contemplate the glorious display of his goodness made by the Gospel of his Son. Here life and immortality for all are brought to light, and here the lovingkindness of God appears to cheer the hearts and dissipate the fears of benighted mortals.

Those who are so unfortunate as to want confidence in God, are generally branded with criminality; but really, they must be sufficiently wretched without being upbraided as guilty. The secret of the heart is closed to human observation, and it is not for us to say who is guilty before God. A lack of confidence in God is a misfortune rather than a crime, and originates in false notions of the Deity, rather than in the depravity of the heart.

UTICA, SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1836.

VISIT TO DUNDEE.

Being summoned as a witness a few weeks since to attend the circuit of the Supreme Court which sat at Bath, Steuben county, on the last week in May, (an uncomfortable time for me, as I was thereby deprived of the privilege of attending our State Convention at Auburn, which met the same week,) I made it in my way to pass through Dundee, Yates county, and spend the fourth Sunday of the month in that place. Though I had sent no previous appointment and was a stranger in the place, I was greeted by our excellent brethren there with a very cordial welcome, and urged to preach to them the word of truth, to which request I readily assented, their pastor being absent and the meeting-house vacant.

In this place and vicinity, our esteemed friend and fellow-laborer, M. L. Wisner, has labored most of his time for the last three years, with great acceptance and success. We find him strongly riveted in the affections and confidence of the people, and a strong solicitude manifested for him to remain. But like many others in our land, he seems to have caught what is called the Western fever, and appears bent on removing to the far West, whither he had now gone to look for a "place of habitation." We pray that he may be blest of Heaven, and doubt not, that wherever he may locate or sojourn, he will continue to do good in the name of the holy child Jesus.

Our meeting at Dundee, was remarkably well attended, considering no notice had been given of it till about noon on Saturday. Our brethren here are considerable numerous and in a united and prosperous condition. They are the principal proprietors of the union or free church, a large and commodious house of worship with a good bell and every convenience for a large congregation, situated centrally, in a young but thriving village. We wish prosperity to our brethren here, and in case of the removal of Br. Wisner, the speedy employment of some other faithful laborer in the Gospel vineyard.

There was one circumstance during our afternoon service at Dundee, which we ought not and must not neglect to mention: for the conduct and the spirit it exhibits ought to be held up to universal reprobation and abhorrence. And I am very confident, that in the community where it occurred, neither the sanctimonious phiz and pious pretensions of bigotry, nor the headlong zeal and loud professions of fanaticism can screen the

HYMN OF THE WESTERN BRETHREN.

BY MRS. J. H. SCOTT.

Air—Heber's Missionary Hymn.

Respectfully inscribed, with the best wishes of the author, to those persevering heralds of the cross, who have left home and friends to publish a free salvation in the wilds of the West.

We have left the scenes of childhood,
The friends of early years,
To journey through the wild wood,
And weep the pilgrim's tears.
We have left our own green mountains,
All gay with sunny flowers,
And our silver-glancing fountains,
For toil and lonely hours.

But shall our spirits falter,
While Jesus calls us on?
Before God's holy altar,
From error's grasp is won?
Away with grief and sadness,
Let every care depart;
We bring the oil of gladness
To many a wounded heart.

What though dark clouds are o'er us,
And angry waves beneath;
Our Master braved before us
Wild persecution's breath—
What though our zeal may lead us
O'er dangers wintry track,
Our guide will ne'er deceive us,
But safely bring us back.

Then on—his footsteps follow,
Our banner waves on high—
Truth, mighty truth, shall swallow
Each vulture of the sky.
On, on, till light descendeth
To every darkened heart,
And Scripture knowledge sendeth
All hope from sin apart.

On, on—we ask no guerdon,
Enough for us to know,
We take from men the burden
Of "everlasting woe"—
We bring them joyous tidings,
From God, their friend above,
And bury their backslidings
In renovating love.

SUBSTANCE OF A LECTURE ON ELOCUTION.

Delivered before the Law Association of the city of New-York, April, 1836,

BY PROF. SAMUEL N. SWEET.

[Concluded.]

It is to be regretted that while great attention is paid to song, little or none is paid to speech in this country. Music, in its perfection, is an elegant accomplishment. But what is it compared to the higher graces and more striking expressions of elocution? Vocal music is more gratifying than instrumental, because the human voice, whether its notes are heard in song or speech, is the noblest and sweetest instrument of music in existence. I agree in opinion with the Editor of the North American Review, that "the voice of song is not sweeter than the voice of eloquence."

The powers of the voice alone are sufficient to justify the exclamation of the great poet of nature, "What a piece of work is man!" When highly cultivated, it sinks to the sweetest whisper, or rises to the highest tone, without any apparent labor. Such a voice never degenerates into song or drawl. It is the music of nature.

A knowledge of the science of elocution, will give the art of conveying the sense and sentiment of discourse, not only correctly but rhetorically. In order to convey the sense and sentiment of what we read or recite grammatically, and with gratification to the ear of the hearer, it is obvious we must perfectly understand the meaning of the author.

It is easy to say that a public speaker should "hold the mirror up to nature," but it is not quite so easy to do it, for nature is a complicated machinery. Talking, although it is generally less formal and more free from affectation, than reading or speaking, is far, very far, from being truly eloquent. Men very frequently, "imitate humanity abominably," in conversation as well as in reading or speaking. Some modes of public speaking are undoubtedly injurious to health. But properly understood and pursued, it fortifies the lungs against all disease, particularly that worst of all diseases, the consumption.

Some men complain that their hearers occasionally get to sleep. The fault is in the speaker and not the hearer. It is our duty to sleep, and sleep soundly too, unless the speaker can say or do something of sufficient interest to keep us awake. There is something in true and genuine eloquence which startles the tyrant in his dreams of power, controls the surges of lawless violence, and makes "the very extremities of the earth to tremble." Can an individual sleep amidst the thunders of such eloquence? As well may he sleep amidst the clangor of the trumpet and the clash of arms.

Eloquence, in our government, is emphatically an instrument of power. There are those who indulge in the fearful apprehension, that this republic, like Athens, Sparta, Carthage and Rome, is destined soon to fall. But while we have public men of genuine eloquence who, although they differ in opinion as to the domestic and foreign policy of government, are zealously and fearlessly advocating the continued existence of the great and ennobling principles upon which it is predicated, let us not despair. Had we no such advocates I should consider our liberties no better than "painted air."

It was when Cicero's eloquence shook the forum that Rome was recognized as the mistress of the world. In vain, then, did the mighty Hannibal lift up his arm against her. But when Cicero was murdered, the "eternal city," tottering beneath the weight of her iniquities, jostled over the precipice of faction and her sun went down in blood.

The great and imperishable interest of millions of freemen are committed to the charge of the generation to which we belong. And are we not under the strongest inducements to strive for the mastery in public speaking?

If I have presented to you a single additional incitement to the many already before you, for increased exertion in restoring elocution to its former position, within the department of useful instruction, I feel amply rewarded. I cannot conclude without observing, if you will excuse the liberty, with the poet, that it is

To fill the ambition of a common man
That Webster's language is his mother tongue,
And Wirt's great name compatriot with his own."

MARRIAGES.

In Boston, November 1, 1835, by Perry Cobb, Esq., Mr. WILLIAM BOWMAN, to Miss MARY DONALDSON, all of that place.

In the same place, March 24, by the same, Mr. AMMI WHITING, to Miss CLARISSA FOLSOM, all of Boston.

In Fowler, St. Lawrence county, May 1, by Rev. O. Wilcox, Mr. SIMON HAZLETON, Jr., to Miss EMELINE COLE, all of that place.

DEATHS.

Near the village of Carthage, May 4th, JEFFERSON, aged three years and five months, and MALVINA, aged two years, only children of Allen and Susan Wait. Also, Mrs. HANNAH PRATT, aged 62 years, Mrs. Wait's mother.

These persons were drowned in a ditch, from which clay had been thrown for the purpose of making brick, and which was partly filled with water. On the morning of this day, Mr. Wait was from home, and Mrs. Wait had left the house for a few moments, to go to a neighbor's, leaving the children on the brick yard, at play. It is supposed that the children fell in, and that their grandmother came to their assistance, and in attempting to extricate them, slipped in with them, and being rather infirm was unable to get out. The width of the place was about three feet, the depth four feet, with two and a half feet of water. Mrs. Wait on returning, succeeded in removing the bodies of her children from the water, but was obliged to go for assistance to remove the body of her mother.

The funeral was attended on Monday following, by the writer, and the consolation of the Gospel tendered to the bereaved and severely afflicted parents of the children, who were the only relatives present. Under these circumstances, it was peculiarly gratifying to our bereaved friends, as well as to every person capable of feeling, to witness the large congregation assembled on the occasion. J. B., Jr.

In Richford, April 27, Mrs. ALMIRA DANIELS, wife of Capt. Heman Daniels, aged 40. By this dispensation, a husband, five children, the Hartford Universalist society, (of which she was a member,) and many relatives and friends have been called to mourn the departure of one deservedly loved by them. It pleased God to remove her by a nervous affection, which was rapid in its progress, depriving her of her reason, and baffling the skill of medical assistance. The funeral obsequies were attended by a goodly number, who were addressed by the writer, from Job xiv: 10.

OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE NEW-YORK CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS FOR 1836.

Met in Auburn, May 25, 1836, agreeably to adjournment, and after uniting in prayer with Br. S. J. Hillyer, proceeded to organize the Council by choosing Br. P. PRICE, Moderator, and Brs. N. Sawyer and C. S. Brown, Clerks.

2. Invited the ministering brethren present to take part in the deliberations.

3. Appointed Brs. G. W. Montgomery, C. Eldred and A. Warden a committee to arrange the public services.

4. Appointed Brs. Williamson, Chase and Hillyer a committee on fellowship and ordination.

5. Appointed Brs. M. Jennison, D. Biddlecom and N. Doolittle to nominate delegates to the United States Convention.

6. Received the Niagara Association into the fellowship of this Convention.

7. Appointed one delegate from each Association, viz.—Br. C. B. Brown, Doolittle, Williamson, D. Biddlecom, Hillyer, N. Sawyer, Chase, Waggoner, W. G. Parker and M. Jennison a committee to consider the powers of this Convention to grant letters of fellowship and confer ordination.

8. Appointed Brs. T. J. Sawyer, P. Morse and C. F. Le Fevre a committee to prepare a model or models for society or church and society constitutions—also rules and regulations for the government of this Convention in its deliberations—and report the same at our next session.

9. Adjourned till next morning, after prayer by Br. Morse.

10. May 26. Met according to adjournment, and united in prayer with Br. Chase.

11. Heard and accepted the report of the committee on fellowship and ordination, to confer ordination on Br. W. H. Waggoner.

12. Appointed Brs. W. G. Parker, Williamson and Doolittle to nominate the place for our next meeting.

13. Whereas the United States Convention of Universalists at its last session recommended "the propriety and expediency of establishing a Theological Seminary, to the consideration of the members of our denomination," therefore,

Resolved, That, although in the opinion of the members of this Council, the establishment of a Theological Seminary by the Universalist denomination, is not desirable, yet we unite in recommending the consideration of that subject to the people. Adopted—Yeas, 11—Nays, 9.

14. The committee of one from each Association reported,

Whereas some of our Associations have objected to the practice of this Convention in granting letters of fellowship and conferring ordination, and whereas the right to such practice has been denied, and whereas it is deemed important that the views of this Convention, and the course it deems proper to pursue, should be fully known and correctly understood, therefore,

Resolved, That uniform precedent warrants the conclusion that this Convention possesses the right to grant letters of fellowship and confer ordination.

Resolved, That as a matter of expediency, this Convention will not grant letters of fellowship; but it recommends all candidates for the ministry to apply for fellowship to the Associations in whose limits they respectively reside, in all cases where it is practicable.

Resolved, That in conferring ordination, this Convention will be guided by such rules and regulations as are in force in the Associations in which the applicant resides.

15. Accepted said report unanimously.

16. Heard and accepted the report of the committee to nominate delegates to represent this Convention in the United States Convention at its next session—viz: That Brs. P. Morse, J. D. Williamson, J. Chase, A. B. Grosh, (ministers,) and Hezekiah Scott, North Salem; Josiah Hart, Esq., Hartford; Ebenezer Murdock, Albany; Imley Prescott, Geneva; D. Brayton, Western; and David Brown, Oxford, (laymen,) be said delegates.

[The residences were not given me by the Clerk—I have added them according to my belief.

A. B. G.]

17. Appointed Br. Grosh to preach the occasional sermon at our next session, and Br. Chase, substitute.

18. Appointed Br. Grosh to prepare the minutes for publication, and accompany them with a circular.

19. After uniting in prayer with Br. D. Biddlecom, adjourned (agreeably to the report of the committee on adjournment) to meet in Albany, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in May, 1837.

CIRCULAR.

The New-York Convention of Universalists, to all in its fellowship, and to all the children of God universally, sendeth salutations of peace from God and good will to man.

The proceedings are commended to the careful consideration of all interested in them. They were passed with great unanimity, and where a diversity of opinion prevailed, there was still a unanimous desire to advance the cause.

The subject of establishing a Theological Seminary received considerable attention—for while all agree in the propriety and advantages of having a well-instructed ministry, there is a diversity of opinion with respect to the mode and means in which that knowledge should be obtained. It was believed that, whatever might be the opinions of each member of the Council on the good or ill, the policy or impolicy, the necessity or inutility of a Theological Seminary, it was improper that the denomination, as a whole, should be pledged in favor of it. Any number of individuals can unite and establish one, if they please to do so, they, alone, being responsible therefor—but it is not desirable that the responsibility of the few should be urged upon the whole denomination, as a denomination, many of the members of which are totally opposed to such a measure. Hence the subject is referred to the people for their consideration, and the subsequent action of each one to whom it is referred, as seemeth good in his own mind. As one coinciding in expressed opinion of the majority, I hope it will receive the attention its importance merits, and that some means may be devised by which knowledge may be, not only increased among the teachers, but also be diffused more generally and extensively among the people, including laity and clergy—all who teach and all who are taught.

Our delegation was far from being full. Not one Association was fully represented. Some had but one delegate, either lay or ministerial—and two (the Steuben and Chautauque) Associations were not represented even in part. This remissness in attendance, (for where the delegate cannot attend, he should strive to appoint a substitute who can and will go,) is much to be regretted. A full expression of the views and feelings, and attention to the wants of our order can never be given by such an unequal and incomplete representation of the Associations. Brethren, do think of these things. If you have active, intelligent men who will make good delegates and faithful representatives, send them—see that they attend, even if you must remunerate those who cannot otherwise afford to take the journey and lose the time.

The public services of the sanctuary were very impressive, instructive and delightful. The songs of Zion sung in sweetest strains, elevated our souls to heaven; the vocal prayer emptied out the heart's best gifts of gratitude and love at the feet of the Father of all, while the preached word filled our minds anew with instruction, consolation and joy, again to bring forth the product of praise and the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

We cannot cease speaking of the delightful season enjoyed by a full house of God's children, without saying that our Auburn brethren, and friends—yea, even some of the opposers of our distinctive sentiment, have given us great cause to remember them as long as gratitude for kindness and affection forms one among the feelings of our souls. May God bless them—fill their understandings with his truth—their souls with his love, and their lives with the providential and gracious demonstrations of his wisdom, power and goodness.

Per order, A. B. GROSH.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

The formation of this body, we looked upon with the most pleasing anticipations. We thought, and still think it the most advantageous and interesting measure that has been adopted by our denomination, for many years. With these feelings, we hate to be the first to find fault. We trust, however, after this frank declaration, no one will question the sincerity of our motives.

It will be recollected that, at the last session of the Convention, a resolution was passed prohibiting all but members of the council from participating in its public deliberations. It struck us at the time, as an impolitic measure; subsequent inquiry has satisfied us that we were not alone in this opinion. It has ever been the practice, in all our ecclesiastical bodies (at least in the State of New-York) to seek by invitation, rather than prohibit the advice and counsel of all ministering brethren in attendance. This we have thought was brotherly, and in accordance with our holy religion; and why the United States Convention should be the first to recede from general usage, we were at a loss to determine. The only reason urged at the

POETRY.

THE FLOWER OF THE DESERT.

Flower of the desert! lone as thou art fair!
No fountain pours its coolness by thy side;
Yet perfume floats around thee, and the glare
Withers not thee where none else can abide.
Thou grateful seem'st that life to thee is given,
Nourished by dews and beams and airs from heaven.

Bright in thy solitude, thy leaves unfold,
Breathing sweet welcome to the matin ray;
Thy rainbow beauties, though no eye behold,
New radiance gather till the closing day.
When stars arise, how graceful bends thy head,
Patient to wait the dews that heaven may shed.

Meek in thy solitude, thou dost not deem
That winds and showers were sent for thee alone:
For wandering gales oft visit thee that teem

With foreign fragrance, richer than thine own,
And whisper tidings of a genial clime
Where groves and gardens flourish in their prime.

A soul there is, as pure as thou and rare;
'Midst heartless crowds in solitude she dwells;
Conscious that kindred spirits breathe afar,
And cheered by that prophetic hope which tells
That flowers shall spring where now no promise shows
And e'en this desert "blossom like the rose."

THE SPIRITS OF THE NIGHT.

A PARABLE—BY MISS MARTINEAU.

As the sun was withdrawing his light from one hemisphere, the guardian spirits of man followed his course, as they were wont, that they might visit every land in turn.

But two who had been busy among the abodes of men all the day, lingered, unwilling to leave those to whom they had ministered.

To the one had been committed the urn which held the waters of bitterness, and he was called Wo. His young sister was named Peace; and in her hand was placed the lyre whose music was of heaven.

"There are some," said Wo, "who will not be ready to hearken to thee to-morrow, my sister, if I leave them already."

"There are also some, my brother, whom I have not yet soothed to deep repose. Oh! that we might tarry awhile!"

"We may not tarry, for there is need of us afar. Yet one thing may we do. Let us give of our power to another, that she may minister till we return."

So they called upon CONSCIENCE, and charged her to descend with the shadows of night, and to visit the abodes of men. The angel of Wo gave her of the waters of his urn, and said unto his sister, "Give her the lyre, for what other music needest thou than thine own songs? What other melody is so sweet?"

And when they had charged their messenger to await them at the eastern gate when the morning should open it unto them, they spread their wings and hastened down the West.

The messenger gazed after them afar: and when she marked the dim majesty of the elder spirit, and the mild beauty of his sister, she bent her head and silently went her way.

"What hast thou beheld?" said the angels to their messenger, when the portals of light were unclosed. "Are the healing waters spent? Hath the lyre been tuneless?"

"The waters are not spent," she replied; "for mine own tears have made this urn to overflow. The lyre was tuned in Paradise; else my trembling hand had jarred its strings."

"Alas!" cried the younger spirit, "where then hast thou ministered?"

"When the evening star appeared, I descended among the shadows, where I heard a voice calling to me from afar. It came from a space where raging fires were kindled by the hands of priests. Night hovered above, but the flames forbade her approach, and I could not abide longer beneath her wings. He who appealed unto me, stood chained amidst the fires which already preyed upon him. I swept the strings of the lyre, and smiles overspread his face. Even while the melody waxed sweeter, the dark-eyed spirit of the tombs came and bore him away asleep."

The young angel smiled as she said, "He hearkeneth now to nobler harmonies than ours! But was there none other amidst the flames to whom thou couldst minister?"

"Alas! there was one who lied though fear. He was led back to his cell, whither I followed him. I shed the waters into his soul, and the bitterness thereof tormented him more than any scorching flames which could have consumed his body. Yet must I visit him nightly till he dies."

"Droop not thy wings because of his anguish, my sister," said the elder spirit. "He shall yet be thine when he is made pure for thy presence."

"I have been," said the messenger, "beside the couch of the dying, in the palace, and beneath the lowly roof. I have shed into one departing soul the burning tears of the slave, and soothed the spirits of another with the voices of grateful hearts. I have made the chamber of one rich man echo with the cries of the oppressed, and have surrounded the pillow of another with the fatherless who called him parent. Kings have sought to hide themselves as I drew nigh, while the eye of the mourner hath lighted up at my approach. The slumbers of some have I hallowed with music, while they knew not I was at hand; and others have I startled with visions, who guessed not whence they came. I am filled with awe at mine own power."

"It shall increase," said the elder spirit, "while mine own waneth. The fountain of bitter waters wasteth continually. When it shall be dried up, I will break mine urn."

"And my lyre," said his sister, "shall it not be hushed by mightier music from on high?"

"Nay, my sister, not then, nor ever. No mightier music shall make men cease to love thine. They shall gather together to hear thee in their cities, and shall seek thee in the wilderness and by the sea shore. The aged shall hear thee chant among the tombs, and the young shall dance unto thy lay. Unto the simple shall thy melodies breathe from amidst the flowers of the meadows; and the wise shall they entrance as they go to and fro among the stars."

Then the messenger sighed, saying, "When shall these things be?"

"When thou art queen among men. Knowest thou not that such is thy destiny? Thou art now our messenger, but we shall at length be thy servants. Yea, when yonder son shall wander away into the depths, and the earth shall melt like the morning cloud, it shall be thine to lead the myriads of thy people to the threshold whence the armies of heaven come forth. It shall be thine to open to them the portals which I may not pass."

On February 21st, by the same, Mr. THOMAS J. MAGEE, to Miss SOPHIA RAYMOND, both of Pike, Allegany county.

On April 3d, by the same, Mr. SANFORD WHEELER, to Miss HELENA HUTCHINSON, both of Darien, Genesee county.

In Sheshequin, Pa., on May 15, by Rev. G. S. Ames, Mr. DANIEL HOOVER, of Nichols, Tioga county, N. Y., to Miss JULIA ANN SIMS, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Mexico, on the 13th May, Mr. DANIEL SHERMAN, in the 42d year of his age. The deceased came to his death by a fall from a building, while engaged in raising it.

This was a kind husband and father, and an obliging neighbor called to pass through the dark valley and shadow of death, in the meridian of life. He has left a widow and five children to mourn their irreparable loss. The funeral was attended on the 15th, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a large concourse of sympathizing friends and neighbors. C. B. BROWN.

At Cicero, of inflammation of the lungs, on March 23d, CLINTON S., only son of Lambert D. and Emily Quack-enbush, aged 1 year and 5 days.

"Oh, weep not! though thus he hath fled

In the blossom of beauty and prime;

The flower's transplanted, not dead—

The sunshine of heaven is his clime!

'Twere cruel to pray for him back,

Since his glorified soul is at rest;

Then, weep not, but follow his track—

He is gone to the land of the blest." C. B. BROWN.

On the 3d inst., of pulmonary consumption, Mr. ELIJAH PECK, eldest son of Capt. Freeman Peck, in the 23d year of his age. Mr. Peck had paid great attention to the cultivation of his mind, in consequence of which he had acquired a competent knowledge of the most important sciences and languages now taught. As a man, he was kind and dutiful—as a brother, he was beloved—and as an associate, he was respected. The society in which he dwelt will deeply regret the loss of this amiable person. He continued to the last, firm and unwavering in the belief of final emancipation from sin and misery and a full restoration of peace and happiness beyond the grave. The disease which closed his existence was of several months duration, and from its commencement to its termination he bore his sufferings with a degree of patience and resignation indicative of true Christian fortitude and meekness, and when death came he met its cold embrace with complacency. His funeral was attended by a numerous retinue of mourning relatives and friends who were deeply sensible of his worth.

When sickness shakes the languid frame,
Each dazzling pleasure flies;
Phantoms of bliss no more obscure
Our long-deluded eyes.

Their frail support deceives no more,
When death his sceptre shows,
And nature faint, beneath the weight
Of complicated woes.

The tottering frame from mortal life
Shall crumble into dust,
Nature shall faint, but learn each soul,
On nature's God to trust.

At Clockville, Madison county, May 24th, THOMAS H. PEABODY, student at law, aged 23 years. About two months previous to his death, he penned the following lines, to which all things connected with his decease, appear to have corresponded.

"Go choose a time—a place to die."

I'd die when Summer's beauties bloom
On field and flow'ret, herb and tree;
Then should some leaflet deck my tomb—
An emblem what mankind shall be.
I'd die when sweetest birds do sing—
'Twould chase death's sullen pains away
To hear those well known carols ring
To which I've listened many a day.
And I would die, ere time had set
His holy relic on my brow—
Ere care my visage had beset
With wrinkles—yes, as I am now.
I'd die where friends should stand around
And see life's last ebbing flow—
To close my eyes, and raise the mound,
Which green upon me there should grow.
That grave be in some lone retreat,
Where careless footsteps seldom tread—
But where LOUISA oft should meet
And hold communion with the dead.
In the night vigil, when all is still,
Nor leaf by forest wind shall wave,
The notes of the lone whippoorwill
Should rise from oft my hew made grave.
This be the time when I would die,
When life's fond vista fades away;
This be the place where I would lie
To wait the coming judgment day.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"Pray for us; for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly."—Hebrews xiii: 18.

The first idea which springs from this statement of the apostle, opens an interesting field of inquiry and thought. He speaks of a good conscience! Is there such a thing as a bad conscience? It would seem so, according to the text, for good is used in contradistinction from bad. An object which possesses but one quality, does not require adjectives expressing different qualities to describe it; because its character is well understood by its simple name. But if we speak of a good man, it is at once implied that there are bad men—if we speak of good food, it is at once implied that there is bad food—and by consequence, if we read of a good conscience, the idea follows that there are bad consciences.

There can be no question but that Paul believed in the existence of both good and bad consciences. In Hebrews x: 22, he speaks of "having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience"—in 1 Tim. iv: 2, he speaks of consciences seared with a hot iron. There are also fragments of consciences, if I may be allowed the expression. For instance—an individual by seeing community around him practice any given vice, will lose his sensibilities on the subject, his conscience will cease to admonish him, will become seared, and he will fall into the vicious indulgence. But on some other actions, conscience will remain true to herself, and reprove him. So far as this is so, he has the fragment of a good conscience. The remark of an old sailor, recorded by an interesting writer on American scenes and manners, is a very happy illustration of this point. Says he, "I never murdered no one, nor stole, nor did adultery—but only now and then I gets drunk—and that's what the quality do!" This man had the fragment of a conscience. He had no conscience on the subject of intemperance, because the example of those who moved in a higher sphere had deadened his sense of right—but on the subject of stealing and murder, his conscience exercised a correct power.

There are also consciences which Dr. Ely has designated by the name of gum elastic consciences. That is; certain individuals, desirous of performing certain actions which are just over the borders of moral right, will bring up equivocal reasons to justify themselves in committing these actions, and will deceive themselves with the notion that they are acting righteously, especially if they advance the interests of a party. Under these circumstances, their consciences will stretch, till they conclude that "the end justifies the means." In this respect, conscience is very much like the mind. Every person knows that the mind can be warped by prejudice. Let prejudice cast its iron grasp upon the mind, and it will become so bewildered as to give credence to the greatest absurdities, and so stretched, as to attempt the defence of the wildest fancies. Conscience can be extended in the same manner. Where the grace hardened bigot is wrought up to the highest note of blind enthusiasm, with complacency he will light the faggots at the stake, for his conscience becomes so stretched, that he thinks himself doing God service in burning heretics.

There are, then, both good and bad consciences. True, this idea militates with the once prevalent notion that conscience is innate, and consequently, like the magnet, always remains faithful in pointing out right and wrong, not being liable to corruption. Hence, in view of this opinion, we hear rejectors of the Bible frequently affirm, that the Scriptures are unnecessary, for if men only gave heed to the voice of conscience within them, they would need no other guide. But in the general renovation of opinions which superior light and knowledge is effecting, this notion has been remodelled, or rather destroyed, while truth has taken its place.

We have no fears, while taking the ground that conscience is not innate, but is the creature of education, and will give us correct or incorrect notions of right and wrong, according to the nature of the education received. Conscience is only a principle of the mind, which presides over our actions, according to the light it attains. The knowledge which the mind receives, is derived from education of various kinds. Ideas are not born in us—a, b, c, is not innate in the child, nor is an understanding of the sciences a simple result of the operation of the mind with its own inward resources alone. True, there must be a foundation in man on which to build the structure of education, for the mind must previously exist before ideas can be received. An idiot cannot learn. But let it be remembered, that the existence of mind does not prove that it possesses knowledge. Its ideas of things will be correct or incorrect, according to the education received. If the mind, in the early stages of its power, comes in contact with errors, it will retain erroneous notions. It was education which made the world once believe that the sun, moon and stars revolved around the earth—it was education which taught people to believe in omens, ghosts and witches—it was education which made people believe that infants of unprofessing parents would be lost—it is education which fills the mind with the glories of astronomy, the power of philosophy in all its branches, and with the duties of civilized life. It is frequently the case, that minds which are strong, remain inactive for a long period; but by some fortunate circumstance, they wake up, and as each successive truth is unfolded to their eager gaze, they soar away into the regions of knowledge like unchained eagles, and by the power of education, become stars of the first magnitude.

That knowledge is obtained by educating the mind,* is proved by an instance which lately transpired in Europe. In 1828, an individual was found, who, although a number of years of age, scarcely possessed a single idea. He had no notions of colors, words or sciences. It was afterwards pretty well ascertained that he had been confined all his days without being educated, and had just then been liberated, and cast upon the charity of the world. Now, if ideas are innate, certainly he would have had ideas—but he had none—and so ignorant was he, that on a lamp being presented him, he viewed it with childish delight, and put his fingers into the blaze, without a single hesitating fear. His mind was afterwards educated, however; he acquired knowledge, became like other people, and progressed in the acquirement of facts. It needs no evidence to prove that a child, if it be placed early in savage life, will attain no knowledge beyond what a savage life affords—but if, on the contrary, it be placed where its mind is cultivated by the fostering hand of education, it will become as superior to savage life, as light is to darkness.

Conscience is a principle of this mind, which, when properly educated, constitutes a perfect rule of right and wrong. It cannot be doubted that there is an innate power upon which to build the temple of moral knowledge—but the knowledge itself is attained only by education. If a knowledge of right and wrong was innate or inborn with the conscience, then it would not lead men to have different views of the same action; for it is a palpable fact, that in some portions of the globe, the same act will be performed without any idea of impropriety, which, in another portion, is viewed as the most criminal conduct. An illustration of this position may frequently be found among us. It is often the case, that some boys profane the name of God and his dear Son in the most reckless manner, without even a thought of its impropriety. Others, again, look upon it with abhorrence, and will be heard checking those of their companions who indulge in profanity. Let us view the causes of these two opposites. The one child, from the moment he possessed any observation, heard his parent indulging in profane oaths, and consequently imbibed the evil practice. The conscience of this child is thus educated by a bad example, and of course is in a bad state, because it is not roused when the name of God is taken in vain. The other child, on the contrary, has been impressed by his parent with the ingratitude of profanity, and consequently his conscience tells him that it is wrong. His conscience, then, is a good conscience, because it has been properly educated.

It appears to me that all knowledge of right and wrong is acquired, and is not innate. The eyes of Adam and Eve were not open to know good and evil, until they found that there was a certain command given, which could not be transgressed with impunity. But after they had transgressed, their sore experience taught them that "the way of transgressors is hard." Hence, this knowledge of good and evil could not have been born with them. If an individual but a few years since, had travelled upon the banks of the river Ganges, he would have seen a pile of faggots with a dead man lying upon it. Presently he would see a widow seat herself beside the corpse, to be burnt with it. The traveller might be horror-struck at the sight, but if he examined the Hindoo religion, he would find that such a sacrifice was considered a religious duty, most acceptable in the sight of the gods.—He would then discover that the people perpetrated such horrid acts, not only without compunction of conscience, but with the approval of it; for conscience told them that they had discharged what their doctrines resolved into a duty. Such consciences are bad, but the evil is in the erroneous education, and not in the conscience itself. They were educated by a religion as cruel as it is dark—by a priesthood of the most unbounded influence—and hence, their practices, though corrupt, were discharged with the conviction that they were pleasing to the gods who they believed ruled over them.

If the traveller had wandered in the wilds of America at its first settlement, and viewed savage warfare, he would have seen the Indian dashing infants to pieces, and scalping his victims in cool blood. The traveller would shudder, but the Indian has been taught to do it—it is his mode of warfare and he thinks it justifiable. He has been wrongly educated to be sure, but his conscience, true to that education, does not tell him that his cruelty is great. The conscientious Jew, whose Sabbath is our Saturday, would feel conscience-smitten, did he neglect to discharge his religious duties on that day—but his conscience does not upbraid him if he yields no respect to the Christian Sabbath. On the contrary, we feel no compunctions for not heeding the Jewish Sabbath, but our consciences are sharp if we abuse the Christian Sabbath. These different views arise from different teaching.

If the Hindoo should be taught by the usages of civilized life, instead of engaging in the immolation of widows without compunction of conscience, he would view it as murder, and shrink from it with apprehension. And if the Christian should be taught by Christian customs, he would view his mode of warfare as horribly cruel, and experience self-condemnation for engaging in it. But this difference of view would be brought about, not by innate sense of right and wrong, but by difference of education. These instances directly prove, that the power of conscience is not inborn, but the effect of knowledge received into the mind, which knowledge has a good or bad effect, according to its quality. Hence it will be seen, when an individual is so taught that he will practice things which are evil in themselves, and his conscience upbraids him not, his conscience is bad. But when an individual is so taught that he views all evil acts as morally wrong, his conscience is good.—Therefore, there are good and bad consciences.

The difference between a good and a bad conscience is well illustrated by an eminent instance recorded upon the page of Scripture. Saul of Tarsus persecuted the Christians in a barbarous manner. Armed in the steel of his bigotry, he pursued them unto strange cities. Yet he did this without compunction, for he declares that he did it ignorantly in unbelief, (1 Tim. i: 13,) thus fulfilling the words of our Lord to his disciples, that whosoever killed them, would think they did God service. The difficulty was in the education of Saul. He was brought up after the strictest sect a Pharisee. He was taught that the Jews were the favored people of God, and that the covenant which he had given them was to stand always. Consequently, when Jesus avowed that the end of the Jewish age had come, Saul viewed such a declaration as monstrously criminal, and hence persecuted the followers of the crucified Nazarene. Thus his conscience was so wrongly educated, that he could persecute, and still deem that he was doing his duty. His conscience was bad.

Paul, of the Gospel, was altogether a different man. In the school of the Saviour he had been taught the love of God and the beauty of the Christian system. His conscience thus became so tender, that he persecuted no living thing, but looked upon all with affection, and strove to enhance their happiness by leading them into the knowledge of the truth. His conscience then was good, because it had been made sharp by good principles, and as it taught him to forgive even his enemies, he could say, "pray for us; for we trust we have a good conscience in all things, willing to live honestly."

There is another instance which tends to strongly elucidate this subject. The first public promulgator of "the restitution of all things," in this country, was John Murray. In the early season of his life, he believed that the grace of God was limited to a part of mankind. His prejudices against those who advocated the salvation of the world were then most bitter. He was once passing a place, where a preacher was holding forth the illimitable love of God. His feelings on the occasion he has given in his own language.—Speaking of Relly, he says, "at this period I should have considered myself highly favored, to have been made an instrument in the hand of God for taking the life of a man, whom I had never heard or even seen; and in destroying him I should have nothing doubted that I had rendered essential service both to the Creator and the created." Life, p. 72. How very badly his conscience must have been educated, to think that he could destroy life, and at the same time be doing God service!

After a time, however, his views became altered. His faith was enlarged, his charity expanded, and his affections extended. He saw that all mankind would partake of the future blessings of immortality. His prejudices vanished, his bigotry melted away before the light of truth. Under such principles, he was taught to look back upon his previous feelings with abhorrence and regret.

He now viewed all men as the objects of his affection, while his conscience so readily imbibed proper teaching, that he was urged to forgive those who opposed him, and do good to all as he had opportunity.

All these instances, then, unite in proving that the power of conscience is not innate, but acquired. True, every person has a constitutional principle of the mind called conscience, but that principle acts according to the ideas which are taught it by any of the various means which elicit either good or evil ideas. This must be evident to all, for if the conscience was perfectly prepared by nature to correctly distinguish between right and wrong, the same inherent ideas of right and wrong would be exhibited by all. Conscience would not acquit the Hindoo mother for sacrificing her child in the Ganges, and at the same time teach the Christian mother that such an act is murder. These different views are the result of education. The Hindoo mother has always been taught, that to sacrifice a child to the river god is a religious duty, and her conscience conforms to that teaching—but if, after setting a child apart to such a sacrifice, she should neglect to fulfil it, then conscience would accuse her. It is exactly the reverse with the Christian mother. She has been taught that the preservation of children is the first law of nature, and she could in no instance get over the determinate warnings of conscience, in order to sacrifice her offspring, when she should become crazy—so true is it, that the power of conscience is acquired by education.

Having then stated and proved my premises, the importance of a proper knowledge of right and wrong will be distinctly seen by every individual. The mind should become so well acquainted with moral good and moral evil, that the conscience will be as tender as the eye, and stand as a faithful monitor in warning the creature from the inhospitable coasts of sin. Mankind should be impressed with the truth, that the practice of any thing which is contrary to the laws of nature, made and established by the great Creator, must produce misery—that the effect is as sure to follow as the cause is put into operation. They would then believe that the way of transgressors is hard, that the guilty cannot escape, that happiness flows from the practice of right. Such views would have more tendency to restrain vice, and make the practice of virtue more prevalent, than ten thousand places of torment in futurity, where they can have no bearing upon this life. Let conscience be thus educated, and I humbly conceive that community would not be characterized by so much vice, nor would so many fall into disgrace.

Any system which will present correct views of right and wrong, must be good, and the very system of which the world stands in need. Let that system emanate from what source it may, every person of the least reflection will admit its importance to the welfare of the world, that it should be cherished, advanced and received, that it should in no instance be rejected, but be held up for the admiration and practice of mankind.

The important question then arises, have we such a system? I answer, yes. That system is Christianity! It is so full and explicit on the subject of morality, that if a mind be once educated by it, it will always be like a watchful sentinel, who cries out when an enemy is near. Conscience, under its full influence, will be no compromiser, but will sternly reprove every unholy act and thought, and bid its follower keep away from the tree of evil.

There are many who now reject Christianity. Bringing themselves to the conclusion, that our Saviour was an impostor, or adopting the more inconsistent and utterly untenable notion that he never existed, they put the whole system of revelation away from them—resign the joys which spring from a belief in the resurrection—give up the most consoling power in the hour of sickness and of death, and wander in the regions of cheerless skepticism, where the dove of hope finds no resting place. There can be no wonder that there are such people—I sometimes wonder that there are no more. The causes which make them skeptics are obvious. The palpable errors which are advanced and defended, the terrible notion of endless suffering, the jarring and collision of sects, together with the evil examples of many professed Christians, all have a tendency to open the gates of unbelief. Pure Christianity never effects such a work—it never tears up the foundation of hope and faith in the heart—you may as well tell me that the sun produces night. The sun may be hidden by an eclipse, and darkness be produced by thus hiding its light. And Christianity may be, and is frequently eclipsed and her light hidden by the hand of error, but when she shines, her light is always pure and serene, filling the mind with truth.

But those who now reject the Bible, must admit that if it is a perfect teacher of the conscience, it is worthy of all acceptance and praise. Let Christianity come from what source it may, even throwing aside its divine authenticity, it should be treated with consideration. And if it be superior to all human systems, presenting one clear, distinct and most admirable system of morality, certainly, so far as this point decides, it must be admitted to have plausible claims to emanation from the Deity. This conclusion is not to be avoided.

I then take the position, that Christianity is the only perfect guide for the conscience—the only teacher which will give it such clear and distinct views of right and wrong, that it will instinctively shrink from every species of evil. We may range the world over, we may collect all creeds and systems, all opinions and codes, and though we may find in them many admirable sayings, many excellent precepts, many good moral statements, doing honor to many of their founders, yet principles will be found mingled with them, which neutralize their powers, and sink them beneath the peerless simplicity and correct majesty of Christianity. If we go back to ancient times, and examine the systems held by the various philosophers of the age, we shall find this position well proved. Theft was permitted in Egypt and in Sparta. The exposure of infants, and the putting to death of children who were weak or imperfect in form, was allowed at Sparta by Lycurgus. It was enacted at Athens, that the Athenians might lawfully invade and enslave any people, who, in their opinion, were fit to be made slaves. Slavery of white people was countenanced in many of the ancient nations, especially in the Roman empire. Even the mild Seneca advocated self-destruction, when a man was in trouble—while others taught that a lie might be told, when it conduced to profit. And in all these ancient nations, human sacrifices and unchastity formed a part of their religious worship. If we come down to modern times, the case is no better. In many of the systems of religion adopted by many nations, the most horrid rites are enjoined. In Hindostan, widows are burnt, children sacrificed, and the aged sick left to die. In China, polygamy is permitted, and many children are exposed to destruction. In fact, in all of what we denominate the Heathen nations, the most objectionable features are discovered and practiced.

We are in no better condition, if we refer to those who denominate themselves philosophers, and reject revelation. Lord Herbert thought that the indulgence of lust and anger is no more to be blamed, than the thirst occasioned by the dropsy. Mr. Hobbes thought that any man's judgment is the only standard of right and wrong. Lord Bolingbroke, that modesty was inspired by mere prejudice. Mr. Hume thought that there was no harm in the practice of adultery. See Vol. 1, of Horne's Introduction. Passing by others which might be mentioned, we here remark, that these individuals have said a great many excellent things and advanced many good sayings. This we cheerfully admit. We only present you the objectionable part of their systems—and we finish, by citing you to the horrible scenes of the French revolution, where all religion and virtue was scouted.

Let the mind reflect on these facts, and inquire if such systems, however good they may otherwise be, present such obviously immoral sentiments, are they fitted as perfect teachers to educate the conscience? Would that state of community be good, if the conscience became so deadened, as to look upon lust and anger without a single compunction? Can any person believe that it would be productive of good, to so teach the mind, that it will not revolt at the practice of any vice? And yet all these systems do advocate the practice of some particular vice, and of course they are imperfect, and unfit for adoption. Every individual who looks into this subject, will perceive that this conclusion is unavoidable.

If we turn to Christianity, we find no such evil principles existing in any of her institutions. All there is pure, holy and correct. Christianity has no countenance for vice in any of its shades. The purity of her precepts is never compromised by popularity, fashion or glitter. It has no more favor for the corrupt king than for the sinful beggar. Her voice calls upon all to obey her injunctions. Where she educates conscience, it becomes a jealous guardian, demanding respect for modesty, protection for virtue and discouragement for vice. This will be more apparent from a few simple considerations.

1. Christianity demands the exercise of forgiveness—calls upon her followers to forget injury, and subdue enmity with kindness. This injunction is urged home upon the heart, by the goodness of God displayed in nature, and the love of the Saviour exhibited on the cross. The mind is called to this subject by the fact that peace will follow its practice, and that enemies will be made friends, while the conscience is made so tender and susceptible by such teaching, as to reprove that proposed follower of Christ, who cherishes hatred and revenge. In this respect, Christianity is far above the teachings of a great many, who practice the principle of "an eye for an eye."

2. Christianity inculcates the principle of true honor. Herein it surpasses the ideas which obtain in community. In some portions of the world, such notions have been established, that on the slightest offence, duels must be fought, which end in murder, perhaps widow a confiding wife, and beggar a family of children. This view of the subject is sometimes so intensely fixed in the mind, that the conscience of a man will upbraid him with cowardice, if he refuses to fight. Christian honor, while it teaches us that to take life is murder, is an honor which consists in freedom from evil, from sin. He is truly honorable who yields to no disgraceful action, but leans upon his integrity.

3. Christianity demands honesty. Under her light, the rights of all are to be respected. The widow is not to be oppressed, the orphan is not to be crushed, the property of others is not to be embezzled, while the creature is to live honest in the sight of all men, by practising good.

4. Christianity aims to suppress all vices, by checking evil desires. It strikes at the very root of all evil, by bidding us cast away thoughts of sin. He who desires to do evil, and dwells upon the desire, without suffering virtuous considerations to have their due weight, is called a sinner. It demands a rigid watch over the thoughts, and a jealous care that our meditation be fixed upon things which will improve the heart and understanding.

5. Christianity bases all her morality on the foundation, that we should do unto others, as we would have others do unto us—thus teaching us to make the voice of right the guide of our actions, instead of our passions and revengeful feelings. If, when we are in the wrong, we wish others to forgive us, we are ourselves to forgive those who do wrong to us; if we are sick, and wish others to visit us, we should visit them—if we do not wish others to injure our property, we should not injure the property of others—in fact, in all the various circumstances in life, this precept can be practiced to most admirable advantage, and to the great honor of the Christian professor.

Now, viewing Christianity only in regard to its moral bearing, we find that it is a system which surpasses all others in the extent, purity and usefulness of its maxims. And this is a sufficient reason why it should be viewed with admiration, and be received as the very thing of which the world stands in need. But when we come to consider the motives by which Christianity urges the discharge of all the duties it sets forth, we are wonderfully convinced that it is the true and perfect standard of right and wrong. It is a fault with all human systems, that though they may present principles which excite approval, yet they carry not with them a power which can open the heart, and win all its energies in the discharge of their precepts. Christianity is superexcellent in this respect. She not only holds forth the most glorious morality, but that morality is accompanied with a key of love to unlock the heart, and score that morality upon its front.

It presents no fires of revenge, it snaps no lash of fury, it hurls no infuriated curses—but it ascends to the heavens, and comes back with arms which subdue the rebellious soul with kindness. She tells us of that God whose love smiles over all creation, and views the sinner with affection, even while chastising him for his reformation. She presents us that Saviour whose life was given for the benefit of man, and whose whole soul was wrapped up in accomplishing the glorious scheme of salvation. She opens to us the riches of immortality, with its pure angelic state, where the waters of reconciliation forever roll, free as the air we breathe. She gives us the lovely form of religion, radiant with every good work and principle. She informs us that there is a peace in the practice of virtue, which can be no where else found. And she affirms that there are certain consequences attached to sin, which cannot be escaped, for so sure as sin is practiced, so sure will those consequences be experienced.

All these motives are presented to the heart in the most soul-touching representations, to induce a practice of virtue—and when they are distinctly seen, they evince the admiration and the obedience of the creature, for he at once discovers that it is the only true way of happiness. We there have a system, complete in all its parts, and so adapted to the various conditions of men, as to give the highest notions of right and wrong. And by teaching us that God, who created all things, and is governor among the nations, knowing by his infinite wisdom the nicest distinctions between good and evil, has established that system, and has a right to demand our obedience, we are at once impressed with our duty of receiving and practicing those precepts. Such a system, properly understood and meditated upon, so purifies the heart and warms the sensibilities, that we instinctively shrink from all manner of evil, as the sensitive plant shrinks from the touch. Then there is no burning of widows, no sacrifice of children, no dishonesty, no profanity, no manner of evil, for conscience has become so correctly educated by the Christian system, as to irresistibly lead us from vice to the practice of virtue. Faithful in all its operations, conscience thus enlightened, will inspire every heart with the energies of virtue, and lead the sons and daughters of men to act after the pattern of Christ.

Such are the remarks we offer on this subject; and we leave them, with the firm conclusion that this argument in favor of Christianity is incontestible; that we should so educate ourselves in all the principles of the Gospel, that our consciences will urge us to defend the truth, and practice every good work. AMEN.

GOD'S WORKS PRAISE HIM.
BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

When I gaze upon the lofty mountain, I am reminded of the greatness and majesty of the Creator of the Universe. The roaring waterfall, the thunder and the storm, show forth his power; the boundless ocean faintly shadows forth his infinity. His goodness is pictured in the fertile valley, teeming with grain and fruits, which so richly reward the toil of the husbandman; it sparkles in every sunbeam, and displays itself in every flower that scents the gale. The feathered songsters fill the air with praises of the Divine goodness; and every gentle rivulet murmurs 'God is love.' Wherever we cast our eyes, we behold proofs of his mercy, love and goodness. The volume of divine truth is full of assurances of his kindness to the children of men; it tells us that he is merciful, and that his mercy endureth forever; that he changes not; that he is infinite in goodness. Shall we believe these evidences, or shall we credit the declarations of those who tell us that he is wrathful and vindictive, and though his mercy abideth for a season, his anger endureth for ever?

GOD IS A BACKSLIDER.

There! says the Partialist reader, that is just befitting a Universalist paper, and is perfectly in character with the patrons of it. I always thought they were blasphemers and revilers of God, and if this is not blasphemy—a speaking impiously and irreverently of God, then there is nothing that is. Very true, reader, I agree with you. But stop; who is it that gives to God the above appellation? See that wherein thou accusest another, thou dost not condemn thyself. That man is a backslider, who, after professing faith in Christ, and engaging in the cause of religion, apostatizes. This is the sense commonly attached to the term. Now the most popular doctrine advocated at the present day, represents God as engaging in the work of man's redemption; but that, after the general judgment, he will suspend all further operations of his wisdom and power to save those who are then sinners—will abandon the work of redemption, or forsake the good cause in which he was engaged, to give place to the enemy. Is not this charging God with backsliding, and that too of the very worst description imaginable? A man who should engage in the cause of religion, and afterward forsake it and give place to the enemy, would most certainly be called a backslider. But this act in him would not be as bad as that which the common doctrine represents in God. If a man backslide, it is generally not contrary to his will; but the common doctrine represents God as acting contrary to his will, (which rather implies a fatal necessity) in abandoning that best of all causes, man's redemption. For the universal redemption of man he has willed. The Universalist represents God as engaging in a work which he has willed, and has power to accomplish, and which, after he has commenced, he never will forsake ere it is accomplished.

Now, reader, exercise your reason and candor in deciding who charges God with backsliding, and thereby blasphemes. O. R.

ANECDOTE.

During the winter past, a young lady of this vicinity, belonging to a Partialist church, was asked to read an article in your paper—(she probably had never looked into one before.) She was shown the "Cheshire babe." She soon became a guest in our meetings, and expressed some doubts with respect to her former faith. On being asked what was the cause of her change of views, she replied, (half smiling, her moistened eye glittering with transport, and casting a glance at the sister who showed her the piece,) "Why, when I read about that little cradle, it confounded me. I found that my cradle was too small to satisfy me. I love my parents, my friends and associates, and my cradle was too small to hold them all." A. Urson.

The pages of Scripture, says Hervey, like the productions of nature, will not only endure the test, but improve upon the trial. The application of the microscope to the one, and a repeated meditation on the other, are sure to display new beauties, and present us with higher attractives.

ATTENDANCE ON PUBLIC WORSHIP.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

Every believer in the Lord Jesus Christ should regard it as an imperious duty, to be punctual in his attendance upon the regular worship of God. The advantages resulting from the regular discharge of this duty are incalculable. The good is not confined to the individual himself, but extends to his family, friends and neighbors. The whole community is, in fact, more or less affected by it; for the power of example is great.

The direct tendency of religious worship, is to acquire a knowledge of the truth, to elevate and purify the affections of the heart, to increase a mutual respect and attachment for one another, to make known the moral obligations under which we are placed to befriend one another, and, in fine, to stimulate us to the performance of all the duties enjoined upon us, towards God and man. Whatever, therefore, tends to the neglect of public worship, must prove injurious to the moral health and happiness of the community.

The great object in the formation of religious societies, is to concentrate the strength and blend the means of individual efforts in the promotion of a general good; or, in other words, it is to support a preached Gospel, the object of which is to promote individual happiness. It must be obvious to all, that the whole object of forming societies is lost sight of, and the collective and personal advantage forgotten, when we neglect to attend public worship.

I know there are times when it is not only inconvenient, but impossible to attend public worship on the Sabbath. But in nine cases out of ten it is presumed these seeming obstacles might be overcome by a single effort. Some people rarely ever find any inconvenience in leaving home to attend meeting on each returning Sabbath, while others can never find an opportunity to do so, though they may be absent every other day in the week. This difference arises more from habit, than from any intervening circumstance. I have frequently heard persons observe, that a Sabbath spent in absence from the temple of worship, seemed longer than a week—tedious in the extreme; but when they had not attended meeting for a long time, it appeared a most unwelcome task to prepare themselves for the service.

It is worthy the attention of those who are perplexed with so many troubles on the Sabbath, to see if they cannot be overcome; so that they can be at liberty to go with their families to the sanctuary of God, and there commingling the devout aspirations of their souls, and join in the delightful exercise of worshipping our Father in heaven, and hearing and meditating on the "great salvation" made known by Jesus Christ, in which all have an interest.

If there is any thing that can overcome the troubles of the present life, and lead us to forget our sorrows, it is the union of kindred souls in the delightful employment of worshipping God, meditating upon the exceeding greatness of his promises of love and salvation. Every Christian, therefore, yea, every lover of humanity, should feel the importance of the duty, as well as the preciousness of the privilege, to improve every opportunity to attend on the stated ministry of the word; and should use all laudable means to encourage others to attend also. What scene is more pleasing to the benevolent heart, than a concourse of people directing their steps to the temple of the living God! Fathers and mothers are conducting their children and friends and strangers, to the worship of the universal Father—that good and holy Being from whom all blessings flow. All worldly feelings are hushed into silence; while all souls, abstracted from transitory things, mingle together in one common sentiment of love and thanksgiving to God, in holy and devout aspirations that the needed blessings of time and eternity may flow to them and all mankind. How do the pride and grandeur of the haughty, the names and distinctions among men, yea, all that the world calls good and great, dwindle into insignificance; while the glories of the heavenly inheritance appear in full view, before the ravished soul of the humble worshipper! How do we sink into our own real littleness, in the sublimity of the contemplation, and realize that from God is all our strength!

"I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord:"

"How did our hearts rejoice to hear
Our friends devoutly say,
Within thy courts let us appear,
And keep the solemn day."

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. IV.

BY REV. JASON LEWIS.

I HAVE KNOWN persons who supposed that the Bible was originally written in the English language; and others, that the words in italics were printed in that character for the purpose of showing them to be emphatic.

I have known men who professed great knowledge of the Scriptures, apparently much surprised on finding that the Bible actually contains the following passage, as quoted by Universalists from the writings of Paul, when speaking of "God our Saviour," "who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

I have known a somewhat popular preacher, who professes to understand the Greek language, declare positively that the word rendered hell in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, is not hades but Gehenna.

I have known nearly as many Partialist preachers converted to Universalism, as I have of Universalist laymen converted to Partialism.

I have known great good result to the Universalist denomination from a renunciation of their faith by a somewhat prominent member.

I have known men to become downright infidels from attending a protracted meeting.

I have known persons who supposed that Universalist ministers had no right to solemnize marriages.

I have known talented preachers who were in the habit of ascribing to Jehovah, the words which Solomon puts into the mouth of Wisdom, when he represents her as saying, "Because I have called, and ye have refused, I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded;.....I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh," etc.

2. Received letters and credentials from delegates.

3. Voted to receive as members of the Council, ministering brethren from other Associations.

1. Appointed BRS. J. A. ASPINWALL, John Fish and A. PARSONS, jr., a committee to arrange the public services for this occasion.

5. Appointed BRS. S. R. SMITH, W. H. WAGGONER and D. BIDDLECOM a committee on requests for letters of fellowship and ordination.

6. Heard and accepted the report of the committee of discipline for the last year—"No cause of complaint."

7. Appointed BRS. WAGGONER, BIDDLECOM and ASPINWALL a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

8. Voted, That BRS. WAGGONER and BIDDLECOM be the ministerial, and D. BRAYTON, Eatonville and S. B. STEVENS, Rome, lay delegates to attend the New-York State Convention to be holden at Albany, in May, 1837, with power to appoint each a substitute in case of inability to attend.

9. Appointed Br. ASPINWALL to deliver the occasional sermon at the next annual session of this Association, with power to appoint a substitute.

10. Voted, That, inasmuch as the Standing Clerk of this body, Br. Joshua Britton, jr., has removed out of the limits of this Association, and resigned his said office, Br. J. A. Aspinwall be appointed to officiate in his stead.

11. Adjourned till Thursday morning at 8 o'clock.

12. Thursday morning. Met according to adjournment—prayer by Br. Barnes.

13. The committee appointed to receive requests for letters of fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Br. J. A. Aspinwall—Whereupon, Voted to accept said report.

14. The following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, at the late meeting of the Universalist Convention of the State of New-York, a resolution was passed recommending to our denomination the consideration of the subject of establishing a Theological Seminary;—and, whereas, it is the opinion of this body, that the present action on that subject is called for by the state of society; Therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association some more effectual means of aiding candidates for the ministry of universal reconciliation, are demanded by the exigencies of the order.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the several societies composing this Association, to give the subject due examination and reflection, preparatory to acting on the same at its next annual session.

15. Voted, That Br. Skinner prepare the minutes of this meeting for publication, accompanied with such remarks as he shall deem proper.

16. Adjourned to meet at Newport, Herkimer county, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1837.

A third service was attended after the above, and a discourse preached by Br. Sias.

REMARKS.

This meeting of the Mohawk River Association was an interesting and happy meeting. The weather and season were pleasant and beautiful—the congregation, though not large, very respectable and attentive during all the public services—the singing good and well conducted—the ministering brethren much more numerous than had been anticipated, all in good spirits, and in unanimity and brotherly affection preferring one another; they came in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ, and proclaimed the Gospel in demonstration of the spirit and of power. Great harmony and perfect unanimity pervaded the Council—not a "nay" was heard to a single vote that was taken. One thing only was lacking to complete our joy—viz. a full and perfect representation of societies. There was certainly an inexcusable remissness in this respect, there being but three societies within the boundaries of the Association represented by delegates in its Council. Brethren of the respective societies, "these things ought not so to be." Why cannot you attend the meeting of one (and that your own) Association in a year, at least as well as your ministers can attend some half a dozen where they have to travel from twenty to one hundred miles while you would not have to travel more than from five to thirty miles to attend your own; and yet entirely neglect it? Brethren, where is your zeal—your devotion—your interest and engagedness in the cause? We do hope that you will awake from your torpor and apathy, every one of you, and never hereafter be without a full representation in your own Council. We also hope you will duly attend to the subject, and at the next session of your body come prepared to act understandingly in relation to the matter recommended to your consideration at this session.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS OF MICHIGAN.

At a meeting, held in Ann Arbor, June 1, 1836, pursuant to notice, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of organizing an Association of Universalists, in Michigan, Br. JOSEPH HOWE was chosen Moderator, and Br. J. E. Holmes, Clerk. Upon deliberation, it was Resolved, That the Council deem it expedient to organize an Association, and Brs. N. Stacy, A. H. Curtis and C. Carter, were appointed a committee to draft and report a Constitution for the government of the same. Said committee reported a Constitution, which was adopted.

Br. N. Stacy was appointed Standing Clerk, and Brs. William Loomis, A. H. Curtis and Guy Carpenter, Esq., a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

Resolved, unanimously, to grant a letter of fellowship to Br. Richard Thornton, and to confer ordination on Br. A. H. Curtis, by Council, at any future time he may designate.

Resolved, That the Association hold semi-annual meetings the ensuing year, and that the next meeting be held at Adrian, Lenawee county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in October next.

Appointed Br. Holmes to prepare the minutes for the press, and accompany the same with remarks, with a request that they be published in the Magazine and Advocate, and the Herald of Truth.

JOSEPH HOWE, Moderator.
J. E. Holmes, Clerk.

MINISTERS PRESENT.

N. Stacy, Ann Arbor; D. R. Biddlecom, Perrysburg, Ohio; K. Townsend, Victor, N. Y.; A. H. Curtis, Adrian; J. Lockwood, Tecumseh; R. Thornton and J. E. Holmes.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.

J. Howe, E. L. Fuller, L. L. Follett, C. Carter, W. Loomis, Joseph Johns, Caleb Wheeler, Levi Hiseock.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Biddlecom, Townsend, Holmes, Curtis and Stacy.

REMARKS.

Brethren of the Faith—By the above condensed minutes, you will perceive that an Association of Universalists is organized—that measures are adopted, to call together the friends of the cause of Gospel truth for the purpose of counsel and religious improvement. The literal wilderness of this rising State is fast budding and blossoming—is beginning to yield to the industry of the husbandman, and the soil to put forth its fruits for our satisfaction. And we trust every believer in God's impartial grace and efficient goodness, feels that he is called upon, by the fruitful seasons with which his heart is made glad, as well as by all the benignity of Heaven, to grow in moral righteousness, and keep pace in religious improvement with the progress around him. Also, to spread as far as possible, by his exertions, the truth that makes his heart rejoice, that others may participate in the blessings which accrue from "faith that works by love and purifies the heart."

To secure these objects, it should be our peculiar aim to exhibit the moral effect of the doctrine which we believe, by conforming our lives to the precepts of divine truth, and regulating our actions by the dictates of love. We shall thus present a moral demonstration of the truth of our doctrine, and the sure evidence that this truth has made us free. Then shall we present a moral argument, which no sophistry can hide—no malice destroy. We can thus preach in every act, and exhort in every day's intercourse with our fellow-men. If we do this—carefully abstain from vice, and steadily, cautiously and firmly adhere to virtue, we shall see that the organization already effected, will form a nucleus around which will cluster sister Associations, churches and societies, until "Zion shall put on her beautiful garments, her people be redeemed with judgment and her converts with righteousness;" her borders be enlarged, and rejoicing multitudes flock into her extended gates. Be faithful, be zealous, be active in a good cause, and the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing. J. E. HOLMES.

EXCERPTS.

SELECTED BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"In an uncertainty whether or not you ought to extend succor, grant it. It can only expose you to the error that is least subject to repentance. But avoid imitating those individuals who are always fearful of being deceived by those who solicit their pity."

During great calamities, the natural equality of mankind discovers itself. "When a destructive conflagration is sweeping along a city, there are no distinctions, no animosities, among the wretched sufferers whom the same terror pursues. Enemies forget their hatred, and partisans their parties. The rich and poor cry out together. All love and aid each other. Misfortune has broken down the separating barriers of pride and prejudice, and they find each other good and equal."

"Whoever philosophically considers the constitution of the human mind—how much we are the creatures of our circumstances, how much we are blown about by impulse and passion, the dimness of our mental vision upon most subjects, the narrow limit which separates between truth and falsehood, right and wrong, and moreover, that we ourselves view every thing through the coloring of our pride and prejudice—will perceive at once, that under all circumstances of error, and even of crime, men are quite as worthy of pity, as of vindictive blame. A little, cold, selfish mind invariably finds much matter for bitter censure in every act, that according to his own chart, is an aberration. Nothing so decidedly marks a generous and noble, as well as an enlightened and philosophic spirit, as the disposition to be indulgent in its construction of the views and conduct of others, and to interpret all by the comment of palliation and kindness, whenever the case will admit of them."

"If you would form the sublimest conceptions of the eternal and underived happiness of the Deity, cultivate dispositions to oblige, and seize occasions to serve and benefit your fellow-beings. If you would imagine more impressive ideas of the torments of demons than poets have dreamed, muse upon injuries, cultivate envy and revenge, and wish you had the bolts of the thunderer, only that you might hurl them upon your foes. If you would experience the eternal gnawings of the vulture, allow yourself in the constant indulgence of your temper."

"I have long been in the habit of measuring the character, mental power and prospects of the young, who are brought under my observation, by the power which they evince to resist the suggestions of the senses. In the same proportion as I see them capable of rising above the thralldom of their appetites, capable of that energy of will that gives the intellectual control over the animal nature. I graduate them higher in the scale of moral power and prospect. But, if in their course, they manifest the clear preponderance of the animal; if sloth, sensuality, and the inclinations, which have no higher origin than the senses sway them beyond the influence of advice and moral suasion, be they ever so beautiful, endowed, rich, distinguished—be their place in general estimation ever so high, I put them down as belonging to the animal and not to the intellectual orders. They can never reach higher worth and success, than that which is the blind award of accident."

"After those great calamities in the dark ages which destroyed the traces of the sciences and arts, men, pursued by terror, seemed to imagine that they constantly saw malevolent spirits flying among the clouds, or wandering in the depths of woods. The sound of strong wind and thunder came to their ear as the voice of infernal divinities, and prostrate with terror, they sought to appease their angry gods by bloody sacrifices. In process of time, a small number of men, enlightened by observation, dared to raise the veil by degrees, and succeeded in dissipating these terrors, by tracing the seeming prodigies to some of the simplest laws of physics. The phantoms of superstition vanished, and in the light of reason, revealed a just and beneficent Divinity presiding over obedient nature."

"Never would men have exchanged their natural convictions, their internal aspirations, their instinctive hopes of immortality, for the lurid and deceptive glare of infidelity, if religious views had not been disfigured by being combined with the grossest errors and prejudices."

"When, in the clear light of reason, I look upon creation, on the star-spangled firmament, and the glory of God's works, I should as soon doubt my own existence, as the perfect wisdom and goodness of the author of my being. All religion, which does not strengthen our confidence in this, must be a dreary illusion. Horrible dreams, dating their origin from the associations of childhood, and the rant of wild and visionary ministers, may sometimes trespass upon our thoughts. But every rational mind must finally settle to repose in that glorious persuasion which instantly irradiates the moral universe with perennial sunshine. 'The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice!' In this or any other world, in our present, or any other forms of conscious being, we may advance upon the unexplored scenes, with a full confidence that we can never travel beyond the beneficence and equity of the infinite mind."

Danvers, Mass.

HOPE SURE.

Christian hope is SURE. But how can this be if endless salvation is conditional? Man is frail, sinful, and varying. To-day he may be meek and penitent, to-morrow proud and sinful. If, therefore, his salvation depends upon his own goodness, how can it be called sure? Nothing resting upon man is sure. Hence when the prophet would give the most striking idea of God's immutability and veracity, he says—God is not man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent. Man, then, is far from being an emblem of stability. Of course, if salvation rests on him, it is not sure; and, consequently, the hope of it, is not sure.—Hence salvation cannot be conditional; but it must rest on the unchanging faithfulness of God. Hope, therefore, is as sure as God is faithful. Well, then, may it be called, an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast.

The profane swearer sins for nothing, upon no temptation, for no credit; unless it be a credit not to be believed.

DEVOTION OF NATURE.

Who is there in the wide universe of God, possessing common intellect and common feeling, that can contemplate on the ever varying and ever attractive charms of nature, without any emotions of pleasure derived therefrom, or of gratitude and devotion to their great Author! The feathered songsters in their aerial flight or in their woody bowers, the finny tribes that plough the mighty main or dart along the limped waters of the purling rill, the cattle ranging over our thousand hills or grazing through our wide spread vallies, all speak forth their joy of existence and inspire devotion in the heart of observing man. The rolling seasons of the changing year, the fragrant flowrets of the smiling Spring, the rich green garment of the Summer's day, the Autumn's golden treasures pouring in, and Winter's hoary honors interspersed with his long evenings' social cheer, all have their charms and call forth admiration nearly allied to what we call devotion. And then again, the twinkling stars that deck night's diadem above us, and rising worlds that round us move, in mystic, silent, endless, glorious order, all declare a being we call Father, and bespeak him worthy of our adoration.

Here, too, in all this mighty range of nature, where countless objects meet the view, and endless lessons of instruction rise, a book is open whose ample pages may be read by all—no mistranslations here—no priest is needed to explain the instructions which this book contains—no sectaries need here be formed—no adverse dogmas taught—no inconsistencies or contradictions here.

Thus talks the child of nature—thus speaks the advocate of a merely natural religion; and then proceeds to say, "How glorious the light of nature! no other light is needed. How sublimely glorious the field of contemplation open to man! no other field or subject of meditation will he ask or seek."

Here are just and unjust, correct and incorrect ideas, promiscuously thrown together; or excellent thoughts and principles carried to ultraism, and hence necessarily to erroneous conclusions. We agree with the naturalist in all established facts and fundamental principles: but we are not a mere naturalist. We agree with nature—we love and admire nature—we adore the God of nature—we love to read the book of nature, and find rich and varied and endless instruction in every page of her ample volume. But because nature's book is true, and sublime, and glorious, it does not hence follow that no other book is true, and sublime, and glorious; nor does it follow that this book is sufficient and none other is needed. Because her light is glorious, it does not follow that there is not a light still more glorious. We would not deny to the mere naturalist all the light he has or can obtain from nature. We would not depreciate the value of that light in the least; but we would direct him, if possible, to a luminary whose radiance will shine far beyond the beams of that lamp to which alone he looks for light—not to a light that is contrary or opposite to his, but above and beyond it.

In saying, therefore, that we are not a mere naturalist, we do not mean that we are opposed to the religion of nature, but that we would aid, and exalt, and sublimize the religion of nature by new discoveries, new truths, new hopes and sublimer themes of contemplation. We will go with the naturalist into the field of nature. With him will we admire the beauties of Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter, the clothing of the fields, the fragrance of the groves and the gardens, the music of the birds, the gushing of the waters, the rolling of the ocean, the glittering of the stars and the refulgence of the sun and the moon. For us the seasons have as many beauties and charms as for him; for us the clothing of the fields is as gay and attractive; the fragrance of the flowers as great, as for him. The music of the feathered songsters is as sweet, and the gushing of fountains and heaving of tides as interesting to us as they can be to him. And to us the glories of the sun, moon and stars, and the systems on systems of worlds that rise around us in vast unbounded space, appear as glorious and excite as much admiration and devotion as it is possible they can to him.

But here he must stop, while we can go farther. Here his light goes out, but ours still shines, and that with increasing lustre. His light goes with him to the verge of the grave and then—goes out forever! It leaves him where most he feels the need of it. Ours shines brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. The light of the Christian believer, whose hope is anchored in immortality,

"And looks beyond the bounds of time,
When what we now deplore
Shall rise in full immortal prime,
And bloom to fade no more,"

Is a lamp to his feet and a light to his path as he approaches the dark valley of the shadow of death—it pierces through the gloom of that dark passage and shows him beyond its murky shades an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for him. It is the light of the revelation of the ever blessed God to man—it is the glorious Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. It contradicts not, nor excludes the light of nature, but shines beyond it. We have therefore all the light which the mere naturalist has, and one light besides, which as far outshines his as the heavens outshine the earth in glory, or as the sun exceeds in brightness the twinkling of the faintest star.—Nature inspires us with admiration, gratitude and devotion to God; but revelation, in addition to this, teaches us to call God our Father, and inspires the heart with strong hope and confidence and everlasting trust.

It is not true, therefore, as the mere naturalist would have us believe, that no other light but that of nature is needed; for man wants and seeks a greater and more glorious one, and aspires after that which nature's light can never reveal. It is not true that he seeks no other field of contemplation nor subject of meditation than what this world or the mere light of nature furnish. For his mind, immortal like its God, soars above while in the world, and delights to roam abroad among the stars, and feast imagination amid worlds more glorious and spirits more pure and lofty, and scenes of more perfect joy, and drink in the bliss of an immortal life. To us, therefore, nature is lovely indeed, and her lessons both instructive and sublime; but nature's God and author is far more lovely, and his revelation contains lessons still more instructive and sublime. In view of nature's works and nature's God we may well use the language of the poet and say,

"These are thy glorious works, Parent of good,
Almighty, thine this universal frame,
Thus wondrous fair; thyself how wondrous then,
Unspeakable who sitt'st above these heavens
To us invisible, or dimly seen
In these thy lower works; yet these declare Thy goodness beyond thought and power divine."

If God is but "dimly seen in these" his "lower works," yet his revelation assures us that the time is coming when we shall "see as we are seen and know as we are known."

"And where He vital breathes there must be joy."

THE COMMENTARY.

The esteemed author of the "Notes on Sacred Subjects," in a private note, says:—

"—begs to suggest to Rev. A. B. Grosh, whether the 'critical and creditable commentary' which is much wanted, as stated by Rev. S. R. Smith, (current vol., p. 139,) would not be most speedily, and perhaps in the best manner, supplied by the contributions of various hands. Let several writers select that portion of the Bible to which they think they can do the greatest justice, or let a book or more be apportioned to those thought most fit, and we are likely to have a more elaborate work than if the product of one mind. To give consistency to the work of so many minds, with views somewhat varying, let a general preface and introduction to the several books be prepared by the same pen. A system of general rules might be made out to which each writer was to adhere, so as to give still more of a consistent character to this work."

I give the above suggestion to the public, believing it most concerns the denomination. It is my belief, however, that an able compilation from a number of the best commentators of all denominations, with the translation of each, where they differ, added in the margin; and the translation of Wakefield, or of Campbell and Locke, or any other for the text; would be a better commentary than an entirely original one, and would certainly be received as better authority among our opposers. The compiler might select the best comments of any one, two, or more—or give a summary of their views when they were too prolix—and might add his own opinion with brief reasons when he deemed them erroneous, or not sufficiently clear. Such is the commentary I would wish to see—a kind of collection to give the student many books in one.

THE UTILITARIAN.

INTRODUCTION.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good?"
Psalm iv: 6.

Yes, Where is the utility? is, after all, the great question by which every thing in politics, in morals, and in religion itself—in literature, arts and the sciences, must be tested. Mankind have a strong desire for happiness—every faculty of body and mind cries out for gratification—and hence cui bono? is the question with which every new system, every projected improvement, every alteration in morals or legislation, is met. This is well. The caution that prompts the question is the wise prompting of that most wonderful and excellent nature, which God, in the exercise of every attribute of his infinite goodness, has been pleased to bestow on his creature man. I rejoice also, that the question is put, and most happy shall I be, in answering it, so far as the subjects involved in these essays may seem unto me to require.

But, before I enter into the subjects, permit a few introductory remarks, applicable to the case. There are some persons, so unreasonable as to ask the question, but refuse to hear the answer. They ask, not to be instructed, but to confound. They ask to be not answered. I hope none of the readers of this essay, thus ask us to show them any good in the subjects of the succeeding numbers. In apostolic times it was considered a peculiarly good and noble trait in the Berean Christians that "they searched the Scriptures daily, to see whether" the things they heard preached were true. Are there no Bereans among our opposers, to patiently hear what we have to offer for their consideration, and then compare it with the Bible, to see whether we agree with its teachings or not? I do hope and trust there are many such—and for such I write. They will "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." They will obey Jesus, by searching the Scriptures, and thus they will learn on what foundation they rest their hopes of enjoying eternal life.

There are some, however, who will readily ask you to show them any good to be derived from a belief of your system; and who will patiently hear your answer; but who will writhe in unwillingness to hearken should you return their own question to their bosoms. Now there is not only inconsistency, but there is dishonesty and cowardice in this conduct. For surely he who will ask you a question, expecting your answer, and will not permit you to ask him the same question, or refuse to answer it when it is asked, does not do unto you as he would be done by. Consequently he is unfair—unjust to you. And why will he not be willing to receive and answer the question? Is it not for fear that he cannot answer it—that his system is of so little benefit that it suggests no answer to his mind? If so, is there not cowardice in his refusal? Yes; there is! and it is the worst of cowardice—for it borders very nearly on the confines of bigotry or hypocrisy in many cases. Bigotry, in holding to a system without adequate and satisfactory reasons for doing so—or hypocrisy, in professing to believe what is believed, and known, and felt to be indefensible.

I trust the number of such will be but small among all who may peruse these articles. And I rejoice in the belief that every day is lessening the numbers of such among the Protestant Christians of America. May they soon be reduced to the quantity expressed by that insignificant mark, called a cypher! Reader, act not with them—if you do, see that your mind is clear on the reason you shall give for doing so, that your conscience may acquit you of all blame on the score of cowardice, bigotry or hypocrisy.

One more class I shall address, before I close my preface—that is, the class composed of those who oppose all utilitarians, because they can see no utility in the inquiries or labors of this matter-of-fact, money-worth-seeking people. These anti-utilitarians, having oppositeness exceedingly small in their dispositions if not in their craniums, and the love of darkness rather than light, wonderfully large in their spiritual temperaments, are very zealously opposed to all discussion and controversy on particular religious subjects. You will find this class among skeptics, Partialists and Universalists. True—this wonderfully pacific disposition is limited in its sphere of action, for on other subjects its possessor is wonderfully combative.

Take a Universalist who is seeking the custom of his Partialist neighbor—or a female that has been admitted into what is termed “good society” among the loudly professing religionists—or one who has a rich Partialist bachelor uncle or maiden aunt a member of some “Orthodox” communion—and what sensitive beings you will find them to be on the subject of religious doctrines! They can see no use in discussing those subjects—it does no good—it only creates disturbance—they really wish people would not trouble themselves about the belief of other people!

Or go to a Partialist who will wage an everlasting wordy war on the all-engrossing, all-important subjects of church government, whether it should be Presbyterian, Congregational or Episcopal—or on the eucharist, whether the bread should be leavened or unleavened; or whether we should use wine, cider, raisin water or butter-milk—or on baptism, whether it should be administered by sprinkling, pouring or immersion; to infants or to adults only—go to such a one, and attack the belief of endless wo, and he will open his eyes in wonder at your presumption in troubling him with such subjects! What good can it do to agitate that subject!

Good, easy, peace-loving souls! they are for making no disturbance about doctrines. They want every one to grow up with just such opinions as their parents were pleased to impart to them, without troubling others, or being troubled by them in return. They would have people go to church, sleep through the humdrum sermon, and return home, praising the minister for “a good soul that never disturbs nobody with controversy and scolding.”

In short, to conclude this introduction, they ask, “Who will show us any good” in religious discussion—in replying to the objections of opposers? And having at last driven them into the ranks of those who use the question at the beginning of this article, I will answer the question briefly, for their satisfaction.

That there is a necessity and utility in our discussing important religious principles, will, I think, be evident, when we consider the situation in which we are placed in the religious and irreligious world. Christians generally, or at least commonly, refuse to consider us as Christians—deem us a kind of cunningly concealed and hypocritical infidels, who, under the mere mask, pretence and profession of religion, are artfully engaged in sapping the foundations of all religion and morality. And unfortunately for us and them, their suspicions have sometimes been strengthened by finding among our public teachers an occasional betraying Judas, a denying Peter or a skeptical Thomas—or by seeing among our private members some who say “Lord, Lord,” but do not the works of his righteousness—or whose lukewarmness and indifference, show that the head, rather than the heart, has embraced our holy and blessed faith.

Thus, are we regarded by our fellow-Christians—and how are we regarded by those with whom they class us? Generally, or at least commonly, skeptics unite in condemning our doctrines, knowing that if found in the Bible, it must be above much of their ridicule, and untouched by nearly all their arguments. They consider us as Christians who are only professedly or half way liberal—Christians in superstitious credulity and slavish adherence to the antiquated notions of a supreme Being, his revelation in the Bible, and in the sending of his Son our Saviour to be our best, greatest instructor and pattern. But in all else they may be willing to call us liberal, meaning, probably, in their sense of the term.

Thus regarded on both sides, the question is asked us by our Partialist brethren, “What good is there in your liberality—in your adherence to a part and your rejection of the remainder of our doctrines? While our skeptical brethren may ask us, What good there can be in rejecting what they deem a part of the doctrines of the Bible, viz., an endless hell and a semi-omnipotent devil, and in holding to an intelligent supreme Being and a universal heaven of holiness and bliss.

Nor is it in satisfying these inquiries of our opposers that an investigation of first important principles, will be useful. By frequent attention to them, and the reasons by which they are established in our minds, they become a necessary part of all our mental relations and associations; and then, when body and mind grow faint and weak, in sickness or decay, obtruding doubts, and faint hearted fears with respect to their truth will have no power. For then shall we think the thoughts of our reason’s greatest strength, and believe and feel, as by intuition, the salutary truths and evidences of truth which patient research, and calm and labored inquiry planted firmly in our understandings. And surely such great and happy results cannot be unworthy of our present care.

These reasons must suffice for the present. Other reasons will suggest and develop themselves as we pursue the subject. In my next, I shall reply to the question of the skeptic.

THE UNIVERSALIST CIRCULATING FAMILY LIBRARY.

The first number of this work, noticed prospectively a few weeks since, has just come to hand. It contains 32 octavo pages, stitched in a cover, and is published at Baltimore, Md. Rev. L. S. Everett, Editor and Publisher. The number before us, contains the first six letters and replies to them of a discussion on the subject of Universalism, between Rev. R. J. Breckenridge and Rev. L. S. Everett. This discussion is characterised by the most base insinuations, vile calumnies and abusive epithets on the part of Mr. Breckenridge, the Presbyterian adversary of Universalism; and by his usual terseness, energy and pith, occasionally interspersed with a little of his accustomed pleasantry as an offset to the extreme acrimony and bitterness of his opponent, on the part of Br. Everett, the defender of the system. Br E. is well calculated to conduct a discussion of this character; and in this case he has but to hold up his opponent in the attitude of a mirror, in which he may see the deformity of his system and the malignity with which it has imbued his own heart, so faithfully reflected as to make any man blush with shame and confusion, excepting a thorough going Calvinist, “died in the wool,” who is fully bent, let the consequence be what it may, on a practical exemplification of the doctrine of “final perseverance.” And that even Mr. Breckenridge is ashamed when seen in so correct a mirror, is evinced by the fact, that he is publishing and circulating by itself, his side only of the controversy. He dare not have both sides seen together. This tells the story as to where conscience assures him the strength of argument lies.

We wish Br. Everett abundant success in his undertaking, and hope the Universalist Circulating Family Library will receive an extensive and enduring patronage. It can hardly fail of being very acceptable and useful to the Universalist public, especially at the South, where it is often difficult, or even impossible, for our friends to procure such works in defence of Universalism as are to be republished in the Library. We close this notice by giving the following extract from the prospectus.

D. S.

The work will be issued in monthly numbers, of at least thirty-two pages, octavo, on a fair type, and good paper, of medium size, and afforded to yearly subscribers at one dollar for twelve numbers, or by the single number at twelve and a half cents—payable in all cases in advance.

The controversy between R. J. Breckenridge and the Editor, will be republished entire in the two first numbers. The next will commence Smith on Divine Government. As the work progresses, other standard books, valuable sermons, and labored essays worthy of preservation will be printed in regular order; and, should suitable encouragement be given, we shall continue on, until subscribers will have a complete Library, in neat and uniform sets, suitably covered to be preserved for many years, and in a form convenient for binding into volumes.

It is confidently believed that the plan will meet with UNIVERSAL APPROBATION. It will enable our friends, throughout the United States, to obtain, FOR LESS THAN HALF THE USUAL PRICE, entire volumes of invaluable books; and, as the “Universalist Circulating Family Library” will assume the form and character of a periodical paper, it can be sent to subscribers in any part of the country, and will cost them no more than the usual postage on Magazines.

AGENTS.

Allen Sisson, P. M., Manchester—Jesse Babcock, Scipio—Dr. H. M. Graves, Horse Heads, and Isaac Slater, Jr., Fort Wayne, (Ind.,) will in future act as agents for this paper in their respective vicinities.

Br. Thompson, of the “Christian Pilot,” is informed that the Magazine and Advocate has been regularly mailed for that office. If he will inform us what numbers are missing we will cheerfully supply the deficiency.

THE UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1837.

The publishers of the Universalist Register and Almanac have concluded, agreeably to the suggestion of their brethren, to reduce the price one-half on the copy for 1837. The size of the work will be somewhat lessened, but it will contain not only full and correct statistics of the denomination, but also much edifying and interesting matter pertaining to Universalism. We shall put the wholesale price so low as to make it an object to those who purchase by the quantity. It will be published early in July next. Orders for the above may be addressed to A. B. Grosh, Utica; or Whiston and Sanderson, Geneva. Geneva, June 1836. WHISTON AND SANDERSON.

STANDING NOTICE.

The Executive Committee of the Clinton Liberal Institute respectfully solicit donations of one dollar, or upwards, from all the friends of unsectarian education, for the use of said Institution.

* * Remittances can be made to this office, by any of our agents, in the same letters containing money for us, and will be paid over immediately to Br. Skinner, and acknowledged in the paper. EDITORS.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in July, by Br. NEWELL at Marshall—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. S. R. SMITH at Madison—Br. C. B. BROWN at Oswego.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in July, by Br. GROSH at Cedarville—Br. NEWELL at Paine’s Hollow, and at Newville at 4, P. M.—Br. C. B. BROWN at Palermo.

CONSOLATIONS TO BELIEVERS.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

Thy beautiful garments, O Zion! assume,
The day star hath risen, thy path to illumine;
Thy night hath been dreary, but joyous the morn,
No longer sit mourning, afflicted—forsorn.

Thy sons from afar, and thy daughters among,
Triumphant return, and require a new song,
They've lowed low their heads, and their harps were unstrung,
While long on the willows neglected they hung.

In robes of salvation thou'rt made to rejoice;
Come, sing of his righteousness, lift up thy voice!
Lo! thousands of harps, with thy voices shall join,
For God is thy glory, arise thou and shine!

Thy walls are salvation, thy gates are all praise,
Thou'lt need not the sun, or the moon's paler rays,
Thy God is a light everlasting to thee,
Released from thy bondage, behold! thou art free!

Thy watchmen are stationed, with banners displayed,
Thy walls to defend—they're in armor arrayed;
They cease not to cry in the strength of their might,
"Come, joy in salvation, and bask in its light!"

Then baste through thy gates, thou beloved of the Lord,
Who hath sworn by his strength, his unchangeable word,
That thou should'st to kingdoms and nations give birth—
Thy glory become a sweet praise in the earth.

Thou art to thy God a most valued gem,
In the hand of the Lord, art a rich diadem;
Array thee in garments of splendor divine,
The bridegroom appeareth, arise, thou, and shine!

SATURDAY NIGHT.

Sweet to the soul the parting ray,
Which ushers placid evening in;
When with the still expiring day,
The Sabbath's peaceful hours begin—
How grateful to the anxious breast,
The sacred hours of holy rest!

I love the blush of vernal bloom,
When morning gilds night's sullen tear
And dear to me the mournful gloom
Of Autumn, Sabbath of the year;
But purer pleasures, joys sublime,
Await the dawn of holy time.

Hushed is the tumult of this day,
And worldly cares and business cease,
While soft the vesper breezes play,
To hymn the glad return of peace—
O season blest! O moments given,
To turn the vagrant thoughts to heaven

What though, involved in lurid night,
The loveliest forms in nature fade;
Yet mid the gloom shall heavenly light,
With joy the contrite heart pervade
O then, great Source of light divine,
With beams ethereal gladden mine.

Oft as this hallowed hour shall come,
O raise my thoughts from earthly things
And bear them to my heavenly home,
On living faith's immortal wings—
'Till the last gleam of life decay,
In one eternal SABBATH DAY!

LADIES' PETITIONS.

We copy the following just and pertinent remarks of the Editor, from the April number of Mrs. Hale's American Ladies' Magazine, where they are subjoined as a note to a notice of the Boston Ladies' Peace society:—

"We will take this opportunity of remarking, that we have never approved of ladies' allowing their names to appear on petitions for the redress of public grievances; nor has our name ever been given to such a list. Not that in all cases we would discourage our sex from open and organized efforts to influence public opinion; but we think they should limit their exertions to those objects which may be obtained without exciting political and civil dissensions in the nation. For instance, we think it would be perfectly proper for ladies to present a memorial to the State Legislature, or to Congress even, on the subject of female education, setting forth its neglected condition, and praying that more ample provision be made for its support—because this subject is one which our sex is more competent to feel and understand than men can be; and we think the opinions of sensible and intelligent women, if modestly and judiciously expressed, would have much influence with legislators and men generally, and would, eventually lead to the adoption of an improved system of female education. But, in regard to questions touching the government or the physical prosperity of the republic, women, in our opinion, ought not publicly to interfere. They cannot vote to amend the laws, nor have they strength to compel their execution. Whatever knowledge or influence they may possess, should be directed to promote righteous principles, and encourage perseverance in just and patriotic measures, among those men with whom they are connected in private life. If a lady cannot, in this way, influence the political opinions of her father, husband, brothers or sons, how can she expect, by her petitions, to influence the decisions of Congress? And then there is not one woman in five hundred, (or five thousand even,) who understands the constitution and laws of our country, sufficiently to qualify her to decide on the proper course of policy to be pursued respecting those questions of momentous interest, which are now agitating the country. And women who do interfere with what they are not qualified to understand or to manage, injure themselves and their own sex greatly, without at all benefiting the cause in which they engage."

ANECDOTE.

Illustrative of the strong effect of certain sounds.

Sounds, though sometimes "airy" in themselves, are, nevertheless, often productive of very sudden and very strong effects. Reader, did you ever, having raised the cup with the intention of swallowing what you believed to be its strengthening contents, hear the sudden cry of "POISON! POISON!" Or when quietly musing along your path, upon some pleasing theme, have you been aroused by the horrible and alarming sound of "MAD DOG! MAD DOG!" Do you recollect the effect which the sound of these words had upon you? Well just such an effect does the name Universalist have upon the auditory nerve of some of our very pious and worthy old matrons.

"What a good preacher our dear old Mr. Cobb was," said a very devoted old lady to her son James; "I wish from my heart, that he had never left our parish. How delightful it is," she continued, with a long drawn sigh, looking again through her spectacles upon a pamphlet which she held in her hand, and which she had been perusing for some time very attentively; "how delightful it is to read his writings, they sound so much like the dear old saint himself!"

"That, mother, is not his sermon; it is one I brought home last evening with me, written by the Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, a Universalist minister of Malden, Mass." "Sylvanus Cobb, a Universalist! The Lord forgive me," exclaimed the old lady, letting the pamphlet fall at the same moment, as if it had been poison, "the Lord forgive me, I thought it was our Mr. Cobb!"—Christian Pilot.

Miss Martineau says, in the conclusion of her preface to her Miscellanies, "It gives me much pleasure to prepare for my American friends, at the suggestion of some beloved ones among them, a book in which they may read, with the eyes of their consciousness, invisible records of the gratitude and love of a stranger, whom they have gladdened by their hospitality and honored with their friendship." Her "American friends" will cordially respond to these expressions of attachment and good will. She has helped us by her presence, as well as by her writings; and many will remember her visit, as an era in the growth of their minds and characters. Her image will be fondly cherished in many a heart, where admiration for the writer is swallowed up in gratitude to the woman. Her vocation is no common one, and, much as she has yet done for her race, we have confident expectation that she will do more. Her

"Godlike aim is to make less
The sum of human wretchedness,
And strengthen man with his own mind."

Her field is the world and there are but few reapers to the harvest into which she has thrust her sickle. There are abuses in the best social system, yet to be removed; dark places to be enlightened, and crooked ones to be made straight. Errors, which have long struck their roots into the soil of the general mind, and resisted for centuries the strong winds of truth, are yet to be torn up. Moral and intellectual wastes are to be made to blossom, like the rose. The heart of man is yet hardened against his brother man, and misfortune is made to suffer the penalty of crime. It must be required of rulers and statesmen and legislators, to act from a far higher set of principles, and to walk by a light from heaven, and not by the dim sparks of expediency and self-interest. The day is short, and the night cometh, in which no man can work. Obloquy and abuse and misrepresentation she must expect; they are the bitter ingredients in the cup which every reformer must drink. This is the same world which stoned the prophets and burned the martyrs; and though it is now esteemed bad taste to put men and women into the fire for their opinions' sake, the intolerance which kindled the flames of Smithfield still exists, though in a different form. But let her not faint or despair. Good wishes will go with her, and effectual, fervent prayers encompass her; and though these should fail, there are the "three last friends" which will not forsake the upright, "Himself, his Maker and the angel Death."—Christian Examiner.

VERY PLEASING.

"It is very pleasing," said a lady in reference to Universalism—"It is very pleasing to mankind to believe such a doctrine."

True, Madam, it is. But to experience its truth must be far more so.

"Well, I hope it may be true."

"Permit me since you allow it is pleasing to the creature to show it is equally so to the Creator. Will you read Colossians i: 19, 20, and 1 Tim. ii: 3, 4.

(Reads.) "It pleased the Father that in him (Christ) should all fulness dwell, and having made peace by the blood of the cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself—by him I say whether they be things in earth or things in heaven." "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth."

Very good. There Madam you see the same thing, (the reconciliation and salvation of all) is "pleasing" to God as well as to a major part of mankind.

"Well," replied the lady, "I have no objection to grant, that God desires the salvation of all."

Then Madam in regard to universal salvation, I propose this question for consideration—If the devil is opposed to it, on which side are "the Orthodox?"—Pioneer and Liberalist.

MARRIAGES.

In Greig, Lewis county, by Aaron Perkins, Esq., Mr. JAMES SPRINGSTEEN, Jr., to Miss JULIA ANN HURST, all of that place.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 8th inst., of consumption, CHARLES C., son of Augustus Hickox, aged 24 years.

In this city, at the residence of his brother, on the 13th inst., Mr. CORNELIUS HOGAN, in the 24th year of his age. He was a student at law, and would have been admitted as an attorney, at the July term of the supreme court. He was a scholar of no ordinary grade. He was cut off in the bright morning of his life, and has left a numerous circle of kindred and friends to mourn his early fall. Yet they mourn not as those without hope, having seen him depart with a full and joyful assurance of a glorious immortality beyond the grave.

In Manheim, on the 9th inst., CHARLOTTE, youngest daughter of John P. Snell, Esq., aged 5 years and 3 months. The funeral was attended on the 12th inst., and the consolations of the true Gospel, which speaks life and salvation, tendered to a large congregation of sympathizing friends by the writer.

A Reminiscence....Founded on Fact.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN, OF DANVERS, MASS.

"A slavish terror, springing from misapprehensions of the character of the divine Being, and unmanly and debilitating horrors in regard to the unknown future in another life, these have been the chief sources of evil to millions of our race."

ART OF BEING HAPPY.

A slight acquaintance with the constitution of the human mind, and with the history of man, will confirm the truth of the above sentence. He who sincerely believes that God in whose hands are his everlasting destinies, is a being subject to wrath and revengeful fury, and that from the imperfections of his nature he is liable to fall under the displeasure and experience the unending indignation of a Deity of this character, must necessarily be oppressed by a heart-chilling fear, an unceasing, ever-present apprehension, highly calculated to embitter all the days of his earthly sojourn. An individual possessing these views of the nature of his Maker, cannot render to him that sincere and heart-felt adoration, cannot exercise toward him that love, pure and unalloyed, which gushes spontaneously from the soul, when filled with a realizing sense of the overshadowing goodness, the all-pervading, unchanging beneficence of the common Father of humanity.

It is my design to illustrate these positions in the following reminiscence, founded on events which have literally transpired.

During a tour through the State of Connecticut, in the Fall of 1832, at the close of a tempestuous day, I called in company with a ministering brother, at the dwelling of an aged gentleman in the town of W——, whom I shall designate Mr. Bond. With that genuine cordiality which is cheering to the weary traveler, we were welcomed by the kind-hearted host and his amiable family. By their friendly attentions we soon forgot our fatigues, and realized not that we were strangers and sojourners. The residence of Mr. B. was in a delightful valley. From a neighboring height a small rivulet rushed down, forming many beautiful cascades and imparting a romantic aspect to the surrounding scenery. In its course through the valley, the stream turned the wheels of several extensive manufactories, which filled the small village below with the cheerful hum of industrious activity.

Mr. Bond was somewhat advanced in years, possessing a competency in regard to this world's goods, and surrounded in the immediate neighborhood by several children settled in life and prospering in their avocations.—Every thing conspired to render his condition comfortable and pleasant; and truly did he possess a heart susceptible of realizing and appreciating the kindness of a bountiful Providence. Under his hospitable roof, my professional duties caused me to tarry a few days. It was the abode of peace and domestic enjoyment. A complacent smile of contentment and satisfaction habitually beamed upon the countenance of this good man, indicating a heart at rest and a conscience void of offence. I soon discovered that religion was his favorite topic. The perfection of God's attributes, and the moral beauty which adorns his character—the advent of the Saviour, the design and glorious triumph of his mission—the final destruction of sin, pain and death—a ransomed world restored to purity and happiness—these were themes upon which he delighted to dwell; and in their contemplation his soul seemed filled with heavenly joy. I noticed, however, that whenever, in our frequent conversations, he reverted to certain portions of the past history of his life, a deep shade of melancholy came over his speaking features, and a tear would sometimes start from his eye. From these and some other circumstances, I became deeply anxious to learn what misfortunes could have left such lasting impressions upon a heart which seemed steeped in benevolence. Upon my urgent solicitation, he finally consented to relate a brief account of his life. This was upon a Sabbath evening. The occasion and the scenery were calculated to inspire a kind of soothing placidity of mind. The sun had retired behind the western hills, arraying in his departure the slumbering clouds with a gorgeous mantle of gold—a solitary star was just discernable at the verge of the horizon, the herald of the approaching array of heavenly hosts—beast and bird had sought their wonted repose, and busy nature was hushed to stillness. The cheerful and united family circled around the blazing fire, and my aged friend thus discoursed:—

"On the fertile banks of the Hudson, I first drew vital breath. My father was a man in the ordinary walks of life, circumspect, industrious and frugal—a member of the Calvinistic church, and a most rigid believer in its doctrines. He exercised peculiar care to infuse into my infantile mind all the characteristics of that faith, and to inspire me with deep veneration for the formularies of his church and the aged pastor who ministered in spiritual things. The "Assembly's Catechism" was placed in my hands, as the summary of all religious truth, and no efforts were spared until its contents were indelibly impressed upon the tablets of my memory. From my earliest days, I was always called a "tender-hearted" boy. I would ever turn aside to avoid crushing the helpless worm beneath my feet; and at school, instead of imitating my fellows in dismembering and tormenting the harmless fly, I was ready to exclaim with Uncle Toby—"Go, poor fly, the world is surely wide enough for both you and me." When in ranging the forests with my mates, I would sometimes, through sheer love of adventure, rob the nests of the artless songsters, how often, upon beholding the sorrow of the bereaved parents, have I with much labor reascended the tree, and returned to their downy home the unconscious objects of my plunder. And tongue cannot describe the unspeakable satisfaction which would on such occasions pervade my bosom, in witnessing the ecstasy of joy with which the partners would receive back the objects of their affections. In the thrilling tones of nature's voice would they sing to me of thankfulness and gratitude; and the consciousness of conferring happiness upon helpless objects, would sweetly distil into my heart a sensation grateful as the falling dews of Hermon.

From this description of my youthful characteristics, you may naturally suppose that the religious sentiments of my father, were uncongenial to my soul. Although I perceived no reason to doubt their truth—as the thought was not permitted to enter my mind, that the doctrines taught in my Catechism, and by the minister, and believed by the parent whom I highly venerated, could be false—yet their contemplation ever filled me with inquietude. In reflecting upon my Creator, terror and alarm would take possession of my mind. My frightened imagination pictured an awful Being, frowning upon the world, with the power and the will to plunge me into a fiery pit of unceasing woe; and I could form no distinct conception of what could be done to avert his impending wrath. Vividly do I recollect to this day, how strange my father's words sounded, when he told me I must love God with all my heart. Love him! I was filled with trembling at the very thought of him! [The old gentleman became energetic.] Love him! Why my soul shrank and revolted from before him, and gladly would I have fled to the end of the earth to have avoided his presence! I could discover in his character nothing amiable or lovely, but on the contrary, every thing dreadful and appalling. My youthful heart whispered that to love such a being was impossible.

In this frame of mind, I grew up to manhood. In due time I left the paternal roof, came to this place, married and settled down for life. There was then but one minister in the town. He was a Calvinist. In compliance with the salutary habit acquired in early life, I became a steady attendant upon his meetings; believing it a duty incumbent upon me, as a good citizen, to countenance and encourage the public worship of God. * * * * Years passed swiftly away—a family sprang up around me; and in the certain reward of industry and economy, I obtained a competency sufficient to screen me from apprehensions of poverty. The busy avocations of life, the absorbing requirements of a somewhat extensive business, to a considerable degree banished the subject of religion from my mind. Believing the doctrines incessantly proclaimed from our only desk, were taught by the Scriptures, I had no inclination to examine those professed by other denominations. But although I received those doctrines as the truth, yet they had not so far influenced my mind as to cause me to become a regular member of the church.

For a long period the subject of religion had excited but little interest in our neighborhood. The church had relaxed into a dormant state; its members had greatly decreased in numbers, and it was generally conceded that our pastor did not possess sufficient intellectual power to produce any material change in its condition. At length it was understood throughout our little village that efforts were to be made to produce a revival. A celebrated minister in a neighboring city was engaged to visit us, and a report was circulated that he would officiate in the meeting-house on the next Sunday. I had paid slight attention to these movements, and felt but little interested in them. When the Sabbath arrived, I repaired, as usual, to the house of worship. It was early filled by a crowded audience, eager to listen to the far-famed preacher.

I soon discovered that he was indeed a man of power. To a strong, sonorous voice, a ready utterance, and no inconsiderable degree of eloquence, he added a perfect knowledge of human nature, and of those secret springs of emotion, by which the great mass of mankind are liable to be led whithersoever their conductor pleaseth. Artfully did he lay his plan of operations to secure the desired object. In the morning he enumerated and endeavored to substantiate the prominent characteristics of his doctrines—the sovereignty of God—the infinite demands of his vindictive justice—the deity of Christ—his intercession for the church—the happy reward of the righteous and the ceaseless wretchedness of the finally impenitent. In his views upon these subjects I fully coincided—they being in perfect accordance with all the instructions I had received from infancy; and a word had I never heard uttered in contradiction to them. In the afternoon he delineated man's natural desire for happiness, and noticed the untiring exertions which we put forth to obtain enjoyment in this life. He then portrayed the superior happiness of heaven—the unspeakable joys of eternity—and dwelt upon the imperious necessity which called upon all who would taste the sublimated sweets of another life, to comply with the stipulated requisition, join the church militant, and thus secure the felicities of paradise. He displayed in vivid colors, the evident inconsistency of those who coincided in the doctrines he proclaimed, and yet neglected from day to day, and from year to year, to comply with those terms upon which they believed their eternal destinies were suspended. I was greatly agitated by this discourse. It seemed pointed directly to my own case; and I was exceedingly troubled from the apparently dangerous condition in which I found myself. This undoubtedly was precisely the effect the preacher intended to produce; and fully prepared me for the events which ensued in the evening.

Night's sable curtain enshrouded the earth. With my mind filled with forebodings gloomy as the surrounding darkness, I repaired to the house of God. The wily man had reserved his most powerful efforts for that evening's work. He selected for his text, Hebrews ii: 3, and his subject was "the awful danger of those who withstood the strivings of the holy spirit." He spoke of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death—he pictured "the grim king of terrors" striding over the earth, daily sacrificing to his insatiable appetite thousands of human beings, irrespective of age, sex or condition; he was then probably hastening to fix his unrelenting grasp upon some even in that assembly, and before the light of another morning, our fate might be irrevocably sealed. Then came a vivid description of the dreadful scenes of another world. The preacher raised his powerful voice to its utmost tension, and with all the energy he could summon, painted the awful picture. The piercing blast of the last trump was sounded—earth was enwrapped in flames—the stars fled affrighted from their orbits—and the trembling race of man assembled before the bar of the stern Judge of heaven! In deep, sepulchral tones, the damning sentence—"Depart ye cursed"—was pronounced; and in imagination we could almost hear the howl of despair from sinking millions! The deep bowels of hell were opened to our affrighted view—"Behold," exclaimed the speaker, "behold the fiery prison of the damned! See the mountain waves of liquid lava, lashed into wild commotion by the fierce storm of God's unceasing wrath. Hark! the wretched sinner, raising his head from beneath the seething billows, cries out in accents of deepest agony—'how long, O my God! how long must I remain in this anguish unspeakable, this living death?' A voice, as of seven thunders, reverberates down from the high battlements of heaven—'Eternally, ETERNALLY!'"

It exceeds my power of description to portray the effect this terrific harangue produced upon the assembly. Each countenance was blanched with fear, and sobs and groans were heard from every part of the house. Oh! what a scene! It was the triumph of error—the supremacy of delusion—a very feast to the dark genius of superstition! It was an illustration of the legitimate effect produced by the overthrow of reason, man's distinguishing and noblest trait, and artfully enforcing religious error upon the human mind, solely by the influence of the low passion of fear. My own feelings were dreadful. Believing the doctrines to be true, which the preacher had proclaimed, I saw distinctly, that he could properly draw these horrid conclusions from them. I was entirely unmanned by terror. Frightened imagination pictured me as standing upon the verge of a burning hell—the lurid flames rose high toward the heavens, and demons and damned spirits, in wild confusion screamed before me. I fancied the earth was crumbling beneath my feet, and that I was sinking into the boiling chaldron below. A cold perspiration gathered upon my brow—the blood curdled around its fountain; and in an agony of despair, I cried for help and mercy!

At the conclusion of the sermon, the preacher came to my relief. He exhorted me to accept "the offered terms of salvation;" and eagerly did I promise compliance with any and every measure, could I be released from my supposed perilous condition. My case was duly considered. The ready and affirmative response I gave to all questions pertaining to the requisite faith, was satisfactory; and I was pronounced converted, and safe from all danger. I openly testified my thankfulness for deliverance—proclaimed the joy with which it filled me—and in due time became a member of the church.

Would that I could say this change improved my condition—that it made me a better or wiser man; but alas! I cannot. I received no acquisition of light, no increase of knowledge, respecting the character of God, or the nature and administration of his government—no improved views of the religion of the Gospel, of the duties it enjoins, or the peculiarities of the blessings it bestows upon the believer. I was led to look upon Jesus as my only friend on high—as the sole being who possessed one impulse of mercy or compassion for fallen man; while upon his high throne, was the inexorable Ruler of the world, burning with wrath and indignation against the frail workmanship of his own hands, and only restrained by the intercession of his Son, from frowning them down to the ceaseless fires of the nether hell! My inducements to piety and virtue became of the most mercenary and selfish character—they presented themselves in no other light but as a medium of escape from the endless tortures of the world of wo. The only motive I could perceive for worshipping God or complying with the requisitions of the Gospel, was thereby to avert his overwhelming vengeance. All the services of the sanctuary, and the duties and formularies enjoined by the church, soon became irksome and tasteless. My observance of them was a matter of policy—a means of defence—an alternative, to be chosen rather than suffer the torments of the damned! As for pure love toward my Maker, no semblance of an emotion of this nature existed in my bosom. Indeed I felt it to be morally impossible to love a Being who was ready to hurl me to eternal despair, upon the slightest failure; and the command to do so, appeared truly mysterious and unaccountable. In all these views and feelings, I was perfectly sincere. They arose naturally in my mind, under the unavoidable influence of the doctrines I had imbibed; and had I then died, I should have adhered to them in my last hour, as the true fruits of the Gospel of Christ.

I have said, that at the time of what was termed my conversion, I publicly expressed my joy for deliverance from the supposed danger that hovered over me. But that joy was of brief duration. When the season of cool reflection arrived—when the natural benevolence of my heart assumed its wonted supremacy—every vestige of rejoicing fled from my bosom. I beheld around me, millions of my fellow-creatures—beings ardently desiring happiness yet susceptible of the acutest pain—all standing upon the brink of interminable wo, and thousands daily dropping therein. Oh! how dreadful is such a thought, when sincerely believed by the philanthropic heart! That one supposition is enough to embitter every moment of earthly existence, and to cause its believers to weep all their days. As I passed amid the busy multitude, and beheld the smile of enjoyment upon many a happy countenance, the sickening thought, as a loathsome reptile, would creep into my mind—how many of these cheerful beings, will become food for the devouring flames, fuel for everlasting burnings! How many will ere long be hurled into that awful pit, where they will forever blaspheme the name of their Creator, and sink deeper and deeper, in sin and wretchedness. And my own little family; the companion of my bosom, the offspring of our love—around whom all my heart's best affections clustered, as jewels beyond value! They were out of the ark of safety; and could I obtain any consoling assurance, could I arrive at any certainty, that they would all share with me the joys of heaven, or that even one would? Alas, my doctrine taught me that I could not! Yet I felt that I never, never, could be reconciled to an everlasting separation. Ten thousand silken, indissoluble cords of love bound them to my heart, and every impulse of affection instructed me in language which could not be misunderstood, that their happiness or woe would be mine forever. How often, as I witnessed the innocent glee and mirth of my children, their happy laugh, the elasticity of their spirits, and their thirst for enjoyment, have the tears gushed from my eyes, and my heart been wrung with anguish unspeakable, from a thought of the bare possibility, that they might become inmates of the dark prison of the lost. Parents who believe the doctrine I then did, can alone realize my wretchedness when reflecting upon this subject.

In fine, from the combined influences of a susceptible heart, and an appalling doctrine, I became an unhappy man. It was in vain that our pastor endeavored to cheer my gloomy spirits. The acknowledgment which he was compelled to make, that my views of the condition of the world, were only such as our doctrine taught—that uncounted millions of human beings, among whom were a great majority of the purest and most disinterested benefactors of mankind—a Washington, an Adams, a Franklin, a Jefferson—having died out of the pale of the church and without belief in our faith, must now be suffering with the vilest of the vile, the torments of unquenchable fire—that nine-tenths of those who now exist on earth, among whom my own family were highly liable to be included, would soon join them in the billowy ocean of despair—these concessions, which he could not avoid, increased my melancholy and sank me deeper in gloom.

My cup of grief was not yet full. A few years glided by, and two daughters, arrived at womanhood, arrayed in beauty and innocence. They were the light of my eyes, the living joy of my soul. Often had I urged them to seek a refuge from impending destruction, in the bosom of the church; but their buoyant spirits seemed to revolt from the dark system presented them, and to flee from the heavy chains which I fondly would have wound around them. At length, unexpectedly—oh, how unexpectedly!—they fell a prey to disease, and within a short period of each other, they were consigned to the cold mansions of the dead. This bereavement was entirely unlooked for; I could not bring myself to realize its extent—it absolutely stupified me with grief. But when my imagination followed them into the unseen world, a thought dark as Erebus, stared before me—the thought of their unhappiness! I would not permit it to enter my mind—no, not for a moment—I endeavored to repulse it, to beat it back—I fled from it, as from a frightful fiend, who pursued to grasp me in his horrid embrace. In agony I cried, “God in heaven, have mercy, have mercy, upon my darling children!”

The day of burial came, when the last of the beloved pair was to be removed from my sight. I cannot believe our pastor had any design to lacerate my feelings; but he seemed to view it as a fit occasion to make a lasting impression upon the many youths assembled, by portraying the lost condition of my offspring. Ah, little did the good man know that he was drowning the last, struggling remnant of hope in my bosom! In a tone of the deepest melancholy, he read the hymn in Watts, commencing thus:—

“Down in the deep where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,
Justice hath built a dismal hell
And laid a store of vengeance there.”

In his discourse he proceeded deliberately to recount the many opportunities for securing their salvation, which the deceased had neglected—the seasons of the outpouring of the spirit, they had permitted to pass unheeded, putting afar off the day of retribution—“until at length,” he exclaimed, “death’s unsparing hand has seized them in the joyous morning of existence, cut short the days of their probation, and hurried them down, beyond the reach of mercy, or the voice of compassion, to the lurid flames of an endless hell!” This horrid annunciation was beyond human endurance! It shot as an ice-bolt to the core of my heart—my soul writhed in agony inexpressible—my brain was on fire—my pent up anguish exceeded all restraining bounds; and in the husky voice of despair, I exclaimed—“Forbear! oh forbear! and tear not from me the heart-strings of my existence!”

From this moment I was a heart-broken father. The tempest of affliction howled in full blast upon my unprotected head. In vain did I resort to my doctrine for help in this trying hour—all was darkness there—not one faint ray of consolation could I perceive—every fountain of hope appeared frozen in everlasting night! The sweets of earthly existence palled upon my senses, and in disgust I turned from them to brood over my unmitigated sorrows. The awful condition of my lost children, ever haunted my imagination, portraying scenes of horror, which would rend my soul with renewed anguish. Did I repair to the couch to rest my wearied frame, the thought, as a ball of fire would settle upon my brain, that my offspring could never know repose; but tossed, forever tossed, on hell’s surging billows, in vain did they beg for one moment of friendly oblivion. Did I walk forth upon a bright and balmy morning, one ever-recurring reflection would cover nature with the dark pall of death—“the cheering beams of yon bright sun, pierce not the sealed prison of the damned—the sweet songs of birds, the soothing hum of the busy insects, the lulling sound of the distant waterfall, the gentle zephyr loaded with the aroma of flowers, cannot penetrate its seared and blackened walls!” These distracting thoughts closed my senses to all those beauties of nature, which to the heart untouched with sorrow, afford such exquisite gratification. Did I repair to the house of worship, my miseries would arise even to the borders of distraction. When the song of praise ascended from the youthful choir, the thought, sharper than a two-edged sword would pierce my heart—“where, oh, where are now my loved, but lost ones?—where those sweet voices which once joined in the anthem of thanksgiving within these walls?—those voices that in former years, with the artless songs of childhood, expelled care and anxiety from my bosom? Have they, indeed, turned to deathless screams of despair?—must they forever, forever commingle in the eternal wail of hell’s damned spirits? Oh, that my heart were stone and could not feel! Have compassion, God of all grace, have compassion upon a poor, crushed, heart-stricken parent! Cannot one glimmering ray of comfort shine from above?—have pity, sympathy, mercy, all forever fled from heaven?”

God heard my prayer [continued the narrator, while the tears coursed down his aged cheeks]—the blessed Father of the world, from his high throne, inclined a listening ear to the supplications of a feeble worm; and while, in utter helplessness, I was beseeching for one drop of consolation, an ocean was ready to gush upon me from the mercy seat of Love!

While memory endures, the circumstances cannot be forgotten. Business had called me to a neighboring town; and I was returning home at the commencement of the evening. A tempest was raging around, but I heeded it not. My mind was in a distant and terrific world in company with my miserable children, whom imagination depicted as contending with the far more furious storm of Omnipotent wrath. In passing a meeting-house by the way side, I observed a cheerful light beaming from its windows; contrasting strongly with the darkness without, and with my still gloomier thoughts. An irresistible impulse led me to enter. A small, but respectable appearing congregation had assembled for divine worship. Seating myself, I awaited in melancholy abstraction, the commencement of the exercises. The preacher soon arose in the desk. He was a man of middle age, with a healthful, ruddy countenance, but with hair as white as wool. His somewhat singular appearance riveted my attention; and I could but remark the cheerful and benevolent expression that beamed from his face. Two stanzas of the hymn he first read, are deeply engraven on my memory:—

“Lo what a glorious sight appears To our believing eyes!
The earth and sea shall pass away
And yonder rolling skies.
* * * * *
“His own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye;
And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death itself shall die.”

Heaven in mercy grant it, I mentally exclaimed, from the recesses of my soul. The preacher selected for his text, Psalm cxlv: 9—“The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works.” This passage had never before engaged my observation, and its language now appeared peculiarly strong and emphatic. As the speaker proceeded to recapitulate the evidences of God’s impartial goodness and mercy, I became entirely absorbed in the subject. He spoke in language so different from that to which I had been in the habit of listening, and presented every thing in a light so new and interesting to me, that my attention was wholly engrossed—not a word, not a syllable was unheeded. He adverted to the surpassing beauty of the starry heavens—the genial light and warmth of the sun, and the invigorating influences of the gentle rains—as blessings participated equally by all the children of men. He directed our attention to the evidence of God’s love for the world, exhibited in the advent, mission and death of the Redeemer. Various scriptures were introduced showing that the design of the Deity in thus despatching his Son, was to confer unspeakable blessings upon all the fallen race of man. He remarked upon the relationship which exists between the Creator and his creatures—that he was equally the Father of all, and therefore must necessarily, in accordance with the declaration of the text, be equally “good unto all.” I recollect distinctly, that towards the close of his discourse, in drawing his deductions from the established premises of the goodness and parental affection of the Creator, he requested the parent to ask himself the question—whether he would not, if he had the power and opportunity, bless all his offspring?—and if so, whether God will not bless all his numerous children, when he possesses both the power and the opportunity? This, to me, was a startling question; and yet it was answered in my mind, even before it was asked. Had I the power, I inwardly communed, how readily, how eagerly, would I rescue the beloved of my soul, from their dark abode of wretchedness, and gently lead them into the path of repentance, righteousness and peace! And then came the thrilling inquiry—can I possibly be more kindly affectioned toward my offspring, than the God of love toward his? A ray of hope sprang into my heart, sweet as a beam of heaven's light in the dark, damp cell of the miserable convict! O, it was refreshing to my weary soul, as the cool draught of bubbling water, amid Arabia's burning sands! This, I mentally exclaimed, must be the Gospel of Christ, the Gospel of peace and good will to men.

At the conclusion of the services the preacher appointed another meeting for the ensuing evening. I inquired his name and sect, of a bystander, and was informed that it was the Rev. Mr. Be, of the city of H., an Universalist minister. This announcement filled me with amazement. Is it possible, thought I, that I have been listening to a preacher of universal salvation, to one of that class who are said to proclaim delusive and licentious errors? And have I listened to error this evening? I cannot think so. No, no—creeds, doctrines fled from my mind, were forgotten—without prejudice or bias I listened—and his words dropped upon my seared heart as the small rain, and distilled as the gentle dew of morning. But he is an Universalist! And yet, after all, what is a name? Before I knew his sect or name, my mind commended the sentiments he uttered, and pronounced them Gospel truths. And shall I, for a name, which by my prejudice has been made to sound unpleasant in my ear, doubt the plain impression of my intellect? Shall I drive far from me, those sweet hopes, which even now are nestling in my bosom? I cannot—at least, until I listen to him again.

During that night and the following day, the discourse I had heard was the engrossing subject of my reflections. I examined it in every possible point of view, in every conceivable light, and in no way could I discover any thing sophistical, unreasonable or unscriptural, connected with it. Yet the prejudice engrafted upon my mind in youth, against the denomination of the preacher, would often arise to deter me from again attending his meeting. Reflection, however, convinced me of the folly of heeding this early bias; and I firmly resolved to assert my manhood by banishing childish dislikes, and, hearing the stranger once more, would judge of his doctrines by reason and revelation, and trust the result with my Maker.

The appointed hour arrived; and with a prayer to God, to screen me from delusion and error, I repaired to the place of meeting—fully believing that my earthly enjoyments depended upon that evening's events! Knowing that the human heart is far more ready to adopt propositions which are favorable to its enjoyments, than those of an adverse character, I braced my mind with a firm determination to ferret out every sophistry, and to reject every argument, however pleasing, that did not comport with clear reason and the Scriptures. As I entered, Mr. Be was opening his discourse. It was upon the attributes of the Deity.

A few words will give the sum of his positions and conclusions.

He laid down the broad premises, as sanctioned by enlightened knowledge and the Bible, and disputed by none, that Jehovah possesses in full perfection, the attributes of goodness, wisdom and power—that he is immeasurably, impartially and eternally good to all his intelligent creatures—in wisdom infinite, and omnipotent in power. He then proceeded to state and substantiate the deductions warranted by these premises—That the goodness and holiness of God, would prompt him to create mankind for no other purpose but to cause them eventually to become pure and happy beings—for his goodness would revolt at unceasing misery, and his holiness at endless sin and transgression—That through his infinite wisdom, which scans the end from the beginning, he could devise a scheme of salvation to effect this Godlike design—a scheme which should be perfect in all its parts—a scheme, in which was foreseen, and measures provided to overcome, every obstacle, every species of opposition that could possibly arise against it—And that his power, omnipotent and irresistible, would enable him to carry this perfect scheme into full and triumphant effect! Thus he arrived at the grand conclusion, that mankind universally, would in due time enjoy that holiness and happiness for which they were originally designed—would obtain that high rank in the vast scale of being, that exaltation in intellect, and purity in morals, for which their capacities are so eminently fitted! To support this conclusion, he quoted numerous unequivocal passages of Holy Writ, and contended that the whole current of the Scriptures, when properly interpreted and understood, tended to substantiate this glorious and sublime termination of creation! "Here is a work," he concluded, "worthy the immeasurable powers and perfections of the great I AM!—here is a result in accordance with the purest desires, the most sublimated aspirations of holy beings—a result which will cause undying hosannas to arise from a ransomed world to the Father of the spirits of all flesh!"

All opposition in my mind was completely overwhelmed. These premises were so just and undisputed, and the conclusions so plain and absolutely self-evident, that I could not withstand them a moment. The sun-light of God's precious truth shone into the dark chambers of my understanding, expelling the mists of error, and every debasing fear! A mountain seemed to roll from my crushed heart—its bleeding wounds were healed—and I stood erect, a freeman of the Gospel, liberated from those corroding chains which had so long held me in grievous bondage! I returned home a new man—I communicated to my family and neighbors the happy change I had experienced. Language was too feeble to express the extent of my joy, and for the first time, I realized what it was to possess a "joy unspeakable and full of glory!"

Nature at once assumed another aspect. I saw with new eyes, and understood with an enlightened mind. Heaven, earth and air were filled with evidences of the unbounded benevolence of the all-wise Creator. Above, I recognized the kind Father of the world, exercising the boundless perfections of his nature in imparting happiness to his dependent creatures. Below, I saw a numerous race of intelligent beings, children of one common Parent, fellow-travellers to the same bourne, and eventual inheritors of one glorious and happy immortality! And although I beheld vast multitudes, who through ignorance of the character of their Maker, of the principles and administration of his government, and of the evil effects of sin, were straying in the way of wickedness, and suffering the unavoidable punishment of transgression, yet there was unbounded consolation in the reflection, that their Saviour, through the purifying influences of a merciful chastisement and of instruction, will at length lead them all home to their Father's house, where there is "bread enough and to spare" for all his hungering children!

But how shall I describe the revulsion of my feelings, in regard to my own departed offspring, whom I long supposed to be lost forever! From the lowest depths of a burning hell—from the companionship of demons and damned spirits—I beheld them exalted to the high joys of heaven; and, purified from every pollution, joining with angels and archangels in chanting thanksgiving and glory to the ceaseless beneficence of God! Oh! with what feelings of reverence and love, did I bow in prayer before my Maker, and pour forth the grateful effusions of my soul, for his rich mercy, in raising me from the deepest despair, and placing my feet upon the immovable rock of truth and salvation. With what assiduity do I study his will, that I may hasten to do it! The duties enjoined by the Gospel are no longer irksome to me; but with joyful alacrity do I endeavor to conform in every word and deed to the requirements of my Maker. I cannot find it in my heart to do aught forbidden by that good Being whom I realize as my dearest Friend, my most unfailing Benefactor. But it is "my meat and my drink," my joy and delight, to run in God's commandments, and serve with full purpose of heart, Him from whom all my blessings come.

How delightful now are the services of the sanctuary! My full soul exclaims with the Psalmist—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord!" With what satisfaction do I hear proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation for wretched, dying man! And as I listen to the swelling anthem of praise, O what visions, what enrapturing visions float before my mind! My thoughts soar far above this dark world of sin and sorrow, and by the eye of faith, a scene opens to view, which can only be fully described by the tongue of angels. I behold the close of Time below—the great drama of earthly existence is enacted—sin, death and hell conquered, annihilated, and universal reconciliation triumphantly completed! There is the assembled world—not one lost, not a child of humanity permitted to remain forever in sin and pain—but all redeemed, restored, purified and clothed in the celestial robes of immortality, unite without a discordant voice or thought, to proclaim—"Blessing and honor, and glory and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever!"

Here my aged friend closed his narration. Reader, the above, in every important fact, is a true and literal history of the experience of the venerable man who relates it. It affords a plain, unvarnished illustration of the widely differing effects of error and truth upon the human heart, when believed in sincerity and fully realized. May the Father of mercies lead you, if yet ignorant of his character, by a more pleasant path, to a knowledge of the soul-cheering truth as it is in Jesus.

Should these lines meet the view of him whose sorrows and joys they imperfectly record, he will please pardon the publicity I have given to his history. A desire to exhibit to the world the legitimate fruits of partial and impartial doctrines, as actually experienced, could alone induce me thus to record a narration received in the private family circle.

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. V.

BY EV. JASON LEWIS.

I SHOULD LIKE TO SEE a commentary on the Scriptures written by a Universalist.

I should like to see an impartial translation of the Scriptures by men competent for the work.

I should like to see Christian sects exercise toward one another more of the spirit of Christ.

I should like to see the use of intoxicating liquors, as a drink, abandoned by all classes.

I should like to see political parties less hostile to each other, and their writers employ less of censorious language, and deal less in misrepresentation.

I should like to see the law authorizing the infliction of capital punishment, erased from our statute books.

I should like to see the day when it could with all truth be said that the United States are a nation of intelligent and virtuous free men.

I should like to see civilized nations agree to learn war no more.

I should like to see Universalism generally prevalent, and the conduct of all its votaries as good as their faith.

I should like to see a judicious epitome of ecclesiastical history, written in numbers of convenient length, and published in some Universalist periodical, for the benefit of all classes of readers.

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.....No. VI.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

In every department of life—in every thing about which we can be rationally employed, confidence in God must have a tendency to inspire us with firmness, and a belief of succeeding in our exertions. We cannot labor successfully, when we have no faith to believe that our labor will be rewarded. We might expect the defeat of an army which should enter the field of battle in a feeble and disheartened state of mind; it would fail to prosecute any advantage it might gain, for the want of spirit and energy in its movements. But let it move forward with a firm conviction that Heaven has espoused its cause, and will lead it on to victory, and it will persevere with a steady and undaunted resolution. So likewise, let us, while engaged in those employments which are lawful and right, "trust in the Lord Jehovah," believing that he will prosper our exertions and crown them with success.

Those who trust in God, will go forward with cheerfulness, and exert that power in their labor to which they were strangers before. They rise above the difficulties of life; and adversity, instead of casting them down, will often become the means of their elevation.

But there is in man an inclination to fret at the disappointments he is called to experience, and the circumstances in which he is placed. It is true that every laudable exertion should be used to remove our sufferings and improve our condition; but if we repose a full confidence in the dispensations of Providence, and believe that all things will work together for good, we shall cease to complain of those things which would otherwise excite a continued murmuring.

Man, in order to be happy, must be active; he must not neglect the means which the Divine economy requires him to use. Indolence is probably as great a curse as man has ever endured, and nothing except habits of industry can deliver him from it. The laws of God seem to have determined that felicity shall, in part, be purchased by the sweat of the brow; and we should neither look to providence nor grace for happiness, while we refuse to adopt the necessary measures for its attainment.

That God conducts some to happiness by a special agency, or by any immediate control, constitutes no part of the Christian faith, and cannot be believed by those who recognize the laws of the universe, with which all things are connected.—There can be no doubt that God governs the world; but it is done on the broad principle of cause and effect. Throughout the whole system of nature there may be seen a perfect argument in the adaptation of means to the accomplishment of certain ends. We have no warrant to believe that we can see any of the ends accomplished without the use of the appointed means, since the day of miracles has passed by.

These remarks are made with reference to time. The dispensations of eternity must be entirely spiritual, and we doubt the propriety of blending temporal with spiritual things.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES.

Br. GROSH.—I noticed an article in your last number, stating that the Partialists had come to the conclusion that Universalists ought not to be admitted as competent witnesses, in consequence of their peculiar faith. Now this is nothing new under the sun; for we all know that if they possessed the power, they would think and act too; but in this particular, as in almost every thing else, I think they err.

I am not much of a lawyer; but if I am not entirely mistaken, the Universalists are the only people in the world that are competent witnesses according to the requirements of the existing law; for they are the only people who believe that there is a God who will punish false swearing.

The law, I believe, declares that no individual shall be considered a competent witness who does not believe in the existence of a God, who will (not may) punish false swearing. Suppose a Partialist is called upon the stand to give evidence in court. The question is put to the witness, "do you believe in a God who will positively punish every individual who takes a false oath?" If he answers according to his faith, he must say, "No;" for he believes that an individual may swear falsely five hundred times, and escape all the punishment that is due the crime, by the single act of repentance. And this he can do at any time during his life. Now I ask, is such a man a competent witness according to the existing law? Is such an one a believer in a God who will punish false swearing? I opine not. E. M. WOOLLEY.

THE ADVANTAGES OF PERIODICALS.

Br. GROSH.—It appears to me that even Editors do not always appreciate the advantages of their publications; neither can they fully, until they are brought to the necessity of travelling from day to day, and year to year, through wet and cold, for the spread of those truths, which are calculated to free the mind from the darkness of superstition, and "deliver those who through fear of death, are all their life time subject to bondage." I often have cause of rejoicing when I contemplate that these silent heralds will be the means of correcting those misrepresentations which are often made against us and our faith, when our voices are still in death. I therefore think it is the duty of all, who possibly can, to use their endeavors to sustain these means of defence, which cause the hypocrite to tremble, the bigot to feel ashamed, and the honest man to rejoice, that there is a tribunal, even short of eternity, that will convince us that justice will take place, virtue triumph, and truth prevail.

DECLINE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH.

It is well known that there has been a considerable decline or falling off in the numbers of the Methodist church during the year past. Many are greatly at a loss to account rationally or find a sufficient cause for such decline. We can, however, see a number of causes operating to produce such decline, either of which we should think of itself a sufficient cause for declension.

1. One cause is the arbitrary, overbearing and insufferable tyranny exercised over their humble members by the "powers that be," viz., their bishops, presiding elders, and circuit preachers. Its ecclesiastical government is founded in the principles of unrestrained tyranny and oppression; and we wonder not that, in this free country, it begins now to decline, but that its declension did not begin long ago.

2. Another cause of declension we believe is found in the manifestly disingenuous, unfair and anti-Christian course of Methodist Editors and publishers of books. When engaged in controversy with opponents, especially with Universalists, they have almost invariably given one-sided and half-way statements of some facts, entirely concealed and utterly denied others, slandered our denomination, and pursued so dishonest a course as to sicken and disgust their most upright and amiable members, and so far as their disingenuous course was known, (and they could not in all cases conceal their hypocrisy,) driven from, instead of winning to their ranks, sensible and honest men.

3. Another cause of the decline of Methodism is the natural increase of Universalism, from its becoming more generally known in community, and its superiority over Methodism becoming every year more and more obvious to an enlightened public. A writer in a late number of the Methodist Advocate and Journal, acknowledges and deplors their decline in the following pathetic strain:—

"It still continues to be a question of painful interest to the friends of our Zion, 'Why is it not now with us as in former times? Why can we not still number our scores of thousands added annually to the church?'

Alas, those days are gone,

Those golden years are o'er;

The light that once so bright did shine,

Perhaps will shine no more.

"It is too soon, however, to wail our funeral dirge. It becomes us much better to search out and remove the causes of our declension."

He then goes on to say, "Universalism, Socinianism, etc., erect their temples and issue their baneful productions hard by the side of our most stately churches." This, though couched in the canting and reproachful terms commonly used by Methodists concerning Universalists, tells the story pretty plainly, and is a forced confession that Universalism is by degrees supplanting Methodism. (By-the-by, what becomes of all their tales about "converted," and "renouncing Universalists"?)

4. Another cause of declension is thus stated by the writer in the Advocate and Journal:—

"Another cause of our recent loss in numbers, results from the fact, that during the great revivals with which the different churches were favored some few years ago, many persons were pressed into the societies without due regard to their fitness for membership. This was the case with all the leading denominations of our country. Indeed, there seemed to be, in many places, a vying with each other, not to say a strife, for the ascendancy in numbers and influence. Never shall I forget scenes of this description. The 'anxious seats' and altars were supplied, and church books and class papers filled by a kind of violence. This process took the rounds, and was kept up by protracted meetings, and other extra efforts, for months in succession. This state of things was succeeded by a tone of feeling analogous to that of the human body, after extreme excitement—a spirit of slumber. This listlessness was succeeded by indications of concern for almost any thing in preference to real piety. Under such circumstances, an angel from heaven, or Abraham to have returned from paradise, and preached with the eloquence of heaven and earth, would have produced but little fruit. Many were doubtless truly converted to God; others were sincerely desirous to flee the wrath to come, and be saved from their sins; many of these have proved faithful, and mourn over the fate of others, who having soon become tired of restraints and duties for which they had no taste, returned to the beggarly elements of sin. These, in too many instances, were borne with too long in the church."

And what better result could be expected from such measures? Can boisterous fanaticism produce sober piety? Must not those who sow to the wind expect to reap the whirlwind? Can espionage, and jugglery, and management, and electioneering, following close on the heels of the "wind," the "earthquake" and the "fire," convince a sober and enlightened public that "the Lord is there?" And will not such means, so long as they are employed, continue to cause decline instead of an increase in the Methodist Episcopal church? D. S.

SCRIPTURAL EXPLANATIONS REQUESTED.

Mr. SKINNER—SIR, As you are a friend to the cause of Christ, and willing to do all the good you can, I here send a few passages of Scripture, hoping you will explain them in their true light. They were handed to me by a strong Presbyterian, who believes that neither you nor any other Universalist can explain them in accordance with your doctrine; and furthermore, that there is no such doctrine as Universalism taught in the Bible. As this place has been for some time past a hot bed of Partialism, and this Presbyterian being one of the leading members, I would most humbly beg your consideration on these passages. St. Matthew vii: 23, and xxv: 41-46; Luke xiii: 27; 2 Peter ii: 4; Jude 6; John v: 29; Rev. xiv: 1 and xx: 10. I wish you would let me have your views on the same that he may see them. It may be the means of doing much good. Your obedient humble servant,
JAMES S. TAFT, JR.

REMARKS.

We are happy to render any assistance in our power to sincere inquirers after truth, and in aid of their more correct understanding of the Scriptures. For this purpose we have often published, for years past, explanations of difficult or obscure texts, and especially of those that the opposers of our faith supposed militated against the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. And by a careful reference to our pages during the last year, or sixth volume of this paper, our correspondent will perceive that all the passages that he names, with but one exception, have there been commented on and explained. And to most of our readers the repetition of the same expositions in this volume would be uninteresting and worse than useless, inasmuch as they would occupy room which otherwise would be filled with more interesting, and especially with newer matter.

Matthew vii: 23, and xxv: 41-46, and Luke xiii: 27, are parallel passages, and the explanation will be found at length in volume vi, of this paper, numbers 32, 33, 34 and 35, on pages 254, 261, etc. John v: 29 is explained in number 47, p. 369. 2 Peter ii: 4 and Jude 6 are explained in numbers 19 and 35, pp. 149 and 277. Rev. xx: is explained in number 23, p. 180. Rev. xiv: 1 is therefore the only passage remaining of the catalogue named, and reads as follows: "And I looked, and lo, a Lamb stood on the mount Sion, and with him a hundred and forty-four thousand, having his Father's name written in their foreheads." In this text we see nothing very difficult of explanation, and especially we see nothing that can in any possible manner oppose the doctrine of universal salvation. The hundred and forty-four thousand seen with the Lamb upon mount Sion, were doubtless the same hundred and forty-four thousand, consisting of twelve thousand from each of the tribes of Israel, who were "sealed" as the "servants of God," as mentioned in Rev. vii: 2-8. We think there can be no doubt of the salvation of those hundred and forty-four thousand sealed servants of the living God, having the Father's name written in the forehead; and it is presumed that even the "strong Presbyterian" mentioned by our correspondent would not question this. Well, now we Universalists heartily believe in this, and not only so—we also believe in the fulfilment of the words of the Revelator immediately following the account of the sealing of God's servants, Rev. vii: 9, 10. "After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands: and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb," etc. Nay more, we believe that, in addition to this, "Every creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and in the sea, and all that are in them," shall unite in the same joyful and exulting anthem as described by the Revelator, chap. v, verse 13.

And what fault will our good Presbyterian friend find with all this? Does it tally with Universalism, or not? Let our correspondent inquire of his Presbyterian neighbor on this subject. And furthermore, if he says there is no such doctrine as Universalism taught in the Bible, let him read the series of articles published in this paper a few weeks since, entitled "Reasons for believing in universal salvation." Has he ever read those reasons? If he has not, let him do it now, and he may learn that the Bible does teach Universalism. But if he refuse to read them, then it is evident he has no confidence in his own system. It is also evident his opposition is founded in ignorance instead of knowledge—that he is insincere when he declares the Bible does not teach Universalism—and that he is afraid to examine the subject lest he should be convinced that it does. "Whoso readeth, let him understand." D. S.

NEW BOOK OF CHURCH MUSIC.

Rev. Thomas Whittemore, Editor of the Trumpet and Universalist Magazine, is about publishing at Boston a new book of church music, that shall be free from an objection which every conscientious Universalist finds, in a greater or less degree, in all collections of church music now extant in the land, viz., religious sentiments directly at war with our holy faith, and revolting in the extreme to every benevolent heart and truly pious Universalist. If we cannot preach, nor quietly hear uttered from the pulpit, sentiments that blaspheme the name and character of our adorable God and Father, and distort and disguise his sacred truth with the most pernicious error and falsehood, how can we consistently sing or hear sung by our choirs such odious sentiments? We cannot. And I have long been satisfied of the propriety, nay the necessity of such a work as that which Br. Whittemore is about to publish. I doubt not it will be an acceptable offering to the public, and receive an extensive patronage. The last number of the Trumpet contains the preface to the work; with which we are so well pleased we cannot forbear making some liberal extracts.

PREFACE.

The principal object of the author in preparing this work, has been to produce a book of Psalmody, which should contain no sentiments offensive to any denomination of Christians. It is the case, in regard to almost all the collections extant, that sentiments are frequently occurring which are objectionable either to the one sect or the other. In some cases, words which have long been associated with particular melodies, have been laid aside, to give place to such as are tinged with the peculiar opinions of those who make the change.—The evil here mentioned, which has been often felt and acknowledged, first suggested to the author the design of this work. If we are careful that our Hymn Books shall contain no sentiments offensive to a pure and elevated piety, we ought also to be equally careful in regard to our books of church music.

The author has not hesitated to retain in this collection, a number of the tunes of the former American composers. This has been done for those choirs, who are exceedingly attached to such music. Many of these tunes have long nurtured the piety and ardent devotion of our New-England churches, and it is a profane disregard of the religious feelings and associations of the great body of American Christians, that has, with scarcely an exception, banished these tunes from all our places of worship.

It would be vain to deny, that such tunes as 'Arnheim,' 'Africa,' 'Brookfield,' 'Addison,' 'Coronation,' 'Confidence,' 'Windham,' and 'Lisbon,' have done as much to raise and sustain a pure and heavenly flame of devotion, as any other music that has been published since they went out of use. Tunes of this character have been preserved in the present work, with no other alteration than such as was absolutely unavoidable.

An attempt has been made to reduce the elements of the science, in the preliminary instructions, to the greatest possible plainness. Utter simplicity has been studied. These instructions are designed for those who are entirely ignorant of music, and who have a desire to commence the science. But no instructions can supercede the necessity of a teacher. Singing by rote is a pernicious practice, that should never be encouraged by a teacher. Those whose minds are too inactive to study the rules, will hurry forward with great impatience to sing by rote; and this is the way in which too many of the members of singing choirs learn to sing. It lays a bad foundation. Let the foundation be laid in a thorough knowledge of the elements, particularly of time and of the diatonic scale; the art of singing will be obtained much easier after this. A teacher cannot be too careful to insist on these things.

The following paragraph relative to the deportment of the members of a choir in church, is too appropriate and too necessary an admonition to be omitted here:—

There are certain instructions to which singing choirs in general have given little attention, that do not respect the art of singing, but their behavior during the hours of public worship. It is a high breach of decorum for the members of singing choirs to spend the time of prayer or of the sermon in laughing, whispering, turning over books, and in things of like character—a practice in which they are too often encouraged by the example of their leaders. The curtains in front of the singing seats are frequently made a screen for such conduct. There are no terms in which we can fully express our disapprobation of such a course. It is a great fault that singers are separated too much from the congregation. We know of no reason, why all the members of a congregation who can sing, should not join in that delightful service. The sublimest portions of praise are those well known doxologies, in which the whole congregation join. They produce an effect which the choir alone, will in vain attempt to produce.

"Assembled men to the deep organ join,
The long-resounding voice, oft breaking clear,
At solemn pauses, through the swelling bass;
And, as each mingling flame increases each,
In one united ardor rise to heaven."

One more extract which in too many instances finds its appropriate application in singing choirs.

It is an exceedingly unhappy circumstance, that singing choirs are frequently rent by divisions and contentions. There are few associations which are so often broken up in this manner. Is it not lamentable, and altogether unpardonable, that those who mingle their voices in the sweetest strains of harmony, should deny to each other civilities and kindness in their personal intercourse? These difficulties arise in general from the vanity which leads almost every one to think that he is the best singer in the choir. This is no trait of a great and generous mind. The best singers will always be distinguished by their performances, in whatever place they may be; and the poorest will only make themselves the objects of derision and pity, by attempts to force themselves forward. It most frequently happens that the best singers are more suspicious than others of their own powers; and no one is so likely to gain the esteem of the wise and the good, as the individual who cultivates a meek and humble spirit. The preference is always to be given, in appointing the president, or leader of a choir, among persons of equal knowledge and skill, to that individual who has the prosperity of the congregation with which the choir is connected, nearest to his heart.

The author, after a hint concerning the too great neglect of sacred music in families, and its appropriateness in happying as well as kindling the flame of devotion in the domestic circle, closes his preface. And we sincerely rejoice that the work is in so good hands as it appears to be. If it proves to be what it ought to be, and we know of no one better qualified to render it what it should be than Br. W., it cannot fail of meeting with general favor with the liberal public. It is now in the hands of the printer and will soon be published. D. S.

STING OF DEATH.

"O death, where is thy sting?" 1 Cor. xv: 55.

Dr. Belsham, in paraphrasing the above triumphant challenge of the great apostle, breaks forth in the following rapturous strain. Can this blessed vision ever be realized if death is to endure as long as the throne of God shall stand, and hold dominion over, and confine in eternal misery millions of human souls? Think of it ye advocates of endless misery and death. D. S.

"O death, king of terrors, irresistible conqueror of the human race, where is now thy dreaded weapon? where is thy power to excite dismay? O grave, insatiable devourer of mankind, where are now thy helpless captives? What is become of thy boasted prey? Sin, which entailed destruction and misery, and which distilled venom into the sting of death, is slain; and the righteous and avenging law of God, which passed the irrevocable sentence, and which transferred to sin its deadly power, is superseded by unbounded mercy. Grace reigns triumphant. Captivity is led captive.—Death and the grave are compelled to restore their victims and are themselves cast headlong into the gulf of perdition. They are swallowed up in victory, and forever. Thanks, everlasting thanks, be to God, who giveth us the victory; and who, by the mission, the doctrine, the death, and above all by the resurrection of Jesus, hath abolished death and opened the gates of life and immortality."

UNIVERSALIST PAPERS—CHANGES, ETC.

Universalist Watchman.—The first number of a new volume and new series of this paper has just come to hand. It is the successor, or a continuation of the "Watchman, Impartialist and Christian Repository." It is, as heretofore, published at Lebanon, N. H., and edited by Brs. John Moore and B. H. Fuller, two able and faithful brethren in the ministry of reconciliation. Its form is again changed from the folio to the quarto, and an intimation given that it will remain the same hereafter, it having undergone very frequent changes in form for years past. It is published weekly, on a royal sheet, at $1.50 in advance, $2. after six months, or $2.50 at the close of the year. Its appearance is neat, its matter interesting, its price very low for the matter it contains, its Editors and publishers worthy of, and we hope they will receive, a large share of the public favor and patronage.

The Trumpet and Universalist Magazine.—This veteran publication in the cause of Universalism has just commenced its eighteenth volume of the old series—ninth of the new—and continues in the same hands as heretofore, viz., those of Br. Thomas Whittemore, as Editor and publisher, and G. W. Bazin, printer—its form the same, folio—its terms the same, $2.00 per annum, in advance, or $2.50 if not paid before the expiration of six months. This is a long tried and able advocate of the doctrine of universal salvation, civil and religious liberty, the freedom of the press and of speech, and the rights of man. Its character and merits are too well known to need any recommendation from us, and we can only say, it has our best wishes for its prosperity.

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository.—The first number of the fifth volume of this valuable periodical has just come to hand. It is a monthly publication containing 40 octavo pages to each number, printed at Boston, Mass., in elegant style on excellent paper, neatly stitched in covers, and afforded at $2.00 per annum, in advance. Abel Tompkins, publisher, Albert A. Folsom, Editor; and Revs. D. D. Smith, Henry Bacon, Benjamin Whittemore and John M. Austin, regular correspondents. It is intended not indeed to be uninteresting to gentlemen, but to be especially interesting and beneficial to the ladies. The contents of the present number are as follows:—Introductory Address, by the Editor, A Mother's Love, (poetic,) The Second Death, (a sermon,) The Bride Leaving Home, (poetic,) Enthusiasm, No. 1, Early Virtue, Napoleon, Spring, Corrected Republications, No. 3, The Teachings of Nature, Universalism, To the Owner of an Album, Nebuchadnezzar's Change of Heart, Thoughts on Friendly Correspondence, The Star, The Grave Stone, The Difference between Orthodoxy and Universalism, The Joyful Flourishing of Christ's Kingdom, Moral Reflections, Importance of Cultivating our Religious Feelings, Divine Goodness, Gertrude to Trevalyan, A May Morn, God's Judgments Salutary, Lines to —, The Graveyard, Reflections, The Unfortunate, God our Father, Christian Sorrow, Free Agency, and a Sacred Song, music and words original. The number contains a great variety of interesting and valuable matter, and we cordially recommend the Universalist and Ladies' Repository to the favor and patronage of the public, especially to females. D. S.

The following letter from Br. Roberts contains too many good hints to be lost. We hope it will not only be read but remembered by every professor of Universalism.

"My residence, as you are well aware, is at Lakeville, which is at the foot of Conesus Lake. I came here about the first of May last, and have preached in this society every Sunday since; though I did not engage to preach here oftener than every alternate Sunday, yet not having fully made any other engagement, our friends here chose to employ me the whole of my time for the present. Many of them are ardently engaged in the good work; but it is here, as it is in almost every other place, there are some who profess to be Universalists, yet do little or nothing to advance the doctrine. But notwithstanding there is some indifference and neglect in the cause of Universalism, there is still a preponderance of good.

"There are numbers, wealth, intelligence and moral influence enough here to accomplish much. We want a united effort, each to do his share according to his intellectual and moral ability. This I regret to say is not done—it is not done anywhere in the denomination. And this, you are aware, is one of the most effectual barriers to the advancement of Universalism in the world. Could every man and woman do all that each could do individually and collectively, Universalism in a few years would hardly have a foe; for it is mighty through God in its conquest, rapid in its onward march to victory, and with the blessing of God will prevail.

"Our society here has no meeting-house yet; and the reason is, they have not all yet been satisfied where it is best to build. Our brethren at Bristol, where Br. Ackley has been laboring for some years to good acceptance, have gone to work in earnest, and are building a neat and commodious house of stone. Our brethren at Conesus are about building them a house of worship also.

"In addition to my labors in this society, I preach once in two weeks at Geneseo, six miles west of here, at 5 o'clock, P. M. There the doctrine of Universalism is almost entirely unknown; but few discourses having been delivered there by a preacher of Universalism. I delivered my first message there but a few weeks since. We assembled in the brick church owned by the Methodists, who kindly, though unexpectedly, opened it for our accommodation, and to our agreeable surprise, the house was filled with devout and attentive hearers. I have preached in the court house twice since, (the Methodists having refused us the use of their house for reasons best known to themselves,) and our congregations have been unexpectedly large. This is encouraging to me, and I know not how to express fully the joy of my heart. It is also encouraging and joy-giving to the brethren there, who have embarked in the good cause with a zeal and earnestness worthy the doctrine they have professed, and who are fully resolved to use every laudable means to build up the doctrine in that growing and populous village. God be thanked that there is such an interest felt in our holy cause, and may much good be done in the name of the holy child Jesus. We shall ere long form a society in this place; which in point of numbers, respectability and moral influence, will not be second to any there.

"From these remarks you will learn that in this section of our Master's heritage, the doctrine we profess, is onward and victorious. Many are inquiring after truth, and seem to say in the language of Scripture, 'We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you.' O. R."

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1837.

The publishers of the Universalist Register and Almanac have concluded, agreeably to the suggestion of their brethren, to reduce the price one-half on the copy for 1837. The size of the work will be somewhat lessened, but it will contain not only full and correct statistics of the denomination, but also much edifying and interesting matter pertaining to Universalism. We shall put the wholesale price so low as to make it an object to those who purchase by the quantity. It will be published early in July next. Orders for the above may be addressed to A. B. Grosh, Utica; or Whiston and Sanderson, Geneva. Geneva, June 1836. WHISTON AND SANDERSON.

POETRY.

SOLILOQUY IN TRIAL.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

In all this world's wide wilderness, is happiness,
Or semblance of it, no where to be found? are sighs
And tears the only portion of our frail humanity?
Alas! my soul, thou'rt even now o'ercharged
With grief, and tears can never more unburthen
Thee! For apathy's expressive weight, like icebergs
Fixed, hath chilled the current of the heart, and checked
The pulse that ought to beat in unison with kindred Souls. Sweet peace, long sought in vain, hath spread
Her mellow wings, and soared (like Noah's dove) for rest,
To regions far above our own, where toil, and care, and Pain, and strife, are never known.
I'm weary with the counting of the days, till thou,
My soul, shalt fly unshackled from mortality,
Along immensity's expanse, in swift pursuit
Of joys divine, to that enriched abode, where reigns Intelligence with reason's sway, and passions are Their slaves. My spirit would ascend, but O, this clog
Of earth! It would not set its prisoner free.
Then shrink within thyself, and be at peace, alone
From all the world, its miseries and crimes, its Malice and deceit; while conning o'er a list of Duties, meant to be performed, with best intent.
And whether friends approve, or foes condemn, thy Motive's good, it is enough, with principles
Established on the law of love, a sure foundation
For a rest, the world can neither give, nor take away—
Remembering all thy journey through,
"To err, is human; to forgive, divine."
Henderson, May, 1836.

ISOLATED AFFECTION.

BY W. G. SIMMS.

"True love, still-born of heaven, is blessed with wings,
And tired of earth, it plumes them back again,
And thus we lose it."

Deep in the bosom of a southern forest, there grew a beautiful flower; the sweetest flower in that lonely region. Its leaves were of the purest white, for the first time unfolding to the world around, and revealing as they did so, the fine and delicate droppings of violet and purple, which before, like so much hidden wealth, had lain in its bosom. Its odor was fresh and exquisite, and no flower in all that forest, could come near it for sweetness or for beauty. In excellence, as in condition, it was equally alone.

But it was not destined to be alone always. There came to it one morning in May, a golden butterfly—a rover among the flowers—an ancient robber of their sweets. Gaily he plied his flight throughout the forest, now here and now there, sporting about in a sort of errant unconsciousness. It was not long before he inhaled the odor—it was not long before he saw the pure white leaves, and looked down with an anxious eye, upon the rich droppings of purple and violet, which nestled in the bosom of the flower.

Flying around in mazy but still contracting circles, he gazed upon the loveliness of the flower, and grew more and more enamored at each moment of his survey. "Surely," he thought, "this is a flower by itself—love's own flower—dwelling in secret—blooming only, and budding for my eyes, and denied to all beside. It was my good fortune, to have found it—I will drink—I will nestle in its bosom—I will enjoy its charms as I have enjoyed a thousand others."

Even with the thought, came the quick resolution, and another moment found him lying—lying close and pressed upon the bosom of the flower. There was a slight effort to escape from the embraces of the intruder—the flower murmured its dissent, but the murmur died away into a sigh, was inhaled, as so much honey, by the pressing lips of the butterfly. He sung to the flower a story of his love—and, oh! saddest of all, the young flower believed him.

And day after day, he came to the stolen embrace, and day after day, more fondly than ever, the lovely flower looked forth to receive him. She surrendered her very soul to his keeping, and her pure white leaves grew tinged with his golden ringlets, while his kisses stained with yellow the otherwise delicate loveliness of her lips. But she heeded not this, so long as the embrace was still fervent—the kiss still warm—the return of the butterfly still certain.

But when was love certain? Not often, where the lover is a butterfly. There came a change over the habits of the butterfly. He gradually fell off in his attentions. His passion grew cool, and the ease of his conquest led him to undervalue its acquisition. Each day he came later and later, and his stay with the flower grew more and more shortened on each return. Her feelings perceived the estrangement long before her reason had taught her to think upon or understand it.

At length she murmured her reproaches—and the grievance must be great when love will venture so far. "Wherefore," she said, "oh, wherefore hast thou lingered away so long? Why dost thou not now, as before, vie with the sunlight in thy advances? I have looked for thee from the dawning, yet I have looked for thee in vain. The yellow beetle has been all the morning buzzing about me, but I frowned upon his approaches. The green grasshopper had a song under my bush, and told me a dull story of the love which he had for me in his bosom; and more than once, the glittering humming bird has sought my embraces, but I shut my leaves against him. Thou hast been slow to seek me—thou whom I have looked to see."

Gaily then the butterfly replied to these reproaches, nor, as he spoke, heeded the increasing paleness of the flower. "Over a thousand forests I've been flying, each as beautiful as this; on a thousand flowers I've been tending—none less lovely to the sight than thou. How couldst thou dream that, with a golden ringlet, broad, and free, and beautiful, like mine, in a single spot I should linger, of the world unknowing aught? No, no—mine is an excursive spirit, for a thousand free affections made; wouldst thou have me, like groping spiders, working still to girdle in myself?"

It was a murmuring and sad reply of the now isolated flower, and lived not long after it had made it. "Ah, now I know mine error—having no wings myself to mate with the lover who had. Alas! that I have loved so fondly and foolishly; for while thou hast gone over a thousand forests, seeing a thousand flowers, I have only known, only looked, only lived for a single butterfly."

The false one was away after this, to another forest; for his ear loved not reproaches, and he had sense, if not feeling enough, to see that they were uttered justly. The flower noted its departure, and its last sigh was an audible warning to the young bud which it left behind it. The wood-spirit heard the sigh and the warning—and when the bud began to expand in the pleasant sunshine, he persuaded the black-browed spider to spin his web, and frame his nest, in the thick bushes that hung around it; and many were the wanton butterflies, after this, who, coming to prey upon the innocent affection, became entangled, and justly perished in the guardian net-work thus raised up to protect it.—Jacksonville Courier.

THE NECESSITY OF VIRTUE.

I can illustrate this subject in no better way, than to observe, that we might as well attempt to live and enjoy life without food and drink as without virtue.

God has constituted us with appetites and passions; and these when properly indulged afford us the highest temporal enjoyment—they give us soundness of mind and health of body. If they are denied their natural wants the body pines away or falls into death. If they are immoderately indulged sickness and death ensue.

Now it is precisely so with our moral nature. There are a variety of powers—such as love, kindness and justice, which serve to constitute the moral man; and when all these are in full exercise, each performing its appointed office, there is a peace of mind, and a freedom from the pains, ills and poisons, which rend the heart of the sinner. Just in proportion, therefore, as our moral powers are regulated by the laws of God, do we enjoy moral health, the same as we enjoy bodily health, when our physical powers are regulated by the laws given for their government. Suppose now you should see a man exposing himself to some fatal or loathsome disease, or cutting off a hand or plucking out an eye to increase his happiness—suppose you should see him walk on embers, or take coals of fire in his bosom to make himself happy—what should you say—should you not call him a madman, and cry out, Sir, thou art beside thyself?

But would not this be as reasonable as to indulge in hatred, anger, revenge, intemperance and profanity to increase the mind's happiness? What a wound is to the body sin is to the soul. What a loathsome disease is to the outer man sin is to the inner man. You have seen the strong arm become nerveless, the lofty genius become dull, and the vigorous body powerless, through the lawless indulgence of the appetites. So have you seen by the same indulgence, a sickly, weak and disordered moral state produced. You have seen Christian generosity dead, kind affection dead, endearing sympathies dead. Sin, then, is a scourge infinitely more fearful than famine, pestilence or sword, and where the latter have swept their thousands into eternity, the former has its tens of thousands. It is a disease which gnaws at the fountain of social life, which eats out the roots of kindness and love, which not only produces a fatal moral sickness in the whole man, but a madness, a frantic rage, which arms the brother against the brother, and spreads ruin and death on every hand.

How many nations of the earth are now barely languishing in existence in consequence of the reign of sin.

Sickly and feeble, they are the theatres of feverish excitements, of lawless outrage, of brutal treachery. They are like an old man, staggering, and reeling, and tottering on the brink of dissolution, convulsed and racked by internal disorders, enfeebled and dispirited by a wasting disease, just ready to fall under the moral scourge which they have brought upon themselves.—Gospel Sun.

MORAL INSTRUCTION IN COMMON SCHOOLS.—Man has a heart as well as a head, and a moral as well as an intellectual nature. Both of these natures should be harmoniously educated. But our common schools do not train the moral feelings—they overlook the cultivation of the heart. The temper is not regulated—the appetites and passions are not controlled, and, in most cases, the worst feelings are exercising and growing into fearful strength, by the daily collisions of the school. To implant and strengthen a good disposition, kindness, benevolence, love to one another, and sincere piety to God, is one of the great, if not the greatest objects of education.—Common School Assistant.

If a sound body and a sound mind, which is as much as to say health and virtue, are to be preferred before all other considerations—ought not men, in the choosing of business either for themselves or children, to refuse such as are unwholesome for the body, and such as make a man too dependent, too much obliged to please others, and too much subjected to their humors in order to be recommended and get a livelihood.

MARRIAGES.

In Lebanon, on the 15th ult., by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR, to Miss REBECCA HEAD.

DEATHS.

At Vernon, June 16, Mrs. SALLY WILLARD, wife of Erastus Willard, Esq., sheriff of Oneida county, aged 42 years. Mrs. W. was an excellent and intelligent woman, and will be deeply and long lamented by her rising family of children, her relatives and numerous friends. She suffered long and severely under pulmonary consumption, which she endured with exemplary patience and fortitude. She retained the full possession of her mind while she lived, and with perfect composure and triumphant hope exhorted her friends to dry their tears. Thus died another Universalist.

By her request, the writer attended her funeral on the 18th, and delivered a discourse from Luke xx: 36.

AN INCIDENT.

A VISIT TO THE SCENES OF MY CHILDHOOD.

Childhood! O, what an important part of our existence! And the scenes of childhood! What a feeling does even the thought of them occasion to the wanderer! What a sensation they produce, when, after a long absence, we return to the home of our infancy—to the place where the vivacity of youth spent itself in the glee of sport—the butterfly chase—the flower gathering—the fishing excursions—to the place where the rising energies of our early years first developed themselves, not only in the task, but also in the sports of the schoolboy!

Such, dear reader, and many similar musings, came into the mind of the writer, a few weeks since, when homeward bound to visit the scenes of his youthful days.

I had just left the beautiful and romantic village of C., where I had resided some time, and which was considered the most lovely spot in the interior of the Empire State. I thought so. And the regret I felt in leaving it may be easily imagined—in leaving a place where the purling rivulet coursed its gentle stream along the valley, to refresh the exuberant verdure upon its banks—where every hill and dale presented a beautiful perspective—where science and morals happily blended their noble influence—where literature, without sectarianism, was encouraged and cherished by a liberal public, and where religion, pure and undefiled, might be heard from the lips of the "man of God," urged home upon the heart with that unsophisticated eloquence which the Gospel theme so naturally inspires in the breast of him who has drank deep at the fountain of truth. But when I approached the place of my nativity, every thought but that of home was sunk in oblivion. The literary institutions with which I had been acquainted, with all their high sounding titles, were forgotten; for here stood the district school house, where the days of my boyhood were whiled away in thoughtless sport, or indifferent recitations—yonder, too, might still be seen, peering above the houses, the modest spire of the old church in which I had sat in death-like silence during many a fearful discourse, which to me were like the threatening lash to the galley-slave—and still further on, surrounded by shade trees and shrubbery, might be seen the little white dwelling of my own mother—and when my eyes met that spot, then, then, if ever, were my feelings beyond description! The thoughts that rushed into my mind, the inquiries that pressed themselves upon me, seemed to come as though an unseen irresistible hand was pouring its unequalled measures of doubts and fears and hopes into my soul! Were the dear inmates of yonder dwelling alive? Were they well? Would the warm embrace and the fond kiss greet me as in the days of my youth? I hoped that all this was true. I looked upon the surrounding scenery, and it was lovelier than ever—yea, lovelier than when the sunny days of childhood sped on without a trouble or a fear; succeeding each other only to bring with them new pleasures and new delights.

How often have the scenes of childhood been described as lovely. Lovely! is that the most comprehensive word that can be used? Is there no term which can express every thing that is pleasing and thrilling to the soul? Such a one, with scores of adjuncts from the descriptive pen of an Irving, would scarcely be adequate to the task of describing the emotions of my heart as I alighted from the carriage, in front of my parental home. I was there—the next minute I was in the arms of my mother!

All were well—all crowded around, anxiously inquiring after my health and happiness. My health was good, and my happiness as complete as earth will allow. One thought, however, arose, which, had I not banished it, would have damped my joy. We must soon part again—I was destined to leave that dear family, whom I had happily met, and joyfully and thankfully embraced.

A few days sufficed to visit the scenes of my early sports and pleasures; and to call upon those friends and neighbors I had formerly visited, and the time was now near at hand which was again to separate us—perhaps forever.

One day, after a delightful excursion upon the little bay, whose shores washed the borders of the homestead, I sat in the family circle, as I had been wont since my return, relating the things I had seen, my prospects in life, and a hundred other things, such as are always interesting to those of our home, when my mother interrupted me, and asked if I thought Lucy would return before I left them? My sister Lucy was the only absent child of four brothers and two sisters. She had been engaged for some time in the business of school-teaching, near the western boundary of the State, and was every day expected home. She was anxiously looked for by me, for I was on the point of starting for the South, and perhaps should never have another opportunity of seeing her. And more than all, my mother wished to see, once more, a meeting of all her children around the same table. To her inquiry, therefore, I made answer, that I had been looking for her all day, and that the hour was not so far gone but that she might yet arrive. I had scarcely ended my answer, when a light tap was heard at the door—it was opened, and sister Lucy stood before us! She had arrived in the post coach, which left her at the public house, and thence, without waiting to send for a conveyance, she had walked home.—Our mutual greetings and embraces were such as pure affection could alone inspire; and the joy of our mother, on receiving into her arms the last absent one was great; and when she saw herself surrounded by six dutiful children—all that bound her to earth, for the companion of her youth, our father, had long since slept in death—she gave vent to feelings which none but a mother ever knew—feelings which alone flow from the fount of pure love in a mother's breast.

Like myself, Lucy was obliged soon again to leave our home. Accordingly, the next day was fixed upon for my departure, and the next morning, as the time when we should probably for the last time, assemble around the once festive board, and partake of Heaven's bounties around the same table.

Morning came, and with it one of those sunny days of the latter part of May, which so nearly resembles the spring season of life. My brothers and sisters were up and busy before I awoke; and when I arose, I was greeted by the whole family, who expected soon to lose my company, and thus they would be deprived of that pleasure arising from a source as natural as it is desirable—visible signs that we were one in heart—bound together by innumerable ligaments of kindred feeling.

We had not conversed long, when breakfast was announced; and perhaps for the first time in our lives it was an unwelcome sound—for it was the last time, in all human probability, that we should all hear it together. With heavy hearts, therefore, we sat down to the morning repast. My mother was an "old measure," New-England Presbyterian; and since the death of my father, had continued his custom of expressing thanks and asking blessings before meals. She did so at this time; and if a fervent prayer ever ascended from mortal to our God, I believe that the breathings forth of her full heart at this time, for the blessing of the Almighty to rest upon her children, were "in spirit and in truth." This over, the subject, of course, turned upon our separation.

All the children who had imbibed any principles of religion, were attached to that system of grace which is impartial and unending—myself among the number. I knew that this fact had created many forebodings in the mind of my mother, in regard to our future well-being. A thought struck me therefore, of seizing upon the present occasion to endeavor to impress upon her mind the impartial goodness of Jehovah, and the truth that the same final destiny awaits mankind. After a few general remarks on the dangers which beset us in life, the trials and troubles to which we are liable, and the regret which each one felt in prospect of separation, I turned the subject of discourse to religion—the hopes which it inspires—the morality which it inculcates—the consolations which it is calculated to impart in time of bereavement—the power which it gives its possessor to avert impending dangers or lessen their force—the fortitude and patience which it yields to us when the waters of sorrow and grief are rolling their turbid streams over the soul—and, as my feelings became warmed, the joy I felt in beholding and describing the character of the eternal Author of this holy religion, poured the influence of its perfect goodness over me, so that I almost irresistibly proceeded, in an animated manner, to dwell upon the loving kindness and mercy of Jehovah—this river of benevolence rolling its broad tide of waters over the universe; diffusing life, and blessing, and joy, wider and wider, till reason becomes more God like, and virtue more general and more perfect, and happiness universal and complete and eternal—and finally, regardless of every thing but the glorious theme which filled my soul to overflowing, I had relinquished my knife and fork, and had half risen from my chair, when a deep drawn sigh attracted our attention. It was from my mother; and for a while I ceased, thinking that, perhaps, I might have injured her feelings; and also, that I was usurping the whole time, when others had the same privilege as myself.

I was silent—all were silent—all eyes now turned on me—I again spoke. Mother your children are all around this table at which you now sit—you see them before you—you expect never again to see them together. Do you love your children? O, cruel question! I knew she loved them—I knew that they were dearer to her than life! I waited for an answer. I looked up to her face, and when I saw the tears streaming fast down those furrowed cheeks, and a countenance more heavenly than earthly, it grieved me that I had asked the question. But it brought to her mind all a mother's feelings; and oh, had you been there and seen that look—that yearning gaze which she bent upon the assembled group, you would have acknowledged that "There is none,

In all this cold and hollow world, no fount,
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within A mother's breast."

It was enough. No expression could have confirmed that love which "many waters cannot quench nor floods drown," more strongly than did the silent but expressive eloquence of her countenance, which "told the tale of affection."

I ventured another question. Mother, I know your love—I know that it is strong, ardent, pure, and lasting; and I know, too, that your children are the objects of that love; now which one or ones have you selected as the subject or subjects of interminable anguish? You believe that all those who are not called of God, elected according to his grace, will be cast off forever. Now, no visible signs—such as are generally considered genuine—can be seen in one of your offspring, and you have no reason, according to your theory, for believing that all of them will ever arrive at a home in heaven. Which are the unfortunate, rejected ones? All were speechless. Not a motion—not a sound—not a breath interrupted the death-like stillness—not even a sigh escaped from the full heart of my mother—and I proceeded. If then, your love, which is finite, will not permit you to make a selection for the abodes of misery from the number of your children, how can it be possible that our heavenly Parent, whose goodness and love are infinite—having no bounds—could have made choice between the objects of his benignity, for the flames of wo forever? And more than this: would his boundless goodness have called into existence those whom he certainly knew would, by their deeds, bring upon themselves the same result—their utter and unmingled wretchedness? And would you, my dear mother, had you power to save to the uttermost, permit a single object of your heart's best affection to welter in pain, and groan and groan and never die?

It was too much. The picture represented eternal separation from those whose temporary absence was more than she could well bear; and she raised her streaming eyes to Heaven, and cried, "O, my God, can it be? O never, no, never!"—and she arose from her seat, and embraced and kissed each child; and when she came to me, she again exclaimed, as if all the powers of feeling were concentrated in the words, "it cannot be!" and sunk senseless into my arms.

It was some time before she recovered, and when she did, it was only to say some few faint words, and then relapsed into the same state. We feared the result. Her feelings had been wrought up to such a height, that we feared her slender constitution was insufficient to bear so sudden a transition from the excited state of mind which my animated manner and the nature of the subjects had produced, to the paralyzed situation in which she now lay. But we were all joyfully surprised, when, in about an hour she was quite revived, and able to converse comfortably and cheerfully.

Another hour, and my mother was fully recovered. There was something, however, in her more than usually agitated manner and expressive look, which told too well that the feelings of her soul were finding a new channel through which they could pour their full tide of affection into the broad ocean of changeless and impartial love. I saw this; but feared again to broach a subject which had so nearly deprived me of my only surviving parent—my mother—she who had supported my infant steps, wreathed the garland of joy that crowned the brow of my youth, and who still felt an affection, undying as the principle of her nature, and as pure as mortal can feel!

The remaining time of my stay, which had now nearly expired, was occupied on subjects which naturally suggest themselves at such times. One half hour, and I must part with all who were dear on earth! The time came, and the coach awaited me at the door. Oh, what a moment! The last I heard until I was past the neighborhood, was the half articulated "God bless you!" of my mother, which sounded as the death knell to every expectation of a future earthly meeting.

It is six weeks since the above scenes transpired. I have just received a letter from my mother, informing me of her uncommonly good health, and that she now, yes, (thank God!) that she now rejoices in the glorious faith of a world's redemption—that she can now reflect, with a comparative calmness, upon our temporary separation, in prospect of a future blissful meeting in holier climes, where there shall be no more parting, neither sorrows nor affliction; but where joys perpetual, from the broad ocean of everlasting love, shall fill the souls of a ransomed universe with ecstacy and unending delight! And for this heavenly news, I blessed God, and said, AMEN.

TOUR IN CANADA.

Brs. GROSS and HUTCHINSON—Dear Brethren, After leaving the State Convention at Auburn, I took the steamboat Oswego, at Oswego village, and crossing the beautiful lake Ontario, arrived at the city of Toronto, U. C., on the evening of Sunday, 29th of May last. This was the day on which I had appointed to preach at that place, but as the day was excessively rainy, no congregation assembled, and consequently no serious disappointment was felt in consequence of my not arriving at the time appointed. After a very brief interview with Messrs. March and Church, chair-makers, who, by the way, are not ashamed to own the blessed Jesus as the "Saviour of the world," I left Toronto, on Monday evening, in the stage, and after travelling more than eight hours over as bad a road as you can well imagine, I found myself twenty-six miles east of Toronto, at Mr. Post's tavern, in the town of Pickering. Here I left, and travelled on foot fifteen miles northward, through a newly settled country of rich and fertile land, to the residence of my aged father. My visit with him was truly interesting. I found him enjoying the fullness of the blessings of the Gospel of salvation.

For more than fifty years he has been a believer in the popular doctrines of the day—the fall of man—original sin—total depravity—election and reprobation—vicarious atonement, and the awful doctrine of endless misery. But blessed be the name of the Lord, he has been born again—born from above! The following is now his language, which I extract from a letter to his daughter, dated June 8, 1836.

"Did you, in your childhood, look up to your parents with confidence for such things as you needed? You may now with propriety look up to your heavenly Father, who has promised, and is able to do every thing for you which you need now, and in any future period. He will always be the same. He will never decay by old age, and he never did, nor ever will lay any restraint or any requirement on you, that is not calculated and designed for your good." "Can you now look up to me with any degree of gratitude and say, My father has been kind to me? If you should now ask me why I did so, my reply would be, it was because I loved you. Do you think the result of my love has ever been any benefit to you? Do you not think that your heavenly Father has done as much for you as I ever did, and loved you as well? If you think he has, and more, then may you look up to him with more confidence and gratitude. Do you believe I ever wished, or strive to promote your harm, knowingly? And do you believe that your heavenly Father ever did, or ever will do any thing that will not be for your welfare? Believe God's testimony—'This is my beloved Son hear ye him.' Did God indeed give his Son, and deliver him up for us all, and will he not with him also freely give us all things? Do we need purifying and cleansing? He is like a refiner's fire, and as fuller's soap. Do we need a new heart? 'A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you.' Do we need repentance? He is exalted 'a Prince, and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins.' Our Saviour said, 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth,' therefore we may with confidence put our trust in him."

This is reasoning warm from a father's heart. And was it dictated by a spirit from heaven? or from—some other place? Whether from the former or not, it is what we should call a spirit of goodness and benevolence. And we fully believe that the desires of every good and benevolent being, in relation to the eternal salvation of Adam's race, will be satisfied. No earthly father would consign his helpless and dependant offspring to ceaseless misery—much less would our Father in heaven, whose name and whose nature is LOVE, doom his intelligent creatures to an endless hell.

During my stay in his majesty's Province, I had the pleasure of delivering four discourses on the great salvation, and the honor of being bitterly opposed by a few ranting fanatics, who, true to the spirit of Partialism, "foamed out their own shame," by speaking evil of that which they "understood not." It has been often remarked that "whom the Lord wills to destroy, he first makes mad"—and we venture to predict that these Methodist opposers will destroy themselves with their own weapons; they will find by sad experience that it is hard for them to "kick against the pricks"—but I forbear. With very few exceptions my humble message was listened to with devout attention and manifest satisfaction—and I trust the seed was sown on good ground, and that it will bring forth an abundant harvest.

For the information of my friends in Canada I would observe, in conclusion, that I had a pleasant and agreeable passage across the lake to Sackets Harbor—attended the Black River Association at Watertown (a most happy meeting)—found our friends and relatives enjoying usual health, and am now sharing the hospitalities of my friends in Mexico, for which and all other blessings I would most devoutly thank the great Giver of all good.

Yours in the Gospel, CHARLES B. BROWN.

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

At a numerous meeting of the Universalist society of the town of Madrid, held at Columbia village, in the county of St. Lawrence, N. Y., on the 24th day of June, 1836, Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of the society be presented to the Baptist society in said town, for the Christian-like feeling manifested in gratuitously lending to our society the use of materials, such as boards, timber, etc., thereby enabling us to erect a temporary house for worship at our Association held on the 22d and 23d days of June inst.

Resolved, That the First Congregational society of the town, in the refusal of the use of their meeting-house, have only given us a renewed expression of their want of charity and Christian feeling. That their conduct on this occasion convinces us more and more that they are not only destitute of that benevolence taught by our divine Master, and that empty profession is but the garb of hypocrisy vainly attempting to cover a multitude of sins.

In behalf of the society, M. D. HEPBURN.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS. INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ 18. SPECIMENS OF A NEW TRANSLATION, FROM THE ORIGINAL GREEK, OF THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT; WITH A COMMENTARY AND NOTES. THE EPISTLES: INTRODUCTORY OBSERVATIONS.—In submitting a few specimens of a work which I have often indulged in projecting, and in making some contributions towards, it is not to be understood that either the introductions or prefaces, or the commentary and notes are so full and complete as if prepared for separate publication. The specimens submitted are only detached passages from a hastily sketched outline of some portions of this great undertaking—a translation of, and commentary on, the New Testament. Before taking up the Epistle to the Romans, I would beg some attention to a few preliminary remarks on the epistolary portion of the New Testament in general, and on the Epistles of Paul in particular.

Importance of the Epistles.—The apostolical Epistles are of very great importance, as they may and have been used to confirm all the material facts of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles; especially the rapid propagation of the Christian faith, and the existence of miraculous gifts. (See particularly 1 Corin. xii and xiv.) Dr. Paley has made an ingenious and admirable application of the Epistles of Paul to this purpose, in his Horæ Paulinæ. "If it be true," says he, "that we are in possession of the very letters which St. Paul wrote, let us consider what confirmation they afford to the Christian history. In my opinion they substantiate the whole transaction." This work of Dr. Paley is deservedly popular, and to every one who reads it will give, I think, additional interest to the study of the Epistles, the early history, and the evidences of Christianity. Dr. Channing has said of it, that it "is one of the few books destined to live."

The Epistles may be considered as commentaries on the doctrines of the Christian revelation, or of the grand truths which Christ was commissioned to promulgate. They are adaptations of these grand truths to particular occasions, particular societies and particular persons. They were intended to explain and apply these Heaven-sent teachings more fully, to confute some growing, spreading errors, to compose differences and schisms, etc., etc.

Number and order.—The Epistles are twenty-one in number; fourteen by St. Paul, and seven catholic Epistles. Those of Paul are not arranged in the order of time in when they were composed, but according to the supposed precedence of the societies or persons to whom they were addressed. Thus: that to the Romans stands first, Rome being the chief city of the Roman empire; next, those to the Corinthians, because Corinth was a large, polite and renowned city. The Chronological order is as follows:

	written from	A. D.
1 Thessalonians,	Corinth,	52
2 Thessalonians,	do	52
Galatians	do at the close of 52, or early in	53
1 Corinthians,	Ephesus,	57
Romans,	Corinth, at the close of 57, or beginning of	58
2 Corinthians,	Macedonia, (perhaps Philippi),	58
Ephesians,	Rome,	61
Philippians,	do. end of 62, or beginning of	63
Colossians,	do.	62 or 63
Philemon,	do.	62 or 63
Hebrews,	Italy, (perhaps Rome),	62 or 63
1 Timothy,	Macedonia,	64
Titus,	do.	64
2 Timothy,	Rome,	65

The catholic Epistles (so called, from not being addressed to any individual society or person,) are seven in number:

	written from	A. D.
James,	Judea,	61
1 Peter,	Rome,	64
2 Peter,	do.	65
1 John,	Unknown, (perhaps Ephesus),	68, or early in
2 and 3 John,	Ephesus,	68 or 69
Jude,	Unknown,	64 or 65

From Horne's Introduction, etc., 6th Edit. Lond. 1828.

Plan.—The general plan of the Epistles is, 1st, to discuss and decide the controversy, or to refute the erroneous notions which had arisen in the church, or among the persons to whom they were addressed, and which was the occasion of their being written; 2dly, to recommend the observance of practical duties, particularly such as the disputes or errors that occasioned the letter might tempt them to forget.

Obscurity and intelligibility.—In the Epistles are "things hard to be understood." The causes of obscurity are chiefly our ignorance of the occasion and design of the letter, and of the circumstances known to those written to, but unknown to us;—also, in Paul's Epistles, his peculiar style and temper. "Possessing an ardent, acute and fertile mind, he seems to have written with great rapidity, and without closely attending to method." Hence occur the frequent parentheses in his letters, etc. etc. The most useful mode of studying the Epistles is, unquestionably, that proposed and recommended by Mr. Locke. (Vide Locke on the Epistles.)

To the cultivated mind, whatever may be its religious sentiments, and of whatever nation, these letters will never cease to be a source of gratification. Letters although they are, the logician may find in them specimens of reasoning, which the masters of his art have not outdone. The impress of time is throughout the Epistles of Paul; thought is their characteristic. As a proof of the great merit of Paul as an author, we might almost be content to forego the general mass of the Apostle's writings, and to fix upon the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, as a piece of composition in which the logician, the scholar, the orator, the poet, the philosopher, the philanthropist, and the Christian—or he who unites all these characters in himself—may find, concentrated in brief space, excellences that merit the highest praise. Notwithstanding, the letters of Paul are not the book for the people; independently of their integrity, and their dealing with forms of society and modes of thought which have long since vanished; they are letters, and therefore more brief, and more obscure than direct narratives or systematic reasonings, or public history; and they were specially designed to exhibit Christianity in a form which should meet and dissipate the peculiar prejudices of Jews and Heathens. The arguments adduced for this purpose are, of course, very difficult to be understood by us, with thoughts and prejudices altogether different. A sermon or address to Jews and Heathens of the first century may be easily conceived to be an insufficient and ineffectual teacher of professed Christians or secret unbelievers after the lapse of nigh 2000 years. Yet strange! the people—those who are least able to understand their sense, or appreciate their beauties, are the most fond of the Epistles of Paul. To such might be said—prefer Jesus to Paul—the clear to the obscure. But wherever you see light, follow it, whether it emanate from Jesus or from Paul. To understand the writings of a Jew, and to Jews, you must learn, as much as you can, to think and feel as a Jew.

As Paul adapted himself to the condition, intellectual and moral, of those whom he addressed, we may be sure that were he now on earth, he would adapt himself to the present generation. And what would be his language? The grand elements and body of truth he would preserve; its dress and recommendations he would change. What the Apostle cannot do, his translator and interpreter for this age may do, and should do, for him. It should be his endeavor and his business, to give the opinions, arguments and doctrines of the Apostle in such a manner as to be intelligible to plain but thinking men; to translate, in fact, not merely the Apostle's Greek into English, but rather his sentiments into language capable of being easily and generally understood in these days.

§ 19. SPECIMENS OF A NEW TRANSLATION, ETC. THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS: PREFACE TO.—This Epistle was dictated by Paul, in the Greek language, at Corinth, to Tertius, his amanuensis, (xvi: 22,) and sent to the Christian society or believers at Rome by Phæbe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, the eastern part of Corinth, (xvi: 1.)

The church at Rome was most probably planted by persons who had heard Peter preach, and were converted at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii: 10, 41.) These Roman Jews, on their return home, doubtless preached Christ to their countrymen in the city, and probably converted some of them; so that the church at Rome, like most of the churches in Gentile countries, was at first composed of Jews. But it was soon enlarged by converts from among the proselytes or religious converts to Judaism, and in process of time, from the idolatrous Gentiles, and that in such numbers, that, at the time when Paul wrote to them, their conversion was spoken of throughout the "whole world," i. e. the Roman empire.—(Luke ii: 1; Rom. i: 8.)

Occasion.—The great controversy which in the first age agitated the Christian community, consisting as it did of Jews and Gentiles, was, whether there was any salvation for men, except within the pale of the Jewish church. The unbelieving Jews and all the Judaizing Christians, ranged themselves on one side, affirming and teaching the Gentiles, "except ye be circumcised, after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." The agitation of this question, whether men could obtain the favor of God without a compliance with the requisitions of the law of Moses, led to such tumults in the city of Rome, that the Emperor Claudius, in the 11th year of his reign, banished the contending parties from the city. Among the banished from Rome was Aquila, a Jew, and his wife, Priscilla. These came to Corinth about the time Paul first visited that city, and being of the same occupation with him, they received him into their house, employed him in their business, and gave him wages for his work, with which he maintained himself all the time he preached the Gospel to the Corinthians. During his abode with them, Aquila and his wife, no doubt, gave the Apostle a full account of the state of the church at Rome before its dispersion, and among other things told him that the unbelieving Romans, following the Greeks, affirmed the light of natural reason to be a sufficient guide to mankind in matters of religion—the Greek philosophy to be the perfection of human reason, and the Gospel mere folly; that the unbelieving Jews affirmed Judaism to be the only religion in which men could be saved—its sacrifices, purifications and other rites the only pardon for sins, in which belief many of the converted Jews joined them, thinking the Gospel only a supplement to the Mosaic institutions, not a superceding of them; that the Gentiles despised their Judaizing brethren as superstitious bigots; who, on their part, regarded the Gentiles as profane, for neglecting institutions which they esteemed sacred; that those possessed of spiritual gifts, each extolled his own; and that some of the converts reckoning it disgraceful to obey institutions made by idolaters, contemned the wholesome laws of the State, and were in danger of being punished as evil doers, to the great injury of the Christian name. His Epistle is evidently framed with a view to these circumstances. Made acquainted with these circumstances by Aquila and Priscilla, (xvi: 3,) and by other Jews expelled by Claudius, (Acts xviii: 2,) Paul became very desirous of seeing them (i: 8-13, v: 14, xvi: 1); but being prevented on his journey to Spain, he availed himself of the departure of Phæbe to Rome to send them an Epistle, (xvi: 1, 2.)

In perusing this Epistle, it will be desirable to read the first eleven chapters at once and uninterruptedly, as every sentence bears an intimate relation to, and is dependent upon the whole discourse, and cannot be understood unless we comprehend the scope of the whole. Further, in order to enter fully into its spirit, we must enter into the spirit of a Jew of those times, and endeavor to realize in our own minds his utter aversion to the Gentiles, his valuing and exalting himself upon his relation to God and to Abraham, and also upon his law, pompous worship, circumcision, etc., as if the Jews were the only people in the world who had any claim to the favor of God. Attention to these will reveal many beauties in the style and argument of the Apostle. Alas! how little was the spirit of Christ or Christianity understood or manifested by either Jewish or Gentile convert, at this early age, is a reflection frequently thrust upon us in perusing this as well as other Epistles!

Scope and Analysis.—The principal object of the argumentative part of the Epistle is, according to Dr. Paley, "to place the Gentile convert upon a parity of situation with the Jewish, in respect of his religious condition and his rank in the Divine favor." The Epistle supports this point by a variety of arguments; such as, 1st, That no man of either description was justified by the works of the law—for this plain reason, that no man had performed them. 2d. That a new medium of justification had therefore become necessary. 3d. That Abraham's own justification was antecedent to the law, and independent of it. 4th. That the Jewish converts were to consider the law as now dead, and themselves as married to another. 5th. That what the law in truth could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God had done by sending his Son. 6th. That God had rejected the unbelieving Jews, and had substituted in their place a society of believers in Christ, collected indifferently from Jews and Gentiles.

As the views of Mr. Belsham approach most nearly to those of the present writer, as to the design and plan of this letter, an outline of his observations may here with propriety be introduced. The deviations from, and alterations of, Mr. Belsham's scheme by the present commentator, will be developed in the course of the work. According then to Mr. Belsham, the principal design of this excellent Epistle is, to exhibit and magnify the great mercy of God in the dispensation of the Gospel to the Jew and Gentile; to illustrate the excellence of that dispensation; to justify the measures of the divine government; and to induce the believers at Rome to adorn their Christian profession by the practice of universal virtue.

The Apostle, after a suitable introduction expressive of his apostolical authority, his good will, and his earnest desire to visit them in person, (i: 1-17,) enters upon the argumentative portion of his epistle, which, without any formal distribution he arranges under four heads: 1, The unmerited goodness of God, in communicating the Gospel dispensation to Jew and Gentile, (i: 18-v: 1); 2, the efficacy of the motives of the Gospel for the sanctification of believers, (vi-viii, 17); 3, also for their consolation and encouragement, (viii: 18 to the end); and finally, the Apostle states and justifies the conduct of the Divine providence in the rejection of the Jewish nation from a covenant state, and in the invitation of the Gentiles, (ix-xi.)

In pursuing this train of argument under the first head, the Apostle shows that neither Jews nor Gentiles possess any claims to the blessings of the Gospel on the ground of merit. And here he considers, 1, the case of the Heathen, (i: 18, to the end); 2, the case of the Jews, (ii: 1-iii: 20); 3, the case of both united, (iii: 21, to the end.) The Apostle then states, at large, that Abraham was justified by faith, without merit, and that his justification was a pattern for all who believe in Christ, and who are admitted into the Christian covenant, without any claim of right on their part, (chapter iv.) The Apostle further illustrates the privilege and happiness of those who are admitted thus freely, and from pure undeserved mercy into the Gospel covenant, (v: 1-14); and finally, he argues his proposition, from the curse entailed upon the posterity of Adam, by the lapse of their first parent, and states the vast extent of the blessings of the Gospel beyond the miseries of the fall, (v: 12, to the end.)

The Apostle having thus established the mercy of God in the free gift of the Gospel to those who had no antecedent claim to its blessings, proceeds,

Secondly, to prove that the motives of the Gospel are effectual to promote the renunciation of sin, and the love and practice of universal virtue; 1. With regard to Gentile believers, who by the profession of the Gospel, are raised to a new life, (vi: 1-11,) and entered into a new service, (vi: 12 to end); and 2, with regard to the Jewish believer: he is first released from a dead and united with a living principle, (vii: 1-4); and secondly, as the Jews by its severity, goaded those who were under its yoke to desperation and to vice, so the Gospel by its promise of forgiveness, encourages hope and animates to virtue. This the Apostle illustrates by a beautiful allegory, in which he represents the awakened Jew, not yet released from the law, as suffering under the domineering tyranny of guilty passions, which were subdued and slain by the grace and mercy of the Gospel, which sets him free from the tyranny of the law, and inspires him with life and energy to obey the commandments of God. (vii: 5-viii: 17.)

Thirdly, the Apostle shows that the principles and discoveries of the Gospel are amply sufficient for the consolation and encouragement of believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, under all their trials and persecutions, (viii: 18 to the end.)

Fourthly, he treats of the present rejection and ultimate restoration of the Jews, and of the invitation of the Gentiles into the privileges of the covenant. And first, he introduces the subject with great reluctance, (ix: 1-5;) obviates objections, (ver. 6-24;) shows that these important events were foretold by the prophets, (ver. 28, to end;) laments their destiny, etc., etc., etc.

The second division of the Epistle to the Romans contains practical exhortations: First, the Apostle exhorts believers, in consideration of their free admission to the privileges of the Gospel, to adorn their profession by the practice of Christianity, and by a faithful performance of the duties of their respective stations in the church.—(Chap. xix throughout.) Secondly, Upon Christian principles, he urges to the practice of all civil and social duties, (chap. xiii.) Thirdly, He recommends mutual candor to those who differ upon things indifferent; and particularly to those who held different opinions concerning the holiness of days, the distinctions of food, (xiv-xv: 13.)—Fourthly, He apologizes for his freedom; relates his success; and expresses his intention of visiting Rome, on his way to Spain, after having finished his mission to Jerusalem; requests their prayers, and adds his blessing, (xv: 14 to the end.) Fifthly, The epistle concludes with many salutations, the usual benediction, and a doxology, (chap. xvi throughout.)

Having thus propounded those preliminary observations which I deemed most essential, and most conducive to the "better understanding" of an epistle which will abundantly reward and remunerate the attentive and intelligent student thereof, I will on an early occasion, proceed to my proposed new translation, which with the paraphrase or commentary and notes attached to it, is intended to exhibit the real meaning of Paul, and to promote a more liberal and enlightened view of the subjects of which he treats, so that his words may not be applied, as they have been too oft, alas! to the confirmation of sentiments but little subservient to, if not rather subversive of, piety, heartfelt devotion, and Christ-like morality. And, I would to God that my time were otherwise employed, if my proposed illustrations prove not auxiliary to the cause of pure and exalted morality—of that knowledge of God which is "life eternal," of filial reverence towards God, and fraternal good will towards man, and, in brief, of the reign of heaven, and of holiness in the human soul.

BRIEF DIALOGUE.

Limitarian.—If I were a Universalist, I would murder every person that should come in my way.

Universalist.—Is it possible that you are possessed of such a fiendish disposition, that nothing but the fear of the devil deters you from committing the blackest of crimes?

L.—You mistake my meaning. I have no ill will against my fellow-creatures, but on the contrary desire their happiness. Therefore, if I believed all were going to heaven, I should consider it an act of kindness in me to send them out of this troublesome world as speedily as possible.

U.—Indeed! you must have an exalted opinion of your heavenly Father, if you suppose he is not as desirous of making mankind happy as you are yourself.

L.—O, I have no doubt but that God desires the happiness of all men; for if he did not he would never have provided a way whereby all might be saved, if they would.

U.—What! do you believe God was so foolish as to make a provision which he knew would never be accepted?

L.—It is useless for you to attempt to argue with me; for all the reason in the world would not convince me that such a licentious doctrine as Universalism is true.

U.—Very well. Then we will change the subject. Do you still retain your aged minister?

L.—Certainly we do. We would not part with him on any account. True, he is now quite too old to be very useful, but he is such a good man, we must keep him for the good he has done.

U.—Do you really believe him to be a child of God?

L.—I have not the least doubt of it. Were he to die this very night, I believe it would be a happy change for him; for he would exchange all the trials of life for that rest which is reserved for the children of God—where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.

U.—If you are so confident it would be a happy change for him, why do you not put an end to his existence immediately?

L.—Why, what do you mean? Do you suppose I would be guilty of such a horrid crime?

U.—No. Neither do I believe you would were you a Universalist. Yet you have just as good a reason for doing it, that you would have if you believed all were to be saved—for you say you would then kill your fellows as an act of kindness. Now, as you believe your minister is a fit subject for heaven, you cannot, on the same principle, refuse to perform this friendly act for the good old man.

L.—I shall be under the necessity of recalling that expression. I did not realize what it would lead to.

U.—So I supposed, or I would not have taken the trouble to show you. You, like thousands of others, being ignorant of Universalism, have entirely mistaken its principles. But let me tell you that, should you ever become a genuine Universalist, so far from wishing to interfere with, or frustrate any of the plans of Jehovah, you will have the utmost confidence in his wisdom and parental kindness. You will then learn that he has not only wisdom to contrive the best means for governing his feeble offspring, man, but has also power to carry into effect all his benevolent designs. Instead of looking upon this life as a wearisome burden, not worth preserving, you will thank God that he has placed you where you can witness such a grand display of his wisdom as the volume of nature presents to our view. These sweet reflections will be rendered still more grand and glorious by that bright hope in a blessed immortality for a ransomed world which that doctrine inspires. Then with tears of gratitude will you say in the sincerity of your heart, Father, I will no longer distrust thy goodness, nor be unconciled to thy government; but with humbleness of heart will strive to imitate thee, by doing good to my fellow-men. But I forget myself. Perhaps you may be deprived of this blessed faith, by remaining, through life, an unbeliever. O. H.

OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE BLACK RIVER ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS FOR 1836.

Met according to previous adjournment, at Watertown, on Wednesday morning, June 15, 1836, and after prayer by Br. Britton, chose Br. P. Morse, Moderator, and Br. C. B. Brown, Clerk.

2. Voted, That ministering brethren from without the bounds of this Association be invited to take part in the deliberations of the Council.

3. Voted, That Brs. Morse, C. Calhoun and C. Cummings be a committee to arrange the public services.

4. Voted, That Brs. Person, Jones and Brown be a committee on fellowship and ordination.

5. The committee of discipline for the past year reported—no cause of complaint. Report accepted.

6. Voted, That Brs. Morse, J. French, and A. Skinner be a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

7. Voted, That Brs. Morse and Jones (ministers,) and Brs. N. M. Woodruff and T. Murray, (laymen,) of Watertown, be delegates to represent this Association in the State Convention, in Albany, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in May, 1837, with power to appoint substitutes.

8. Adopted the following preamble and resolutions by a unanimous vote.

Whereas, the subject of establishing a school in which young men who would qualify themselves for the ministry of universal reconciliation, may obtain the necessary scientific and theological instruction, has recently engaged the serious attention of many of our brethren—and whereas this subject has been repeatedly recommended to the consideration of Universalists by some of our ecclesiastical bodies—and whereas the time seems to have arrived when it is expedient for us to express our opinion on this subject, both in our individual and social capacity—therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Council, further means should be devised to diffuse more generally among clergy and laity, scientific, theological and biblical knowledge, and we earnestly recommend the subject to the serious and candid consideration of all Universalists.

Resolved, That among the various means best calculated to effect this desirable object, we believe the establishment of a library by every society in the denomination, and of one or more large and well selected libraries in the State, accessible to every member of the denomination under suitable regulations, would be well calculated to promote the object above specified.

9. Appointed the Clerk to prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate.

10. Adjourned to meet again on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1837, at such place as Br. Morse, the standing Clerk, shall designate.

C. B. Brown, Clerk.

P. MORSE, Moderator.

NOTICE.—Br. Morse requests those societies that want the next session of this Association held within their limits, to make their wants known to him immediately, that he may make an early and suitable selection.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

Pitt Morse, J. Whelpley, Cornelius G. Person, Seth Jones, A. B. Grosh, J. French, M. B. Smith, J. Britton, M. B. Newell, J. A. Aspinwall, C. B. Brown, W. Sias.

DELEGATES PRESENT.

C. Calhoun, C. Cummings, Watertown; J. Weaver, J. J. Van Antwerp, Wilna; N. French, J. Mendall, Ellisburg; John C. Foster, Oliver Stowell, Antwerp; Phineas Davis, Mexico; Wm. Twining, David Heacock, Champion and Rutland; Alanson Skinner, G. B. Britton, Brownville.

ORDER OF PUBLIC SERVICES.

Tuesday evening.—Prayer, Br. C. B. Brown. Sermon, Br. Newell, Exodus, xiv: 13. Prayer, Br. Persons.

Wednesday morning.—Prayer, Br. Grosh. First sermon, Br. Sias, Luke xvi: 26. Second sermon, Br. French, Matt. v: 48.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. Aspinwall. First sermon, Br. M. B. Smith, Rom. xi: 36. Second sermon, Br. Jones, Ephesians, iii: 11.

Evening.—Prayer, Br. Britton. Sermon, Br. Persons, Col. i: 15.

Thursday morning.—Prayer, Br. Newell. First sermon, Br. Aspinwall, Ps. c: 3. Second sermon, Br. C. B. Brown, Rom. xii: 20, 21.

Afternoon.—Prayer. First sermon, Br. Whelpley, 1 Peter, iii: 15. Second sermon and address, Br. Grosh, Isa. xlviii: 18. Prayer, Br. Persons.

Thursday evening.—Prayer, Br. C. B. Brown. Sermon, Br. M. B. Newell, Gal. i: 9. Concluding prayer and benediction, Br. Newell.

The meeting house (not a small one) was filled—on the second day it was crowded, and many stood in the aisles and hall. The taste of the choir in its selections, and its skill in their execution, deserves especial commendation. The services were most attentively listened to during the whole ten, (and we may venture to say the whole eleven) sermons. The measure recommended, of establishing libraries for the benefit of the clergy and laity, is certainly worthy of being carried into immediate execution. May every society, every Association, and every Convention soon have, each a library, both large and good, and open to all.

Assembled pursuant to adjournment, at East Richfield, Wednesday morning, June 22d, 1836.

1. Organized by choosing Br. MOSES WHEELER, Moderator, and Br. M. B. Smith, Clerk.

2. United in prayer with Br. Woolley.

3. Heard and accepted the report of the committee of discipline, that no cause of complaint had been presented.

4. Voted, That Brs. T. J. Smith, J. Boden and G. Thomas be a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

5. Voted, That Brs. L. C. Browne, Wm. Park and T. J. Smith be the committee on fellowship and ordination.

6. Adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock.

7. Thursday morning, June 23.—Met and opened the Council by uniting in prayer with Br. L. C. Browne.

8. Appointed Br. L. C. Browne, and T. J. Smith, ministers, and Moses Wheeler and William Park, laymen, to represent this body in the New-York State Convention at its next annual session, with power to appoint substitutes.

9. Voted, That Br. M. B. Smith be the Standing Clerk of this Association.

10. Voted, That when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet at Burlington Flats on the fourth Wednesday in June, 1837.

11. Appointed Br. T. J. Smith to deliver the occasional sermon at the next annual session of this body, with power to appoint a substitute.

12. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting letters of Fellowship to Brs. Moses B. Smith, John D. Hicks, James Boden and William M. Delong, which report was accepted.

13. Whereas, this Council deem it expedient that a Conference be held within the limits of this Association previous to its next annual session. Therefore,

Voted, That Brs. Davis Brown, Moses Wheeler, and H. N. Coleman be a committee to attend to requests, and designate time and place for holding a Conference, and give notice in the Magazine and Advocate.

14. Voted, That the Clerk prepare the minutes of these proceedings, and that they be published in the Magazine and Advocate.

MOSES WHEELER, Moderator.

M. B. Smith, Clerk.

Afternoon.—Introductory prayer, Br. Boden.—Sermon, Br. L. C. Browne, Rom. i: 16. Address by Br. Woolley, who also administered the Eucharist. Concluding prayer by Br. L. C. Browne.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

E. M. Woolley, Hamilton; L. C. Browne, Fort Plain; W. H. Waggoner, Eatonville; T. J. Smith, Bridgewater; W. M. Delong, New-Berlin; J. D. Hicks, Springfield; J. Boden, Cooperstown; M. B. Smith, West Burlington.

DELEGATES PRESENT.

H. Cook, G. D. Countryman, Fort Plain; L. Plumb, T. Taylor, First Society, Otsego; O. Beardsley, H. Palmer, East Richfield; W. Park, G. Thomas, Burlington; R. Corbett, L. Smith, Cedarville; C. Clark, J. Kellogg, Cooperstown; T. W. Brewer, N. Fields, Hartwick; L. S. Mason, Middlefield; D. D. Piper, Paine's Hollow.

Notwithstanding the weather was less pleasant than might have been wished, a goodly number united in the soul-cheering devotions on this interesting occasion, and many hearts were made glad, many countenances beamed with joy, and the whole scene was one of deep and thrilling interest to the beholder. The singing was excellent, the society with whom we met kind and liberal in providing all things requisite; and it would be wicked to doubt but that much good was done in the name of our divine Master: and we pray God that the good seed there sowed may spring up and bring forth its hundred fold. M. B. SMITH.

DEDICATION.

The new Union meeting-house of Stafford, owned half by the Universalists and the other half by the Christian denomination, was dedicated to the worship of God on the 2d inst. The services from the gallery were animating and delightful, and sent a thrill of pleasure through the soul. Those from the desk came with the "fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ;" and we trust were performed in the "unity of the spirit and the bonds of peace." The house was full, and the congregation devout and attentive while there, and they went away "joyful and glad of heart." The following is a brief account of the services, and their order.

1. Voluntary by the choir, "Holy, holy, Lord God of Sabbath." 2. Introductory prayer by Br. T. Fisk (Christian.) 3. Singing. 4. Reading select Scriptures by Br. T. P. Abell. 5. Singing. 6. Dedicatory prayer by Br. Babcock. 7. Dedicatory anthem. 8. Sermon, Br. A. Peck. 9. Singing. 10. Benediction by Br. Peck.

The services of the afternoon were by our Christian brethren, as follows: 1. Singing select hymn. 2. Prayer by Br. Crocker. 3. Singing an anthem. 4. Sermon by Br. Fisk. 5. Prayer by Br. Parker. 6. Singing, "Praise God in his holiness." 7. Benediction by Br. A. Peck.

We had also a very fine time in our Conference in the evening and next day: preaching by Brs. Abell and Babcock. Our Conference happening at the same time of the session of the Niagara Association, we were deprived of much assistance from our ministering brethren. But we trust it will long be remembered as a time of joy. A.

THE TABLES TURNED.

From the Christian Intelligencer of New-York, (the fearless Dutch Reformed paper, edited by an association of gentlemen who refused to redeem their promise to publish Br. Thomas' "213 questions without answers,") I cut the following article, selected from the Christian Mirror. It gives a quotation from the life of Garrick, the celebrated tragedian, in which he relates an anecdote respecting an infidel with whom Garrick boarded. The non credenda of the atheist and his companions was so often advanced and argued at the table, that the servants soon became as able disputants as their masters. At last one of the servants made off with some valuable articles, was pursued, and caught. He was privately examined by Mallet, (the atheist,) as to his reasons for such base conduct. Here is the extract.

"At first the man was sullen, and would answer no questions put to him; but being urged to give a reason for his infamous behavior, he resolutely said, 'Sir, I had heard you so often talk of the impossibility of a future state, and that after death there was no reward for virtue or punishment for vice, that I was tempted to commit the robbery.' 'Well, but you rascal,' replied Mallet, 'had you no fear of the gallows?' 'Sir,' said the fellow, looking sternly at his master, 'what is that to you, if I had a mind to venture that? You had removed my greatest terror; why should I fear the less?'

"Universalism promises all men, not only exemption from future punishment, but absolute and eternal happiness. How would its advocates obviate the reasonings of this delinquent servant, if based, as it might be with equal or greater strength, upon their hypothesis? The question is put, not in the way of reproach, but seriously."

As the question is put seriously, we will answer it seriously by asking another, after stating a similar case. Suppose some one of these many gentlemen Editors had a servant, who often heard his master, his minister, and others, declare that there was not an adequate punishment for sin on this side of the eternal state, for that many sinners really enjoyed far more peace of mind and happiness than do the saints of God—and that the only adequate punishment for sin, the sufferings of an endless hell, could be avoided at any period, by repentance and conversion to the creed of the Presbyterian church. This servant would at last become almost as expert as his master in opposing Universalism by contradicting the Bible, and in adducing instances wherein sinners were happier in their sins than saints were in their holiness. Desiring to be happy—perhaps to be rich—he at last steals the Editor's watch and money. When apprehended and questioned concerning his motives, suppose he were to reply, as he truly and conscientiously could:—"Sir, I had so often heard you tell of the happiness enjoyed by being sinful, and of the miseries incurred by being virtuous, that I resolved to be virtuous no longer. I wanted to be happy—believed that I could escape all detection and punishment in this life—and therefore I turned sinner, and stole your goods." "Well, but you rascal," says the Dutch Reformed Editor, "had you no fear of hell and the devil before your eyes?" To which the fellow might reply, "Sir, you informed me that I could escape the flames of the one and the fangs of the other, whenever I chose to repent and join the church; and I intended to do both as soon as I got to a place of safety from the officers of the law. You had assured me that if I escaped them, there was not only no punishment besides, but much happiness; and having thus removed from my mind all fear of present punishment, and filled it with the hope of much present enjoyment—and having told me that the only punishment to be really dreaded, was easy to be avoided, what was to hinder me from being a thief, or even a murderer?"

Now, how would a Calvinist obviate the reasonings of this man—cased as they might be with greater strength, upon his hypothesis? For he adds to the Arminian no certainty scheme, the assurance that, if the sinner is one of the elect, God will not, by any means, suffer him to be adequately punished—and if he is one of the reprobate, the more he sins, the more happiness he will have, for he will not be saved, let him be as honest or virtuous as he may. What say the Calvinistic Editors of the Mirror and Intelligencer? "The question is put not in the way of reproach, but seriously." We really want their answer.

A. B. G.

The above was written while on my journey at the North. Having more leisure to think, I will answer more directly.

There is one sentiment in Partialism which is most pernicious and demoralizing in its influence—namely, that sin is not adequately punished, nor virtue adequately rewarded in this life; and that the just punishment of vice may easily be evaded. This sentiment is faintly and partially neutralized by another—namely, that if the just punishment of sin is not evaded, it will be inflicted in the eternal state. "Ye shall not surely die"—or ye shall not die in the day of transgression. Now let the latter, weakly restraining clause be obliterated by the no faith of atheism, and the former sentiment be retained, (as is sometimes the case,) and a combination of sentiment—or rather a unity of sentiment—is formed, the most pernicious and demoralizing that can possibly be devised or imagined. I beg our Partialist brethren seriously to consider this matter.

But the Universalist—the well informed Universalist receives as one of the very first—the most prominent items in his faith, the certainty of punishment—the impossibility of avoiding all or any of the sufferings which divine justice may award to him. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." So also, in regard to rewards. He is assured, from the nature of God and the nature of man, that virtue is his highest good—that he cannot be happy without it—that his very nature, as the child of God, is so constituted that he must be miserable if he is not virtuous. It is true, he may sometimes forget these truths; or cease to feel their influence; but when he acts on other principles, these truths are not the cause of his actions. He may act on the Partialist sentiments above reprobated; but if he does, he is so far not a Universalist, but a Partialist.

Now take these simple facts, and apply them to the case in hand, and our brother Editors of the Christian Mirror and Intelligencer, will have no difficulty in seeing the cause why Mallet's servant became dishonest. He was half Partialist and half atheist. And they will also see that his argument could have no weight when directed against Universalism as it is, not as they would represent it to be.

I hope and sincerely pray that both our Partialist and atheist brethren will heave overboard their disbelief of important salutary Scripture truth, and believe that, as God is all goodness, and man is his offspring, vice can no more make us happy than it can be pleasing to our heavenly Father.

TOUR.

Having a desire to communicate to many personal friends some account of a journey to the counties of Jefferson and St. Lawrence, and to many readers whom I believe it will interest, some news respecting the good cause there, I choose to do both at once in this way.—Those readers belonging to neither of the above classes—especially if opposed to descriptions of this kind—have my permission to go to sleep, or seek some better article, or engage in some other employment, until I finish my story. And, surely, that is generous!

After nearly two weeks, spent in close application to enable me to leave home for a few days, I started on the morning of June 14th, for Watertown, to attend the Black River Association. Arrived there after a pleasant but tedious ride, about midnight. The proceedings of the Association—are they not recorded in the Magazine and Advocate?

On Thursday evening, by the kindness of Mrs. Woodruff and Fay, I was conveyed to Sackets Harbor, and introduced to the warm hospitality of brethren Halls, with whom, in the family of Thomas S. Hall, I spent the time delightfully until the arrival of the steamer United States, at ten in the evening. Took passage on this beautiful boat for Ogdensburg—but found sleep impossible on account of the novelty of my situation and the noise of starting from the Harbor at midnight. Before four in the morning we arrived at Kingston, when, in despite of the rain, I occupied nearly an hour in a first walk in his Britannic Majesty's dominions. Of course I saw but little of what was to be seen, and understood less. My mind was unfavorably impressed with the strong contrasts presented in the alternate splendor and meanness of the buildings closely mingled together, in this city. But the most beautiful portion of it I did not see, for want of time, which also prevented a visit to the piles of masonry exhibited in the barracks and fortifications on the adjacent island. From hence to Ogdensburg was one continual, ever varying scene of most delightful beauty, loveliness and grace. The innumerable islands (rated at upwards of seventeen hundred in number) of every shape, size and appearance, from the small rock with a few tufted bushes growing out of its rifted surface, up to the well wooded, well cultivated island of many square miles in size, defy the powers of memory to retain or language to describe them all. They spread on every side, and at every turn of the boat present new appearances, giving and receiving beauty from the wide spread and noble stream, in whose clear waters they seem suspended, as in a second atmosphere. The shores, now many miles distant, anon approaching closely to each other, are generally low, sloping gently upwards, and well peopled with here and there a pleasant looking settlement or village. I think that, in variety of scenery of the beautiful order, this "river of a thousand islands" is probably unequalled by any in the world. The grand and sublime—the awful and majestic, is indeed absent from the scenery; but it is found in the thronging associations which crowd every thought respecting the waters of the St. Lawrence—the immense chain of inland seas and their tributary lakes and rivers, of which it is the outlet—the immense shores these waters have laved, and the diversities of population inhabiting them—these, and the great and interesting events which storied tradition and its younger sister, history, have located along the many waters of its floods—all these thoughts are well calculated to fill the soul with feelings which foaming waterfalls and frowning rocks can scarcely awaken.—Long may the twining silvery streams and heaving waves here rolled into one great and peaceful union, happily unite and harmonize the interests and affections of the two nations, and the many States, Territories and Provinces in which they rise, till even this beautiful river and its pleasing scenery, shall but faintly represent the prosperity and joy its waves witness in all their course! But enough, or the reader will truly guess that, notwithstanding the absence of a single ray of sunshine to light the scenery of the St. Lawrence, I was but little short of feeling the intoxicating whirl which prompts the antics of the schoolboy just let loose from school.

I arrived at Ogdensburg on Friday noon, and soon found myself at home in the family of Br. Robbins, whose son, T. B. Robbins, became my guide and almost constant companion while I remained in that region. Here I preached five discourses, on the third and fourth Sundays in June, going and returning. The school room in the old academy, was well filled with an attentive congregation. There were present, I was informed, one or more hearers from every denomination in the place, except from the Unitarians! These "liberal Christians" worship the One God in the Episcopal church, by reading trinitarian liturgies and singing tritheistic doxologies! Oh, consistency! Some few professed Universalists, probably out of compassion for the Unitarians, kept them in countenance by also abstaining from attendance on their own meetings; and I think I heard of some who are becoming Nicodemites.

On Monday morning, June 20th, in company with Br. T. B. Robbins, took the steamer for Louisville landing, thirty miles from Ogdensburg. We passed through several rapids—(the French names of which defy my knowledge of orthography)—found the river narrower, but still the same scenery, and replete with many agreeable associations. On landing, we hired a conveyance to Massena, nine miles distant, and on our way passed in sight of the long Sault, (pronounced Soo,) the celebrated nine mile rapids of the St. Lawrence. At 9, A. M., after crossing the Grass river, and passing through Massena village, we reached the celebrated mineral springs on the Racket river, called Harrowgate, because of their resemblance to, and equal efficacy with the celebrated Harrowgate waters in England. Let the dyspeptic, or the weakly, but try them—and, judging by the effect on myself, I think I can promise them an increase of appetite, to say the least.

The society in Massena is flourishing under the labors of Br. E. A. Garfield, with whom I formed a brief acquaintance, at the house of Capt. Polley, the proprietor of the springs. Here, also, I became acquainted with Br. Briggs, from Middlebury, Vt., who has concluded to remove soon to Canton—of which more anon.

On Wednesday morning, 22d, I was conveyed to Columbia village, nineteen miles distant, by the kindness of Br. Crowley of Massena village. The Presbyterians did not grant us the use of their meeting-house to hold the Association in, and twelve or thirteen of our friends had purchased each a piece of factory cotton cloth, and while the men were busy in putting up large poles and boarding up two sides of a tabernacle, the ladies plied the needle industriously, so that the canvass was soon ready to cover the top and enclose the two ends of the same. Imagine a tent seventy-six by thirty-six feet, seven or eight feet high in the lowest part, and fifteen or twenty in the centre, well and closely seated, with a large platform and long desk in the centre of one of the sides, and you have the meeting-house in which we met for worship, during two days and one evening. And though covering an area of more than two thousand seven hundred square feet, it did not hold all that assembled on the second day. How rejoiced were we when we looked at the Presbyterian meeting-house, (but a few yards in front of our tent,) that it had not been granted to us—for it would not have held one-half the congregation! Thank God! that, in consequence of the want of liberality in these, our brethren, our friends were enabled to accommodate at least from nine hundred to one thousand out of about twelve hundred persons who attended. The weather, too, which had been very rainy from Sunday night till Wednesday morning, became gradually pleasant, so that we were perfectly comfortable in our airy place of meeting. As the proceedings connected with this Association will soon be published, I add no more on the subject.

On Friday morning, 24th, Br. Conkey, of Canton, conveyed me to that village, (twelve miles,) where I preached in the afternoon. Br. Robbins had passed on, the evening previous, in company with Br. Newell, and left on this morning for his home, before I arrived. Br. Morse and lady arrived on Friday evening—the weather and sister Morse's health having prevented his presence at the St. Lawrence Association—and with Br. Wilcox, and the amiable family of Br. Jennison, we enjoyed a pleasant visit until Saturday afternoon. The society in Canton is provided with a very pretty and commodious brick meeting-house in the village, and for intellectual, moral and religious character, is surpassed by probably no religious society in that section of the State. They have for sometime been without a pastor, but it is believed that in Br. Briggs they will now find one after their own heart.

Saturday evening, June 25th, found me again in Ogdensburg, which I left in company with Br. Langworthy, (who was on his way to Gaines, Orleans county,) on Sunday, at 5 P. M., on the steamboat in which I first arrived there. Ogdensburg is rapidly improving, and is already a beautiful place, combining many great advantages. In a moral point of view there is room for hope—but that worst foe to an unpopular doctrine, having no aristocracy of sentiment or practice to recommend it, is abundant there—I mean a love of popularity, and its attendant hypocrisy. The latter is worse than bigotry, superstition and fanaticism united. But even right motives may be infused by bringing the influence of the Gospel to bear on the heart, and there are those in Ogdensburg, who, though few in numbers, can do this. Let them persevere and faint not—sooner or later they will triumph.

On Monday morning we reached Kingston, but having been be-fogged during the night, there was no time to finish my walk in that city. The day was beautiful—Saturday and Sunday having been cloudy and rainy—and the ride on the lake to Sackets Harbor, a very pleasant one.

Arrived at Sackets Harbor at noon—was again welcomed by the Brn. Halls and family—visited the curiosities of the place—preached in the evening to a good congregation for a week day, in the commodious school house, and after a night's rest, and a pleasant visit with these and other brethren, obtained private passage to Watertown with a friend who was travelling through it.

Arrived at Watertown at 6 P. M.—visited a few friends—preached to a large and very attentive congregation in the evening—and retired to rest to be awaked in a few hours with as heavy, crashing, and frequent bursts of thunder and vivid flashes of lightning, as I remember ever to have seen. That scarcely over—say at 2 A. M. of Wednesday, I took stage and arrived home on Thursday, about 1 A. M., well shaken with the joltings of the stage over a road which had been getting “no better very fast,” ever since I had left home.

Everything on my whole journey was very pleasant, except the weather, which was cloudy, cold and rainy the greater part of the time, and the roads. I travelled upwards of five hundred miles, was absent sixteen days, and preached nine sermons. Found my family well, and myself improved in health, flesh and appetite—for all which mercies and blessings may God be praised and we be thankful.

ERRATA.—Two errors occurred in Br. Montgomery's sermon—one by reason of the indistinctness of the word in the manuscript—which the reader will please correct as follows—page 202, column 1, line 7 from the top, for Christian read Indian—“And if the Indian should be taught by Christian customs,” etc. Same page, column 2, line 31, for when read unless—“unless she should be crazy.”

UNIVERSALIST PAPERS—CHANGES, ETC.

The following notice was prepared for and should have been inserted in last week's paper in connexion with the notice of the Watchman; but was crowded out in making up the last form.

The Star in the East and New-Hampshire Universalist, sometime since discontinued and said to have been united with, or merged in the Watchman, has been revived as a separate paper and is now determined to keep on its course alone and entirely unconnected with the Watchman, disavowing any inclination for a union. We are sorry for it on several accounts. Their separate publication we think will be worse for the cause, worse for the public that patronise them, and certainly much worse for the publishers. While separate and local feelings and prejudices are kept up, the cause cannot move forward with that energy and unanimity that it otherwise would. The papers cannot be made as interesting, nor furnished as cheap to patrons by two separate establishments being kept up, as if all the editorial talent and publishing appropriations were concentrated in one. And the patronage for two Universalist papers in the little State of New-Hampshire, we are confident, can afford their publishers but small encouragement. And we are mistaken if they do not make a losing instead of a gaining business of it in the end. We have no feelings but those of friendship and good will towards the Star and Universalist and its esteemed and talented Editor, Br. John G. Adams, but wish abundant prosperity to both. But the truth is, the “Watchman” and “Star” ought to be united in one paper, and jointly conducted by the three Editors who are now engaged in the two.

However, that is their business, respecting which we can only express an opinion, and with which we have no wish further to interfere. The Star and Universalist is and always has been one of the best and neatest papers in our order—deserving extensive patronage—and calculated to do much good. Any of our wishes for or respecting it, therefore, must arise out of the value we attach to its merits and the well directed labors of its Editor—whether we wish the Watchman to be merged in the Star, or the Star in the Watchman.

D. S.

The Pilot and Banner.—The Christian Pilot, edited by Br. Z. Thompson, and published at North Yarmouth, Maine, is to be united in a few weeks with the Gospel Banner, edited by Brs. Drew, Gardner and Bates, and published at Augusta, Maine. The union of the papers includes the union of Br. Thompson's labors with those of the former Editors of the Banner—thus lessening the number of papers, but making up in quality what is lacking in quantity.

We hail the union with joy, as one promising great and increased good to the cause—greater benefit to the Editors and readers—and all at a less expense and less loss to the proprietors. The Banner will begin its new volume, under this union, in about two weeks; will be published simultaneously at Portland and Augusta—edited by Brs. D. D. Smith, Portland; Z. Thompson, North Yarmouth; G. Bates, Turner; C. Gardner, Waterville; and W. A. Drew, Augusta. Terms—Two dollars in advance—two dollars and twenty-five cents if not paid in six months, and two dollars and fifty cents if not paid within the year.

NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The first number of the fourteenth volume of the New-York Mirror has been received, and read with much pleasure and interest. The beautiful ballad called Lillian, occupies five columns with its beautifully simple, easy, and humorous verse. Even those who tire in reading poetry, will regret that there is not more of it. The Decayed Veteran is an affecting, national-pride-humbling tale—for it is indeed “over true.” The original sketch from the French, Love and Death, is calculated to show the deep miseries attendant on unlegalized connexions, and its insertion justifiable on the precedent of the Spartans who exhibited their slaves drunken in order to disgust their children with intemperance. On the whole, the New-York Mirror is a deservedly popular periodical—and having the exclusive services of Mr. Fay and N. P. Willis, as Editors, and the contributions of a large number of the best writers now living in this country and Europe, it bids fair to keep pace with all the refinements and improvements of the literary world. The agent for this city is John H. Edmonds. Terms, five dollars per annum.

THE PRIZE ARTICLE

Published in our last is the one which by the award of the adjudicating committee was pronounced the second best of its class, and, to use their own language, “was so good that they could scarcely decide between it and the first.” From its very nature it is better adapted for distribution among our opposers, being more doctrinal. We have therefore concluded to publish it in pamphlet form, as soon as the work of the office will permit, and offer it for sale at a cheap rate, for this purpose. Those who wish a number of copies, will please signify it soon, that we may know how many to print. We shall make up a pamphlet of it, to consist of 24 or 36 pages, as may be most convenient, and shall afford it at about six dollars per hundred—or one dollar per dozen—perhaps less if many are ordered—but certainly as low as we can afford them.

My preparations for the journey North—my absence, and the business yet pressing on me in consequence, must be my apology for any seeming neglect of correspondents, or deficiencies observable in my department of the paper.

POETRY.

THE FRATERNITY OF MAN.

BY MISS MARTINEAU.

All men are equal in their birth,
Heirs of the earth and skies;
All men are equal when that earth
Fades from their dying eyes.

All wait alike on Him whose power
Upholds the life he gave;
The sage within his star-lit tower,
The savage in his cave.

God meets the throngs who pay their vows
In courts their hands have made,
And hears the worshipper who bows
Beneath the plantain shade.

'Tis man alone who difference sees,
And speaks of high and low;
And worships those and tramples these,
While the same path they go.

Oh! let man hasten to restore
To all their rights of love:
In power and wealth exult no more;
In wisdom lowly move.

Ye great! renounce your earth-born pride,
Ye low! your shame and fear:
Live, as ye worship, side by side;
Your common claims revere.

SIN PRODUCES MISERY.

That sin produces misery, no one, we presume, will attempt to deny, for it is clearly established both by reason and revelation. Sin must and will produce misery wherever it is found. "The wages of sin is death"—death to—what? to peace and happiness—to every spiritual comfort and enjoyment. That the wages of wickedness lead to woe, is a sentiment which the wise in all ages have supported, and it is a truth to which every one, from his own experience, can bear testimony. And notwithstanding still, there are thousands who mistake the road that leads to it. Daily and incessantly, do we see many pursuing the broad road of vice and folly, indulging the vain delusive hope therein to find that pure and celestial gem for which they seek. The scenes of vice, it is true, may profess a fascinating charm, and afford a transient and fleeting pleasure; but they can never produce real and substantial happiness; their best fruits are disappointment and sorrow. And ah! when we cast our eyes around upon the world of intelligences, what an inconceivable mass of misery do we behold! How much trouble! How much sorrow! How many are partaking of the very dregs of the "Bitter cup of baleful grief."

"Happiness is our being's end and aim,"

And whence comes all this? What is the cause? Surely, the origin of it all, is nothing but sin, that great enemy and destroyer of man's happiness. The Scriptures of divine truth declare that the way of "transgressors is hard"—that "many sorrows shall be to the wicked"—that they "are like the troubled sea, whose waters cannot rest." It is, therefore the height of folly and madness for us to expect the "peaceable fruits of righteousness," so long as we continue our course in the path of wickedness.

Kind reader, ask the man who has pursued the path of vice and folly from his childhood, if the smiles of realized happiness have not been

"Few and far between,"— and he will tell you that his brightest hours were all mispent—that his hopes have been unrealized, and his felicities denied! This is the happiness there is in sin; and so long as a man goes on in sin and wickedness, he will be miserable. This world to him is "a wilderness," "a vale of tears," "a thorny maze," "a weary land," "a darksome wild," "a tempestuous ocean." And a man of real goodness of heart and delicate feelings, cannot look upon the man who pursues the path of folly and vice, without his eyes being moistened with "a tear of pity." And as the poet expresses it—

"Vice is a monster of such frightful mien,
That to be hated, needs but to be seen."

Pleasure in sin! nothing can be more absurd! As well may we expect grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles, as to expect to obtain true and substantial happiness, from an indulgence in crime of any description.

It is an indisputable fact, that all the happiness which we enjoy, is the product of virtue and goodness; from this source alone it must originate. The object of all our wishes and desires, is happiness. Be where we may, and be our calling what it may, our sole object in all we do, is the acquisition of this most invaluable blessing. It will then be asked, what course must we pursue in order that we may secure to ourselves happiness—that inestimable blessing, which is the object of all our desires? We answer—

"Virtue alone is happiness below."

"The just shall come out of trouble;" "to the righteous good shall be repaid;" and that "in the way of righteousness is life; and in the pathway thereof there is no death." And "all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." These are the precepts of him who "went about doing good." If we would exert ourselves in the same course of conduct, how much greater would be that happiness which would be to our lot while we should continue our pilgrimage through

"Life's varied scene."

And how much misery, which must be experienced, would be forever unknown. Let us then, each and all, cherish virtue—"eschew evil and do good,"—and pursue the ways of wisdom, which are life, and thus secure to ourselves all the happiness which we are capable of enjoying in this mortal state.

With the examples of our dear Saviour in view; as his professed followers; as those who hope to live with him forever; thus should we love one another as he has loved us; remembering that "God is love"—that he is our friend, and loves us with a Father's love—that he is "without variableness or shadow of turning," and the "same yesterday, to-day and forever." Imbued with this spirit, we shall not be unmindful of the wants of others, but freely administer to the temporal and spiritual necessities of all. And while we drop the tear of sympathy into the cup of the afflicted, we shall freely pour the oil and wine of consolation into the wounded spirit.

Do we desire the approbation of Heaven—would we enjoy permanent felicity—true and lasting happiness? be it ours to cultivate this divine principle—to cherish every sentiment calculated to increase within us the holy and sanctifying flame—the love of God—the love of virtue—the love and peace of heaven. To this end faithfully strive for the attainment of true wisdom; the knowledge of God, as revealed in his word—the knowledge of ourselves—of our duty, and our eternal destiny. And thus, when we shall be called to our final exit, we shall be enabled to look back, and with satisfaction to reflect on our past lives, resigning our spirits into the hands of Him who gave them, with "The soul's calm sunshine,

And the heartfelt joy."

GOSPEL AND LAW.

"Convicted in their own conscience." John viii: 9.

Mr. Butterworth says, conscience is "The soul's opinions of its actions and duties." The Bible speaks of a good and evil conscience. One must be an approving, the other a condemning conscience.

Our text relates to persons who had brought a sinful woman to Christ, that he might condemn her: that they might find cause of complaint against him. They said they had taken the woman in the act of wickedness, and by their law she ought to die. If he condemned her to death, according to their law, they would complain of him to Caesar or the Roman power, who only had the right to put to death the subjected Jews. If Christ cleared the woman, they would complain of him as disregarding the law of Moses. They were in hopes of finding some fault with Jesus, so as to condemn him lawfully. But Jesus was too wise for them.

He stooped down and wrote on the ground, probably, something, some word, which put them in mind of their own sin. He then said, he that is without sin, let him cast the first stone at the woman. Now there was great searching of heart. They now are convicted in their own conscience of guilt. And each one could find some sin in himself. Every one had an evil conscience; No one had a good, clear, pure conscience. Beginning at the eldest, they go out, one by one, till the woman is left alone, before Jesus.

He then asks, "Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee?" No man, Lord, said she. "Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more." So Jesus cleared the woman of past offences, on condition she sinned no more. This was agreeable both to law and Gospel. The law said, be obedient and live. The prophet said, let the wicked forsake his way, and turn to the Lord and he would have mercy upon him, and abundantly pardon. The Gospel said, repent and be converted and your sin shall be blotted out.

How apt are people to cover their own sin, and expose others. How prone to justify themselves and condemn others. How often with a beam in their own eyes seek to pull motes out of others' eyes. Judge not lest ye be judged, said Jesus. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant, said Paul. Only let people live and act, so as to keep a good conscience, and they will be happy, and have confidence before God and man.

But miserable is that man whose conscience testifies against him.

There are many people who are convinced of the truth and do not obey it: and convicted of sin and do not forsake it. Conviction many have: but who is converted from the evil of his ways? Who is so perfect as Saul of Tarsus, who kept a conscience void of offence both toward God and toward man? Conviction of conscience that a person has done wrong, kindles up a hell within. This may be called the wrath of God, revealed from heaven against all ungodliness. God has so written his law upon the minds of men, or made them capable of judging what is right, or how they would have others treat them, that whenever, they will allow themselves to consider their ways, they will find that they have done evil, and deserve punishment. S. S.

HOME.

What is home? A magic word—a sound that falls upon the ear like the strain of a lute, as it is borne out on the still evening air. What is home? Ask the mariner, as he rocks upon the tossed deep. His time worn brow softens—his bosom heaves with the rush of youthful thoughts, as he points to the dim line where sea and cloud blend together, and he tells you "There!"—and that by the roaring reef and in the howling storm, he bethinks himself of home—that beloved spot, which lies not on the welcome lee—and sighs. Ask the classic youth who, just free from his Alma Mater, roams over the wide-spreading prairie, or climbs the blue mountains of the West, overlooking far-reaching vales, and exhausting horizon after horizon, encircling hill, and lake, and upland slope, and winding river—ask him if he thinks of home, and he will tell you that each returning evening speaks of it, and that as he turns his eye to the cloud that, tinged by the farewell rays of the departed sun, hangs far in the East, and seems in imagination to sleep over the place of his birth, he is in an instant there. O sacred, breathing thought! The soul is lost in a sea of memory! Dwelling, grove, and solemn forest are animated. Scenes after scene, association after association, come rushing upon the mind, and in a moment his past life comes back upon him. Who forgets the parent's last look—the parting kiss—the loved one's tear? The splendid mansion or lowly cottage—fertile plain or barren rock—all are hallowed, as we look back upon them through the vista of years. It may be that the footprints of decay are there—that the village church is crumbling—the walls of the paternal dwelling sinking to ruin—and around them the woodbine is clinging; yet there, and where even the wild grass waves over the graves of our sires, there home is—there we began to live—there we love to linger.

DEATHS.

On the 30th April last, by hanging, in the town of Massena, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., Mrs. SALLY BARNES, consort of Cornelius Barnes, aged 51 years. Mrs. Barnes had for several months been under the exercise of a mental delirium, occasioned by sickness. She was a worthy woman—respected and beloved in life—mourned and lamented in death. The consolation of the Gospel was tendered to the friends of the deceased, and to a large and attentive audience by the writer.

SERMON ON CHRISTIAN PERFECTION.

BY REV. W. WEST.

"Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Matt. v. 48.

Notwithstanding the notorious fact, (for it is one which must be admitted by every attentive reader of the New Testament,) that a very great part of the sacred Scriptures were spoken and written in view of events and circumstances which belonged to the age and times in which the speakers and writers lived. And these portions of Holy Writ will be found to constitute the major part of the revealed will of God—for they are defined in such a manner as not to be mistaken—i. e., "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled." "There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till all these things be accomplished." "Learn the parable of the fig-tree: When it putteth forth leaves, ye know that Summer is nigh; so likewise, when ye see these things, know that it is nigh, even at the doors." But notwithstanding this conspicuous fact, yet there are many parts of enduring application and relevancy to the children of men, and among these are the words of our text.

It is a remark worthy of a celebrated annotator, that "there is no rule in the understanding of any word, or text of Scripture, of the same importance as the connexion of the place where it is found;" since the same word may have various significations, owing to this circumstance. If this fact was kept constantly and steadily in view, there would not exist such diversity of opinion amongst professing Christians on matters of faith and practice.

Our text is part of our Saviour's sermon on the Mount; and the words naturally grow out of the preceding parts of the discourse. To come directly at the true import of the language, we will read part of the chapter. "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

You perceive at a moment's glance, the nature of the perfection alluded to. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." The inquiry naturally suggests itself, 1. In what does the perfection of God consist? 2. What constitutes the perfection of man? (in the sense of our text;—for our reflections must be governed by the perfection intended. God is infinite in perfection; man is finite and mutable—imperfect in every other sense than the sense of our text. But God requires man to be perfect. We observe that imperfection is inseparable from humanity in the general application of the word.—"Man is ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.")

The achievements of important facts in science are the results of long and laborious experiment and repeated failures. Neither are they accomplished in the lifetime of one individual; but are the result of generation after generation, and age after age. And if, in the course of fluctuating and precarious events, a science or branch of art be forgotten, it requires years, yea, generations, before it is again developed.

I need not advert to Egyptian and Grecian acquisitions—I will not dwell on their mummies, which have defied the power of putrefaction for thousands of years; nor show you the breathing marble of Athens or Corinth—for theirs was a knowledge and skill far superior to ours. Nor need I advert to the days of Pagan darkness, which one generation after another has gradually dissipated; when the most enlightened of our race thought our earth a plain, and the sun a travelling deity—while as yet learned England was a barbarous isle, and her druids taught the warlike sons of Albion the absurdities of the grossest polytheism—long before the eventful era which blessed the world with a Newton! immortal! who has drawn back the curtain and shown to an admiring world the untold glories of the universe, and locked, and sealed the tongue of infidelity and atheism, "and bid our longing appetites the rich profusion taste," of glory and of God! No, my friends, the perfection of art and science is not the perfection contemplated in our text—noble, commendable, and praiseworthy as they are. Perfection in these is not within the grasp of imperfect man. He must content himself with a very few imperfect glimmerings of this kind of knowledge: for the more we know, the more we feel our imperfection; an unbounded labyrinth lies still before us, even when we have put forth our mightiest effort.

The perfection in the text, is the perfection of love. "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?" You perceive the predicate is as clear as it possibly can be. The conduct of God is made the ground of our actions, and upon which our perfection reposes, and of which it is constituted. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."—You will indulge me a moment, while I give the words their import by a circumlocution. We are too apt to lose sight very frequently of the plainest language, by being too familiar with it. Absurd as this appears to be, it is a melancholy fact. How is it that the most important doctrines and precepts of our Lord Jesus Christ have been thwarted and neglected by those whose business it was to search the sacred Scriptures, and to understand their true import? How is it that this very passage has very rarely been understood and practiced?

You will please to note again the argument and the application of the words of our Lord, verse 46: "For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?" If ye do not return good for evil;—if ye do not love your enemies;—if ye do not bless them that curse you; then you are no better than the publicans. (And by your own admission, and your own estimation, they are the very worst of men.) Now I tell you, ye are no better than they, bad as you esteem them, while you follow their practices; for they are not insensible to all justice; they will return good for good received. But I tell you my religion is of a different character; mine is a dispensation of LOVE; and if ye become my disciples, ye must adopt a different course: in short, you must return good when ye receive evil;—for this is the perfection of the kingdom I have received of my Father, and this is the sanctification of the spirit of love divine; for love thinketh no evil—has no malignant feelings, even to the most flagitious offender.

"This is the grace that lives and reigns,
When faith and hope shall cease."

You perceive, then, in what the perfection stated consists: It is the entire absence of all animosity, and every species of vindictive retaliation;—it is the purifying of the heart by love divine;—it is the imitation of God in his conduct to his creatures. 1 Cor. xiii: Ps. xix: 7. God is the very centre of all goodness—he is infinite in goodness. Be ye therefore followers or imitators of God as dear children. Be ye holy as I am holy, saith the Lord of Hosts. We need not detain you longer on this point. It is manifest that our heavenly Father requireth no more of us, than he himself exercises towards us. He is the grand object of imitation to all his creatures. This is the predicate of the text:—"Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." This was the grand mission of our Lord Jesus Christ—that he might show us the Father—that he might reveal to us the glorious, the infinite perfections of his Father and our Father—of his God and our God. He was a faithful portrait of the moral character of the Deity; and in the Son, we see the Father's face. He was as a reflected light from the great spiritual Sun of the universe, which transmitted the radiating beams of light and spiritual life all around. "Show us (saith one) the Father, and it sufficeth." "Have I been so long time with you, and have you not known me, Philip? Whosoever hath seen me, has seen the Father. Believe me, that I am in the Father, and the Father in me. I and the Father are one, and ye are one with us—the Father in me, and I in you—that the world may know that I came not of myself, but that the Father hath sent me."

My respected friends, it is the very best index to the true character of God, to look at the life, the actions, and the death of our great High Priest. Do we wish to know the universal goodness of God? Do you want direct evidence? "O yes," says the true inquirer, "I want some positive proof on that point. O could I be well assured that indeed God is a being of universal, impartial, efficient goodness—that he would make an end of sin; finish transgression; and ultimately restore all the human family to holiness and happiness; O! my happy soul would soar away, and leave the clogs of earth behind; I would pass joyfully through my earthly pilgrimage, nor cast a lingering look behind." Well, my dear friend, travel with me to that ancient city, Jerusalem, and let me show you that spotless Lamb of God—the Captain of our salvation—follow his meanderings amongst a crooked and perverse generation, subject to the most cruel mockings of the very people he came to save; (from sin, from moral and spiritual death;—) who when he was reviled, reviled not again, but who proved himself the only begotten Son of God, in grace and in truth. See him there at Pilate's bar. See the cruel mockings of the Prince of Peace! He said he was a King. "For this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I might bear witness to its truth." Oh! see the vile indignity and contempt with which he is treated. The royal purple is ludicrously wrapped around his shoulders, and for a diadem the rugged thorns are bent around his sacred brow; for the sceptre of an empire, the reed is forced into his hand. Now the cruel mockings! They bow the knee in derision before him:—Hail, king of the Jews! And they smote him with the palms of their hands:—"Prophecy unto us; Who struck thee?" And they spit upon him; and from his beard they pluck the crispy hairs. But see the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world—"as a sheep before the sheersers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." The cursed cross is fastened on his shoulders. He sweats and toils up the rocky steep, till weak and faint, he falls beneath the heavy load, while the coldness and whiteness of the marble of death has spread itself over his prostrate form, and the big icy dew-drop mingles with the blood let out by the pointed thorns on his head. Another takes his place. They reach the fatal spot. The cross is laid down. Behold the man of sorrow, stripped of his drapery! He is stretched upon the rude hewn tree; the pointed spikes are driven through his unoffending hands, and through his feet; and the epitaph is placed above his sacred head—in derision, "This is Jesus, the king of the Jews." The cross is reared and wedged into the stony ground. Oh, what a spectacle! The loving, harmless Jesus writhes in pain and agony, while his heartless murderers wag their heads in mockery—"He saved others, himself he cannot save." The awful moment comes; the dim film of death has half closed his eyes—but ere he dies, he evinces the doctrine of love divine—the doctrine taught in our text, and returns blessing for cursing, in these emphatic words:—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."—"He dies, the friend of sinners dies!"

Here is evidence, my friends, the strongest and the best. Christ was an emanation of the love of God; he was the nearest who has ever approached the divine perfection of goodness. He was our great exemplar. He was perfect, even as his Father in heaven is perfect—perfect in love. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Do you want any more evidence, my respected friends, of the universal goodness of God? We can give you none better. Will you receive the words of Christ? Methinks you will;—and your hearts already melt with sympathy and love.

"Come, holy Spirit, heavenly Dove,
With all thy quickening powers;
Kindle a flame of sacred love
In these cold hearts of ours."

Again, to the philosophic mind I would say—what they very well know—every effect partakes of the nature of its cause; and we may trace back the effect to the cause. Let me, then, invite you to contemplate the effect of the love of God, Jesus Christ; who was a burnished mirror, in which the divine mind was seen. You know his life, his actions, his death; you know he was the gift of God—"the Lamb of God"—the Son of God; in whom the spirit of God dwelt without measure; who came to do the will of his Father. The cause then must be of all good, the perfection.

The speaker is well aware that, in opposition to all that has been said of the universal goodness of God, (and what he has said can never be successfully contradicted,) the existence of moral evil is brought up, as an offset against unmixed goodness, and the predicate established on this fact, that the government of God is not universally and absolutely good; but retributive and vindictive, as well as merciful and good. That moral evil does exist, is a fact of every day experience. But that it should exist at all, has proved a difficulty in the way of many, who would rejoice to contemplate the Deity as a being of absolute goodness. Should we say as our brethren, the ways of God are past finding out, we should be granted the position. Should we say that the Lord bringeth good out of evil, it would be likewise granted: "for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Should we go farther, and say there is no evidence of absolute evil in the whole universe, it cannot be successfully contradicted. That short-sighted man cannot understand and develop the ways of God, is most certain; but we rejoice to say with the poet,

"God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

It has been said by a very learned and good man—and with plausibility—God alone is infinitely perfect; that imperfection is the cause of evil; and man being imperfect, is necessarily subject to evil—progressing as he does, from infancy to manhood, his character formed by his experience, "ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." Mistaking wrong for right, evil for good, he brings upon himself and his fellow-nature, moral evil, pain and death. Again, that there can be but one being in the universe infinite in perfection;—that he cannot create another equal to himself, and hence does not prevent moral evil;—(for moral evil and imperfection are inseparable;—) thus he accounts for the existence of evil. We will not follow up the ideas involved in this sentiment. It would be too metaphysical and abstruse for the most of my hearers. But it is certain, be this as it may, God is able to control all things to subserve his own designs. If it be admitted, (and it must be,) that his designs are good and benevolent, and that he is infinite in power, then it must follow necessarily that ultimate good will be the result of his wise and benevolent government.—But with you, my brethren, who hail with joy the Gospel of "God's dear Son," the question is forever settled. There we read, as sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, so grace should reign to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

We have thus endeavored to define the perfection mentioned in our text. And what is it? It is the perfection of LOVE. It is loving the whole world, even as Christ loveth us. It is having put on the character of Christ; being adopted into the family of God; in imitating God; in a word, in returning good for evil.

Now my dear friends, suffer a short application of the subject: will this doctrine do any harm in the world—will universal good will to all mankind do any harm? In other words, will universal forgiveness—universal perfection—(for they are the same—) will they do any injury in the world? Pause and reflect—no, certainly not; every heart responds no; for the perfection of Christ consists in this very thing, forgiveness of enemies. Then, if this practice becomes universal, surely universal holiness will ensue. Then you perceive, that the common cant, that Universalism is a bad, demoralizing doctrine, is quite false; so far from it, it is the only doctrine calculated to make this earth a paradise. If every man loved his neighbor as himself, all bickering and animosity would forever cease; peace and good will would pervade the face of the moral world, and grief and woe be exchanged for joy and gladness.

But let us view the opposite of this sentiment, that teaches that God is a vindictive and cruel being; that he hates his enemies, his erring and misguided children; that he has displayed his infinite wisdom and power in forming an endless hell of fire and pain, to torment the creatures he has made, through the countless ages of eternity.

If this God-dishonoring sentiment were true, then it would be certainly right to imitate him, to the utmost of our ability; then Christian perfection would be the greatest curse that could take place upon the earth. Then the retaliation for injuries would be practiced; then we would return evil for evil—an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth; then, instead of blessing there would be cursing; then the spirit of vengeance and extermination, would prowl like a furious monster insatiable and unending, in his pursuits for vengeance. Then would murder and rapine stalk forth at noonday, and destroy the peace and happiness of every family.

Enough, my friends—we will not follow up the long catalogue of crime ensuant on this doctrine. We might detain you for hours in recapitulating the most flagitious crimes consequent on this sentiment. It was this that built the black and gloomy walls of the inquisition in Spain; that riveted the iron cages of torture, within that hell in miniature, which its founders copied from the supposed original. It was this that kindled the bonfires of human flesh in England. It was this that travelled across the broad Atlantic, and reared the whipping post and gallows in our own New-England. And it is this, my friends, that now worketh in the children of self-styled Orthodoxy.

Finally, brethren—let us go on to perfection—press forward to the mark for the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus—letting our good works shine before men. Let us be like lights in a benighted land—like a city set upon a hill, that cannot be hid; so shall we glorify our Father which is in heaven, and end our course with joy. Amen.—Star in the West.

EPISCOPALIANISM.....No. VIII

LITURGY—BEHIND THE AGE.

The liturgy of the church of England, is a standing monument of the pervading power and genius of popery. It also furnishes another instance in the catalogue of proofs, that of all the subjects which may need reform, that which relates to religion, is the very last that mankind will commence, or even tolerate. A dread of innovation—of breaking up the strong foundations of ancient institutions—of possible consequences on the public mind, when once set at liberty from the restraints of a powerful establishment; and, above all, the supposed sacredness of the subject, combine to perpetuate the most absurd theories and practices, once dignified with the name of religion. These considerations have doubtless had their full share of influence in perpetuating the English liturgy, with all its obsolete institutions, expressions and usages, in despite of the progress of the human mind.

The following quotation from Mr. Buck's Theological Dictionary, is perhaps as correct an epitome of the history of the liturgy, as any other, and in the most condensed form. "The liturgy of the church of England, was composed in the year 1574, and established in the second year of King Edward VI. In the fifth year of this king it was reviewed, because some things were contained in that liturgy, which showed a compliance with the superstition of those times, and some exceptions were taken against it by some learned men at home, and by Calvin abroad. Some alterations were made in it, which consisted in adding the general confession and absolution, and the communion to begin with the ten commandments. The use of oil in confirmation, and extreme unction, were left out: and also prayers for souls departed, and what related to a belief of Christ's real presence in the eucharist. This liturgy so reformed, was established by acts of the fifth and sixth of Edward VI. ch. 1. However, it was abolished by Queen Mary, who enacted that the service should stand as it was most commonly used in the last year of King Henry VIII. That of Edward VI. was established with some alterations by Elizabeth. Some further alterations were introduced in consequence of the review of the Common Prayer Book, by order of King James, in the first year of his reign; particularly in the office of private baptism, in several rubrics, and other passages, with the addition of five or six new prayers and thanksgivings, and all that part of the Catechism which contains the doctrine of the sacraments. The Book of Common Prayer so altered, remained in force from the first year of King James, to the fourteenth of Charles II. The last review of the liturgy was in the year 1661. Many supplications have been since made for a review, but without success."

1. On the foregoing quotation we may remark, that there is a great and obvious similarity between the Roman and English ritual. And this striking similarity is among the first impressions made upon the mind, in attending the public worship of these respective denominations. The perceptible differences will only be sufficient to satisfy the beholder, that he is not listening to the identical offices in both cases, that the head of one church is in Rome and that of the other in England—and that consequently, both have their head on earth,

True, the service of these churches is not wholly performed in the same language. Mass is said in Latin, and the Episcopal liturgy, in English. But this does not appear to be a subject of much importance to the worshippers in either case. The Catholics do not generally understand the language of the mass; and the Episcopalians do not seem to care much whether they understand or not. Indeed, we are decidedly of the opinion, that the balance of devotion is greatly in favor of the mother church. Her devotees are often profoundly ignorant; but they are conscientious. They have unbounded confidence in their religion and in their religious instructors. On the other hand, the worshippers at the altar of the English church, in some cases disbelieve its doctrines—many have little confidence in their spiritual guides; and many others despise and abominate the articles, the ritual, and the whole establishment.

But it is not surprising that the Episcopal service should so nearly resemble that of Rome. The English had been long accustomed to all the institutions of popery, and the prime mover of what is called the reformation in Britain, Henry VIII, was a bigoted Catholic, and who died, as he lived—a Papist. It will be recollected, that when he shook off the authority of the pope, he was at great pains to assert his devotion to the doctrines and usages of the mother church. And all that was really effected, was, to remodel the mass; and the same ecclesiastics who had chanted that service in Latin, now read the liturgy in their vernacular tongue.

The points of resemblance between English Episcopacy and Romanism, do not alone consist in doctrines. For unhappily, this sameness extends over forty-nine fiftieths of the Christian world. Most Protestant churches still retain the identical doctrines, which constituted the fundamentals of popery in its darkest age. Nor is it, that the government of the English church is fashioned and moulded by the hands of Papists, and after Catholic models. But its interior, its structure and arrangement—its whole ritual, public and private, and even its drapery, present a hundred points of resemblance and sameness.

The creeds of the Episcopal, are identically those of the Catholic church: and the thousand and one feasts, fasts and festivals, public and private, moveable and immovable, are generally the same. That the season of lent—the injunction of fasting every Friday, (except Christmas,) and rogation days are of Papal derivation, is known to all people. But if any are ignorant of these facts, they may derive all necessary information from their very almanacs, which are generally loaded with a set of names for saints-days and Sundays, for the special accommodation of Catholics and Episcopalians, from St. Nicholas down to quadragesima.

2. The perpetual use of the liturgy tends to render the religious feelings and perceptions gross, and prevents the successful influence of moral instruction.

It is an admitted fact, that the most revolting idolatry has generally originated in the use of sensible images, which were at first merely designed to symbolize some particular view of divine Providence. And the greatest, and the foulest corruptions of Christianity, have crept into the church under cover of the multitude of external observances. Why is it, that the laity of the Catholic church are more ignorant on the subject of religion, than the members of any other Christian communion, except perhaps the Greek and Armenian churches? The answer—and the only true answer is, because their ritual is encumbered with a greater number and variety of external rites. The withdrawal of the Bible from their hands, renders the work but more complete, and fixes more permanently the power of their priests. Hence, the rational religious feeling, the pure and intellectual devotion of a spiritual mind, is rarely to be met with among them. With an immense proportion the sum of religion is—to cross themselves with holy water—to make the several genuflections before a crucifix, or the image of some patron saint—to abstain from meat on Friday—to pay the price of absolution—to perform the prescribed penance for transgression, and to repeat a few prayers. It is thus made up of sayings and doings which only reach and affect the senses; and which if removed, would leave them destitute of religion, because nothing tangible would remain.

But human nature is the same; and similar circumstances will infallibly produce similar results. It is therefore impossible to assign a substantial reason, why the members of the English church should not approximate the ignorance of the Catholic, in the ratio of the similarity of their ritual.

We grant the difference in the intellectual and moral culture of the two sects—and we grant that in the United States this difference is greatly in favor of Episcopalians—much greater than it is in Europe. For the mass of Papists here are the degenerate French and Swiss, and the most miserable and degraded of the Irish. But this difference is to a considerable extent, if not entirely, fictitious. The fabric is the same in both cases—it was reared for show—for effect—with a view to impress the physical rather than the moral and intellectual man. The white-washings which Episcopacy has superadded to the old Papal mansion, neither alter the material nor very sensibly affect the moral health of its inhabitants. The cultivated Catholic loses nothing by comparison with the cultivated man of any other denomination—except in his knowledge of religious subjects. But few would venture a comparison of either Papist or Episcopalian commonalty, with the Scotch Presbyterians or German reformed, unless for the purpose of showing the great moral and mental superiority of the latter.

It is well known, that men may possess many social and scientific advantages and endowments—may be indeed men in philosophy and arts—who are yet the merest children in religious knowledge. And though the effect might not be as great, nor the destitution as overwhelming by the instant suppression of the English, as of the Romish ritual; yet it would leave many a minister of the establishment without a prayer, and an immense number of devout worshippers without one definite idea on the subject of religion.

The reasons for all this are concentrated in one general truth—it is impossible to reach the mind with the pure and heavenly principles of the Gospel, through the physical covering with which the liturgy loads the senses. And hence it happens, that while the Episcopal church can boast of a great number of men of the first order of talent, it really comprises but a few intellectual Christians, except among its clergy. The great mass, in defiance of its homilies and the labored and splendid discourses of its pulpit, neither understand the doctrine of the church, nor can give a consistent and Scriptural reason why they ever became its members. For among those reasons, neither convenience, fashion nor habit can have any place.

3. The continual use of the liturgy, is unfavorable to genuine devotion; inasmuch as its doctrines, language and forms are prescribed, and nothing is left to the efforts of the understanding.

It is not objected, that the supplications, thanksgivings and prescribed exercises of the "Book of Common Prayer" are deficient in devotional expression—they are perhaps unrivalled as compositions of that description. But with all their excellences, variety, number and length, they want—what such compositions must always want—adaptation. There are so many circumstances—such diversified combinations of events—such relations in the immense concatenation of joys and sorrows—such infinite ramifications of feelings, sufferings and support—such modifications of trust, confidence and hope, that no human foresight can provide for adequately, and no unimpassioned language of the closet can ever utter.

But the symbols of the liturgy want much more than this—they want the fresh and flowing unction that is diffused over the expressions, and is poured from the lips, as the feelings of the heart, and the sentiments of the religious mind are uttered in the spirit of devotion. Sameness is the great nullifier of the zeal and activity of the mind; and with the liturgy, all is perpetual sameness. Its benumbing touch accompanies every religious act to the very altar of God; and renders the flame of devotion cold, that it does not extinguish.

It happens unfortunately for mankind, that they are little disposed to exertion, when they are encouraged to avail themselves of the labors of others. And mental efforts are suspended by the assurance, that the thoughts of others are better than our own. Instances innumerable occur, which illustrate and prove this position.

And thus it is—and thus it will ever be, with the services of the liturgy. Every one knows his prescribed task—and where nothing is left to the mind, it is a task, perpetually rendered more irksome and soulless by every successive repetition. And with the best intentions, and the most arduous efforts, it often happens that the recitals are performed with such a grace, and with an air so languid and lifeless, as to set gravity itself at defiance. The whole, when thus conducted, has the appearance of a solemn farce, designed to ridicule devotion, and calculated to inspire a universal skepticism. And it is doubtless owing to this circumstance, notwithstanding the very learned and able defenses of divine revelation by distinguished Episcopalians, that the English church, in America, has a greater number of skeptics than any other denomination.

4. The whole Episcopal ritual—its government, its liturgy and its creeds, is behind the age. It is now almost one hundred and fifty years since any attempt to improve the liturgy has been made, and about two hundred years, since any actual alterations (save the very trifling ones in the United States) have been made in the "Book of Common Prayer."

Were it to be admitted, which it cannot, that no change was necessary in the doctrine of the church; still it is reasonable to suppose, that the peculiar customs and expressions instituted nearly two hundred years since by human authority, require adaptation to the improved mind and cultivated taste of the people of England and the United States. Especially when it is recollected, that the forms, phraseology and laid marks of the liturgy, are the first offspring of the undoubted popery which every where prevailed, at the dawn of reviving literature. For however well it might have suited the condition and met the wants of a people, just emerging from the spirit and character of the dark ages—with habits and institutions but one remove from the feudal system of tyranny; it by no means follows, that it is fitting and useful for an age improved by great advances in science and government.

Christianity in the beginning was exempt from a cumbersome ritual—it was in fact designed to supersede the external observances of the legal dispensation; and only required a pure moral and intellectual devotion. And in this character it is adapted to man in all countries, and at all periods of time. That system, then, which throws the worshipper back upon a distant, unimproved and superstitious age, is in all respects behind the times in which we live.

It is the boast even of Episcopalians, that the present is an age of rapidly progressing improvement. Be it so—and so it undoubtedly is; but what a sorry compliment does their liturgy offer to its mental advances in matters of religion! Here we are with a "Prayer Book," composed at a time with which the present would blush to be compared—composed too by men enlightened by the very genius of popery; and itself about as intellectual as a treatise on the forms of oriental superstition. Nor are we singular in our views of this subject. It is well known—too well to be disputed by any intelligent Episcopalian—that some of the greatest ornaments of that church, have seen, and felt, and uttered their convictions of the inutility of the liturgy. They have felt as Peter did respecting the law, that it was "a yoke which neither they nor their fathers could bear." But they have wanted what very many of that communion now want—moral courage to shake off the incubus by which they were oppressed. And while they can keep themselves in countenance, by numbers, wealth, fashion and influence, we venture to predict that the liturgy will remain untouched by the hand of reformation.

But we shall doubtless be told, that the Episcopal church is not very strict in enforcing its ritual—that the rigid observation of its respective fasts, has fallen into disuse. So much the worse. No church has any right to retain as integral and constituent parts of its formula, institutions of sacred import, which it thinks of too little consequence to observe, or is ashamed to enforce. And that Episcopalians consider them altogether below their attention, there is no room to doubt. This is the tacit confession that their liturgy is behind the age—it is piecemeal becoming obsolete, and receiving from its votaries their undisguised contempt. And it is retained only because the laws of England, and the bishops in the United States, require it; but it is becoming too pernicious for comfortable management, in an age where the intelligence of the people is greatly in advance of the temporal and spiritual pretensions of an established priesthood.

For the character of the liturgy, we knew not a better and more comprehensive epitome, than that furnished in a speech of King James—while yet, he was a Presbyterian. "As for our neighbor king of England, their service is in an evil-said mass in English." VERAL.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XX. REMARKS ON MARK XIII: 32, AND 1 COR. II: 2.—In the former of these passages, the historian Mark relates that Jesus Christ, while speaking of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, said, "that this generation should not pass, till all these things be done; but of that day and that hour (at which they were to happen) doth no man know, neither the angels who are in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only." To me this passage presents evidence quite satisfactory that Jesus was not omniscient, and of course he was not, neither claimed to be, God. Let us glance at the several methods by which it has been attempted to evade this conclusion; for as there has been no single mode of evasion which has been quite satisfactory to all the advocates of the deity of Christ, there have been several sought out. This circumstance of no one evasive explanation being universally acceptable, might be urged as no inconsiderable proof of the imperfect title of either to be just and true.

The common mode of explaining the above quoted verse, and of evading the above stated conclusion, is to say, that Jesus spoke it only of his human nature, "and that the Deity which dwelt in the man Christ Jesus might, at one time, communicate less of the knowledge of futurity to him, than at another." To such evasions I have a brief answer; with such objectors I have a "short and easy" method: I reply that their explanation is taking for granted what requires to be proved—that it is a begging of the question—a petitio principii.

Dr. Adam Clarke strongly suspects that the difficult clause was not originally in this Gospel. And why? "Its not being found in the parallel places in the other evangelists, is, in my opinion," says he, "a strong presumption against it." By the same canon or rule of criticism, Dr. Clarke would have to give up many passages of great value to the polemic theologian, which he would be sorry to dash away with his own hands. But he knew well that such a rule for determining the genuine text of the sacred historian never could receive the sanction of common sense and sound judgment. The received text has been made out, as it ought to be, not by the comparison of one Gospel with another, but a collation of the several extant MSS. of that particular Gospel, and of the ancient versions. Such being the approved mode of settling the text, and so many things being found related by one historian which are either not noticed at all, or in a way somewhat varied, by the other evangelists, the common sense and common voice of the unprejudiced, when appealed to, will forcibly rebuke and repudiate the suspicion of Dr. Clarke.

Dr. Macknight has originated another manner of solving the difficulty. He alleges (Essay iv, § 7.) that the verb oiden has here the force of the Hebrew conjugation in Hiphel, by which it comes to signify to make known or promulgate, instead of to know: hence, that the meaning of the verse is, that this secret was not to be made known, either by men or angels, no, not even by the Son of man himself, but by the Father only, in the execution of the purposes of his justice. His brother in the difficulty, Dr. A. Clarke, says, "I am afraid this only cuts the knot, but does not untie it." Dr. Macknight attempts to support this sense of the word by alleging its use in the same sense in 1 Cor. ii: 2, where Paul says he was determined to know nothing (or to make nothing known) among the Corinthians, save Jesus Christ, even him crucified. But it may be said that to know nothing can hardly admit of meaning to make nothing known. We believe this passage to be only a strong expression of the apostle's determination to appear among the Corinthians and to preach among them, as if ignorant of every thing else, save the great subject of his ministry. He came among them in the character of an apostle of Jesus Christ. As a man he was acquainted with many other things; and he might be under temptations to display his knowledge. But as an apostle he had one message to deliver, and he determined in this capacity to know nothing else than that message. Is not this the meaning of the text? The apostle had resolved, for the time, to banish from his thoughts all other knowledge—to dwell exclusively on this grand and most important subject—to concentrate all the energies of his heart and mind upon it—to make it the constant topic of his arguments and exhortations—to be for a season, as one who had forgotten every thing else—who, if one might venture to adopt the language of the great dramatist,

"From the table of his memory
Had wiped away all trivial fond records,
All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past
That youth and observation copied there,"
That this great argument "alone might live
Within the book and volume of his brain
Unmixed with baser matter."

Such I believe to be the spirit of a passage worthy of the great apostle of the Gentiles, and which Dr. Macknight, to answer his critical purposes, and to save from a shock and an overthrow his preconceived and prejudiced opinions, would have robbed of all its force, vigor and beauty.

EFFECTS OF CORRECT EDUCATION.

BY T. B. ROBBINS.

There is but very little originality, of any kind, in the world. And this is particularly the case as respects man. What one person has seen or heard of another's doing, that he will imitate; and very few have the independence to strike out a new path in thought or action.

The character of a man depends upon a variety of circumstances—the first and greatest of which is education, or those ideas which are instilled into the mind in youth. What is learned in youth, is generally retained in after life: this being the case, how important that all should learn aright. All men being created subject to like infirmities of body and mind, it only requires that the same principles be instilled in younger days, and similar external circumstances, to produce the same character in all—as like causes produce like effects. But different external circumstances create different motives for action, and according as these motives are commendable or otherwise, should be the credit bestowed. Fear of the disapprobation of community may make persons avoid evil, and perhaps does, in very many instances; but all the credit due is the same which the slave is worthy of receiving, who obeys his master because the lash is constantly over his head.

For a person to be virtuous because he would be punished if otherwise, is a very poor reason; as it seems to convey the idea that more enjoyment may be found in iniquity and transgression, than is conferred by a life of piety and virtue; than which, nothing can be more erroneous. And the situation of the person who labors under the mistaken idea, that the life of virtue and religion is one of trouble and toil, while that of vice confers a greater amount of enjoyment, is to be pitied for the great darkness which obscures his mental vision, misleading him towards the broad road of destruction rather than directing him to the narrow way which is life and peace. For the temptations he is called upon to resist, and the continual departure from the path of rectitude which must result from being under the influence of false and erroneous sentiments, must end in ruin. It is this pernicious idea which, reduced to practice, leads the majority of mankind through the dark valley of death. In this situation we see the drunkard stagger through the streets—the debauchee, with countenance erect, because he has no shame—and that contemptible creature who uses profane language, the index of his mind, and which shows the recklessness of character and degradation at which it is possible for a human being to arrive.

But let the principle be universally taught and inculcated, that vice can no more produce any substantial benefit, or virtue even real temporary disadvantage, than pears may be grown on thistles, or the sweet fountain to send forth bitter waters; and let every human being adopt such a motto, and square his life to this principle, and that great moral desolation which has been caused by sin, will be completely removed. What is now a desert and a barren waste, will become fruitful, bring forth and blossom. This will redeem man from the greatest servitude, exalt and ennoble the mind, and cause it to approximate nearer to the Creator.

It is by an appeal to the reasoning faculties, that man is to be brought from the darkness of nature, and from spiritual death to that truth which maketh free indeed. Beasts of the field may be controlled, in some measure, by the fear of the goad; but man needs only to be convinced of the way of truth, and he will pursue it for the greater degree of enjoyment which it ever confers. Man, the image of his Maker, has been created susceptible of moral improvement, and of the highest mental enjoyment—capable of receiving pleasure, enduring pain, and duly appreciating the great end for which he was called into existence. He considers, when actuated by principles of truth, the many pleasures of the world innocently pursued, as tending to assuage and calm the turbulent passions, and to render him cheerful and contented. Hence he is not gloomy and sullen—and in case of misfortune, he looks upon the fairest side, and profits even by adversity. Such a man looks abroad upon nature, and admires the beauties by which he is surrounded, and which are every way calculated to inspire his breast with the most noble sentiments of love and affection for his Maker and his fellows, and while he acknowledges his own insignificance, silently adores Him of whom he sees such abundant evidence in every thing which is presented to his sight.

Threatened punishment of any kind, as well as corporeal punishment inflicted, has an influence on the mind of the person debased by ignorance, and may deter him from transgression, whose mind is already seared to such a degree that, so far as his conscience is concerned, he perceives no difference between right and wrong. It is therefore necessary to the preservation of society, that punishment be threatened and inflicted upon the criminal. But this is a doctrine which it is very improper to practice upon a mind in a state like that of the child before he has arrived to years of accountability. It tends to destroy that nobleness and independence of mind, which is the universal characteristic of the upright, to deaden the more refined feelings, the sensibilities, and that sense of modesty and pride combined which produce shame, and which it should be the aim of all persons, having the care of youth, to increase rather than to destroy. Let these feelings exert their full influence upon the mind, and they will do more towards preserving an upright character than all the rods and ferules combined, which have ever disgraced the hand of the petty tyrant.

Almost every man has a strong natural desire of being valued and esteemed by his species; but it is a matter of great concern, that so few fall into a truly laudable manner of becoming so. Some aim at making themselves esteemed by the pursuit of learning—others by accumulating property, by wit, or by beauty of person. But what are all these, when compared with virtue, which alone confers more enjoyment than all other possessions combined? The learned, the wealthy, the powerful and the beautiful may be respected and admired, but the virtuous are adored.

Then, who art thou that wishest to obtain to thyself that to which nothing earthly can compare, which confers the greatest happiness experienced by mortals, which must bring the respect of secret enemies, although bigotry may make them so uncharitable as to call hard names in consequence of trifling differences in faith! White or black, bond or free, male or female, obtain to thyself a good moral character, not because by thus doing you may please some great one of the earth, nor because, if you possess it not, you must expect punishment for evil conduct, but because it is the only source of present felicity, without which life is not merely a blank but far worse, and existence a curse, rendered such by misconduct.

If these true principles and motives to action were taught to the same extent that some errors are, what a great moral revolution might be made in the universe! Let those who are teachers, hold up natural moral effects as the consequences of action, and let all in this and the next generation be educated in these principles, and if a different state of things from that now witnessed does not exist, then the writer of this will well deserve the name of a visionary enthusiast.

NIAGARA ASSOCIATION.

Among other resolutions adopted by this body, at its recent session, is one that appointed a committee to draft a code of by-laws for the government of the Council, and to render more explicit the constitution in reference to the duty of ministers and societies within its jurisdiction. It contemplates the adoption of such rules as will enable the Council to proceed with their business with greater accuracy and order, and to know what societies and ministers are dead or living. Hitherto there has been a culpable remissness—a criminal negligence on the part of societies. Some have neglected to represent themselves in Council year after year, either by letter or delegate. And at the last session of this body, only one-half of the societies in fellowship were represented. Though business of the utmost importance comes up for our consideration each year, yet we are not permitted to hear from several societies, or know any thing of their circumstances and wants. Brethren, such negligence is sin. If other societies in this Association had no more zeal in the cause of Universalism than you manifest, another year would annihilate our associate capacity. You know that this Association has been divided and subdivided till the territory embraces only ten societies. Were each of these societies annually represented, as they should be, we might still maintain a name to live. I hope there are no societies whose recovery is doubtful, but if there are, their friends ought to be informed of their case. We expect that our next session will be one of more than ordinary interest.

It is well known that several persons in western New-York hold letters of fellowship, which certify that they are preachers of the Gospel, who have either given up preaching altogether, or only preach occasionally—some a few times a year. These letters were given under constitutions which require them to be recalled upon the discontinuance of their ministry. And the question is, What is it to discontinue the duties of a minister? Will one or two sermons in a year answer the object for which these letters were given, and to which they bear witness? especially when the person is devoted to some other employment. I do not propose these questions to support the resolution, (for I consider the author capable of attending to that himself,) but to set forth the intended character of the resolution itself. Brethren, think of these things.

C. HAMMOND.

REMARKS.

The above is applicable to the circumstances of several other Associations. A few years ago the Central Association undertook to establish a similar measure, by which non-preaching preachers should not be exempted both from taxation by the State, and preaching by the denomination; but it is believed that measure has fallen again into disuse, and that it needs being revived. There are other Associations in a similar condition, I have no doubt, and therefore need the above remarks thus applied more extensively than Br. Hammond first intended it.

METHODISTS AT DUNDEE.

Our readers will recollect that in noticing our journey to the West, in May last, we took occasion to animadvert upon an indignity shown us and our friends at Dundee, during the time of divine service, by a Methodist of that place. We have lately received the following letter from one of our brethren, which goes to show in what light that community looked upon the deed. D. S.

DEAR SIR—Our friends here have noticed with pleasure your remarks in the Magazine and Advocate in regard to your visit to this place, concerning the ringing of the bell during our afternoon service, when you were here. Much has been said—and much warmth of feeling has been manifested by all sects and denominations in and around our village. The consequence has been a meeting of the trustees, and a unanimous choice made by them of a different and unprejudiced man to ring the bell—one who will not presume to disturb the solemn worship of our heavenly Father on the day secured to us for devotion and peace, by the laws of our country.

We mention this with pleasure, as our trustees are composed of men of other denominations from ours. All express a just indignation at the outrage committed. We do not charge the disgraceful affair upon the whole Methodist society here: for there are many warm and noble-hearted ones among them, whose souls would be filled with an ecstasy of joy could they be brought to know the common Father of the universe as he is. There are others, it is true, of a different character—whose conduct we choose to pass over, at this time, in silence, leaving them to be condemned by their own conduct. I remain, dear Sir, fraternally yours,

JESSE S. LAYTON.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

UTICA, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1836.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE RELIEF OF WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF DECEASED UNIVERSALIST CLERGYMEN.

At the late session of the Central Association of Universalists, in Madison, June 2d, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted in Council, by which a society, subject to the supervision and control of the Association, was organized for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Universalist preachers. The recent death, in this State, of a number of our best preachers, and the almost portionless and destitute condition in which most of their families were left, seemed to admonish us that something ought to be done by this Association to provide for those within our limits who may hereafter be left in similar circumstances. And we cannot but hope that other Associations, yea all of our Associations throughout the State, will organize similar societies within their respective boundaries as early as practicable. It might be the means of saving many an anxious bosom from gloomy forebodings, and alleviating, with ease, convenience and readiness, the actual sufferings of many in distress.

Will every preacher and every benevolent layman in the Central Association, immediately see how many members he can procure, and how many donors who will subscribe any sum, however small, to aid the funds of the society? It can be done with a little effort—at public meeting, or in his private visitations. And let the names, subscriptions and donations thus procured be forwarded to the Editors in this city, to be entered on the books of the society in proper form.

One remark more—there are but few members yet obtained, but of these, all have subscribed from five to ten dollars as their annual subscription, (instead of one and two dollars,) so long as they shall be able to give it. But one member has signed less than five dollars. Let every one that is able follow up the example here begun, and the society will be able to accomplish what it has in view, should the dispensation of God require action at their hands. No one need fear to subscribe liberally for fear of being called on to continue a larger sum than he can afford in after years—for one dollar, only, is the constitutional annual sum, and even that need not be paid if the contributor is unable to pay it. See the following resolutions of organization. EDITORS.

Whereas, in the decease of several members of this Association, we are furnished with undoubted proof, that the families of clergymen are peculiarly liable to be left in circumstances below mediocrity, if not in absolute want—and whereas it is believed that the means of remedying a condition so painful, exists in the denomination, and that there is a willingness to apply them—therefore,

1. Resolved, That this Association recommend the immediate organization of a society by the name of "The society for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen."

2. Resolved, That each person paying two dollars and signing this Constitution, be a member of said society—and that each member shall contribute one dollar annually to the funds, so long as his circumstances and convenience enable him so to do.

3. Resolved, That the officers of the society consist of three Trustees, a Treasurer and a Secretary.

4. Resolved, That all monies paid into the hands of the Treasurer, be receipted by him to the Secretary and Trustees; and all monies paid out by him, be receipted by at least one Trustee, or the Secretary.

5. Resolved, That in the application of the funds of the society, reference shall first be had to the members, and that the whole annual income may be appropriated when the officers deem it proper; and in case of several applications at the same time, the said officers shall have discretionary power over the apportionment. In particular cases, families may receive the benefit of the funds who have not been contributors.

6. Resolved, That Col. L. Barker, Clinton; J. McCounell, Esq., Lebanon, and Mr. Garrett Scott, Bridgewater, be Trustees, Rev. D. Skinner, Treasurer, and Rev. A. B. Grosh, Secretary.

7. Resolved, That this Association reserve to itself the right of inspecting the conduct of the officers of the society, of removal for abuses or malpractice, and of filling all vacancies—and that each member of said society, present at any meeting of this Association, shall be entitled to vote in reference to said officers.

8. Resolved, That the annual meeting of this society shall be held at the same time and place as the meetings of this Association.

UNPARALLELED LIBERALITY.

At the recent dedication of the Third Universalist church in the city of New-York, one of the most liberal collections was taken up towards defraying the expenses of the building, etc., that we recollect of ever having noticed in any place, especially in any society of Universalists. The three collections taken up at the close of the morning, afternoon and evening services of that day amounted to the enormous sum of TWO THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-ONE DOLLARS AND FIFTY-FOUR CENTS! Here was a liberal congregation indeed, and the substantial witnesses of their liberality were found in the contribution boxes after the congregation had retired from the house.

Universalism in the city of New-York, seems to have arisen in its might and to be carrying all before it. Six years ago, a sum like this could scarcely have been raised by subscription among all the Universalists in the city for buying or building a church—now behold! one day's contribution does it! How great the change! "It is the Lord's doing and it is marvellous in our eyes." The London of America is being redeemed from worse than Egyptian darkness and bondage; and the day dawn of her glorious emancipation has commenced. The light of divine truth is destined to spread till it covers the earth as the waters do the sea; and New-York, though the greatest of our cities, shall not be last nor least in doing her part in the glorious work.

By-the-by, the thought has struck us, What if the Universalists and friends of liberal principles in and about Utica should take it into their heads and hearts and hands to do just such a thing here as our New-York friends have done—make a contribution of twenty-five hundred and seventy-one dollars and fifty-four cents, in one day! What a noble thing it would be! Why, brethren, it would swing us clear of the old church debt, that, like an incubus, has been weighing us down and paralyzing us ever since, yea even before, we had a house in which to meet and worship our God. With how much lighter and more cheerful hearts should we meet on each returning Sabbath, and with how much more gladness could we sing the songs of Zion! Brethren, may we not hope to see the time, and that ere long, when by such contributions, or subscriptions, or other means of testifying their liberality, our friends will enable us to see the happy day when we can call ourselves and our society free from our church debt? It would indeed be a glorious and hallowed era to us all. Well, brethren, there is a growing liberality, an increase of our congregation and the spread of our doctrine in community. It is destined, nay it must ultimately triumph over all opposition. And happy is that man who first puts shoulder to the wheel, and can have it to say that he helped on the cause in its infancy when there were few that dared, few that could, and fewer still that would, aid our infant cause.

UNITARIANS.

A writer in the last Trumpet gives the names of seven once large and flourishing Unitarian societies in the vicinity of Boston, that have been converted to other denominations, or obliged to hire preaching from other denominations to keep up the shadow of an existence, or are now at their last gasp. Four have employed Universalist preachers with their parish funds—one employs a Calvinistic Baptist preacher, (I presume “he is a popular man;” for these “liberal” and “enlightened Christians” regard that qualification as highly in Massachusetts, as do their Episcopalians, trinitarians and tritheistic Unitarian brethren in this State)—and the rest are dead or dying. The writer says he could name many similar cases—these are given as mere samples of the prosperity of the religious aristocracy of New-England. A. B. G.

A SERMON

On the sin against the Holy Ghost, delivered before the second Universalist society of Philadelphia, January 24, 1835. By Savillion W. Fuller.

This is a sermon of twelve duodecimo pages, on the texts which speak of the sin against the Holy Ghost, Matt. xii: 32, and Mark iii: 29. It is written in Br. Fuller's usual, ready, bold, offhand, yet energetic style, for which his pulpit labors are so much distinguished; and with that plainness and simplicity that none can misunderstand. He speaks

1. Of the solemn importance of the subject, the necessity of giving it a candid and fair hearing, and the absurdity of the charge of those who accuse Universalists of attempting to evade the force of the passages, pervert them from their legitimate design for the sake of lulling conscience to sleep, and thereby engaging in sin the more greedily: as this charge supposes them to be so unnatural and so devoid of common sense and common prudence as to be totally indifferent to their own eternal destiny.

2. Of the fatal effects of false interpretations of the subject, and the lamentable consequences to those deluded souls who, being erroneously made to believe they had committed this sin, supposed there was no mercy or salvation for them, and gave themselves up, in consequence, to despair, insanity or suicide.

3. Of the Holy Ghost against whom this sin was committed. He refutes the idea of the personality of the Holy Ghost, especially of its being the third person in the trinity, or Godhead, as commonly believed—shows that it was to be the Comforter, i. e., the spirit of truth. John xiv: 16, 17, 23, and maintains that the spirit of a thing is its life, energy, activity, vigor, or efficacy—that in opposing Jesus, and maliciously ascribing his miracles to the power of Beelzebub, the Jews opposed the spirit of truth, spoke against, resisted and blasphemed it to such an extent as to have incurred enormous guilt—and that none but those who did this in the face of miracles which they saw performed, could then, or can now, be guilty of this sin in the sense intended by the Saviour.

4. Of the phrases this world and the world to come—shows that they mean the Jewish age, or dispensation, which was then present, and the Gospel age or Christian dispensation, which was then to come or about to succeed it.

5. Of the intention of our Lord to compare the clemency of the Jewish and of the Christian dispensations, and show that, though the latter was decidedly the most clement and merciful, yet so heinous was the sin of blasphemy against the spirit of truth, the Gospel itself could not forgive it.

6. Of the probability that our Lord, in accordance with the Jewish manner of speaking, meant not to assert absolutely that all other sins would and this would not be forgiven, but comparatively, that this was a much worse crime and far less likely to be forgiven.

7. Of the phrase eternal damnation—that eternal, being translated from the same word as everlasting, means the same thing—i. e., age lasting—damnation means judgment here, and the whole phrase means the judgment of the age.

8. Of the condition of those who went out of the world or died unforgiven—maintains that none can carry their sins with them beyond death—that because St. Paul said, “he that is dead is freed from sin,” therefore they cannot be sinners beyond this life, and do not consequently need forgiveness.

9. Of the proof of the future happiness of those who die before they are forgiven—maintains that as they brought not their sins into this world when they came into it, so their sins must be left behind, they being unable to carry out of the world what they brought not into it, etc., etc., and that in the resurrection, all shall be made alive in Christ—shall become glorious, spiritual and happy.

There are many striking and excellent ideas in the sermon; but as an individual I should dissent from some of them, especially under the two last heads. I have always believed, and still do, that a sinner, especially one guilty of the blasphemy treated of, could never be saved without forgiveness. And furthermore, if sinners are not saved from their sins in this state of being, and it is impossible they should ever have any sins in another state, then it is impossible they should ever be saved by Christ, in the sense of Matt. i: 21; Acts iii: 26; Rom. xi: 26, 27. I do not consider Rom. vi: 7 to relate at all to natural death. Nor do I consider it true that man can carry nothing out of the world with him but what he brought with him into the world. True, we can carry no earthly substance, goods or riches, out of the world with us. See Eccl. v: 13, 14, 15; 1 Tim. vi: 7, 8, 9. But if we can carry nothing, either of a moral or spiritual nature out with us because we brought nothing of either in, then we can carry no knowledge out, for we brought none in—we can go out with no moral principles, for we came in with none—we can carry no love to God into another state, for we came into this world with none. To me such an idea seems entirely irrational and untenable. I see no reason why a person may not enter upon another state of being with the same moral principles with which he leaves this, as well as a man emigrating from Europe to America may bring the same moral principles here, as those with which he left the Eastern continent—especially if his passage is instantaneous, or if he has been entirely unconscious during his passage. I see no reason why a mere physical change should necessarily produce a moral change. If a man has not exercised faith in Christ here, I know not why means may not be employed hereafter to produce it. If he has not been brought to repentance and experienced forgiveness here, I am unable to see any obstacle to their exercise hereafter. In short, if Christ is to save all men from sin, and he does not accomplish the work in this state, I see no reason why the work may not progress hereafter till it shall be effected in another state.

The sermon, however, I commend to the attentive perusal of all—it contains much interesting, valuable matter. Its author I esteem as one of the best of men; and I do not believe he will blame me for the exceptions I take to one or two points in his excellent sermon while I so cordially agree with him in all the rest. DEDICATION.

The Third Universalist church in the city of New-York, recently erected at the corner of Bleeker and Downing-streets, has been completed this season in a style of superior beauty and taste; and was on Sunday, the 19th ult., solemnly dedicated to the worship of the one only living and true God, the Saviour of all men. The following was the order of the services:—

Reading of Scriptures by Br. C. F. Le Fevre. Prayer by Br. B. B. Hallock. Sermon by Br. Le Fevre. Benediction by Br. William Andrews. Br. T. J. Sawyer, preached in the afternoon and Br. Abel C. Thomas in the evening. During all the services the house was densely crowded, and multitudes retired from the doors being unable to gain admittance. The building is sixty-five feet by seventy-five deep, and executed after the Ionic order; the members having been carefully selected from the Grecian Ionic. There are one hundred and six large ships on the principal floor and fifty in the gallery. It is furnished with a splendid and rich toned organ, and best of all with an excellent congregation. (with several distinguished individuals of whom we have the happiness to be personally acquainted and can bear testimony to their liberality and high moral worth) and a preacher, Br. Le Fevre, whose mind is enriched by various knowledge, his tongue with ready utterance, and his heart by many virtues. May Heaven's approving smile be with them all now and forever. D. S.

THE RECORD.

My absence at the North, and more pressing business since my return home, have prevented the furnishing of a record until now. After turning over a big pile of papers for one whole day, I have selected the following items. The proceedings of the Pennsylvania Convention and of the Massachusetts Union Association were crowded out of the last record for want of room, and then were laid over to await my return home.

PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.—Met in Milestown, Saturday, May 21st. Br. Elijah Dallet, Moderator, and Br. A. C. Thomas, Clerk. Continued the committee of correspondence—Jacob Grosh, Marietta, Joseph Kingsbury, Sheshequin, and A. C. Thomas, Philadelphia. Appointed the following delegation to the United States Convention, with power to appoint substitutes—Br. Jacob Myers, A. C. Thomas, S. W. Fuller, John Perry, ministers; and John M. Brown, Elijah Dallet, William Taylor, Jacob Mayland, George D. Keim and Jacob Grosh, laymen. Appointed Br. Thomas to prepare the minutes and append a circular—and Brs. Thomas and S. W. Fuller to appoint the place for the next meeting of the Convention. Adjourned to meet again on the last Saturday in May, 1837. No delegation appeared from the Susquehanna Association. Five sermons were preached by Brs. Perry, Myers, S. W. Fuller and Thomas. Addresses were also made by Brs. Fuller and Thomas, the latter at the grave of Dr. George De Benneville, senior, embracing a notice of his life—which will probably be published. Reports were made from various parts, of the unexampled prosperity of our cause.

SOUTHERN CONVENTION.—Met at Portsmouth, Va., May 20th. Col. D. Watts, Moderator, T. Fisk, Clerk. A committee was appointed to amend the Constitution, and reported a new one, which was adopted. After considerable discussion the following preamble and resolution was unanimously adopted.

“Whereas the unparalleled prosperity which has attended the preaching of the doctrine of universal salva-

THE CHRISTIAN VIRTUES PERSONIFIED.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

Reader! have patience—my story's soon told,
Of eight lovely beings, who never grow old.
They're all of one family—daughters of truth—
Equally beautiful—glowing with youth.
Congenial their natures, they walk hand in hand,
While harmony governs the sisterly band.
High born—of noble deportment and merit—
A glorious king/om is their's to inherit.
Courteous, delicate, winning and wise,
Their heavenly origin beams in their eyes.
Their steps, as the young roe's o'er green hills straying—
Their breasts as zephyrs 'mong forest roses playing—
Their smile, as though heaven had op'd its fair doors,
And a flood of effulgence and beauty outpours.
So gracefully robed in celestial attire,
Thou'st only to see them, to love and admire.
Would'st make their acquaintance, and add to thy fame?
Salute them in friendship—I'll call them by name.
The eldest is Faith—while true joy she bestows,
Sweet "Hope springs eternal," wherever she goes.
Virtue comes next, with her garlands of peace,
Thy brows to adorn with true pleasures fair wreath.
The third is true Knowledge, who's never puffed up,
She'd have all her votaries drink deep of her cup.
'Tis full, and o'erflows from a life-giving fount,
With its healthful perfumings no riches can count.
Temperance—behold her! O, sweet as the rose—
Health, and content, and long life, she bestows!
Patience—mild being! high Heaven's own daughter,
Ever adoring, and meek as a martyr.
She has happiness, quietness, concord to give,
Without her, there's none of us mortals could live.
Godliness, next in the illustrious train,
Her boon to mankind, inexpressible gain.
Brotherly kindness, sure passport to heaven,
Extensive her bounty, and liberally given.
Now comes the adorable queen of the skies,
LOVED CHARITY, laden with boundless supplies—
Her olives with green boughs of love are entwined,
Her motto is, "peace and good will to mankind."
I've told you, their names, and finished my story,
Accept of their guidance, they'll lead thee to glory
Henderson, June, 1836.

GOODNESS OF GOD.

"The Lord is good!" Yea, verily—sweet singer of Israel, thou hast declared the truth. He "is good, and doeth good"—and his children are called upon to rejoice and be glad in his name. And would they consider his goodness as it shines in the face of creation—in the outspread volume of the earth, sea and the sky; would they remember his goodness in calling them into being—providing for their wants—watching over them in tender care, and in dealing out his bounties to them continually, it would seem that his character would appear in a different light altogether from that in which the doctrines of men present it.

And then—would the children of men duly consider the Scriptures—and therein read the repeated declarations of God's goodness—and listen to the preaching of Jesus on this subject; and would they consider that this very goodness is calculated to lead men to repentance, they would soon look upon all attempts to impeach this goodness, by declaring the doctrine of endless woe, as a foul calumny on the character of our heavenly Father.

Infinite goodness and endless misery! Heavens! What a jargon! What a perverse attempt at union! They can never agree; and the more men attempt to reconcile them, the plainer will the contradiction appear. Reader, if thou art inclined to distrust the goodness of God—beware of the tempter! It is the spirit of the adversary at work within thee. Drive it away—and pray to thy Father for an increase of lively faith in his kindness and everlasting love.—Star in the East.

YOUTH.

How delightful dost thou revel in the full flow of nature's bounteous stream, swelling to expected perfection. To the present feeling of enjoyment, and to the unbounded anticipation of future bliss, how open is youth! How full of delight and how beauteous in infancy, although, like the early blossom of Spring, it feels the chills that its nature is heir to. We press the elastic muscle, full and soft, of the healthful child, and pass our fingers through the glossy curls, and fondly pinch the rosy, dimpled cheek, and gaze in the laughing eyes, and express with enthusiasm our admiration of the promise nature gives of its future perfection—we know not what; but we feel, and know that we love youth even in its imbecility. As it approaches to and attains maturity, how admirable, how lovely is youth in its pristine purity! Though man may not measure the power of God by his own weakness, he may, and must, love youth, beauty, and purity; and while such love is active in him, he must adore his infinitely good Creator.—New-York Mirror.

OLD HUMPHREY ON FITS.

Though no doctor, I have by me some excellent prescriptions, and as I shall charge you nothing for them, you cannot grumble at the price. We are most of us subject to fits; I am visited with them myself; and I dare say that you are also; so now for my prescriptions.

For a fit of passion, walk out in the open air; you may speak your mind to the winds, without hurting any one, or proclaiming yourself to be a simpleton.

For a fit of idleness, count the ticks of a clock. Do this for one hour and you will be glad to pull of your coat the next, and work like a negro.

For a fit of extravagance and folly, go to the work-house, or speak with the ragged and wretched inmates of the jail, and you will be convinced,

Who makes his bed of briar and thorn,
Must be contented to lie forlorn.

For a fit of ambition, go into the church yard and read the grave stones. They will tell you the end of ambition. The grave will soon be your bed chamber, the earth your pillar, corruption your father, and the worm your mother and sister.

For a fit of repining, look about for the halt and the blind, and visit the bed-ridden and afflicted, and deranged, and they will make you ashamed of complaining of your lighter afflictions.

For a fit of despondency, look on the good things which God has given you in this world and at those which he has promised to his followers in the next. He who goes into his garden to look for cobwebs and spiders no doubt will find them; while he who looks for a flower may return into his house with one blooming in his bosom.

For all fits of doubt, perplexity and fear, whether they are a load to the shoulders, the head or the heart, the following is a radical cure which may be relied on, for I had it from the great Physician: "Cast thy burden on the Lord and he will sustain thee."

Love is the great instrument and engine of nature—the bond and cement of society—the spring and spirit of the universe.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 4th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Dr. JOHN ORR, to Mrs. MARIA LAISTEE, both of New-Hartford.

In this city, on the 8th inst., by the same, Mr. SOLOMON C. DART, of Boonville, to Mrs. MARY ANDREWS, of this city.

In the town of Gates, on Sunday, May 22d, by Rev. H. Roberts, Mr. GILBERT GILLET, to Miss LAURINDA, daughter of Col. George Bowen.

DEATHS.

JAMES MADISON IS NO MORE! The last of the great lights of the revolution, the brightest of those great minds, which, like the pillar of fire of old, conducted the American Israel through the trials of the scarcely less important era following the Revolution, and gave to his country the repose, security and happiness of a wise, regular, stable and consolidated government; this pure and beautiful and benign light has at last sunk below the horizon, and is quenched forever in this world. Glorious indeed has been its long course, and though no more to be seen, it has left a radiance in the firmament at which his country will long gaze with admiration and gratitude.

For more than thirty years the name of JAMES MADISON, has more than that of any other living man, been associated, in the mind of United America, with the principles and the fabric of our government. He was the principal architect in its construction, if he did not lay its corner stone. He lived to see it endure many trials, survive great dangers, and to promise endurance for ages.

He died on the morning of Tuesday, 28th of June. He was born on the 16th of March, in the year 1751; and was of course when he died, of the patriarchal age of more than eighty-five years.

His end, visibly approaching for some days before, was such as that of a good and great man ought to be. His faculties undimmed till his latest hours, he expired without a struggle, free from pain, free from regret, and from cause of reproach.—National Intelligencer.

By drowning, near Ingham's Mills, in Manheim, June 4th, ALONZO, son of Jacob Powell, Esq. The deceased, in company with seven of his associates, in attempting to pass up the creek with a small boat, fell out where the water is supposed to be about twenty feet deep; and before he could be found his spirit had plumed its way to a brighter and better world. His funeral was attended at the Reformed Dutch church near Esq. Powell's, on the 13th ult., and the consolation of the Gospel of Christ exhibited to a large concourse of people, by the writer, from Rom. xv: 29. W. H. WAGGONER.

GREEN H. ROBERTS, son of Mr. Potter Roberts, of Otsego, aged 15 years, on the 18th of May last, crept into a hollow log to procure a measuring stick which had been placed there. While in the log, a tree which had nearly burned down, fell across the log, and so crushed the lad that he died on the Friday following, after enduring much pain and distress.

In the town of Brighton, May 25th, of consumption, Mrs. DIANA LEWIS, aged 37 years, consort of Mr. Zachariah Lewis. Sister Lewis was a firm, unwavering believer in the ultimate glory and felicity of a ransomed world. Death had no terrors for her—she was calm, serene and composed, believing death to be (as it really is) a friend and not an enemy. She has left an affectionate husband and seven children to mourn their loss. May God bless each and every mourning relative. Her funeral took place on the 26th, when the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer of this to the mourners and to an attentive congregation of sympathising friends and neighbors, from 2 Cor. v: 20. H. R.

In Rome, on Sunday, the 3d day of July, ANN ELIZA, consort of Orville Briggs, aged 28 years.

Near Canton, Onondaga county, June 28th, HENRY J. PAUL, son of Jacob Paul, in the 27th year of his age. He was taken with inflammation on the lungs, ten months before his death, which terminated in consumption. He bore his sufferings with Christian resignation, and died reconciled to God, and at peace with the world, for his faith was unwavering in the restitution of the whole human family.

The funeral was attended by Elder O. Morrel, of the Christian denomination, who ministered freely in the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning relatives and friends, in a discourse founded on Job xix: 25-27. The Christian meeting-house was opened, also, for their accommodation, and that spirit of good will and affection manifested, which is especially enjoined in the doctrine, precepts and example of our Redeemer—for which God will reward them.

PORTRAIT OF BR. THOMAS.

J. M. Butler and J. L. Gihon have issued proposals for publishing a portrait of Br. A. C. Thomas. Here follows the design:—

PROPOSALS

For publishing by subscription a PORTRAIT OF EV. ABEL CHARLES THOMAS, Pastor of the First Universalist church, Philadelphia.

The subscribers, having obtained permission, purpose publishing (should they receive sufficient patronage to warrant the undertaking) a Portrait of Evangelist Abel C. Thomas, in the following beautiful style:—

The engraving to be executed in a superior manner, in the Mezzotinto style, on a steel plate, by Mr. SARTAIN, of Philadelphia, from a painting by Mr. ROCKEY, recently exhibited at the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts—it is neatly printed on a quarto sheet of fine English imperial copperplate paper.

Persons wishing to obtain a copy of this engraving are assured that the only means for doing so will be by subscription, as it is not expected they will be offered for sale in any other way.

The price to subscribers will be one dollar per copy, payable on delivery.

All orders addressed to the subscribers, through the Postoffice will be thankfully received.

ORIGINAL ADDRESS TO FEMALES.

BY REV. J. WALLACE, OF POTSDAM.

(Published by request of the hearers.)

"Fear not Mary; for thou hast found favor with God." Luke i: 30.

"Favor with God"—blest antidote for fear!
Let all who read attend, and all who hear,
To this celestial "Tree of Life" repair,
And dissipate their doubts and darkness there.

'Tis not the language of a mortal voice,
Allays your fears and bids your hearts rejoice;
But 'tis the accent of an angel's tongue,
Who first on earth primeval being sung;
And now descends that being to attend,
Protector, guardian, benefactor, friend;
Announcing truth, eternal as the throne
From which it flows, the High and Holy One;
The great Creator, who in equal ways,
Is far exalted, high above all praise.
The message is from God, let every ear
Of all the tongues and nations, far and near,
In cheerful, willing, lively interest bend,
And to this gracious embassy attend.
Be now invited—open all your hearts,
To the instruction which the text imparts,
And let the deep impression brightly shine,
As written by the hand of truth divine.

My sisters in the faith of equal grace,
Whose minds enlarged by love divine, embrace
In arms of hope and charity, the whole
Possession of the Lord, from pole to pole;
With pure affection and submission due,
This joyful subject I address to you;
In which, a world redeem'd shall be survey'd,
And so fulfil the sacred pledge I made.
A pleasing hope is fondly entertained,
That I shall be in this attempt sustained
By approbation high, although I choose
To leave the path of prose, and court the muse,
And unassuming in this dress, convey
The lessons and instructions of the day:
And so arrange and organize my plan,
As not to lose the preacher in the man:
Nor in the man, the honest, faithful friend,
To teach, advise, admonish and defend
Your sacred rights, your character and name
Refine, and raise above reproach and blame.
To place the female in her native light—
Repel the wrong, and advocate the right;
The cause of injur'd innocence restore,
And spread the mantle of oblivion o'er
The errors of the head—be just and true,
And so award the meed of honor due,
To her whom God ordained by act of grace,
The mother of a ruined, ransomed race.
This mode of speech unusual, I select,
With every mark of deference and respect;
Attentive only duty to fulfil,
In this address, but call it what you will;
Oration, poem, sermon, 'tis the same,
With, or without the trappings of a name;
'Twill not offend, if only I the dart
Can so direct as to transfix the heart
With deep impressions, honest and refined,
And to the power of truth subdue the mind.
The text is rich, with heavenly wisdom filled;
The soil prolific, easy to be tilled;
The clime congenial, and the season fair,
Then let us to the ample field repair,
Armed for the work, our duty to fulfil,
Employ our wisdom and exert our skill;
Trusting the promise of the Lord to bless,
And crown our humble effort with success.

To youthful Mary, Abram's daughter blessed,
The gracious message mildly is addressed,
In language sweet as honey drops distil,

From rosy beds, and limpid as the rill
Descending from the lofty summits high,
Of cloud-capped mountains near the azure sky.
The angel said, be not alarmed with fear—
Hush every passion—lend a willing ear;
Rejoice, and praise, and magnify the grace
Obtained for you and all the human race.
'Tis thine to be the mother of a Son;
The promise of the High and Holy One;
The seed prolific of a harvest blest,
In which shall all the tribes of Adam rest.
"Favor with God"—unmeasur'd blessings flow
From this rich mine to all the earth below.
To this we shall our first attention lend;
Its doctrine develop, its grace attend;
Its duties demonstrate by reason clear;
Call all the ransomed of the Lord to hear;
And as I wisdom may possess, apply
The truth to every ear—to every eye.
Grant me the light of evangelic fire,
My mind illumine, my verse with truth inspire;
Teach me in flowing numbers to rehearse
My joyful theme and write in swelling verse.
In vain I tune the lyre, if Heaven refuse
To be the genius of my willing muse:
Grace I invoke—thy power efficient bring,
And let me drink salvation from thy spring:
Be thou my guide to life's immortal fount,
And fan my heart with zephyr's from the mount;
With pure ethereal breath my tongue inflame,
And from my lips inspire the song of fame;
Grant me but this—my tongue no more shall ask,
With joy I'll write and happy be the task.
Too long the bard has courted flattery's dream,
And kings and conquerors swell'd the idle theme;
Kingdoms must fall, and titles fade away,
And thrones and empires crumble to decay:
But what I write shall brave the wreck of time,
When worlds retire, shall still immortal shine.
These are the themes that flow from poesy's tongue,
And those the strains that poets long have sung:
My muse awakes to themes neglected long,
To nobler subjects and a richer song.
Woman, I write to vindicate your cause,
And sound your honest plaudits of applause;
With friendly hand wipe the ungenerous stain,
That long has soiled and tarnished your fair name—
That so your worth in native light may shine,
And you be honored to the end of time.
Your noble deeds shall swell the humble lay,
And all your shining excellence display:
Reproach no more shall heave your breast with sighs,

And tears no more shall dim your swelling eyes;
But happy millions shout your spotless name,
And glory in your bright untarnished fame.
Too long has man with cold unfeeling heart,
Instead of guardian, played the tyrant's part—
Charged you with all his evils here below—
With all his pain and complicated wo—
Spurned at your sex, as ready to deceive,
And for example pointed up to Eve—
Has made of you in every land a slave,
And wrote reproaches on you in your grave.
But I'll redeem by testimony strong,
Your name from censure, calumny and wrong;
Review the subject—bring the truth to light,
And judgment render, equal, just and right.

When time began, God the Creator spoke!
And the long reign of solemn silence broke—
Atoms obeyed—the sovereign mandate heard—
From chaos wild a world to view appeared!
Creation smiled—time into being sprung!
August event—the morning angels sung,
And rent the balmy air with loud acclaim,
In cheerful praise to the Almighty name,

Whose power creative angels all admired,
While joys unknown their happy bosoms fired.
This was of power, a bright, a new display,
The dawning of a long—long glorious day,
Which should to angels' wondering eyes unfold,
Surprising scenes, unheard, unknown, untold.
This was the happy era of that time,
Which long existed in the will divine,
That nature should begin—and man have birth,
The sovereign ruler of the happy earth.
Man then was lord—the world his empire made,
To reign as sovereign if he but obeyed
The easy dictates of his Maker's voice,
And made his laws and government his choice.
Love was his charter—but in love he failed,
And pain, and death, and misery him assailed.
Created happy, innocent and free,
Nought forbidden but one only tree.
The whole creation peaceful homage paid,
To man who was its lord and glory made:
And to complete his happy blissful state,
Woman was made his kind and loving mate;
The last best gift of God, the only wise,
To counsel, comfort, happy, advise;
To be the partner of his joyful care,
To taste his bounty and his blessings share.
In pleasing converse, innocence and joy,
Swift flew the hours and love was their employ;
In the fair garden, midst the rural bower,
They pruned the vine and dressed the purple flower:
No passions rankled in their peaceful breast,
And Love divine the happy couple blest.
Thus stood the first grand-parents of our race,
The equal sharers of Almighty grace:
They stood not long—'tis painful to relate—
Alas! they fell and lost their happy state!
Man's loving partner—but it so must be,
Put forth her hand and took the fatal tree;
And though deceived, she with a generous heart,
Divides the spoil and gave her husband part.
This was her crime—for this her sex and name,
Have borne too long reproach, disgrace and shame.
O, could I write with Heaven inspired flame,
I'd wipe reproach from woman's injured name;
Her character and worth again should shine,
In all its ancient lustre so divine.
Here I will pause, and short digression make,
To explain the facts the sacred books relate.

The apostle Paul, inspired with truth, hath said,
Adam was here a lively figure made
Of him that was to come to do the will
Of God on earth, and all his words fulfil.
Adam was not deceived, Paul did assert,
But all deception on the woman's part:
That Adam yielded as a volunteer,
To suffer with his wife transgression here;
To represent the all-enduring love
Of God to man, transmitted from above,
And in a suffering Saviour verified,
Who took our nature, bore our sins and died;
That so offenders might be made to bear
A part with him, and of his fulness share.
Adam was head, and from his yielding side,
The body came, in fashion of a bride.
As when a rib, so when a wife, she shone,
Flesh of his flesh the same, bone of his bone:
So she became his wife, in union one,
To represent our nature, by the Son
Of God redeemed, by restitution made,
A bride and body for this glorious head,
Who is ordained in Heaven's immortal plan
The spiritual head and heir of every man.

But to return. That Being great and wise,
Who made the world and arched the starry skies, Directs events according to his will,
And all his gracious purpose doth fulfil;

Did in the eternal counsels of his mind,
Decree extatic pleasure to the mind,
That all who lived, his glory should behold,
And feast on joys divine, unheard, untold;
That human minds with rapture, joy and love,
Should fill and overflow in realms above.
This was the purpose—thus it then must be,
And so in counsel passed the grand decree.

He who would look with eyes omniscient bright,
Supreme in wisdom, majesty and might;
Divinely rich, in mercy free and kind,
Will sure perform the purpose he designed.
In blooming Eden, innocent and fair,
Eternal Wisdom placed the happy pair;
And from that stock permitted to descend,
Unnumbered millions, countless, without end:
Too weak—too frail, immortal bliss to know,
But fitted to enjoy this clime below.
But Eden's joys, its innocence and love,
Are mean compared with life divine above;
Joys far beyond what mortals could receive,
Taste or enjoy, imagine, or conceive;
And had man still in earthly nature stood,
He'd never known this far superior good.
If man by woman lost his portion here,
By her, God blessed him more abundant there:
What though the pleasures of this mortal state,
Were lost by woman when the fruit she ate?
They are too mean, unworthy of a thought,
To be compared with joys that woman brought—
Bliss far above, these reptile joys below,
As heaven is higher than the realms of woe.
Unthinking man, contrasted in his sphere,
Would be content with grovelling pleasures here,
And rudely murmur at a moment's pain,
Though joys immortal it for him obtain—
Calls woman still the author of his care,
And all the burdens of his sufferings bear;
And thus to her imputed long has been,
All guilt and evil, infamy and sin.

Here let me pause a moment and reflect,
Upon the evil and its dire effect
On all mankind, since the first human pair,
Lost Eden and their happy standing there.
With scrutinizing eye look back through time,
And view the effect of that one single crime;
See how the poison rankled to a flame,
And rose to murder in the breast of Cain.
See wars and tumults, rumors and alarms,
Destroy mankind and raise the world in arms—
Deceit and malice, rancor, hate and rage,
All peace destroy, and bitter every age;
Pride and ambition, envy uncontrolled,
With baneful avarice—the love of gold—
Have changed the nobler passions of the heart,
And man reduced to act the tyrant's part.
Treason, rebellion, arrogance and strife,
Consume his days, and waste his mortal life;
Suspicion, envy, jealousy severe,
Tortmenting anguish and desponding fear,
Waste his sad hours in grief, despair and woe,
While streaming tears in bitter anguish flow.
Treacherous kinsmen and disloyal friends,
Betray his trust—his aching bosom rends
With gloomy grief, and melancholy care
Preys on his mind, a victim to despair,
And man becomes the inveterate foe of man,
And through the world the moral evil ran.
Thus all these evils to a vast amount,
Are charged, O woman, all to your account,
The fatal taste of that forbidden tree,
Brought all this burden of disgrace on thee,
Alas, too true! the fact I'll not evade
But plead that you have richly overpaid
The heavy debt, a thousand thousand fold,
And brought man blessings countless and untold.

Will any dare in reason's face advance,
And charge all wisdom to the hand of chance?
Think uncreated wisdom could not trace
All good and evil that has taken place,
With all events transpiring here below,
Say ye, eternal knowledge did not know?
It would be arrogance presuming blind,
To charge such weakness to the perfect Mind:
He who all worlds and beings did create,
Did he not know their life and future state?

What the effect of all his works would be,
Which he directed by a wise decree?
No disappointment can his plans derange,
Nor can they fail by accident or change.
Established well, the counsels of his mind
Control events, all worlds and beings bind:
Good in design—in execution grand,
Declare his will and shall forever stand.

Here I again the liberty will take,
And to explain, a short digression make,
That so the female character may shine,
As honored in the plan of grace divine.
When the first guilty pair in Eden blamed,
Was at the bar of God on earth arraigned,
And judgment passed on all—"Return to dust," Still unrevoked, unmitigated just.
In that decisive all-important hour,
Upon the tempting, adverse, serpent power,
Whose wily arts the race of man betrayed,
A standing, heavy malediction laid;
In which a gift, a blessing lay concealed,
To be in ages long to come revealed.
Thus the Almighty to the serpent said,
The woman's son shall bruise thy reptile head;
Thy scepter break—thy works and power destroy,
And give man life and liberty and joy.
In this enigma, we behold a ray
Of light, increasing to a perfect day
Of honor in reserve, designed to crown
The female head with glory and renown.
The Angel said, to her by ages blamed,
Fear not, for you the favor have obtained
Of God, which is of wealth all price above,
The gift of life, the pledge of endless love.
O, could I here the boundless scene survey;
This treasure in a mortal balance weigh—
Foot up the items—cast the mighty sum
Of all the glory in the world to come—
Unlock the treasures of the love of God—
The fulness of his blessings spread abroad,
All moral evil here, reproach and blame,
Would dwindle down unworthy of a name,
The light of truth with purifying flame,
Will ransom and redeem your injured name;
In human life your forfeit rights restore,
And give you honors as you had before
The gloomy darkness of that evil day,
When fell temptation led your steps astray.

Then let the preacher here without offence,
Duty, as well as Gospel truth dispense,
And so persuade the whole of female birth,
To prize and estimate their moral worth;
To rise above the stigma of offence,
And so enjoy of life the present tense.
I would not flatter, but I would persuade,
As preaching and persuasion is my trade,
The female to improve her active mind,
To patronise the virtues of mankind;
Improve your powers, your energies direct;
Vice to dissuade, and errors to detect;
Exert your growing influence to reform
Domestic life—the social state adorn;
Cast in the ponderous weight of all your skill,
The moral waste of man to fence and till;
Truth moral and divine with zeal embrace,
And as the benefactors of your race,
Be strong in right—submit to nothing wrong—
Restore the wandering—lead the blind along,
And let the light of your example rise,
As yonder sun illuminates the skies.
In every place through all the social state,
The power and influence of your name is great;
In infancy and age alike your hand,
Can sovereign sway the scepter of command;
What you approve, will be by man admired,
And by your spirit he will be inspired:
If vice you disapprove—he will forsake—
If virtue you approve—he will awake:
Frown on profanity, and it will fly—
Intemperance too, if you command, must die.
The loose, licentious, idle and impure,
Speak but a word, and they receive a cure:
Invite, and thousands with a yielding heart,
Will hear, obey and take an active part,
In the expulsion of their mortal foe,
And lead mankind to happiness below.

But not by shields of brass or coats of mail,
Or polished arms of steel, can you assail
The human heart entrenched in habits strong,
And from their hold expel the rebel throng.
The arms and armor for your use designed,
Is of a moral, not a carnal kind.
Persuasion, meekness, innocence and love,
Will in your hands a combination prove;
The force of which, the heart of man will feel,
With more effect than all the power of steel.
This is your armor, boldly put it on;
March to the field, the victory is won:
The hearts of millions are prepared to crown
Success with fadeless laurels of renown.

"Favor with God" kind mothers, matrons, maids,
Virtue alone exalts—'tis vice degrades:
The meek and humble shall exalted be,
To peace and pleasure in the first degree.
Already is begun the sweet employ—
Already you begin to share the joy—
The meed of praise already is prepared,
By virtue sounded and by virtue shared.
Not in noisy tumult of debate—
Not in the camp of war—or halls of state—
Not in the cabinet, nor in the field,
Was woman's softer hand designed to wield,
Of power the scepter, or of arts the skill,
But in retirement humbly to fulfil
The far less splendid, but more useful part,
Of training the affections of the heart—
Subduing passion, and refining mind,
Is the true province Heaven for you designed.
Resume your places in the moral world;
Be wide the banner of your rights unfurled;
Be not afraid; 'tis the appointed time,
The light appears, awake, arise, and shine!
Truth calls for faith—the still small voice obey;
Hope points to Heaven, and duty leads the way;
The word is onward—let your light abound,
And charity diffuse her blessings round.
"Fear not," your cause is good—it will prevail,
Though bigots frown, and zealots loudly rail;
Denounce who may, one truth is well sustained,
The grace of God and favor you've obtained.
A voice divine, articulate and clear,
From Heaven addressed, salutes a mortal ear;
Refreshing and consoling as the light,
That wakes creation from the reign of night;
Reflecting beauty on the dewy vale,
And breathing music on the balmy gale.
"Mary, all hail! thine be the glory given,
Thus to receive the high behest of Heaven.
From the eternal beatific throne,
I come commissioned by the Holy One:
Credentials all divine and unto thee,
Make known the royal pleasure and decree;
The word of promise to the saints of old;
By lips of truth predicted and foretold,
On affirmation high, thus saith the Lord,
Be not afraid—behold the sacred word,
Humble in flesh, shall for a blessing come,
And thou shalt be the mother of a son,
Of high extraction and of royal birth,
Anointed Prince and heir of all the earth;
Holy and high he shall to all proclaim.
The will of God, and Jesus be his name,
The Empire of his grace shall long endure,
And life eternal be established sure."
"Mary, fear not," a sentimental treat,
With spiritual blessings ample and complete:
Dispel your doubts and dissipate your fears—
Allay your sorrows—wipe away your tears,
For grace and truth descends to elevate
The deep depression of your mortal state.

Thus far my theme—I write, but much remains,
Important more, demanding loftier strains—
More perfect skill, and higher gifted pen;
Glory to God—on earth good will to men—
A pleasing task my willing time employs;
A subject grand, and rich with future joys:
Mankind redeemed—a ruined world restored,
Will to the pen a richer theme afford;
Long on this theme, delighted let me dwell,
And woman praise, for she deserves it well.
On mortal ears, a voice from Heaven broke;
All nature listened while th' Eternal spoke;

"Behold the man, I in my image made,
By serpentine subtilty betrayed,
And though by woman sin and sorrow came,
By her shall man diviner blessings gain,
Than those betrayed by some inveterate foe,
Or could have known in paradise below.
Mankind I made the children of my care,
And they shall still my loving kindness share;
Though earth's to them by disobedience lost,
And human life by toil and suffering crost.
Though they must taste of sorrow, sin and shame,
My love to them in mercy is the same;
And man to save I have a ransom found,
And grace and blessings shall to him abound:
What came by Eve, by her shall be undone.
The seed of woman he shall be my Son—
One of a virgin born, ye shall adore,
And he to me again shall all restore."
Thus far the counsel of his love revealed,
Then ceased—and wisdom all the rest concealed.
This glorious promise happy thoughts inspired,
And mankind long reflected and admired,
With pious reverence on the love divine,
That should abound to save all Adam's line.
In God's appointed way it shall be done,
In the long fulness of the times to come.
With faith and patience they did wait of old,
And earnest looked the promise to behold:
Women did then in faith and pious care,
Esteem it honor many sons to bear,
Each hoped they might be made the happy one,
That should conceive and bear the promised Son.
For this they long with patient minds did wait,
And suffered not their ardor to abate,
Till he appeared, for whom they long had prayed,
And was the subject of the promise made.

Here let us view with scrutinizing eye,
The world of grace, the moral earth and sky;
The fields of truth, that blooming spread away,
And take of prophecy a wide survey.
Our compass is the sure unerring word,
Our line of measure a "Thus saith the Lord";
With these we shall true mensuration make,
Of all things God by holy prophets spake
Concerning the redemption by his Son,
Since nature and the reign of time begun.
The old creation rises into view,
A clear and striking transcript of the new:
The teeming earth—the starry heavens high,
In proof of grace, are summoned to supply,
With testimony strong the human mind,
Of what is by the love of God designed,
For man redeemed from earth to heaven, and there
The glorious image of himself to bear.
Moses addressed the universal ear;
Summons all heaven, and all the earth to hear
The proclamation issued from the Throne,
And made on earth by revelation known.
The subject is to every eye addressed;—
"Look unto me and be ye saved and blessed;
Behold the grace and glory of the plan,
The testimony of my will to man;
Confirmed before of God in Christ, and sealed,
And by the prophets' flaming tongues revealed."
Thus Moses, the salvation shall be like—
Not the dark, cheerless, dismal gloom of night—
Not like raging whirlwinds angry form—
Not like the pitiless fury of the storm—
Not like the blighting mildew or the blast,
That lays the reaper's expectation waste—
Not like the haggard visage of despair—
Not like the pining poverty of care—
Not like the ways of man, or raging flood,
Nor like the vengeance of an angry God:
But like the crystal light of dawning day,
When Phœbus spreads abroad his morning ray:
Like cloudless skies, mildly serene and fair—
Like spicy odors in the balmy air—
Like early showers of gently falling rain—
Like pearly dew drops on the flowery plain—
Like teeming earth, prolific with supply,
Meat for all mouths—beauty for each eye!

So wisdom paints the kingdom of the Lord,
And spells the name of Jesus in his word.
Behold the Shiloh comes divinely blest,
The author of salvation and of rest;

The scepter from his hand shall not depart,
Till every eye shall see, and every heart,
In cheerful, willing, happy homage bend,
And own him Lord of all, Redeemer, Friend.
Recorded by Isaiah's ready pen,
And for instruction handed down to men;
The Lord of hosts, according to his will,
Upon the lofty heights of Zion's hill,
By hand of grace, shall rich provision make,
And freely all the earth-born race partake.
All unbelief, the moral darkness here,
From every human heart shall disappear;
The tears of sorrow cease from every eye,
And death abolished, shall forever fly—
No more the empire of his power maintain,
And cease o'er man, forever cease to reign.
The deep reproach of sin he will remove,
From all the people of his boundless love.
Thus saith the Lord, with high, uplifted hand—
While all the nations wait on his command,
"Look unto me, for I am God alone;
Salvation is the mandate of my throne;
My word on oath is pledged, that unto me,
Shall every tongue confess, and every knee,
In free submission to my scepter bend,
From the creation to the final end,
When day and night give their dominion o'er,
And rolling times revolve again no more."
Another witness elevates his voice,
And bids the howling wilderness rejoice;
The blind shall see—the deaf shall hear his name—
The dumb shall sing—the feeble and the lame,
In strength renewed, leap like the bounding roe,
And streams of life in barren deserts flow;
The ransomed of the Lord, their steps retrace,
And find in him a happy dwelling place.

Another witness, competent and true,
Gives in his ample testimony, too:
The rolling stone shall to a mountain rise;
Fill all the earth and rise unto the skies;
Its light and glory shine on all below,
And like a stream all people to it flow.
Once more—the burden on him shall be laid;
And for all sin a sacrifice be made;
The merit of his life and death alone,
Is all-sufficient—ample to atone,
By grace applied, impartial and direct,
And universal health the grand effect.
Four times five centuries of years twice told,
Must roll away, ere they shall him behold:
The time unknown—they waited the delay,
And longed to see the rising of that day,
Which then but dawned, but brighter did appear,
As ages rolled the promised season near.
Dim was the vision through long years of night,
They saw but darkly with imperfect sight,
The rays of promise which but dimly shone,
Through types and shadows it was only known:
As time advanced, the prospect brighter grew,
Light more resplendent burst upon the view;
"One shall on earth appear that's free from sin,"
The spirit said, "and all shall come to him—
Confess him Lord, and bend the suppliant knee, Allegiance swear and happy subjects be.
Lo! on the mountain, one with beauteous feet,
Comes with glad tidings affable and sweet:
Behold I make upon my holy hill,
A feast divine which shall all people fill;
I will return the ransomed nations home,
And all the kindreds of the earth shall come,
Redeemed from sin, with songs of heavenly joy,
And praise forever all their tongues employ.
See their chastisement heavy on him laid,
And he for them a mighty ransom paid:
All kindred, people, tongues, of every clime,
Are his by right of legacy divine,
On him bestowed, creation long before,
To save, reheal, to reconcile, restore:
Here he must reign according to decree,
Till the full travail of his soul he'll see."
Thus brighter beams illumed the rising day,
And types and misty shadows passed away;
Before the light thick clouds of darkness flew,
As rolling ages brought the truth to view.
Near and more near—the veil must soon be rent,
And laboring time groaned with the grand event—

At length fulfilled—the all auspicious morn
Appears, when great Messiah must be born.
Refulgent lustre burst in every eye;
Brightness resplendent reillumined the sky,
Peace o'er the world her flag of white unfurled,
And Mary gave a Saviour to the world.

All hail to earth! the promised seed has come;
The glorious work of grace is now begun;
It shall progress and executed be,
Till all is made from sin and sorrow free.
Hail grand event! all favored woman hail!
Your fame restored, shall sound on every gale;
Your precious gift shall swell the poet's lay,
And to your name deserved honor pay:
Paeans of praise round the wide earth shall ring,
And bards unborn your future praises sing:
Your matchless fame thro' every realm shall fly,
And heaven resound the echo from the sky:
The sea shall hear, and round the distant pole,
To every nation shall the tidings roll;
All kindreds of the earth with joy shall hear
Your sounding glory and your gift revere.
What man, by you, did lose in Eden shade,
Is twice ten million times by you repaid.
The Saviour blessed, that matchless babe of thine,
Shall raise this mortal to a state divine;
Though him shall blessings of superior kind,
Flow from on high and fill the human mind:
His healing hand shall temper and abate,
The rage of monarchs and the jars of state;
Ensanguin'd war throughout the world shall cease,
And be succeeded by the reign of peace;
Envenomed reptiles shall no more destroy,
Nor beasts of prey man's peaceful steps annoy;
The curse removed, the fertile earth shall yield,
Abundant harvests on the untill'd field;
Perfumes and odors breathe on every gale,
And beauty blossom on the flow'ry vale:
Returning health shall smile on every breeze,
And fruit innoxious load the bending trees;
In gentle streams shall healthful waters flow,
And on their verdant banks spontaneus grow,
The healing plant, medicinal with power
To heal, to strengthen, stimulate, restore
Decaying strength, invigorate and strong,
And to longevity man's days prolong.
Mankind no more in infancy of age,
Shall fall untimely off life's active stage;
But nursed in virtue, innocence and peace,
Shall grow and prosper, multiply, increase,
Till earth a countless multitude shall see,
And all its surface occupied shall be.

Hail long expected, glorious day to come,
When these events prophetic shall be done;
My eyes enraptured with delight, survey,
That happy era—that auspicious day,
When all is peace, and every blot and stain,
Is wiped away from your long tarnished name.
Your name restored, much injured sex, I greet,
And your memorial shall to me be sweet;
Inspired by you I strike the tuneful lay,
And to your name a willing tribute pay.
In this grand scene you've acted well your part;
Expressed the native kindness of your heart:
You gave to man a Saviour kind and free;
Fed from your breast and dandled on your knee;
With fond maternal kindness did caress,
And rear a Saviour who the world should bless.
I note the fact as worthy of record,
That women best obeyed and served the Lord;
In high degree, to them, he honor paid,
And many rich communications made.
Through all his sufferings, and afflictions sore,
Him they did succor, reverence and adore;
When want distressed him, they were not afraid
To lend him freely their benignant aid;
And while on earth the Saviour here remained,
He was by them best loved and entertained;
And when for man he drank the cup of death,
They wept his fate and mourned with pious breath.
By them his wants were pitied and supplied,
While man with cruel mockery him denied.
Him man despised, dishonored and betrayed,
But was by them loved, honored and obeyed.
While here on earth they listened to his voice,
And at his resurrection did rejoice.

For this attention, they were honored well,
As all the Bible testimonies tell,
Which I may here in sober truth relate,
And to my hearers application make,
That all may know and understand the cause,
Why woman is the subject of applause;
And why in her behalf make this appeal,
And labor thus with warm untiring zeal.
Here I will state the simple facts in brief,
And draw the figure true in bold relief.

The promise first was unto woman given;
Of her was born the Lord of earth and heaven;
His wounds supplied through life, and on his head
The sacred ointment, sweet memorial, shed.
When dying on the cross, by nail and spear,
She shed for him the sympathizing tear;
With costly spices, myrrh and incense sweet,
Embalmed his body in his winding sheet:
When he arose—did first to her appear;
And first announced salvation in her ear;
She was the first the tidings to impart—
The first to banish sorrow from the heart
Of the disciples, who through grief and care,
Deeply depressed, were sinking in despair.
"The Lord is risen indeed"—did first proclaim,
And these are facts in honor of her name.
Thus woman's kindness to the Saviour, Friend,
Shall wide the veil of charity extend,
With friendship, love and tenderness to hide,
The native frailties with her sex allied.
Her name no more shall bear the stain of crime,
But in its own refulgent lustre shine;
All eyes shall see and every tongue shall own,
The rich immortal blessings of her Son;
Peace to the world and honor to her name,
Shall blow with joy the future trump of fame;
Sweet notes of praise the muse's theme shall swell,
And bard to bard the happy tidings tell;
Harmonious numbers warble on the string,
Till every tongue in sweet accordance sing
A world restored—and man from suffering free,
See face to face, and eye to eye shall see;
United all, and knowing as they're known—
Exalt her fame in reverence of her Son—
Immortal music charm the listening ear,
And light divine the distant realms shall cheer,
One Lord shall rule and every tongue shall own
His right to reign and worship near his throne:
The prayer of faith fulfill'd, "Thy kingdom come;"
The covenant confirmed, on earth is done;
All Adam's race shall bend the willing knee,
In that blessed day, and happy, happy be.

The favor found with God—Now without fear,
As doctrine true I've demonstrated clear:
"Fear not"—on this a few remarks bestow,
The cause exhibit, and the reason show.
Professed preachers every where appear
Whose several systems all depend on fear—
Fear is with them the first, and fear the last—
Fear is the present, future, and the past—
And like the serpent busy round your ears
Excite your passions and alarm your fears.
"Not be afraid! fie on such folly, fie!
Not be afraid! rank heresy," they cry—
Say they, if you would reach the blessed abode,
You, first of all, must be afraid of God—
If you desire to get religion here,
You must be sad, lament, despair and fear—
If you in peace would yield your mortal breath,
Must all your lifetime be afraid of death;
Sin to avoid and evil to eschew,
Must own, believe, and fear the devil too;
And as you hope at death, in heaven to dwell,
Long as you live, must be afraid of hell.

Strange, passing strange—and strange beyond degree,

That men will be so blind as not to see
The light of truth, by revelation given,
And brighter than the noon-day light of heaven.
The Gospel is designed to dry your tears—
Dispel your sorrows, and abolish fears.
But we'll compare for once what angels teach,
With what these serpent missionaries preach.

"Fear not"—the angel unto Mary said,
"For thou shalt bear a Son, in whom the dead

Shall rise again, for unto them is given,
Eternal life, under the seal of Heaven."
"Fear not"—resounded o'er the Jewish plains;
Soft and consoling as angelic strains,
"For unto you is born, of royal birth,
A Saviour, Lord and heir of all the earth."
To his disciples much alarmed with fear,
Himself to them addressed, "Be of good cheer,"
And unto them in soothing accents said,
Behold me here—"Tis I, be not afraid."
"Fear not"—the angel unto Joseph spake;
"And unto thee a wife of Mary make;
For she shall be the mother of the Lord,
According to the prophet's holy word."
"Fear not," to woman, when the Saviour rose,
An angel said, their sorrows to compose—
"He's risen again; behold, he is not here; Resign your terrors and dismiss your fear."
If you believe in fear, fear will control
Your faith, your works and deepenslave your soul.
'Tis a base passion, unallied to love,
And hostile to the wisdom from above.
Then do not fear, but choose the better part,
To grace, and truth, and peace resign your heart—
Search and compare, be wise to understand
The Gospel precept, and the law command.
Be fixed in purpose—turn not soon away,
With every wind and doctrine of the day;
What you profess, be not ashamed to own,
But let your faith before the world be known;
The cause of truth by lip and life maintain,
Though bigots frown and zealots loud declaim;
Be not afraid to stem the foaming tide
Of fashion, popularity and pride;
Churches may spurn and idle priests may frown,
Be not afraid, live opposition down;
The tongue of slander, set on fire of hell,
Quench in the living stream of doing well;
By virtue, truth and grace, disarm the foe,
And let the haughty opposition know,
In face of all the world, you're not afraid,
To trust the strength of your profession made.

My subject now to its conclusion draws;
Your name, your place, your character and cause,
I've labored with becoming zeal to clear
Of all unjust reproach upon them here.
I now submit, and to you make appeal,
Will you in turn sustain with equal zeal,
The truth of facts in this address surveyed,
By living up to the assertions made?
Without offence, may I to you declare,
—And you will with me as a preacher bear—
To all, widow, matron, maid and wife,
The law of honor is a woman's life.
To this attend and be with glory crowned,
For you with God have endless favor found.

ANOTHER FALSEHOOD.

Messrs. EDITORS—In looking over a late number of the "Union Herald," a paper lately established in the village of Oswego, and edited by the notorious revivalist, Luther Myrick, I perceived an article entitled "A voice from the West," from which I make the following extract. The writer of said article, after having stated that in "almost every settlement in the West, numbers may be found, who once belonged to churches in the East—were zealous and useful; but have given up their hopes and become infidels, Universalists, or are dead—yea, twice dead and plucked up by the roots;" proceeds to relate the following anecdote.

"One little incident, (says the writer,) that occurred in one of these settlements, I will relate—use it if you please. A student was invited to spend a Sabbath in an Universalist society, formed chiefly of those who once hoped for salvation, only through faith and repentance. A Universalist preached in the forenoon, and the student was to speak in the afternoon. After opening the meeting, he selected the fourth chapter of the 1st epistle of John. He used the Universalist Bible, [!] bearing the owner's name in large letters on the outside; so that all could not fail to know whose Bible it was. The Universalists seemed much delighted with such a loving chapter, till he came to the 17th verse; the student then emphasized as he read, 'that we may have boldness in the day of'—something; I should think it was 'judgment'! though it is crossed in the book: perhaps it is an interpolation! The Universalist minister sat close by his side, and seemed much disturbed. He began to speak but choked—then hemmed a few times, and hung his head for shame, while the student read on.

"Thus it is, that these deceivers, under the instruction of their father, who was a liar from the beginning, learn to pervert God's truth, or, as circumstances may suit, cross it out. You see what a fine Universalist text it is, by first crossing 'in the day of judgment.' The same Bible was marked up in a similar way, in various other places. Our Universalist friends are reminded that they might save themselves all this trouble, if they would only have a revised edition that should exclude such passages; for surely they need a different edition from ours to prove their doctrine."

Thus readeth the extract, upon which the sapient Editor remarks as follows:—"Would it not be better for the poor creatures to burn up the OLD BOOK, and thus get rid of it at once, and with it, their troubles?"

Now, brethren, did you ever, in all your life, hear a more barefaced, malignant and wilful slander told respecting any religious denomination? A Universalist crossing out words in his Bible! a tale only worthy to be promulgated by the Rev. Luther Myrick!! But what is the reason the writer did not state definitely the place where, and the time when, this transaction took place; also the name of the Universalist minister who was so wonderfully dumb-founded? Can any reason be given, other than this, that, like converted Universalists, no "local habitation or a name" could be given? Can anything further be said of the story than, that it is a "tale told" by a student, "full of sound and fury signifying nothing"?

In conclusion, I would recommend to the especial perusal of the writer of the foregoing extract, the 8th verse of the 21st chapter of Revelations; and to the Editor of the "Herald," the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians.

Baldwinsville, July 7, 1836.

REMARK.

The dear fellow overshot the mark. In his great anxiety to make Universalists appear odious, he heaps on us two charges, one of which contradicts the other. 1. That we have a Universalist Bible; and 2. That we have to erase words in our Bible to make it prove Universalism! Perhaps the writer is a young hand at the slandering business, and will improve by practice, as he grows older in iniquity. But if not, some one more cunning should revise his articles for him. Mr. Myrick must be rather careless to be the Editor of such a paper. But thus it is—God taketh the wise of this world in their own craftiness, and turns the way of the wicked upside down.

CHURCH IN ADRIAN, MICH.

Brs. GOSH AND HUTCHINSON—A meeting was held here on Wednesday and Thursday, June 23d and 24th, at which time our church was recognized. Br. Curtis received ordination, as an evangelist—two brethren received the ordinance of water baptism—and fourteen brethren and sisters, with joyful hearts, sat down together in commemoration of the dying love of our Lord and Saviour, for the first time here.

Brs. N. Stacy, D. R. Biddlecom and J. Lockwood were present. Four discourses were delivered—two by Br. Stacy and two by Br. Biddlecom—Br. Lockwood assisting in the devotional exercises.

The number of members in our society is forty-eight, a part of whom will doubtless join the church.

I feel much more encouraged respecting the prosperity of our cause here, than I have felt at any time before: as the spirit of pure, genuine Christianity is now apparent among us, and where this is found our success is no longer doubtful. You will certainly agree with me, that it is a matter of far more joy, to be made in any measure the instrument of awaking the spirit and power of religion, even in a small number of individuals, than to be instrumental in raising up a large society of mere nominal believers.

I rejoice in the hope that our brethren in general, throughout the country, are becoming sensible of the necessity of an improvement among our people in this particular. They have been sufficiently instructed in the doctrinal part of our religion; I think it is now time to turn our attention more particularly to experimental and practical culture. And I bless the name of God that our ministry are in general of the same opinion. I have lived to see the denomination more numerous than I ever expected to see it, when I entered the ministry of reconciliation, some nine years ago; were I permitted to live to the common age of man: but now, should I be permitted to reach my appointed three score and ten, I expect to see the number more than double what it now is. Truly "the Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

Religion, the pure, spiritual, primitive religion of the Gospel is now what we stand in need of; in order to reap any real advantage from our success; and to ensure our future prosperity. Without this solid foundation, I am satisfied that no society can be sustained for any length of time; and with it, the gates of hell cannot prevail against us. Indeed, it seems to me a useless business to raise up societies, and even become a numerous denomination, (if the thing were possible,) if our people are not made better Christians on account of it.

Finally, brethren, pray for us: that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is with you. Farewell, Adrian, June 25, 1836. A. H. CURTIS.

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. VI.

BY EV. JASON LEWIS.

I SHOULD REGRET TO SEE the Clinton Liberal Institute fail for want of necessary funds.

I should regret to see the Magazine and Advocate, or any other Universalist periodical, expire for want of patronage.

I should regret to see the success of any measure tending to effect a union of Church and State, or to endanger the union of the United States.

I should regret to see any measures taken for spreading the Gospel among the Heathen, if I believed that the greater part of them would be endlessly damned in consequence of rejecting it, while all would have been saved had they been allowed to remain in ignorance.

I should regret to see any evidence of a future state of existence, if I expected to witness, in that state, the endless torment of even the vilest sinner that ever lived.

I should regret to see a strife amongst Universalist clergymen to determine who should be accounted the greatest.

I should regret to see the Universalist denomination rent in pieces by intestine divisions.

CIRCULAR.

TO ALL UNIVERSALISTS:

Brethren and Sisters—The second annual session of the Allegany Association has been held—again have we been permitted to mingle and take sweet counsel together—to meditate upon the continued and ever-continuing tokens of our heavenly Father's parental regard—to contemplate the richness of his love as displayed in the Gospel of Christ to a wanting world—to encourage and assist one another in the good work of promoting the Redeemer's kingdom—to have our minds expanded, our hearts gladdened, our hopes brightened, our faith strengthened, and our zeal stimulated and increased. We have met from the different parts of our Associational territory, have commingled our worshippings in the sanctuary of our God, and have felt and tasted the overflowing of the goodness of that Being whose "tender mercies are over all his works."

We feel encouraged. Liberal principles have arisen in the strength and glory of the Most High, and the partisans of human creeds cannot prevail against them; and bigotry, bondage and traditional errors are shrinking beneath the regenerating influence of the still small voice of the religion of universal love. Soon, we trust, will this wilderness region rejoice and blossom as the rose.

Our sanctuary services were very well attended, notwithstanding the unpleasantness of the weather and the badness of the roads. A goodly number of our opposing friends were present, some of whom had never before listened to the words of life as we declare them. We trust the seed fell upon good ground, and pray that God may grant an abundant increase.

Brethren! it is ours to sow the seeds of Gospel truth, and to "water the plants which our heavenly Father hath planted;" and though it is for him to overrule the results and give the increase, yet if we would see the doctrine we profess to love prosper—if we would see it "run and be glorified," we should be more practical imitators of God. Let us, then, one and all, live as though we felt the influence of our sentiments; let us be UNIVERSALISTS. And then all will be well. For when we shall have adorned our profession with a corresponding walk and conversation, we shall cease to be a reproach to our neighbors—a scorn and derision to those round about us: then shall we be freed from the vilification and contumely of an unsanctified world.

Per order, T. P. ABELL.

THE UTILITARIAN.

ATHEISM.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good?"—Ps. iv: 6.

Under the head of atheism, though not properly belonging to it, I shall for the sake of convenience, include skepticism and pantheism generally, as well as the absolute denial of a Deity, or the direct belief that there is no God. And while I speak with all plainness, and unreserve of their sentiments, or want of faith in, and worship of a Deity, I wish to be considered as treating the individuals with all that kindness, respect or compassion, which their feelings, moral worth, or wants can possibly claim. Also, while I freely argue and point out what I believe to be the natural and inevitable tendency of skepticism or atheism, in every shape and form, I do not wish to be understood that it has yet had, or that it certainly will have its full effect on every individual embracing it—but that such is its tendency—such its natural and legitimate results, in whole or in part, according as they may or may not be restrained by counteracting and better influences. These remarks premised, let us proceed to the work in hand.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good" in having any system of religion; or in engaging in any acts of religious worship?

Such, to my mind at least, is the language of that universal skepticism of our day, which, however, candid in all temporal things, admits no religious tenet, however clear—which, however its abettors may maintain the general systems of astronomy, philosophy, chemistry, etc., reasons against all systems of religion as equally absurd and incomprehensible. Many men who embrace this spirit, will receive any fact recorded in profane history without a scruple as to the validity of human testimony; but in religious matters, they will require the testimony of one, or more, or all of their five senses. Some of them change systems of unbelief, every new opponent they meet—use arguments the most contradictory, at various times—and deny truths they themselves have advanced, but a short time before, as self-evident—in short, scruple not to use any argument however false, or to profess any whim, however absurd and little believed, if they can only thereby confound the religionist they are, for the time being, engaged with. I charge but some—a few, probably—with such conduct—with inconsistency and change in every thing, except in their general skepticism—with being reasonable and ready to believe evidence on every subject, except the single one of religion. Instances might be given—but it is presumed that every one who has had to do with skeptics has found enough to render their mention unnecessary.

Such is the character of that spirit of skepticism which prompts the question, Who will show us any good in being religious in thought or feeling?

In reply, I would state, that I believe in such a thing as religion—in religion of some kind—because I deem man to be naturally a religious being. I am aware when I make this statement that there are a few who will deny it—but I see at the same time that their denial will lead to the same conclusion. For if it be a principle instilled by education—derived from others—the universal diffusion and existence thereof will impel to the conclusion, that man must, in the primitive ages, have learned it by experience, or been taught it by revelation. And in either case, the existence of the principles of religion, and an object or objects recognized by those principles, must be established.

When I say man is naturally a religious being, I would not be understood to say that he is born with an innate knowledge thereof—but that he is endowed with an internal capacity for its reception—or, if you prefer the definition, an internal organization which shall lead him to desire and to seek such knowledge. For how else shall we account for the universality of religion? In what age or period of the world has it been unknown—or in what nation and clime has it been unacknowledged and unfelt? Go to the poor African scorching under his sultry sky, ignorant of most of the arts necessary to sustain life in every other land, because God has been pleased most liberally to provide for him without them—or go to the same being rudely torn from his happy home and carried into a slavery which leaves no time for any thought unconnected with his wearied frame and bitter drudgery! His fetish, worshipped to guard him from harm—his belief in the Obeah man, at once his tyrant, physician and priest—and his hundred other idolatries and yearnings for some great and invisible power, will tell you that there—even there—nature, or if you please, education has been at work—for there is the principle of religion just waked into a faint, a living spark. Will it be said that these are remnants of the more civilized systems of religion, which were held and practiced by their ancestors, when Carthage was queen of the world, and Africa ranked where Europe now does among the quarters of the globe? How comes it then, that all is lost but this principle—that the spirit of their ancient kings, and sages, and heroes, and lawgivers is extinct, while that of their priests still lives on?—that even memory has forgotten, and tradition utterly lost all remembrance of the fountain from whence this principle flowed? Will you ascribe it to an internal principle of human organization? Do so, and you admit that religion is natural to man.

Yes, man in every age, in every country, has a desire—an innate faculty for religion; and in every age, in every nation, he has found it, in some shape or other—impure, imperfect, and much deficient, it is true—but still the spark has been kindled, the fuel has been prepared, and sooner or later the blaze will burn brightly, pointing to heaven in purity and gratitude, from the altar of every human heart created of God. Religion of some kind is natural to man—and man, if he would not be most unhappy, must conform to nature.

The demand—the desire—the yearning for a religion may be resisted and suppressed for a time, by any one hardy enough to make the trial—by some more easily than by others—for all are not equally strongly inclined to and prepared for its embrace. But when circumstances arise to wake this desire from its dormancy, think you not that it will rage to anguish because of its former suppression? Oh, look at the scoffer at religion when drawn into the destructive and intoxicating whirl of a modern revival! No faith to steady him—no hope to support and console him—no fixed principles to guide, enlighten and direct him—he is a feather in the storm—a floating straw on the tempest-lashed waters, and settles down into a half-crazed bigot, with a credulity equalled only by his former skepticism! Or see him in his moments of deep, silent reflection, when his spirit stirs within him, calling for communion with the Infinite fountain which he knows not, and whose existence he has denied. Unable to satisfy his yearnings for a religion in a contemplation of mere nature around him, he is compelled to flee into the idolatrous absurdities of pantheism, and by praying to the material universe of which he himself is a part, falls into self-worship and idolatry, excelled only by the Pagan bowing before his idols of wood and stone.

Or let sickness come, with the prospect of death in its train—let his desires to live be unsupported by any hope of immortality after this weary life is over—and oh, how must he long for a faith he despised, and wish that he could believe that death is but a passage from this to a better world! For even admitting such faith to be a delusive, deceitful lie—it cannot flatter to betray—it cannot lure, merely to disappoint him. If death be, indeed, the termination of human existence, he will never find out so as to know or to realize his disappointment—while through life—in every emergency of trial and adversity—in every scene of sickness or of sorrow—of affliction and death—it will shine as a light around his steps, and be to him a ministering angel for good. The separation of friends will be viewed but as temporary—death, but as the messenger of a better world—the triumphs of evil, as the forerunners of greater and enduring good.

It is true, religion as a principle of the human affections may be carried to an extreme, and much, much misery be the bitter consequence. For though divinely bestowed, it is managed by human agency. But so are all the desires, appetites, affections, capacities and faculties which God hath given us. No one thinks the abuse or excessive use of these an argument against their goodness, or that of their Author—nor yet a proof that they are not natural to us, and that therefore no objects exist for which they are wisely adapted, and on which they may be exercised and gratified. Indeed, the very existence of abused or false religion, proves the existence of the correctly used and genuine. If there were no genuine bank notes, or money, there would be no counterfeit—if man had not given to him a principle of religion, he could not abuse it, or be made to embrace a false system. And the greater the curses which flow from its abuse, the greater the blessings which flow from the proper use of it. Look around, then, at the baleful and bitter consequences of bigotry, superstition and fanaticism; and, oh, how great—how incalculably great must be the blessings and joys flowing from a proper exercise of pure and undefiled religion! And if so, of how much happiness must he deprive himself, who wholly rejects all religion, natural and revealed?

Nor does his misery end here. Consequences as baleful and destroying flow from the disuse as from the abuse of religion—both are alike fruitful causes of bigotry, brutality, insanity and suicide, with their kindred vices and diseases. Conceive, for a moment, with all candor and charity, the natural tendency of atheism. According to it, men are but the chance productions of unintelligent, undesigning, unfeeling causes. There is no relationship between them, but that of one tree, plant, rock, or animal to another. They have no standard of moral rectitude, save common consent; or the vague half discovered laws of nature; or the fluctuating opinions of society. Doomed to exist, hap-hazard, and to perish at death as but a high order of brutes—having no standard of moral or intellectual excellence to copy or strive after—no hope of attaining to a higher state than the present, or even communing with a better, greater being than themselves—how can such a system keep man elevated above the brute, but in form—how can it animate to great moral and intellectual exertion—or how inspire man with the kindly, benevolent and brotherly affections, and love of virtue and goodness, which renders the human being so like a God, and fills his heart with a foretaste of heavenly joy and peace? Now all this, so excellent and so desirable, is given us by religion in every form—increasing, of course, with the purity and excellence of the religious system that calls it forth.

As to the natural tendency of skepticism to insanity, that is a matter that would need no proof, were all religious feelings as fully extinguished among men, as they are now carried to an extreme. No one doubts that fanaticism drives to insanity, yet the cases are few in comparison with the number of fanatics. And as religion is natural to man—or, at least, common among men—we have far more thorough fanatics than thorough skeptics. Could this state of things be reversed, the number of deranged persons and suicides would not be much, if in any wise diminished among us—indeed, if medical men may be believed, the cases would be increased. Dr. Brigham, in his appendix to Spurzheim's Treatise on Insanity, very justly remarks, that "it is the abuse of religion that leads to insanity and suicide; for pure religion, Christianity, tends to subdue the passions of men." "But if the abuse of religion sometimes leads to suicide, the entire neglect of it does more frequently."

This testimony comes from a man who deprecates the multiplication of Sunday schools in which sectarian dogmas are taught—the early instruction of youth in theological doctrines—intemperate preaching, and excitements of every kind. Hence I would infer that he is not unduly bound to any of the dominant religious sects, nor bigoted in favor of any particular religious system. Esquival, Falret, and other eminent physicians of France, who had ample opportunities of observation, testify to the same facts. The latter named, in particular, declares that—"Irreligion is certainly a very frequent cause of suicide. Those who think all there is of man perishes at once—who do not believe in another life—are necessarily disposed to abandon this, when it appears to be but a source of calamities." We all know what an influence hope for the future has, in reconciling us to present calamities—that he who feels sure of immortal bliss, is most contented with this life, while he who is certain of enduring endless hell tortures, is constantly impelled to destroy life—and in view of these facts, you can judge for yourselves respecting the rationality of Falret's deduction. He who has no hope for the future, as well as no fears, will feel his mind strongly drawn to contemplate present evils, and to shun them, even by death, if necessary.

Dr. Rush, also, who certainly was no bigot though a Christian—who was most liberal and charitable to the views of others, and who reasoned only after close and repeated observations—has declared, in his third lecture on the "Cause of animal life"—"The different religions of the world, by the activity they excite in the mind, have a sensible influence on animal life. Atheism is the worst of sedatives to the understanding and passions. It is the abstraction of thought from the most sublime—and of love from the most perfect of all possible objects. Man is as naturally a religious, as he is a social and a domestic animal; and the same violence is done to his mental faculties by robbing him of a belief in a God, that is done by dooming him to live in a cell deprived of the objects and pleasures of social and domestic life. The necessary and immutable connexion between the texture of the human mind, and the worship of an object of some kind, has lately (i. e., shortly after the French Revolution) been demonstrated by the atheists of Europe, who after rejecting the true God, instituted the worship of nature, of fortune and of human reason; and in some instances, with ceremonies of the most expensive and splendid kind. Religions are friendly to animal life, in proportion as they elevate the understanding, and act upon the passions of hope and love. It will readily occur to you that Christianity, when believed and obeyed according to its original consistency with itself, and with the divine attributes, is more calculated to produce those effects than any religion in the world. Such is the salutary operation of its doctrines and precepts upon health and life, that if its divine authority rested upon no other argument, this alone would be sufficient to recommend it to our belief. How long mankind may continue to prefer substituted pursuits and pleasures to this invigorating stimulus, is uncertain; but the time, we are assured, will come, when the understanding will be elevated from its present inferior objects, and the luxated passions be reduced to their original order. This change in the mind of man, I believe, will be effected only by the influence of the Christian religion, after all the efforts of human reason to produce it by means of civilization, philosophy, liberty and government, have been exhausted to no purpose."

The pertinency of this long quotation, which many of you may have previously read, will be my excuse for quoting it in full. This same distinguished physician, in his Treatise on the Mind, classes the principle of faith among the faculties of the mind, natural thereto, and necessary to its soundness. He says, "Happily for us, its operations are involuntary in a sound state. - Happily for us, likewise, a source of knowledge so necessary to individual comfort and social existence, has not been made dependent upon our [external] senses, nor left to the slow inductions of reason. The world could not exist in its present circumstances without it. It is no objection to its necessity and usefulness, that we are sometimes deceived by it. The same objection applies with equal force to our senses and reason, as sources of knowledge." In the same excellent work, speaking of the disorder of this faculty, he says, "That it is often affected, I infer..... from persons who refuse to admit human [or historical] testimony in favor of the truths of the Christian religion, believing in all the events of profane history"—exactly the case of many of our skeptics at the present day. He calls skepticism a "palsy of the believing faculty" in another part of the same work.

I might proceed with other testimony on the unhealthy, insane and suicidal tendency of the disuse of religion, but having adduced the testimony of three competent witnesses, I deem them sufficient for the present.

I have thus showed the good there is in believing in a system of religion—or, in other words, in being religious—and though my labors on this point were not specially intended to bear on the succeeding divisions of my subject, or in favor of any particular system of religion in preference to others, yet my quotations embraced them in part, and I beg you to notice, also, that the arguments in every division relate more or less to all the divisions that follow.

It is good to be religious in thought and feeling, because religion is natural to man, and a conformity to nature is necessary to happiness.

Because without it man's understanding and affections are rendered inert and are brutalized. Without religion man degenerates in all his religious powers, his health of body and of mind becomes more or less impaired, and he is less able to bear up under the calamities of life, or enjoy its pleasures. And therefore, by being religious—rationally religious—these evils and their diseases and vices; are avoided; and their opposites secured and enjoyed.

UNIVERSALIST PUBLICATIONS.

Br. L. F. W. Andrews, of Charleston, S. C., having sold out the Southern Evangelist to the Universalist society there, and being about to leave that city on account of the health of his family, Br. T. Fisk will hereafter edit the same for the association. Bating its frequent apologies for and defence of the institution of slavery, (which may not injure it at the South, though it must render it very disagreeable to Universalists at the North, Universalism being opposed to slavery of every kind, in time and in eternity,) the Southern Evangelist has been conducted with much energy and spirit, and we hope has been very useful to the cause of universal salvation from sin and misery. Br. Fisk is well known to the Universalist community as a beautiful and excellent writer, and therefore requires no introduction to them. We ardently wish that the society in Charleston, the Evangelist, and the cause with which both are connected, may prosper abundantly under his labors and management.

Another Universalist paper! with the promise of yet another to be published in Pittsburg, Pa.! The Christian Telescope, edited by Moulton Avery Chappell, has reached us from Columbus, Ohio—where it is to be published in octavo form, once a month, at one dollar per annum. It is printed on a sheet rather smaller than that of the Magazine and Advocate, a few scattered pools of matter in a meadow of spaces and margin. Much of this matter is from the pen of the Editor, and is pretty fair, and the selections evince considerable taste. In our humble opinion, as a substitute, it will be but a poor and very dear one for the Sentinel and Star in the West, which, in such case, it must sadly injure without benefitting the cause; and as a conditor, it will need all the help of the Sentinel, which needs help for itself, without imparting any in return. If more cannot be said for the paper, said to be forthcoming from Pittsburg, our cause in the West must be injured rather than benefited by these new publications—for the faithful Sentinel can scarcely be supported without a division of the aid there extended to periodicals, much less with such a division.

And if so, these new publishers will pay Madam Experience rather high a price for the lessons she will teach them on the subject of publishing new papers, when even the old periodical cannot be supported. But that is their business—as it is ours thus frankly to state our opinions on the subject. All concerned are entire strangers to us—we have no partialities for persons or places to gratify, (we have some partiality for the Sentinel, it is true,)—but we feel much interest in the advancement of the cause in the West, and would therefore that our friends there would zealously and ardently unite in supporting well one good periodical in their midst, before they start another.

Br. J. E. Palmer, of Barre, Vt., has published a work entitled, "A Collection of Valuables, consisting of pieces on doctrinal, practical and experimental subjects, written by Rev. Hosea Balton, and originally published in the Universalist Expositor and Universalist Magazine." Retail price, seventy-five cents. Agents for the work, Editors of the Watchman, Lebanon, N. H. As we have not seen a copy, we cannot, of course, give an opinion respecting the work.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

The number for July, begins a new volume of this very excellent monthly, and begins it well—it is a superior number. Not to specify where all is good, but to notice according to the importance of the article, I would recommend to the careful perusal of all, the valuable article of Dr. Brigham on pulmonary diseases—their causes and preventives. Vegetable diet, or Grahamism, is severely reprobated—early marriages especially among those predisposed to such complaints—light and tight dressing—and, above all, the want of proper physical culture, are named as the prominent causes of this fatal destroyer, who sweeps off fifty thousand victims per annum, in this country alone. Mothers who clothe but partially their off-pring, leaving the arms and other portions of the frame exposed to the air, receive a gentle but earnest rebuke. I cannot but believe the article will do much good, appearing as it does, in one of our best and most admired monthlies—and only regret that the Editor did not add a note to it warmly recommending Brigham's work "on the influence of mental cultivation and mental excitement upon health," Dr. Caldwell "on Physical Education," Dr. Combe on the same, and several other works that might have been named, treating on the same subject. Such works should be read by every parent—they have too long been neglected, and a puny, sickly, consumptive race are crying aloud for attention to the subject of physical education.

TO AGENTS AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

Be careful to state when you wish subscriptions to commence—i. e., whether we shall send back numbers, or not. We can supply a number with perfect files, from the beginning of the volume, if they request it. The essays, tales and sermons already published are worth much more than the subscription price, and in our opinion a subscriber will regret not getting them before the volume is out—especially if he wants to get his volumes bound.

Heretofore we have sent the back numbers, when nothing was said—but more than half the year has expired, and we shall no longer send them unless ordered.

But as we must have some rule to go by, hereafter we shall send from No. 27, when no special time is mentioned at which to commence—thus sending the half volume. And in all such cases, the other half volume may be obtained, (so long as we have any to send,) by specially ordering it.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

UNIVERSALIST MINISTERS.

It is too obvious to require either proof or illustration, that many things can be effected with the greatest ease by association and concert, which if not wholly impracticable by an individual, would, at least, be extremely difficult of accomplishment. Some four or five years of unremitting exertion, have sufficed to convince those most deeply interested in the prosperity of the Clinton Liberal Institute, that what must otherwise be attained by long continued efforts on their part, can easily be accomplished by a more extensive co-operation. This institution, it is well known, has as yet received but a small amount from public charity, and nothing from the State. Its wants are fully understood—and its merits are beginning to be appreciated. Appeals to the generosity of the public have been repeatedly made; and calls for contributions for even a single dollar, have been urged upon the friends of unsectarian education—almost in vain. What was understood to be alike the interest of indefinite thousands, was felt to be the duty of none in particular—and very little has been done.

Under these circumstances, it has been deemed proper, once more to ask Universalist ministers to make one effort to raise, each a small sum among their respective friends; and at once to relieve the Institute from the pressure of pecuniary wants. They are probably not aware, how very trifling would be the amount from each—and which, if they are neither able nor willing to contribute themselves, might certainly be obtained from their friends by asking. Let each Universalist minister in the State of New-York send thirty dollars—and the work is done. But lest this sum should be too specific—let those who can, send more, as some may find it necessary to send less. Or, let each preacher of the denomination send ten dollars and the result is nearly the same.

What say you, gentlemen?—can you not—will you not be at the trouble, if trouble it is, to ask your friends to enable you to forward to Joseph Stebbins, Esq., Treasurer, at Clinton, or Rev. D. Skinner, Utica—THIRTY DOLLARS? And will you not do this without delay—before the approaching month of August expires?

Is it asked—why you are thus called upon? The answer is—you are the only class of preachers who have the mind to devise, the hand to execute, and the heart to enjoy truly "liberal things." The Institute was projected by you—has been thus far principally sustained by your friends, and by them is almost exclusively appreciated. And though it neither does, nor ever will admit the creed of any sect among its instructions—it ever has depended, and still depends principally upon Universalists, both for patronage and support.

By directions of the Treasurer of Liberal Institute,
S. R. SMITH, General Agent.

THE ADDRESS TO FEMALES.

By our venerable and excellent brother, J. Wallace, published in this paper, is especially commended to the perusal of our sisters in the faith, as a frank, affectionate and generous tribute to their worth. It was prepared and delivered at the request of the worthy ladies of his congregation at Madrid, (who accompanied the request with a substantial token of their respect and esteem for its author,) leaving to him, of course, the selection of the subject, and the manner and style of the address. These ladies were, probably, the very same whose industry furnished the spacious canopy under which the St. Lawrence Association held its late session, as stated in my published account of my tour North, a few weeks since.

POETRY.

THE MOTHER.

The cold winds swept the mountain height,
And pathless was the dreary wild,
And 'mid the cheerless hours of night
A mother wandered with her child—
As through the drifting snow she pressed,
The babe was sleeping on her breast.
And colder still the winds did blow,
And darker hours of night came on,
And deeper grew the drifts of snow—
Her limbs were chilled—her strength was gone.
Oh! God, she cried in accents wild,
If I must perish save my child.

She stripped her mantle from her breast,
And bared her bosom to the storm,
And round her child she wrapt the vest,
And smiled to think the babe was warm;
With one cold kiss, one tear she shed,
And sank upon a snowy bed.

At dawn, a traveller passed by,
And saw her 'neath a snowy veil—
The frost of death was on her eye,
Her cheek was cold, and hard, and pale,
He moved the robe from off the child;
It lived—looked up—and sweetly smiled."

THE WISH.

BY MRS. LYDIA BAXTER.

Oh! could I dwell in some lone spot,
Where fragrant breezes blow,
With a pure rill before my cot,
Passing in murmurs low;
Where sweetest flowers arise to greet
The rays of morning's sun,
And peace and plenty smiling meet
My cheerful board alone!

Oh! could I dwell with one kind friend,
In such a place as this,
Whose sorrows with my own should blend,
And sweeten all my bliss—
I would not ask for India's mines,
Nor princess' gay attire;
But sweet content a wreath should bind
Around my brow entire.

THE HERMIT.

BY MISS MARTINEAU.

There was a lofty rock which had stood forever. And a fountain sprang up beneath the rock, and the waters thereof were purer than any waters that were upon the earth.

A hermit made his dwelling beside the fountain. He drank of the waters at their source, morning and evening; and he went lower down and purified himself every day.

His dwelling was covered with vines; and the hermit trained the branches thereof, and watered the roots, and rejoiced to behold the golden clusters, and watched with care those that were yet unripe.

Birds fed from his hand, and refreshed him with their song. Antelopes also were sheltered beneath his roof, and he loved to behold their sports.

It chanced one day that the hermit was weary and slept. And when he awoke, lo! one stood beside him in his dwelling. And the hermit wist not how he had found entrance therein.

And the stranger was of a gay countenance, and in his hand he held a cup. He drank thereof, and offered unto the hermit.

The hermit was afraid; but, after a while, he listened to the words of the stranger and drank.

The night passed away in mirth. The holy man knew not when the sun went down: neither did he repair to the fountain as he was wont.

Towards dawn, he sank down in a deep sleep; and when he awoke, lo! the stranger had departed.

When he went abroad, the sun rode high in the heavens; and as he looked around him, he saw that all was laid waste.

The vines were torn down from their supports and trailed along the ground. The birds had not been fed; therefore their song was hushed. The antelopes came not forth: they were stretched on the earth fainting with thirst.

Then the hermit went to drink of the fountain. But the stream was almost dried up, and the waters thereof were bitter.

He hastened to bathe his feverish brow. But when he bent over the pool, lo! his face was changed that he knew it not.

Casting himself down in fear and sorrow, he cried, "An enemy hath laid waste my dwelling while I slept." Presently, dark clouds arose, and thunders rolled afar off.

And the hermit heard a voice calling on his name. He looked up, and beheld one whose eye was sullen, and his brow dark and lowering.

And he frowned upon the hermit, saying, "He whom thou hast entertained is SIN. He hath despoiled thy habitation, and the waste can never be repaired."

Then the hermit trembled, for the voice of the stranger chilled his soul.

"What, then, must I do?" he cried. And while he spake, the winds arose, and there was a great storm. And DESPAIR replied—

"Thou canst not remain here. Behold! the storm beats upon thy dwelling, and it shakes from its foundations. Follow after thy guest, for here is no abiding place."

"But he hath spoiled me already," cried the hermit; "and if I follow him, he will destroy me utterly."

"Then," cried DESPAIR, "cast thyself down from a rock and die."

And the hermit fled to the edge of a precipice, and was about to cast himself down, when a hand restrained him. He turned and beheld the form of a woman. She was clothed in a dark raiment. Her countenance was severe, though calm. Her eye was mournful and bore traces of tears that had passed away. Her voice was low, but sweet; and the hermit, while he listened, felt the tumult subside in his soul.

"Return unto thy home," she said. "I am REPENTANCE; and I will aid thee to repair the desolation thereof."

"But," replied he, the storm beats upon it, and will overthrow it, so that I can never more enter therein."

"Return with me," answered his protector. "Thou canst abide under the shadow of the rock till the storm be overpast."

So she took his hand, and the hermit suffered himself to be led back.

At length the black clouds parted, and a ray of light fell upon the fountain.

"Drink thereof, and refresh thyself," said his guide.

The hermit feared to taste, because he knew that the waters were bitter: but he obeyed the voice of his guide.

As he stooped to drink, lo! the pure wave swelled to meet his lips. His tears flowed fast, and as they fell into the stream, the bitterness thereof passed away.

And he arose refreshed and strengthened for his work. And REPENTANCE guided him therein.

But when all was done, the habitation was not pleasant as before.

And when she was about to depart, the hermit cried, "Remain with me, for my home is yet sad, and the beauty thereof hath vanished away. I also fear to be alone, lest SIN, my enemy, should return."

REPENTANCE answered, "Another now waiteth my help and I must depart. But be thou watchful, lest thy enemy should approach thee unawares. If thou beheld him nigh, flee unto the shadow of the rock, and thou shalt be safe."

And when she had departed, the hermit pondered her words continually.

After a time, SIN again drew nigh. He hoped to find the door standing wide and the hermit sleeping as before.

He marvelled when he saw how fair the dwelling and the garden appeared. And he said,

"Some one hath taught him to repair the ruin which I caused. I must beware how I approach."

And he looked, and beheld the hermit was seated beneath the everlasting Rock. Peace was in his countenance and he saw all around was fair and promising. The last rays of day shone on his gray hairs.

And SIN dared not approach; but lingered till the darkness of night should come on.

When the sun disappeared, the hermit repaired to the fountain, and knelt down to drink.

Then SIN hastened to unfurl his wings and fled away.

CONVERSATION.—There are some few gifted individuals, whose conversation flows like a confined stream, all around, enriching others without impoverishing themselves; but how different from the idle chatter of empty heads, whose only sounds are caused by their own hollowness. "Two things are indicative of a weak mind," says Saadi, the Persian sage, "to be silent when it is proper to speak, and to speak when it is proper to be silent."

DEATHS.

DEAR BRETHREN—It is with feelings of regret that I am under the necessity of communicating to you the following disconsolate facts:—

A few days after the date of my last, about the 10th of April, and before my return from Louisville, Ky., I was taken sick of the scarlet fever, and it was with difficulty I arrived home. After my return I partially recovered, and then took a relapse, and I still remain extremely feeble. But this is not my great source of grief. On the 14th we met with the loss of our only daughter, ELIZABETH GARDNER, after a sickness of about twenty hours, aged 10 days. And, alas! dear brethren, I am not permitted to stop here. On the 16th, my wife, MARY ANN GARDNER, departed this life after a sickness of nearly two weeks, in the 23d year of her age. Thus am I deprived of an affectionate wife, a tender companion and a constant attendant upon my sickness. She was deprived of her senses most of the time. When in her right mind, she expressed her willingness to go, by saying, "Lord, thy will, not mine be done"—again, "How long, dear Lord, O how long before I come to thee." When we were married in 1833, she was a member of the Methodist church, and left the same in peace and good will; and with its members we together held sweet communion. In 1834 she joined the Universalist society in Greenville, Ia. She has often remarked truly that the Methodists she had seen since, were not as friendly as those of her own church.

The sympathies and friendships of her neighbors and friends were truly manifested towards her in her sickness. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to a numerous congregation by Rev. Mr. Woodworth, on the 17th inst.

Thus you will discover I have been deterred from attending to the duties of the desk for some months, and in all probability shall be for many to come; which must be my excuse for not attending to the numerous calls from our brethren in Illinois.

Farewell, I remain your affectionate, though disconsolate brother in the Gospel. A. R. GARDNER.

Henderson, Ill., June, 1836.

In Sheridan, Chautauque county, June 7th, Mrs. ELIZABETH EACKER, mother of J. I. Eacker, Esq., aged 82 years.

A funeral discourse was delivered on the 9th, by Br. Tomlinson, of Buffalo.

In Frankfort, of Asthma, on the 12th inst., Mr. JONATHAN BARBER, aged 63. He died as he had lived, a firm and consistent believer in universal salvation.

In Patterson, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., of consumption, in the 31st year of her age, BETSEY WINSLOW, third daughter of Hon. Joel Brownson, late of Richmond, Vt., and wife of John Winslow, of Kalamazoo, Michigan. She sustained with Christian fortitude the painfully lingering approaches of death, and died in peace, in the soul-rejoicing path of unlimited salvation by Jesus Christ.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXI. A FATHER'S SUNDAY EVENINGS WITH HIS FAMILY: OR FAMILIAR ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE GOSPEL.—MATT. CHAP. I.—The lesson upon which some portion of your attention and your time have been employed during the previous week, my dear children, is the first chapter of Matthew. I have told you that in reading the Gospel history this time, we will follow the order of each evangelist (i. e., good-news-teller) in their order; and that, at our next reading we will follow a chronological arrangement of the recorded events, i. e., an arrangement in the order of time. This mode of arrangement I have shown you has been followed by Macknight, Doddridge, Greswell, Priestley, Newcome and others, in their exposition of the histories of the evangelists. What is meant by an evangelist?

In the biographies which some of you have read, you have noticed that the first chapter or the commencement of the book is generally occupied with an account of the parents and ancestors of the person whose life is about to be recorded. From verse 1-17 is a similar account of the progenitors of Jesus of Nazareth. Matthew probably intended the first verse as a title to this genealogical table, and had he written in English and at the present day, he would have entitled this section of his book, "The Genealogy of Jesus the Anointed, or the Christ." It would tend to preserve better in remembrance, the meaning of the words Christ and Messiah, which both signify the same thing, viz., anointed, if they were never employed except with the definite article prefixed to them.

There is little in this genealogical account which is of interest to us in our circumstances. Why, then, you may be curious to know, should Matthew take up his time in making it out? For this reason, my children, that he wrote for people in very different circumstances from those in which we are situated. He did not introduce it merely in compliance with the custom of biographers; he had an object in view beside gratifying a natural curiosity about the ancestry and parentage of the hero of a story. The great majority of the Jewish nation would not, and did not believe that Jesus was the person who had been long promised and long expected as the Messiah, the Son of David, etc. Under the title of Son of David, their expected King and deliverer was spoken of among the Jews. During this week, when reviewing your own thoughts and mine upon this chapter, if you consult the following passages, it will impress this fact upon your minds: Ps. lxxxix: 3, etc. xxxii: 10, 11. Isa. xi: 1. Jer. xxiii: 5; xxxiii: 15. Acts xiii: 23; also, Jer. xxx: 9. Ezek. xxxiv: 23, 24; xxxvii: 24, 25. Matt. ix: 27; xii: 23. Luke ii: 32. It was a prominent if not the principal object of Matthew, in writing his history, to convince some of this great majority who obstinately rejected Jesus, that this very Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah—the longed-for Son of David. The Jews expected their Deliverer to be of the race of Abraham, and of the family of David; and this genealogical table is undoubtedly introduced, to prove this to be true of Jesus. It was expected that he was, also, to be born in Bethlehem, and in the next chapter, which is to be the subject of your study this week, you will find that Matthew has introduced the fact of the birth of Jesus there, as a further confirmation that he was indeed the Messiah, the promised, expected, and anointed One. When we come to Luke's genealogy, I will endeavor to show you his reason for using a different one.

In verse 16, Matthew states that Jesus was also surnamed, or accounted, the Christ. In verse 21, you have an explanation of the name Jesus, or Joshua, which is, Saviour or Deliverer. I will endeavor to explain to you the meaning of the Christ, which never before was used as the proper name of a person. Your brother R. will show you, in his Hebrew and Greek Lexicons, that Messiah and Christ both signify anointed: This will impress it more on your memory. It was the law and the practice among the Jews, to install into office their prophets, priests, and kings by anointing with oil. The Hebrew word, which we pronounce Messiah, and have adopted into the English language, meaning one anointed, thus came to be a substitute or synonyme for any of these titles of office, especially for king. Consult during the week, Isa. xlv: 1. Ps. cv: 15; ii: 2, 6. Lev. iv: 3; vi: 20. 1 Sam. ii: 10, for proofs of this. Christ, the word for anointed in Greek, you will find used synonymously with king in Luke xxiii: 2. I believe from the superscriptions placed over his cross, Luke xxiii: 23, 38, 39, from the above mentioned uses of the words and from other considerations, that in the times of Jesus, the words Messiah and Christ were used synonymously with king. It is known the Jews expected their promised Saviour to be a king, a temporal prince, to deliver them from the yoke of Roman bondage.* In England and other countries on the continent of Europe, kings are still consecrated for, or installed into office, by anointing. The archbishop of Canterbury, primate of England, anoints with oil the head of each successive king of Britain, at his public installation or coronation. Could I meet with some old newspaper giving an account of this ceremony, it would prove interesting to you at the present moment.

I like the reflections of the pious Doddridge so much, that I beg your attention to the two subjoined. "When we survey any such series of generations, it is obvious to reflect how, like the leaves of a tree, one passeth away and another cometh; yet the earth still abideth, and with it the goodness of the Lord, which runs on from generation to generation, the common hope of parents and children." Again, "We observe among these ancestors of Christ, some that were Heathens, and others that, on different accounts, were of infamous characters: and perhaps it might be the design of Providence that we should learn from it, or at least should, on reading it, take occasion to reflect, that persons of all nations, and even the chief of sinners amongst them, are encouraged to trust in him as their Saviour. To him therefore let us look, even from the ends of the earth, yea, from the depths of guilt and distress, and the consequence will be happy beyond all expression or conception."

Verse 18 to the end. You have observed, after having pointed out to you the object for which Matthew wrote, that this story must have been introduced for the purpose of convincing the Jews that what they expected as a circumstance characteristic of their expected Messiah or king, was strictly true of Jesus. Isa. vii: 14 is the passage of prophecy from which it is supposed the Jews had originated and entertained this expectation. By referring to that prophecy you will see that Ahaz, king of Judah, after the loss of upwards of three hundred thousand of his subjects and of one of his fortified cities, and with the kings of Israel and Syria combined against him, was afraid that he would be defeated, the city of Jerusalem taken, and the kingdom of Judah come to an end. To remove his fears Isaiah goes to encourage him, and permits or desires him to ask for a sign, which should be a pledge of the truth of Isaiah's cheering intelligence. Ahaz declines. Isaiah then says, "therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign," &c.. Whether this referred to their expected Messiah or not, if they so understood it, it served the purpose of Matthew to allege the fulfilment of this prophecy in the person of Jesus, to prove whom to be their Messiah, seems the chief purpose of the first two chapters. Matthew tells the purpose of introducing this story in verses 22 and 23, viz. to show that the above prophecy was fulfilled. In verse 20 we have a specimen of a mode of phraseology, common among the Jews, but which seems very singular in our ears.—Were Matthew writing his history at the present day, and for our use, he would not tell us that the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph; but that during the deliberations of Joseph, it fortunately occurred to him, or it was suggested to him. But in Hebrew phraseology, a strong fire is a fire from the Lord, a good thought is an angel or a message from the Lord, to express a fortunate or great event they say the Lord brought it to pass. When at leisure I mean to make out a large roll or catalogue of such Hebraisms, or peculiar modes of expression among the Jews. Dr. M. Stuart has collected a considerable number of such, but I cannot lay my hands upon the place where they occur now. After having referred to all the parallel passages in your Bibles, or read over the first chapters of the other historians, you must have noticed that none other of them have introduced this story in their narrative. Indeed several, particularly Dr. Williams in his "Free Inquiry," and the editors of the "Improved version of the New Testament," have very much doubted the genuineness of these first two chapters of Matthew's narrative, or have not hesitated to pronounce them a spurious interpolation. But I would suggest whether Matthew might not, as well as any other, notice the opinions and sentiments of those whom he wrote for, whether just or foundationless, in order to show that they did not militate against the good cause which he was advocating—a belief in Jesus as the Christ.

This history has, I think, been turned to a good account in the following reflections, which I now read to you from the commentaries of Scott and Henry. "Let us look to the circumstances under which the Son of God entered into this lower world, till we learn to despise all the distinctions of rank, birth and riches, when compared with the real dignity which piety and holiness confer. He could have assumed our nature, [he might have been born,] in an imperial palace as well as in an obscure cottage or an humble stable. But his dignity and honor, like his kingdom, were not of this world. A poor obscure virgin, espoused to a carpenter, was chosen to be the mother of Him," etc., etc. "Were there deliberation in our censures and judgments, as in his (Joseph's), there would have been more mercy and moderation in them." "Those who would have direction from God, must think on things themselves, and consult with themselves. It is the thoughtful, not the unthinking whom God will guide." "We have no evidence that they are the people of Christ (Jesus) who are not saved from the dominion of their sins, and are seeking continually for deliverance from the remaining power of them. Every time that we name the name of Jesus, we should be reminded to rely on and apply to him for this complete salvation; that we may be delivered from guilt and sin, and saved in Him, the Lord our righteousness, with an everlasting salvation."

AN OBJECTION CONSIDERED.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

The salvation of the Sodomites is objected to on the ground that they were not punished as justice required. It may be seen that this objection denies the truth of vicarious atonement, because it rests on the certainty of punishment.

For argument sake, we will admit—what is altogether unreasonable—that they were not punished for their sins in this life. We will now present an instance of equal, if not superior injustice, which the popular doctrine involves, in order to destroy the objection with the weapons of its author.

Last Fall, John W. Cowan, of Cincinnati, murdered his wife in a manner so horrid, that she died without one moment for repentance, and sunk to endless woe. He was immediately taken to prison, where he received all the advantages of Christianity, and finally from the gallows, swung to the arms of a merciful Saviour. By this single act of wickedness he is now seated in heaven amongst the blessed, and his wife is in hell wailing with the damned. This circumstance must be reconciled with the principle of justice, or the above objection is eternally lost.

Thus, in relation to the Sodomites, we have erected a man of straw for the purpose of showing the weakness and indefensibility of the popular doctrine.

The Scriptures represent the temporal destruction of Sodom as a dispensation of justice and mercy. "They were haughty and committed abomination before me, therefore I took them away as I saw good." Ezekiel xvi: 50.

It would be difficult to show how any good could be accomplished by sweeping this wretched people from their earthly abominations to a state of endless sin and suffering. That their punishment was never designed to place them beyond the reach of mercy, is learned from the 55th verse of the above mentioned chapter. "When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate, and Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate, then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate."

HAPPINESS.

BY T. B. ROBBINS.

However misguided and foolish may be the conduct of some, yet it is believed the aim of all is, the attainment of what will produce the greatest amount of happiness. And how varied is the course pursued! The person who has been taught that duty and religion consist in denying himself the enjoyments and pleasures of this life, will certainly infer that there is more happiness in the practice of vice than of virtue. And when such an opinion has obtained, then, indeed, is needed the threat of an endless hell and the frowns of infinite wrath to restrain from evil. And by this erroneous idea has been caused all the sin and misery which at present exist. The first pair who transgressed in the garden, were led by temptation to expect greater felicity than was previously enjoyed. The practice of this doctrine has continued, and will continue until the seeds of the woman will have bruised the head of the serpent—when all nations, kindreds and families of the earth will believe and act upon the principle, that he who soweth wheat, shall reap wheat as his reward; but that it is not possible for the wicked to be at rest, for the works of his hands are continually bringing upon him confusion and shame, and will ever do so, till he practices the doctrine, that, in the day of eating the forbidden fruit, he shall surely die, and that it is not possible for the repentance of man to make the truth of God a lie,

"Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace," and the paths of wisdom are virtue, which is man's highest interest while he tabernacles in the flesh; because it gives the greatest amount of happiness.

Truth makes the believer happy, by delivering him from fear, doubt and darkness, and bringing him to that glorious light, which to believe and be in, is everlasting life—viz: the restoration of the unreconciled to an unchangeable God, a new birth and a foretaste of the regions of bliss to which all mankind shall be raised in a future state.

Men in ordinary life, are subject to great extremes in enjoyment; yet with a proper character and deportment, one will probably balance the other. But if all adverse fortune were considered as chastisements, intended for our good, then, instead of saying plus one minus the other, we may give both affirmative signs and make our happiness equal the amount.

KNOW GOD.

BY REV. ALFRED PECK.

"Know thou the God of thy fathers."—1 Chron. xxviii: 9.

Set a sinner to seeking God, and learning his character, according to the spirit of the popular religion, (for we will not say Orthodoxy) and the influence of modern teaching. It is a well known fact that many Christian people do not look upon the sinner as in a hopeful way, until he is distressed in mind. The poor sinner then, to be a hopeful convert, must not only feel in sorrow the weight of his sins; but he must view God as a being, who "hates him with a perfect hatred"—look forward with fearful horror, to deathless and immortal misery, required by the justice, and inflicted by the rage of that being, who can laugh and mock at the sinner's calamity!

The question arises, is this the true knowledge of God? Whence, then, the sudden departure? Anon they view him, as a being of ineffable glory, and unchanging love. Are both these characters of God true? Is he my worst foe—my best friend? Can two directly opposites be true at the same time? If the first character be true; the sinner in his sins, knows God. Then wherefore exhort him to "know the God of the fathers"—whom to know, is life eternal? If the latter character be true, the former is false. But as every Christian views God to be good towards himself; it follows, God either was loving in his affections, and good to him as a sinner, or he has changed. If the Deity changes by hating at one time and loving at another, he is altogether such an one as we are, and the sinner has as consistent views of Deity as any body—probably the old idolaters the best. But we are instructed by divine truth, "God is love," and that he "is good unto all."

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. VII.

BY REV. JASON LEWIS.

The Bible does not contain any one of the following expressions:—Triune God, Adam's fall, free agency, total depravity, original sin, unpardonable sin, self-murderer, the last judgment, eternal death, eternal hell, endless death, endless hell, endless misery.

The Bible does not contain any one of the following phrases:—Forgiveness of punishment, changed from nature to grace, day of probation, probationers for eternity, sinned away the day of grace, dropping from time into eternity, everlastingly too late, the door of mercy shut, the death that never dies.

The Bible does not contain any one of the following texts:—As a man thinketh, so is he, (see Prov. xiii: 6, 7).—The prayers of the wicked are abomination to the Lord, (see Prov. xv: 8, 9, 26; xxi: 27 and xxviii: 9).—After death the judgment—As death leaves us, so judgment will find us—Arise ye dead, and come to judgment—If ye die in your sins, where God and Christ is ye never can come—God, out of Christ, is a consuming fire—There is no change after death.

The Bible does not contain any one of the following statements:—That God created a place called hell, not included in "the heaven and earth," mentioned in the first verse of Genesis—that "the serpent," mentioned in the third chapter of Genesis, as the tempter of our first mother, was a fallen angel, or the residence of such a being—That Adam was constituted the federal head or representative of the whole human family and his sin imputed to each individual—That Christ suffered, in the stead of mankind, the penalty due to them for Adam's sin—That Christ will by and by leave the mercy seat, and take the judgment seat—That there is no such a thing as judgment in the earth—That the wickedest persons are the happiest in this life—That the devil or his works shall forever exist.

THE INFLUENCE OF EARLY RELIGIOUS PRINCIPLES: AN EXPERIENCE.

It has become very common in these days, for religionists to relate what they term an experience, and among those who believe in a limited salvation nothing is more frequent and common, than to hear them describe their feelings when they first felt the influence of their faith operating on their minds. They tell us of the tears they shed, of the anguish of their minds, and of the indescribable misery they felt in those times, in view of the awful doom that awaited them, and now awaits all the unbelieving. I have no reason to doubt but that these are their feelings, being the legitimate fruits of their faith, but I should be willing to call it any other experience, than that of religion. This experience is told over and over at their conference meetings, until every reasonable person is perfectly disgusted with it. It is not my intention to burden the reader's mind with an old and trite story; but simply to relate what no one ever heard me relate before.

It has been frequently remarked, that the impressions received into the mind in youth, seldom, if ever, are eradicated. No saying is more true. In the early part of my life, it was my custom to attend all religious meetings in the immediate vicinity where I lived. These were generally Partialist, there being no Universalist meetings except occasionally. At these meetings my young associates assembled, which made the occasion interesting and pleasant; but the exhibition of divine truth (as it was termed) was not soon to be forgotten. Although at that time, I thought nothing of the doctrines that were proclaimed, but in a few years after, when my mind had become more mature, I found these same ideas and doctrines springing up, and in spite of reason I believed they were true. My good parents who were Universalists, frequently requested me to absent myself from these meetings, saying that it was the chief object of the conductors of them to frighten and terrify the young and the weak minded. From what I had seen, I thought this to be really so; but the desire to meet with my young friends, induced me to continue. For a few years all things passed along pleasantly, but it was not of long continuance.

About the year 1831, I went to the West, my business being such as generally to call me from home. About this time I began to reflect seriously on the importance of religion, and began to read the Scriptures, but the exhibitions of divine truth which I formerly heard, and then occasionally, interpreted all Scripture for me; and I was under the necessity of admitting it as true. If my eye met with the word hell, it signified nothing else but a place of misery. If I found the word damnation, it conveyed to my mind, nothing but a damnation in hell. If I read of salvation, it was a salvation from hell and damnation. My mind being young and weak, I came to the conclusion that if the Bible was true, Universalism must be false. I was ignorant of Universalism; the most I knew about it was, that it taught that all men will be saved, and that there was no endless hell, and certain I was that this was not the sentiment of the Bible. I then considered Universalism as a pernicious and licentious doctrine, not from what I saw of it, but from what I had heard, and thought that its advocates must be lost. This was a gloomy and cheerless thought, which caused me to be unsocial and melancholy, but no one knew the cause. Can it be true, I exclaimed, that those fond parents who have watched over my infancy and childhood with parental fondness and affection—who have taught me the best of morals, and learned my infant mind to pray to my heavenly Father by the repetition of the Lord's prayer, that they must sink down to hell, to writhe in ceaseless and immortal pains? O, horrid thought! Yet it must be so, or else my doctrine is false. And not only they, but a numerous circle of relatives and friends, whom I loved as dearly as life, an aged grandfather, whose head was whitened by the frost of seventy winters; a grandmother, who had for years been a Presbyterian, and now in the evening tide of life had embraced this soul-destroying doctrine; all must be lost. When I thought of the few that would be saved in comparison with the myriads that would be lost, and that among this unhappy number, most of my friends must be included, it gave me pain which none can describe. The more I reflected upon the condition of man, the more my unhappiness increased, and I became a lonely and solitary being—sought no person's company, and no one sought mine. My days were passed in silence and meditation, my nights in tears. My Sundays I generally passed in the solitary wild, having no inclination to go to church, where I knew my misery must be augmented. Oft did I wish the Creator had stayed his creative hand, and left me in unconsciousness.

This was the state of my mind for two months. After an absence of six months, I returned from the West to my native place, where on my return, I found a protracted meeting in progress, under the direction of the Messrs. Foots. I concluded to attend the last day, in the afternoon. I entered the church before services, and there found a few church members sitting in silence, with sadness and gloom depicted on their countenances, which indicated to me that they were believers in endless misery. The remarks of some, and the prayers of others told me that was the very seat of misery. Soon after the preachers entered and commenced the most abusive language, that men ever uttered to their own church, for not praying to suit them. Here I was, without the least provocation, accused of disturbing the meeting—was told that I was fit fuel for the flames of hell, and that I would be the companions of demons and devils forever. Surely, thought I, my companions were then demoniacal, but I very much doubted about being their companions forever. The meeting was closed, and I passed in silence from the church, meditating on the abusive treatment I had received, the sadness and anguish of mind that seemed to pervade the whole congregation, and the extreme misery I felt in consequence of the belief in the cheerless doctrine of endless woe. My God, I exclaimed, can this be the fruit of religion? If so, it is the greatest curse that ever visited mankind.

Soon after, the Universalist minister of the place appointed evening meetings for the discussion of Scripture questions, supposed to teach the doctrine of endless misery. The first that was selected for investigation, was the parable of the ten virgins. This I had long considered as a complete overthrow of Universalism, and my early prejudices were so powerfully riveted in my mind, that I was perfectly confident he would fail to remove the anticipated object. I attended, and to my utter astonishment, and to my entire satisfaction, he obviated every difficulty, and I looked in vain for my former objections. These meetings were continued until every objection and doubt were removed from my mind, and the light of Heaven's glorious truth shone into my benighted understanding, and joy unspeakable took the place of gloom and sadness. My God, what a contrast between my present and my former situation! If the whole arcana of nature, and the boundless love of God had at once been unfolded to my mind, I could not have been more happy. My whole system, every fibre, and every nerve seemed touched with a sense of gratitude. I then could see in God a Father, in heaven a home for all mankind. The heavens seemed filled with his glory, the earth with his power and goodness, and infinity with his presence. I then could repose confidence in my Creator, and pray to him as a Father who regarded my happiness and destination, and that of all mankind. I then could behold the Sun of Righteousness lighting up the darkness of the tomb with the refulgent beams of immortal life and glory, giving to man a prelibation of his eternal rest in the region of endless felicity. I then could see how perfectly blind I was made by the lessons received in youth.

If any should be disposed to doubt that such, as is here represented, is the fruit of a belief in endless misery, I would say, believe in it yourselves, and then you will be convinced of its truth. For one, I am perfectly satisfied, and think that I shall eternally remain so; and if Universalists wish to see their children believers in this doctrine, let them be under the instruction of the Partialists, and be assured that they will see the object accomplished.

THE CHAUTAUQUE CIRCUIT CONFERENCE.

The Conference convened according to previous adjournment, at Carroll, June 11, 1836; and after uniting in prayer with Br. Paine, Br. R. ELDERED was chosen Moderator, and Br. A. Williams, Clerk.

No business of importance came before the Council.

Brs. J. and N. Smith, of Panama, and Br. J. Babcock, were designated a committee to appoint time and place of our next meeting.

Although there was not the usual attendance of distant brethren, owing to the secular avocations of the season, the inclemency of the weather, and the badness of the roads; yet by the commendable zeal of our friends in the immediate vicinity, the audiences were rendered respectable—especially on Sunday they exceeded our fondest anticipations. Six discourses were delivered by Br. Paine and the writer, and the prayerful and devout attention with which they were listened to, evinced a due appreciation of the preciousness of the espoused cause, and its salutary and happy influence. All things contributed to our felicity, and in rendering it a time truly interesting, conducive to the upbuilding of the cause—and long to be remembered, with its varied associations, with delight.

The society with which the Conference met received an essential benefit in the impulse given for its engagedness to activity, and awakening it from cold indifference, to a sense of surrounding privileges, and the indispensable necessity of assiduity, and an exhibition of a zeal for its growth and prosperity. The impressions will not soon be erased. The seed sown will germinate. Truth in its complete sway over the sombre regions of moral darkness will soon illuminate the sentient world, and produce universal submission to the eternal King and supreme Ruler of all things.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS FOR 1836.

1. Met pursuant to adjournment at Columbia village, Madrid, June 22d, and chose Br. MINOT JENNISON, Moderator; and Br. J. Wallace, Clerk.

2. United in prayer with Br. J. Simonds.

3. Appointed Brs. Wallace, J. Montgomery and I. Hawley a committee of arrangements for public services.

4. Appointed Brs. Wallace, Simonds and Langworthy a committee on fellowship and ordination.

5. Heard and accepted the report of the committee of discipline—"No complaint."

6. Continued the committee—viz., Brs. J. Wallace, F. Langworthy and S. Field, of Malone—for the ensuing year.

7. Appointed Brs. J. Wallace and F. Langworthy (ministers), and Daniel Mack, of Canton, and Paul Marshall, of Plattsburg (laymen), delegates to attend the State Convention in May next.

8. The subjects of family prayer, eucharist and theological seminary were introduced and discussed, but not acted upon.

9. Thursday morning.—United in prayer with Br. Sias.

10. The Clerk being absent by reason of indisposition, Br. Langworthy was chosen pro tem.

11. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of conferring ordination on Br. O. Wilcox. Report accepted.

12. Received the first Universalist society in Massena into fellowship.

13. Appointed Br. F. I. Briggs to preach the occasional discourse at our next session.

14. Appointed quarterly meetings to be held as follows:—In Potsdam village on the first Saturday and Sunday in September—in Malone village on the second Saturday and Sunday in December—in Massena on the last Saturday and Sunday in February next.

15. Appointed Br. Wallace to prepare the minutes for the press, and have them published in the Magazine and Advocate.

16. Adjourned to meet again in Canton village, on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in June next.

M. JENNISON, Moderator.

J. Wallace, Clerk.

ORDER OF PUBLIC SERVICES.

Wednesday morning.—Prayer, Br. Grosh. Sermon, Br. Sias.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. Newell. Sermon, Br. E. A. Garfield.

Evening.—Prayer, Br. Simonds. Sermon, Br. Newell.

Thursday morning.—Reading Scripture, Br. Briggs. Prayer, Br. Langworthy. Sermon, Br. Briggs.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. Briggs. Sermon, Br. Grosh. Reading select Scriptures, Br. Newell. Ordaining prayer, Br. Simonds. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures, Br. Grosh. Right hand of fellowship, Br. Langworthy. Usual addresses, Br. Grosh. Benediction by the same.

A sermon was also preached in the evening by Br. Grosh.

The meeting was in the highest degree satisfactory. The holy words of truth from the lips of our visiting brethren, distilled like the dew, making an impression which we hope will be lasting and productive of much good, both to those who are in the faith, and those who are out. Through the impoliteness of some of the Congregational church in that place, our request for the use of their meeting-house was not granted; yet through the exertions of our friends we were conveniently accommodated with a capacious tabernacle, erected on the meeting-house green, sided with boards and covered with cloth, supplied with comfortable seats within, and a commodious stand for the preachers. The singing was good, and friendship, love and peace prevailed; and all who worshipped therein, felt to realize and rejoice, that the "tabernacle of God was with men." The truth is advancing, and error receding. Be united, firm and independent in the faith, and live before the world the profession which you make. J. WALLACE.

WHICH IS THE WORST?

A Calvinistic preacher once assigned as a reason for not embracing Universalism, that it appeared to him very unreasonable that the cruel tyrants who had been guilty of burning martyrs at the stake should fare as well in another world as the pious defenders of Christianity who had suffered their persecutions. Yet this same preacher professes to believe that God willed, before their existence, a share of his own offspring to suffer agonies indescribable throughout the endless ages of eternity.

Which being is the worst? the one who tortures for a few moments, or the one who tortures endlessly? O. H.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Since the publication of Br. S. R. Smith's article in favor of a theological seminary, I have been repeatedly requested to write an article opposing such an institution. A compliance with these requests has been delayed, partly by my absence from home and the press of other business, but more in the hope that some abler hand might save me the labor.

I prefer to examine the subject rather than reply to any individual—and, in order that a reply may be made with perfect freedom, to write not as an Editor or proprietor of the paper, but as a correspondent—as a member of the denomination. As to motives, I impugn none. Knowing my own to be pure and good, I will not question those of others without evidence. Neither will I admit the right of any one to say I love ignorance or oppose knowledge among either laity or clergy, unless they can prove it by my practice in past life. I oppose a theological seminary for reasons all similar to the few I here offer, and I ask to be judged by what I say are my reasons, and not by what others attribute to me.

Excuse this preface. The importance of the subject and the necessity of its investigation by the people at large—the probability that it will yet be largely canvassed in our periodicals, and otherwise—the question that has been made of motives on both sides, and the misrepresentation of arguments that has too generally prevailed, demand it.

To the subject. The immediate object to be attained by establishing a theological seminary, is, an increase of facilities for the acquisition of theological knowledge by candidates for the ministry. Some would include literary and scientific knowledge, but as these will not lessen the objections, can be otherwise obtained, and only encumber the question, and as the subject recommended “to the consideration of the members of our denomination,” is a theological seminary, I prefer the question in its simplest form. The immediate object is, however, not the only object. The ultimate object is, or should be, the instruction of the GREATEST POSSIBLE NUMBER of our fellow-beings in the doctrine and principles of Universalism—in other words, THE PROSPERITY OF OUR CAUSE. I am heartily in favor of both these objects, but deem the latter object by far the most important—and I am earnestly opposed to the means proposed, because I believe that measure will not accomplish even the immediate object near as well as other less dangerous and less expensive means; while it will much retard, if not wholly prevent, the accomplishment of the ultimate and most desirable object. True, a theological seminary will gather together means for acquiring theological knowledge, and will, to a certain extent, increase the facilities for using those means, but it will limit them in such a manner as ultimately to lessen the number of our preachers, divide and distract the denomination, and thus ruin the prosperity of our cause. The following are a few of my reasons for this belief.

1. The probable abuses arising out of a theological seminary, are not among the least important of my reasons—but as these evils have often been named, and are thickly sprinkled on the page of history and among the denominations around us, I will not here specially recapitulate them, but attend to the argument by which they are met.

It is said that our doctrine and principles will prevent these abuses among us. If lived up to, they would; but Universalists sometimes forget their principles, and act very much like other people. We are but men, and Partialists are no less than men—yet they have abused such seminaries most grievously, and what evidence have we that Universalists will not do the same? The simple profession of Universalism? Let us see. Did Universalism prevent the Anabaptists of Germany (Bucer, Buckholdt and others) from practicing polygamy, promiscuous intercourse, and subverting all order and civil government? Did it prevent the Seventh-day Tunkers, of Ephrata, Pa., from lying on oaken planks studded with brass nails, monacism, and other absurd and superstitious, if not immoral and wicked practices? Did it prevent the “Convention for the New-England States and others” from attempting to exercise supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction over State Conventions which they would not acknowledge and it was obliged to desist from? Did it prevent the division that now exists in Massachusetts? Did it prevent “veteran Universalists and certain mothers in Israel,” in Maine, from “speaking as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and as the spirit gave them utterance,” in public meeting—i. e., pretending to especial inspiration of God? Does it prevent the Universalists in Montville, same State, from claiming the same inspiration, the gift of prophecy, and the ineffable mysticisms endorsed by Br. Bates as “a travel into the deep waters of divine grace,” and the speaking of “Christ by his resurrection power”? (See Gospel Banner of July 9th). No—and neither can I believe that it will save us from the abuses of a theological seminary if once established among us. We, as well as other denominations, have the materials of bigotry, superstition, and fanaticism, and the love of power, existing among us—and if the torch is applied they will blaze as readily and burn to nearly as much desolation.

2. That a theological seminary will lead to the establishment of arbitrary literary, scientific and theological tests, by which many able and useful, but poor and sensitive candidates for the ministry will be excluded, and their services lost to us, I think quite certain, because—1. Such effects have always followed the establishment of such seminaries among other denominations; and, 2. The first and most earnest advocates of the theological seminary are in favor of such tests, and avow one of its objects to be, to establish such a standard of qualifications. The evils resulting will be noticed in another place.

3. To accommodate our measures to the views of those whom we most hope to convert, is laudable and proper, when we can do it without sacrificing principle, or a greater good. Yea, it is our duty to do so. The abandonment of a theological seminary will not compromise our principles; for it is advocated only as a means to do greater good. No greater good can exist connected with our measures, than the attainment of our ultimate object, viz., the conversion of the greatest number to Universalism. But the greatest number of those whom we can most reasonably hope to convert to our cause, are strongly opposed to theological seminaries—while those in favor of such institutions are the least likely to be converted to our faith. If I can establish this point, I prove that a Universalist theological seminary will defeat the main object for which it is established.

Who are opposed to theological seminaries? A large majority of all those connected with no denomination. The Arian and Freewill Baptists, generally—the Baptists in the West—the German Baptists or Tunkers, Mennonists, Omish, Friends or Quakers (Orthodox and Hicksite), etc., etc., who are liberally scattered abroad in N. Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, western Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and elsewhere, and most of whom have already embraced, or are strongly inclined to embrace, the distinguishing doctrine of our denomination. Also the most liberal portion of the popular denominations supporting such seminaries; for they are tired of the beggaries and disgusted with the drones and practices attendant on such institutions. And lastly, the great portion of community which, by disgust at the practices and doctrines of our opposers, have been driven into skepticism, from which they can be rescued only by the doctrine of Universalism, and in favor of which, and a corresponding conduct, they are generally strongly inclined. Nearly all these are deeply and irreconcilably opposed to theological seminaries, and prepossessed in our favor by our opposition to them, to the arts by which they are supported, and to the abuses of power and inequality of condition to which they have always given rise. Their friendship, good will and war-wishes for our prosperity—all hope of their general conversion to our sentiments, and union with our order—we must forever renounce if we now turn back and build up the very measures we have always hitherto so ably opposed.

And what can we gain to compensate us for this loss? Those in favor of theological seminaries? Who are they? Generally the high-toned, wealthy, and spiritually proud among the Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Calvinistic Baptists—the priest-ridden among the Methodists and Roman Catholics—and the aristocratic, wealthy and popularity seeking among the Unitarians and Episcopalians. These may affect to despise our clergy because they come not forth from colleges, universities and theological seminaries; but it is evident that they do not often risk a controversy with our field and workshop preachers, and when they do, they are uniformly worsted. And it is also manifest, that the very reasons for which they withhold credit from our preachers, are the reasons why our cause deserves credit, and receives it, too, from “the common people.” We cannot gain even the apparent respect of these opposers by giving up our measures for theirs; for they will hold our doing so as a mark of submission to them; and we must lose the advantages our cause now possesses in the prepossessions of “the common people” because of the ease with which it is defended.

But even if we could gain the applause and outward respect of the advocates of such seminaries—would this gain compensate our loss on the other hand? I think not—for, of the two, give me the same class of men that followed after Jesus and his apostles, in preference to the “many wise, many noble” who are “not chosen,” and who uniformly opposed the Gospel in its simplicity, and the church in its poverty.

4. But not only do we drive from us the many that are drawing nigh, but we may drive many out from among our midst, by establishing such a seminary. It does appear to me that there is an indifference to these probable consequences which does not augur well for our brotherly affection, or love for the peace, union and prosperity of our order. That there are thousands of our brethren who are most earnestly opposed to such an institution, believing it the entering wedge of spiritual domination and oppression, is well known; and that if such a measure is introduced by the denomination, many will for ever abandon our ranks, and others remain bitter opposers in our midst, is by them solemnly declared. Yet in despite of this, the friends of a theological seminary not only insist on one, but appear to urge the denomination, as such, to establish and support it at the risk of all this division, loss and strife. Whole associations, if not conventions, can be named, which will not remain in a denomination holding such an institution; and will oppose the denomination in all measures relating to it. True, a majority of our public bodies will adhere; but in them will be many sorrowing hearts and paralyzed hands. True, but a small minority may separate; but it will be large and powerful enough to destroy our union and harmony—and these destroyed, where is the advancement and prosperity of Universalism?

5. Nor will the division end here. The measure contains in its very operations, the seeds of strife and disunion. The professor (or professors) of theology will have his peculiar opinions on those doctrinal subjects which are sufficient to divide Universalism into as many separate systems as Partialism is now divided into. These opinions he can, and probably will, often bring before the minds of the students. Having the whole direction of their studies, he will prescribe such a course, and select such books, as are best calculated to impress on their minds his peculiar sentiments. The consequences may easily be imagined. He has to do with young men—many of them warm and strong in their predilections, and jealous of authority and constraint—the more so, because they have no choice of teachers. Future and no future punishment—the materiality and immateriality of the soul—Calvinistic and Arminian views of moral agency—these and a thousand other views of doctrine; baptism, the eucharist, church government, and other forms and ceremonies—each of these is quite sufficient, in such a juncture, to form a line of division and a source of endless discord.

Add to this the strifes likely to arise between rival candidates for the professorship and their respective friends—between various ecclesiastical bodies for the control of its measures; and the local jealousies arising from its location, and I for one, must solemnly deprecate its establishment even by private individuals, much more as a denominational measure.

6. The expense of a theological seminary over a simpler and more republican plan (of which more anon) possessing tenfold its advantages without its evils, is another objection to it among Universalists. An attempt to gain the respect of our opposers, by emulating their expensive measures, will only ensure us their deserved ridicule and derision. If Universalists in the Empire State (nearly one fourth of the whole denomination), are unable to pay for the Clinton Liberal Institute, how can we vie with Cambridge, Andover, New-Haven, Hamilton, and Princeton Theological Seminaries; each costing ten times as much (and annually, beside, as much) as the whole cost of the Institute! And this, too, after every ecclesiastical body in the State has resolved its support over and over again—after agent after agent has begged and importuned for subscriptions—after a single dollar even, has been received with gratitude! If it takes five years active and united exertions of one fourth of our order, to raise $6,000, how many years of divided and opposed exertion will it require from one half of the denomination to raise enough to build a respectable theological seminary, furnish a good library, and secure the services of a sufficient number of professors, after those five years collections?

But this is not all. None but the wealthy can lose three years time, and pay boarding, clothing and tuition to the amount of at least $300 beside, while enjoying its facilities. Out of about fifty preachers with whose early circumstances I am acquainted, not one would and could have done this! I venture to say that out of the one hundred and twenty preachers of our order in this State, not five could have done it before they entered the ministry. Men advanced in years, or having families dependent on their labors, could not. What, then, shall be done with the ninety-five out of every one hundred candidates, when the new standard of qualifications is erected? Look, before you leap! They may understand their Bibles and human nature—they may preach acceptably and usefully to country congregations—they may possess good common sense, general knowledge and excellent moral characters, but if they cannot attend a theological seminary, or pass examination before those who have attended, they will be excluded. "The standard of ministerial qualifications must be raised," say the advocates of such a seminary, "to require at least a grammatical knowledge of the English language, logic, rhetoric, and ecclesiastical history." After the seminary is in operation, who will guarantee that Greek, Hebrew, and Biblical criticism will not also be required? Under such circumstances, at least ninety out of every hundred that would now enter the ministry, must be excluded; or hordes of beggars must overrun our denomination, and our females get up "holy fairs" to sell dolls and baby caps, in order to raise funds to educate the ninety out of charity—thus degrading them before the other ten more wealthy brethren!

But this is not all. The money to found such a seminary is to be collected from the laity—for what? To educate those candidates for the ministry who are wealthy enough to afford this loss of time and money. Cannot those collections be so applied as to benefit all—laity and clergy—the poor candidate for the ministry as well as the rich? Certainly it can—and that, too, without risking its perversion and abuse, the division of the denomination, and the ruin of the cause. But of this plan in another number, for it belongs to a different subject.

7. I cannot admit that such great necessity exists for a material change in educating and fellowshipping preachers, as is supposed by some—nor that the benefits of a very learned and theologically educated ministry are even equal to those of a practical, self-educated ministry, in the present state of our denomination. Look but at the past rapid advancement of our doctrine—at the present prosperity of our cause—at the success of our preachers, compared with that of preachers of other denominations pursuing the very new measures proposed, and aided, too, by wealth and numbers we have not, and operating by ecclesiastical combinations we should not have. All these prove the general superiority of our present measures, and call on us to "let well enough alone." Remove the defects of the present well-operating measures; but do not abolish them for new schemes, which have always been injurious in the hands of others.

But even if a change was required, it is, least of all, the change a theological seminary will bring us. The wealthy can now get every requisite in education, except the mere item of theological study, in the existing colleges and academies. If industrious and talented, they can get the theological portion; for they already have the money to get the books they will want, and have preachers capable of directing them—or where are we to get professors? The poor could not get any of these requisites, even if we had a theological seminary in which every language and science was taught. We cannot now procure preachers enough to supply the calls, taking all good men who come, rich and college bred, poor and self-educated. The former will be but poor substitutes for the latter self-denying class, in new and sparse settlements; for they know more of books than men, and will require at least double to support them in former habits and indulgences. As to our more refined and literary congregations, in populous villages and cities, we now have as many preachers to suit them, as they can support. Hence it is evident that the denomination at large will be but little, if any, benefited by the new measures, while it may be much and deeply injured.

As to a commentary, since the publication of a few late works in our order, it is less necessary than formerly. There is a growing abundance and cheapness of standard Partialist commentators, whose admissions will always have more authority with Partialists, than any thing a Universalist can assert. Besides, had we ever so many able scholars, could we agree whether the commentary should be written by believers in punishment after death, or not? Remember the outcry made a few years ago against Br. Loveland's offer, on account of his sentiments! But it is admitted that we have two or three capable of the work; and one on whom all could agree, but he is too diffident. Is it not easier and better to overcome that diffidence, or to employ the others, than to erect such a seminary at the risk of all its evils?

8. In conclusion. I hope the denomination, in its denominational capacity, (or the United States Convention,) will see the propriety of not taking sides against either of the two parties on this great question. Let the advocates of a theological seminary build and sustain one, if they will have it, and are able to do so. Let the opponents oppose it, and persuade its friends to abandon it, if they can—or support any measure in opposition, which they may devise. But let not the denomination, as a denomination, take sides with or against either party. If a different measure can be devised in which all parties can agree, well; if not, let that third party, also, take its course unsupported and unopposed by the denomination, as a denomination. This, in my humble opinion, is the only course that can save the denomination from division and ruin. And while I earnestly entreat it may be pursued, I firmly and sincerely believe that if the voice of every member of the denomination could be truly and fully ascertained, there would be at least three to one against a theological seminary, whether erected by a few individuals or by the order. My observations and knowledge would warrant me in saying nine to ten—but I put it at the lowest estimate. Yet I would not array the denomination, as a denomination, against even this one-tenth—I would only refuse to endorse their measures. Let us have peace, and we prosper.

I have done. Much as I have written, I could not have said less and given my principal reasons. I have written in sincerity and frankness, and with fulness of charity to all. I ask to be read in the same manner—and if replied to, to be answered in the same spirit—and whether or not, may God save Universalists from the evils of a theological seminary! Amen. A. B. GROSH.

THE SOCIAL PRINCIPLE.

Of all religious systems ever promulgated in the world, Christianity the most effectually appeals to, and calls into exercise the social principle in man—makes him feel that he is not a solitary being—not alone in the world—that he lives not and acts not for himself alone, and that the happiness which is "his being's end and aim," is to be a social happiness, enjoyed in common with others, and diffused abroad as widely and among as many fellow-beings as possible. Christianity in its purity makes no ascetics—drives none from the social walks of life to cloistered cells and monkish seclusion—nor encourages the vain and delusive hope that the life of the gloomy anchorite is most approved of Heaven and most certain to secure the happiness of man. The great founder of the system was himself no recluse—his habits were altogether social—social in the most tender and endearing sense of that term. True, he occasionally sought solitude. But for what? Not as the great business, and labor, and end of life; but to fit and prepare himself the better for discharging the great social duties which he came to perform. The miracles he wrought and the instructions he gave were not wrought and given in solitude, but before multitudes of witnesses, and thousands were benefited thereby.

But of all the forms in which Christianity was ever presented to man, Universalism (which we consider the purest and best), is the most extensively social in its principles and bearings. It confines not its blessings and its social affections to its believers and friends alone. It teaches its advocates that they are not the exclusive heirs and favorites of Heaven—that the mercies of God extend to all—that all are created by the same benignant Parent—destined to the same happy and glorious immortality with themselves, and hence, that in the eye and counsels of the Eternal, they all form but one great fraternity, and are finally to dwell together in one brotherhood forever, in the closest bonds of social and fraternal union. Therefore, in the language of the apostle, they are bound to "do good to all men as they have opportunity."

But our design in introducing this subject to the notice of our readers, at this time, is, not to write an essay on the social tendency of Universalism as a theory, or to prove that the principle in the abstract, is better calculated than any other to endear man to his fellow-man, and encourage the free, and social, and generous affections that make so great a share both of the duties and happiness of life: but to inquire and examine whether Universalists do really carry out this social principle in the manner they ought, and live in that intimate and affectionate interchange of thoughts and affections which they profess to believe are encouraged by their theory.

We know that in some places and with some societies and churches of Universalists, this principle is duly and properly regarded, and the members feel and act on the great plan of the universal fraternity of man and the special and intimate brotherhood existing among their members. They feel and act like social beings—they take a lively interest in each other's welfare—they seek to promote each other's happiness—they feel that "if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it." They are ever seeking for opportunities to do each other good—they speak when they meet, and they meet often to converse one with another. If a stranger meets with them at the house of worship, they are careful to ascertain, if possible, who he is, and to bestow on him those friendly attentions, those fraternal courtesies and those kindnesses that will make him feel at home, and as if he were among friends and brethren who know how to treat him with Christian courtesy and kindness. At their meetings, whether in private at each other's houses, or in public on the day of worship, they enjoy "the feast of reason and the flow of soul"—ay, and the bliss of soul too; for they are acquainted with those ennobling principles which form the elements and make up the sum of human happiness.

But there are other places and other societies in our order, where the social principle scarcely seems to exist; or if it exist, it seems entirely dormant and inactive. It is stifled in its very first efforts to commune with kindred spirits. Instead of the warm embrace of friendship and reciprocal love, it meets with cold indifference, and distant, silent reserve, that seems to freeze up the very vitals of affection, and dampen every joy that approximates to sociableness. Those who should be the most intimate and ardent in their friendship, meet each other and, like the priest and the Levite pass by on the other side without speaking, as if they had been born mutes. They see each other at the house of worship—always excepting those who stay at home on the Sabbath—but they know not each other's names, or at farthest nothing but the names, nor speak, nor try to become acquainted. They call not on each other at their respective dwellings, nor seem to care whether their brethren are in want or abundance, sick or well, happy or miserable. The stranger that visits their meetings they welcome not, nor treat with the friendship and cordiality that would induce him to come again. They are sure also never to invite strangers or neighbors of opposing sentiments to attend their meetings, lest they should be suspected of endeavoring to proselyte, although they have often yielded to the importunity of their neighbors, and gone with them to hear opposing and inconsistent dogmas.

Such, at least, are the appearances that manifest themselves in some Universalist societies. We pretend not to say they are invariably the true index to the feelings of the heart. They may, in some instances, proceed from bashfulness, timidity, want of acquaintance, want of reflection, infrequency of meetings, or other similar causes. But we do say, that whatever be the cause, wherever this distance and unsocial spirit and feeling exist, they are decidedly hostile to the spread and the influence of Universalism—they dampen the faith, chill the hope and freeze the charity of the society that harbors them. We know these feelings sometimes exist, to a great extent in so called Orthodox societies—but though they may have some excuse for them from the nature of their principles, yet we have no excuse, no apology to offer for their indulgence. They are entirely at war with our principles, which in themselves are essentially and necessarily social. Let each member and each society examine themselves, and see whether they are faulty in this respect. Let all be active, zealous, faithful, at home and abroad—let them stir up each other's pure minds by way of remembrance—let them exhort each other with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs—let them often visit in private, and never be absent from the public meetings—let them invite their families, their friends, their neighbors, even their enemies to go along with them and join in the delightful worship of God—let them always be able to give to every inquirer a reason of the hope that is in them, and exemplify in their lives the benignant fruits of their faith; let them do these things, and they have nothing to fear. They will go on conquering and to conquer—one shall chase a thousand and two shall put ten thousand to flight, and the world shall soon come to the knowledge of the truth, the social principle every where prevail, and the whole world form but one society. Amen.

M. W., AND REPLY.

MR. EDITOR—SIR—I never happened to fall in with one of your papers, until a few days since, when a friend had the politeness to send one to me—the number which contained the prize article—and I was so forcibly struck with its contents, that I have taken the liberty to make a few remarks, which you are at liberty to publish, if you please.

In the first place, I am a believer and professor of that religion, which is so often spoken against by Universalists. And it appears to be the object of him who penned the article, to prove that this religion makes its votaries perfectly miserable. But, Sir, I think if you will examine minutely the conduct and feelings of the man spoken of, you will readily perceive the man had no religion—that he was destitute of all those noble feelings which pure religion inspires in the soul of man. It appears that he was filled with fear, and all he did was through fear of hell, and under the impulse of such feelings, he became a member of the church, and for years lived in that awful condition. Oh, miserable man, to be thus deceived so long! Now this feeling is in direct opposition to religion. And here I would ask what pure religion is. Is it not pure love to God and man? We read in the word of God that "perfect love casteth out fear;" and it is certain that this man did not possess one spark of love, either for God or man. The first right feeling that I perceive in him, is when he prays, "have compassion God of all grace," etc. And how ready God was to give him peace, when he cast himself on the mercy of God. The man's language afterwards is what every soul feels when renewed by the blood of Christ. I do not believe that it was a belief in universal salvation that changed the man's feelings so much, but it was that fear had gone, and pure love to God had taken its place. Then it was that he felt as every true Christian feels, let his or her name be what it may. He believed that God was good, just and wise, and that all God did was for the good of the human family—that he would do right with all that he had created; and it was such feelings as those, that inspired love in his soul, and caused peace to flow like a river. It is not the name by which men are designated that makes Christians, but it is love to God. And if we love God, we shall strive to keep his commandments, we shall follow as nearly as possible, the example of our blessed Saviour.

But what I would say on this subject, is, I do not believe that any person can be a true Christian, when he does what God commands through fear of hell. It must be love, for "God is love." I speak from my own experience. I never had a fear of going to hell, but was induced to be a Christian, and love my Creator and Preserver, because the character of God appeared lovely, and all his requirements were just, and calculated to make me happy in this world, and in the world to come.—And I believe that God will reward the virtuous, and punish the vicious, and that, too, in another state of existence, if they die in sins unrepented of. And this belief does not make me unhappy, but gives me joy and pleasure to which I was once a stranger. It is and ever has been my prayer, that all might repent and come to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus.

M. W.

Buffalo, July 18, 1836.

REMARKS.

I wish to add a few remarks to the foregoing. "The religion spoken against by Universalists" is Partialism—a belief in the endless misery of a part of mankind, and of the practices consequent upon that belief. Is M. W. a Partialist? Does M. W. believe in this endless misery—feel it—practice as that faith induces? If so, her (for I think it is a female) love for God may be great—her love for man may be extensive—but neither is "perfect," and consequently she is not devoid of fear, nor free from its torment. But if not a Partialist, she has misrepresented herself—she has misunderstood the bearing of the tale, and is herself a believer in God's impartial grace and universal goodness. If M. W. will please settle these questions—for I believe that now her mind is bewildered in relation to Universalism—then will I further attend to what she has to offer.

In all her remarks about what religion is, what are its effects, the inutility of the fear of hell to make any one a Christian, the necessity of seeing God as he is—i. e., in a lovely light, and loving him because he first loved us, and believing that all he does is for our good—in these and all similar remarks, she breathes so fully and perfectly the pure, genuine principles and feelings of Universalism, that we cannot believe she is a Partialist—that she ever was willing to be endlessly damned for the glory of God—that she views God as a being who will "cast off forever" his own offspring.

She says that her belief in the punishment of the wicked "does not make her unhappy, but gives her joy and pleasure." Of course one of two things must be true. 1. She really desires what she prays for—viz., "that all may repent and come to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus;" and believes that the punishment of the wicked will make them repent and come to Jesus—or 2. That she does not desire it, and therefore rejoices in the belief that their punishment will never have any salutary effect on them. If the first is true, she is a Universalist—if the latter, a believer in cruel, unmerciful, and useless endless punishment. Let her examine herself—find out her own sentiments—boldly and plainly advocate them that they may be understood, by her precept and her practice; and she will soon find that the religion we oppose is solely the religion built on fear—that the religion we advocate, is the religion based on and filled with love to God supremely, and to man universally. In this religion I am happy to be, with fraternal affection, the brother of M. W. A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST PUBLICATIONS.

"Universalism against Suicide.—A sermon delivered in the Fourth Universalist church in Boston, May 15, 1836; in reply to a sermon by Rev. J. H. Fairchild. By Benjamin Whittemore, Pastor." Published at the office of the Universalist and Ladies' Repository—pp. 20, 8vo.

The Rev. Mr. Fairchild, it appears, preached a discourse intended to prove that, if Universalism is true, it is the duty of its believers to cut the throats of their relatives and friends and then their own, and so hasten all to heaven at once. On application, he refused to furnish his sermon for publication, or to allow any extracts to be copied from it. So much for the discourse to which the one before us is a reply.

In reply, Br. B. Whittemore shows most clearly, from plain and undeniable facts, that a belief which produces misery in the minds of its believers, has a tendency to lead to suicide—consequently, as Universalism does not make its recipients miserable, but the reverse, it cannot naturally lead to suicide; but to the more careful preservation of life. Hundreds have destroyed their wives, children, friends, and themselves, because they believed they themselves were going to an endless hell; and feared those others might go there if not destroyed—but no single instance can be produced where a man destroyed his own life, because he believed he was going to heaven; or took the lives of those dear to him because he feared, that if he did not, they would be endlessly holy and happy. If our opponents wish to discuss this subject we are always ready to meet them; but let them bring forward at least one fact to justify their suspicions and their fears. Inferences will not do—the people ask for facts—and if Universalism has such an evil tendency—as Mr. Fairchild and others pretend, surely among the five hundred thousand Universalists in the United States, they can find one fact to prove it by.

But I have forgotten the sermon. It is a fair, candid, manly reply—affectionate and earnest in manner, sound in argument and chaste in style. We thank its publishers for sending us the copy before us.

The Philomath Encyclopedia—a monthly publication, edited by Br. J. Kidwell, at Philomath, Ind., has made its appearance, and the first number is before us. It is an octavo pamphlet of 48 pages, and is to be afforded at two dollars per volume.

The typographical execution and quality of the paper is inferior to what such a publication should be; and we regret to see the pages occupied in part with personal controversy between its Editor and Rev. Robert Smith. As to the necessity of such a work and its probable utility, those in the West can judge better than we. Br. Kidwell is a self-educated man, of good natural talents, but we doubt his ability to make the work a complete encyclopedia, even with the aid he can procure, if we may judge from the specimen before us.

The Glad Tidings, published every other Saturday, at Pittsburg, Penn., by a committee of the Universalist society there, and edited by an association of clergymen—Br. S. A. Davis and others—has just reached us. It is published at one dollar and fifty cents per annum in advance—is about the size of the Magazine and Advocate, well filled with selections and editorial which we have no doubt will be found respectable, though we have not had time to examine it.

Its appearance is good, and if it can be sustained, will be useful to the cause.

The Gospel Banner and Maine Christian Pilot began a new volume in their united form, last week, with the aid of the new Editors. A neat, well filled, folio newspaper worthy of all commendation and an extensive circulation. We hope it will receive both to the full extent of its merits. A. B. G.

STATISTICS OF UNIVERSALISM.

JANUARY TO JULY, 1836.

It is perhaps impossible without more definite arrangements, to obtain full and certain information respecting the statistics of our denomination. Individuals enter the ministry and no report is made through the periodical papers—societies are formed and churches erected and dedicated; and all we learn commonly respecting either, is, the fact that such events have occurred.

Now there is, or ought to be some person in every society, who will make a full report of the preliminary efforts which have resulted in the establishment of that particular community; of the number of members, the nature of their compact, their circumstances and their prospects. Occasionally, indeed, this is done—but commonly, only when it is supposed that something a little extraordinary has been accomplished.

Societies which number but a few members, or are located in some obscure or by-place, seem to forget, that it is as important to the relative influence and progress of the denomination, that they number but fifteen or twenty out of a population of a hundred, as some kindred society which counts some two or three hundred out of ten thousand. Let both—let all make a full report of their number, privileges, proceedings and prospects, and we shall not, as now, be presented with a meagre catalogue of names and dates.

Recapitulation—twenty-two preachers—seventeen societies—eight meeting-houses, and two Associations.

Such is the progress of Universalists and Universalism during six months—and it is not doubted that even this record falls short of the reality. For if we have the whole number of accessions in preachers, societies, meeting-houses and Associations, it furnishes no data whence to estimate the increase of members in previously existing societies. Neither does it embrace the many houses for worship now erecting, nor the numerous congregations which are emerging into being, or which are becoming permanent and influential by a more regular ministration. TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Brs. Spear, Lewis, Austin, Peck, A. Clark, A. H. Curtis, Holmes, and others will be heard from with pleasure, when it suits them to break the silence which has reigned between us—some of them we have not heard from for so long a time, that we ardently desire again to see their manuscripts.

Reflector, J. H. S., Eimi, A Universalist and Z. P. are welcome and welcome again.

"A Sister," (at the North,) and sister S. L. W., (when she gets settled down in her new home,) will be heard from with more than ordinary pleasure. We have so few female correspondents, that we cannot lose one for any length of time without much missing her.

PROMOTION OF THE SABBATH.

The Presbyterians and some others are making great special efforts on this subject. At a late meeting held in Buffalo, they recommended the withdrawal of the patronage of people from lines of boats and stages which travel on Sunday—and even from those who will not observe the day. Whether they will again establish pioneer lines, and attempt to stop the Sunday mails, they have not yet determined. Probably, (as they cannot live without excitement and scarcely with it,) they will get up another crusade on these subjects. We shall see.

WESTERN UNION SEMINARY.

Br. J. Kidwell, General Agent for this Seminary, gives notice that Mr. Houseworth, Professor of polite English literature and the Latin and Greek languages, proposes to make a permanent residence at this Seminary, for the purpose of taking charge of the same as soon as a sufficient number of students can be engaged to justify commencing operations.

There is not yet a sufficient number of boarding houses in the vicinity to accommodate a great number of students; but by students rooming in the Institute, and furnishing bedding in private houses, forty or fifty can be accommodated. The prices of tuition from $2.50 to $5.00 per quarter. A. B. G.

NOTICE

Is hereby given to the stockholders of the funds of the Clinton Liberal Institute, residing within the district composed of the counties of Oneida, Herkimer and Madison, that two Trustees are to be elected, to fill the places of Amariah Stebbins and Simon Bingham, removed from the State. And the said stockholders are hereby required to return the names of two suitable persons to fill said trust, to David Pixley, Secretary, at Clinton, Oneida county, on or before the 30th of August next.

July 25, 1836.

N. B. Those who have paid ten dollars to the permanent funds of the Institute are entitled to one vote—and to one additional vote for every additional twenty dollars.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The regular communion day of the Universalist church in this city will be a week from to-morrow—the first Sunday in August.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in August by Br. C. B. BROWN at Williamstown—Br. SKINNER at Fort Plain and Br. L. C. BROWNE in this city—Br. C. S. BROWN at McLean—Br. H. ROBERTS at Byron Centre—Br. WOOLLEY at Richfield Springs, and at Carver's at 5, P. M., and Br. T. J. SMITH at Lebanon, and at Eaton at 5, P. M.—Br. WHITNEY at Oswego—Br. BIDDLECOM at Newville—Br. WAGGONER at Newport at 5, P. M. [the exchange between him and Br. Aspinwall, noticed in our last, is recalled]—Br. ASPINWALL at the brick schoolhouse in East Martinsburg—Br. ANDREWS at Middleport—Br. GROSH at Cedarville—Br. QUEAL at Howlet Hill, and at the schoolhouse near the Widow Leonard's at 5, P. M.—Br. S. R. SMITH at Madison—Br. O. ROBERTS at No. Bloomfield.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in August, by Br. WHITNEY at Lyons—Br. C. B. BROWN at Fulton—Br. DELONG at Hamilton Centre and Br. WOOLLEY at New-Berlin—Br. H. ROBERTS at Spafford—Br. O. ROBERTS at Lakeville.

Br. O. WHISTON will preach on every Sunday in the Universalist meeting-house in Cooperstown during the coming year.

The Chenango Association will meet at Oxford village, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in August—viz., August 31st and September 1st.

The Steuben Association of Universalists will meet at Howard Flats, Steuben county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (7th and 8th) of September.

The Ontario Association will meet at Geneva, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (14th and 15th) of September.

NOTICE.—At the annual meeting of the Western Reserve Association of Universalists it was thought expedient to divide the Association, by constituting a new one, to embrace the counties of Cuyahoga, Loraine and Medina. We the undersigned were appointed a committee to carry into effect the establishing of said Association. Therefore, in pursuance of the duties assigned us, we appoint a meeting to be held at the meeting-house in the township of Olmsted, Cuyahoga county, on the last Saturday and Sunday in August next, for the purpose of organizing said Association, and adopting a constitution and by-laws for its future regulation and government. Public services may be expected on both days in the usual manner on such occasions. Ministering brethren are respectfully solicited to attend; it is also desirable that the several societies within its limits may be represented by delegates regularly appointed. ASAHEL E. HEROD'S REMORSE.
BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

'Tis John the Baptist—lo! he comes—he comes! 'tis he!
In vain I close my aching eyes, I cannot shut
The spectre from my brain. Distinctly seen, both when I wake, and in my troubled dreams. The head—the Gory head! E'en smoking yet, with life's warm vital Current drenched.
Look! how benign his features are—with smile upon
His lips as angels wear, when to Jehovah's high Behest they bow obsequious.
The same forgiving calm lights up and overspreads
His placid brow—as calm those eyes, and countenance
Divine, as when the damsel, flushed with wantonness
And wine, presented it to me in that accursed charger.
Serene and saint-like, e'en in death as when in life,
With faithfulness and zeal, he served the most high God.
And yet a victim sore of woman's pride and hate!
And why? for admonition gently given,
And mild rebuke, for breach of law and deeds his Holy spirit disapproved.
Cease, spectre, cease! Torment me not with pity's gaze.
Compassion is but mockery to my woe. Horrid
To me its faintest tints! Dost thou pursue a broken
Reed? Oh, haunt me if you must, with hate infernal—Mad revenge. Less terrible to me thy features
Were, if shadowing forth thy imprecations dire Upon my doomed head! Then apathy might quench the Fever of my brain, and drown this keen remorse.
Gehenna's flames burn not with such intensity,
As does my brain. I've shed his blood—the blood of Innocence. And when my mandate reached him in His loathsome cell, he blessed the hand, that loosed the clanking
Chains—the foe whose upraised arm had aimed to strike
The deadly blow, and him that did command it.
O! death, I woo thee! hide me in the grave—
O, screen me from the worm that never dies—
This blasting, dread remorse!

Fool that I was! ah, murderer too!
Curse on the intoxicating bowl, and woman's dark Revenge!

O! woman, woman!
With uncontrolled dominion, rulest thou the mind
Of man, his destiny creating. Thou art his Tyrant, he thy cringing slave. Thou rul'st
Unconscious of thy power—therein consists thy strength.
Yet may thy sway extend, when all the virtues reign
Supreme within a spotless soul—
Where honor shines, and grace and truth preside—Unerring then the road. And thou wilt guide us on
To goodness, greatness, happiness and peace.
But when to folly bent, thy mind reveals its Dissonant traits, and vice sits empress of Thy heart—"Thy steps take hold on hell," and as a syren, Thou dost lead thy simple votaries down a drear,
Bewildering path to death!
What though report doth tell of one performing mighty Deeds? Some say that 'tis Elias—others, 'tis a prophet,
Or as one of them—but something whispers me, 'tis John the Baptist—who's risen from the dead, and Mighty works do show themselves in him. He, verily,
Was a Prophet—holy, just and true—and oft I've Heard him gladly, when he preached repentance.
Repentance? ah, indeed, will bitter tears wash from My hands the guilty stain? or cleanse the heart from crime?
Alas! tho' tinsel'd gauds I wear! what is a crown?
Emblem of power, to me, of power abused and Misapplied. I would exchange these robes of royalty
I wear, dishonored thus, for those of sackcloth, dust
And ashes. He lives again, I doubt it not—
For none but him could work such works, or speak the words
Of truth and grace like him. But what is that to me?
Can he forgive a wretch like me? and ease me
Of the load I bear? O, no; I'm doomed to bow beneath
This weight of guilt. And still I may not die!
O, would to Heaven, that I might die!

THE THEOLOGICAL MAN OF EXPEDIENTS.

"All means they use, to all expedients run."—Crabbe.

The theological man of expedients is one, who instead of following his own conscience and reason in religious matters, follows the popular fashion, consults appearance, and tries to seem orthodox—whatever orthodoxy may happen to be in his place and time.

"Whatsoever king may reign, He'll be the vicar of Bray, Sir."

Caiphas was a man of expedients, when he said "it is expedient that one man die for the people, and so the whole nation perish not." Pilate was a man of expedients when he believed Jesus to be a just person, and then put him to death. Erasmus was a man of expedients when he thought it safest to keep in with the pope, and write against the Reformers, though his heart and head was with them. St. Paul was not a man of expedients, for he did not shun to declare the whole counsel of God:

nor was Luther a man of expedients when he exposed himself singly to the whole power of Rome, and being asked, "Where then wilt thou remain in safety?" answered, "Under Heaven."

But in these days, and perhaps in all days, the Pilates and the Caiphases are more frequent than the Pauls and Luthers.

The man of expedients will subscribe any creed that you offer him, and then write, talk and preach against every article of it. He believes it, he says, "for substance of doctrine." He thinks he can do more good in the church than out of it. When he hears of a man's leaving a church because he does not believe its articles, he laughs at his simplicity. Better stay in it, and preach against them. If he is a Unitarian, he joins the Episcopal church, and reads prayers to the "Holy, blessed, and adorable Trinity"—on which he puts his own private interpretation. If he believes that man has full power by nature to obey God, he joins the Presbyterian church, and then employs himself in shuffling the words "natural," and "moral," backwards and forwards, till he has mystified his hearers and readers. If he believes that Adam had nothing to do with any body's guilt or innocence, and that imputation is nonsense and folly—he teaches his child to say that

"In Adam's fall
We sinned all!"— and goes and signs the Westminster Confession. If you ask him how he can reconcile all this to his conscience, he assures you that whatever the authors of the catechism have said, they must have meant exactly what he does—and that though they do not perhaps know it themselves, yet that nine-tenths of the good orthodox Calvinists believe just the same as himself. The man of expedients "is a blessed fellow to think as every one thinks—not a man's thought in the world keeps the roadway better than his"—that is, when he is defending himself against a charge of heresy.

The man of expedients has no idea of any thing being true yesterday, to-day and forever. If he had his handful of truths, he would only open his little finger. His doctrines change with the atmosphere he happens to be in. If he is in Connecticut, he is a Calvinist of the strictest sect—if in Massachusetts, he thinks it proper to exercise the reason; and in the western country he expands into a champion of all that is liberal. If you ask him whether a proposition is true or false, you must give him time, place and circumstances, or he cannot answer you. What was false yesterday is true to-day; what is sheer nonsense at Andover, is sound doctrine at Princeton.

The man of expedients is one thing in the pulpit, and quite another thing in the parlor. "He is a lamb in a drawing-room, but a lion in a vestry." The text in the Bible which he studies most faithfully is, "Be all things to all men." He earnestly strives to be wise as a serpent. If he is preaching before a congregation of whose character he is ignorant, he takes care to put in a little of every kind of phraseology, that by all means he may save some. The more he explains his faith, the less can you tell what he believes.

When the man of expedients is a layman, he is always to be found in the fashionable church, and on the popular side. He does not pray in the corners of the street, for that is not the custom, but when the church is full his devout appearance and the solemnity of his face are truly edifying. If an Episcopalian, how pathetic his responses! If a Methodist, how fervent his groans and his cries of glory! Perhaps he agrees in opinion with some small body. He is most careful then never to go near them. He grants their opinions are like his own, but then another church is nearer, or the preaching suits him better, or the music is finer, or the forms preferable, or some one he dislikes goes to the other church,

"Or any other reason why."

Alas! how common are men of expedients; how uncommon are men of principle and independence!—Western Messenger.

LANGUAGE OF MINISTERS.

"Whatever language a man uses, it tends to beget in him the style of feeling of which it is characteristic. If an awakened sinner, to conceal his impressions, shall affect lightness of manner and language, he will soon become what he affects to be, a careless sinner. On this principle it is, in my judgment, that no minister can adopt a severe, harsh and censorious manner with sinners, and not become to some extent in spirit, what he seems to be in language. We must at times use the language of severity, but if this becomes the unvarying and common mode, it will be unhappy. Nor can the language of denunciation and threatening, such as cursed, hell, damna-tion, and the like, be made frequent and familiar in the pulpit, without bringing up the associations of similar language from profane lips, in far different places, or without producing, if not as much, yet some degree of that bad influence of profane swearing. In the time of Davenport, they used to address men from the pulpit as 'cursed sinners,' and talk about their being 'damned to hell,' which made some people wonder what had got into ministers to swear so."

DEATHS.

In Manningville, Lower Canada, on the 13th inst., in the 67th year of her age, of paralytic affection, SARAH, wife of John Manning, Esq., who during a protracted illness which she bore with Christian fortitude, and whilst in possession of her senses, which she retained until a few days previous to her death, ever expressed a perfect willingness to resign her breath into the hands of that God who gave it, in whom she placed her trust, through faith in the all-sufficient merits of a crucified Redeemer and Saviour of the world. Her exemplary virtue through life, rendered her an ornament to her sex—the kindest wife, and most affectionate mother—peaceful in life and respected in society. She died as she always had lived, without a personal enemy; and has left a husband and ten surviving children to retain with sensible emotions, her amiable qualities in lasting memory. Funeral sermon by Rev. Charles Halsey, Presbyterian, from John xvii: 24.

In Geneva, N. Y., on Saturday, the 16th inst., HOLLOW
MILES, in the 26th year of his age, son of Rev. Stephen Miles. He was patient and resigned through the progressive stages of the most protracted disease with which we ever knew a mortal to be afflicted. It had not been his privilege to enjoy even tolerable health for several years. Some two years since or more he was brought to the very confines of the grave, but to the joy of his friends was again partially restored. After this time he sent us an article entitled "Universalism will do to live and to die by," (see No. 7, of this volume) in which he desired to correct the opinion abroad that Universalism will not sustain us in the hour of death. He had himself realized the excellency of his faith most, when all hope of recovery had fled. We extract the following from the article alluded to. "I have not been able to sit up over six or eight hours in a day, and some part of the time not even one, since July last; and I yet remain a firm believer in the final holiness and happiness of the whole human family." All which is stated in this article was fully exemplified in his death: he was as he said, "perfectly willing to go." Br. Miles was no speculative believer; he manifested the spirit of a Christian, in his life, and he died rejoicing in the expectation of a happy immortality for a ransomed world. May we be enabled to bear as respectful a tribute to the memory of all of "like precious faith!" Our aged Br. Miles and his consort, who survive their son, although deeply afflicted, yet since it is the will of God, are amply compensated in the reflection, that their son died rejoicing, and that they shall again meet him.

Br. Chase, by request of the deceased, truly tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the afflicted relatives and friends, at the Universalist church, on Monday last.

DEATH OF BISHOP WHITE.—The Gospel Messenger of this city, for last Saturday, was issued in mourning for the decease of WILLIAM WHITE, D. D., the Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States, and the oldest bishop of that communion in the world. He has consecrated every bishop of that church in the United States, with the exception of the last consecrated—the bishop of Michigan. He was consecrated bishop of Pennsylvania in 1792—having been in that ministry, chaplain of Congress during the Revolutionary war.

He died at his residence in Philadelphia, on the 17th inst., in the 89th year of his age—esteemed for his worth, beloved for his goodness, venerated for his age by all who knew him; and almost idolized by the communion of which the Messenger calls him the head and master.

THE TABERNACLES OF GOD.

BY REV. A. B. GROSH.

"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts."

Psalms lxxxiv: 1.

The tabernacles of God must be those earthly tabernacles in which he is worshipped and adored; and where, because he is specially sought after, he is also specially felt, and therefore is declared to be especially present. It is not a particular and single tabernacle, but all tabernacles; hence although eternity, the habitation of the high and lofty One, is included; yet those of earth, reared by the hand of religion, are not excluded.

All the tabernacles of God are amiable, all places truly devoted to receive the worship and praises of his children, are his tabernacles; and though the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, yet can he reside in a temple made with hands, in the grove where praise is offered up, in the cottage where devotion is found, in the closet where genuine prayer ascends, or in the humble heart where love universal and divine has found a residence and a home. And all these places, however homely and rude they may appear to the fastidious, the proud, and the unfeeling; when they become the tabernacles of God, are amiable to the worshipper of the Lord of Hosts. And why? Not because the workmanship is cunning, the decorations grand, the materials costly, the rites imposing, or the attendants are splendidly arrayed; but because it is the tabernacle of the Lord of Hosts. The glory of Jehovah rests upon it, and the majesty of God fills with reverence the mind that reflects upon it, and uses it, as it was designed. Dedicated to the worship of the greatest and best of Beings, a being of infinite goodness and perfection, the odor of Jehovah's name, and the recollection of all his mercies hallow the tabernacle in our remembrances of it. It is the house of prayer, the dwelling place of Divinity, the homestead of our devotions, and the household hearth of kindred spirits kneeling at the same altar—of children uniting in the praise of one common, universal, eternal, beneficent Father. Well, then, did the royal Psalmist rapturously exclaim, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts!"

For with what gladness does the affectionate child, its heart all alive to a parent's tenderness and love, return to the home of its father to hold fond and thrilling communion—to find again by sweet experience, that it is the loved one of that venerated form—and the dear object of a father's unwearied care and attentions. It matters not whether that father dwells in a rude hovel, or a stately mansion—in an humble cottage or the proud palace—it is a parent's home, the heart is seeking—and where the father dwells, there the child bends its footsteps exclaiming—How amiable is the home of my father—how dear the home of my youth—how lovely the fireside which is encircled by my affectionate brothers and beloved sisters! And what is it, my beloved friends, that throws such a bright sunshine of joy and halo of tenderness around the father's home? Is it not the parent's character—the assurance of a father's love—and the recollection of his manifold acts of kindness and deeds of affection to all his children? It is the social circle of grateful and loving hearts, bound together by the ties of an affection, lit up in every heart by a father's love for all, and which like the electric shock is felt by all alike, and at the same time, as it continually comes from, and perpetually returns to its fountain head. And where is there a father like our God, where can love and kindness be found for us equal unto that which is continually exercised by the Lord of Hosts? And what can be more amiable in our sight, if we duly appreciate his love, and are grateful for his mercies, than the tabernacles where we commune with his affectionate spirit, are wrapped up in and filled with his love, and are blissfully engaged in celebrating his praise and adoring his goodness?

How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! whether those tabernacles be the weary waste, the dreary desert, the smiling arbor, the lofty height, the lowly vale, the stately temple, the modest church, the humble cottage, the secret closet, or the cheerful heart. All, all are amiable in thy grateful children's sight, for they all are the tabernacles of thy spirit, they all are the residence of our Father.

Who can go out with the spirit of devotion in his soul, when the armies of the sky are mustering to praise, their glittering legions of suns, and worlds, and systems of worlds, when earth lies in sleeping beauty before him in the calm moonlight, when all is still, save the silent voice of nature praising its great Author, when all is hushed, save the uprising spirit of man, ascending on the wings of adoration to worship its eternal Parent, and not feel the truth of our text? Or go, thou grateful and adoring soul, on the broad ocean, or in the desert waste, where God only is seen, and felt, and heard, and feel there his presence and immensity—his care and thy dependency—his goodness and thy wants—his power and thy weakness, and thou wilt worship and adore in that tabernacle of his lonely manifestation, and feel it amiable indeed, for God, thy protector and thy father is there. Or, change the scene, and go into the full temple, where God's character properly displayed, causes joy to beam in every face and infuses happiness into every bosom, where each soul feels its alliance to its Maker, and its consanguinity to its fellows, then ask yourself,—are not Jehovah's tabernacles amiable? does not a delineation of his character, and a contemplation of his goodness, render even the crowded assembly one of peace, serenity, heavenly joy, and blissful adoration? Or, go into the family circle, or into the humble meeting-house, the effect is still the same, the same ruling cause is there to produce it, the same devotion to God, the same correct understanding of his character, the same gratitude for his goodness, and the same love toward all his fellow-creatures. God is there, not only in the house, but in the hearts and minds of his worshippers. The kind Father is among his grateful and affectionate children. Or, go out into the awful darkness of the storm and tempest, climb the mountain's dizzy height, and see Almighty majesty robed in the lightning's cloud and speaking in the thunder; mark how all nature bows before his awful presence; and if you are a worshipper of his infinite glory and power, if your heart is filled with confidence in his goodness, you will "see God in clouds and hear him in the wind," your heart will throb tumultuously with the heavings of the tempest's solemn grandeur, and your voice will rise above the contending elements, and go forth on the north wind pealing among its banners in the exulting cry—"The Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Thus may all places, times and seasons become alternately the tabernacle of Him—"whose temple is all space, whose altar, earth, sea, skies," and in the varying vicissitudes of each, the beautifully devotional hymn of the Scottish bard, will burst from the devout lips and the feeling heart of his adorer.

"These, as they change, Almighty Father these Are but the varied God. The rolling year
Is full of thee."

"And every sense, and every heart is joy."

Nor will place so much vary our feelings, as to render unamiable the tabernacle where God is sought and found, even though the pleasures of social worship, and of friendly commingling should not be ours. For in the language of the same gifted bard,

"Should fate command me to the furthest verge
Of the green earth, to distant barbarous climes,
Rivers unknown to song; where first the sun
Gilds Indian mountains, or his setting beam
Flames on the Atlantic Isles; 'tis sought to me:
Since God is ever present, ever felt,
In the void waste as in the city full;
And where HE vital breathes THERE must be joy."

"I cannot go
Where universal Love smiles not around
Sustaining all yon orbs, and all their suns;
From seeming evil still educing good,
And better thence again, and better still,
In infinite progression."

But, be it remembered, that the pure, the upright, and the feeling soul derives all its pleasure in the tabernacles of God, not merely from the greatness, the power, the wisdom, which it sees in the infinite Eternal, but from that infinite goodness which is attributed to every perfection of our heavenly Father.

A child does not truly reverence and love its parent merely because he is a parent. It loves because it was first loved—it reverences, because its father's virtues are pleasing and worthy of esteem, and it is grateful because the parent has done that which has lit up the holy flame of gratitude in its bosom. And could a parent ever become altogether inhuman, cruel and unamiable in the eyes of his offspring; we would see reverence and affection droop and die beneath the deadly influence of his character, and the father's residence become the aversion of his children. For how can the parent's home be amiable to his child, unless the inmates of that house render it so? Impossible. We may frequent such a father's home for convenience, out of fear of his displeasure, out of compulsion, arising from his power, but it is his love only that will draw us there with willing footsteps—it is his amiability only will make his dwelling amiable in our minds, lovely in our sight, sweet to our memories, and dear to our souls. In like manner, we contend, will it be with the tabernacles of our God. Where we can hear him described most as he is, where his character is displayed in its greatest perfection, and where all his acts are declared to be what they truly are; those of infinite goodness and unbounded love, there will be the most amiable tabernacle of Jehovah to his creature's hearts and his children's understandings.

Let those who will, worship the temple; we worship the true divinity, to whose service it is, or should be consecrated. Let the timid bow before the terrifying idol held up by a priest, or the worldly-minded adore the priest himself; we are neither to be scared into idolatry, nor seduced into man-worship: our God is our Creator, our Preserver, our Benefactor, our Saviour, our Father in heaven. And into those tabernacles where his character is traduced and his perfections misrepresented, our hearts shrink from entering; for however gorgeous they may be, as his tabernacle it is not amiable to our souls. Many, it is true, go there for convenience, and frequent it to escape his wrath—but it is goodness only can entice our willing steps over his threshold, and impartial love draw our commingling souls, equally desirous of our own and others' happiness, to worship around its altar, and to offer up his praises beneath its roof. What shall we say, then? Are there tabernacles of the Lord of Hosts, which are unamiable—where his character is always displayed in abhorrent and unlovely light, or are all his tabernacles amiable? My friends, we shall declare with the Psalmist, "How amiable are thy tabernacles—that is, all thy tabernacles—Lord of Hosts!"

The tabernacles not amiable to those who worship God in spirit and in truth, are not his tabernacles—the places not lovely to the adorers of infinite Love and Goodness, are not especially Jehovah's habitations—for though he may be present in them as he is in all places, yet there he is not revealed to the worshipping and waiting souls of his children—his character is not manifested to those jealous of his honor and delighting in his glory. Have none of you ever been in those places, which were said to be the tabernacles of God, but were not—and when God was said to be especially present, but was not? In an assembly convened for his worship and to engage in his praise? There, came up old age leaning on its staff, smiling in the gladness of the venerable heart—and there too, came youth bounding along with restrained joy in every footstep. There, was the guileless maiden—the thoughtful wife, and the grave matron. There, sat the smiling children, the manly youth—their bright and glossy curls beautifully contrasting with the silver locks of the aged grand-parent. All had come up in simplicity of heart and sincerity of soul, having apparelled themselves in clean, sweet, neat raiment, perhaps of their own fashioning, to show their reverence for the great and good Being, whose temple they deemed it to be. Yes, there they sat in meditative silence waiting for the services to begin—the sweet chorister longing with modest impatience for the time when she might open her lips to speak God's praise—when her thrilling "wood-notes wild" were to ascend on the words of the sacred song, borne aloft on the wings of pure devotion to the very throne of the great Eternal. There they sat, all waiting for the minister of the temple to open his lips, and, clothed with the garments of salvation, to proclaim those glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people. The aged parent whose son's manly bosom was pressed with the green turf of the graveyard—the venerable mother whose tear-gemmed eyes were bent on the marble tablet which recorded the birth and death of her only daughter, the fond sister who was watching the healthful wavings of the rose tree her hands had planted on her brother's grave; the brother, the wife, the husband, and the friend, whose hearts were not yet healed of those deep wounds, which death had made, when he plucked the loved one away from their embraces, and stamped the loss in undying thought on their anguished memories;—all were waiting for the words of consolation and of peace, which should assure them that their loved ones were the gainers by the exchange of worlds; which should proclaim to them the life and immortality brought to light by the Gospel, and point out to them a reunion in that world, beyond the resurrection, where death has no residence—grief no abiding place—where sin and sorrow are no more, and where sighing and parting cannot come.

At last the preacher arose, the clouds of wrath were on his brow, and the awful glooms of despair rested on his features. He took for his text a passage, dark, mysterious, and not understood by his auditors. Its terrible denunciations related to this life, and were fulfilled on the mortals of two thousand years before. He applied it to this congregation, and, oh, horrible! to their buried ones. He showed by false reasonings, and forced constructions, that its denunciations were to take place in eternity, and would endure so long as God himself should have an existence. Availing himself of the assistance of the corrupted theology of Christendom, the ignorant helplessness, early prejudices, and educational opinions of his auditors, he dealt out the unending damnation, the hot wrath and angry indignation of Jehovah, on all who had not experienced a certain mysterious change, an inexplicable and confused train of feelings, to them unknown, and by them unfelt. Then pointing to the tenanted burial ground, with the fury of a demon gleaming from his eyes, and the horrors of his hell convulsing every feature, he cried out in the deep, hoarse and husky tones of emotion;—"There sleep your sons and daughters—there rest the bones of your brothers and your sisters—there moulder the earthly remains of parents and friends—but their souls—their immortal and never-dying souls—where are they? Screaming in hell! Parching, burning, hissing, rolling in agony amid the ever flaming lava of the fiery lake! treading down the red-hot surges of the deep damnation of Tophet! surrounded by the almighty wrath and fierce indignation of God, forever and ever!" "Yes, the angry Judge of heaven and earth has seized a thunder-bolt, glowing with the heat of his vindictive wrath, and dashed them down to endless woe!"

Oh, where is now that lately hoping and therefore blessed congregation? The gray haired sire, the venerable matron, the blooming maiden, and the manly youth, feel their hearts transfixed as with a shaft of ice, while their brain is pierced with the hissing heating darts of Apollyon. Intellectual and physical power are prostrated, and one promiscuous mass of terrified people cover the floor, and fill the murky, trembling air with sobs, and shrieks, and sighs, and groans of more than mortal agony and despair. Heaven-bestowed reason deserts its throne, and, as the spectre despair, rises up from the imaginary abyss of unending wrath to take her place, and to wither forever the heart and hopes of man, glaring lunacy creeps over the brow, and convulses each brooding feature with fear and horror unutterable. Then, when they are thus frantic with despair, and rayless of all hope, the myrmidons of this modern Moloch, commence singing the song of the separation of fathers and mothers, of brothers and sisters, of companions and friends, and disgusted, the spectator rushes weeping from the unhallowed spot, at the dead hour of the night, his retiring ears ringing with the chorus of the infernal ballad—"And there will be wailing, wailing, wailing, at the judgment seat of God." Oh, beneficent Lord of Hosts, are these thy tabernacles? Art thou verily and especially present in these horrible scenes of frenzied despair, and frantic blasphemy? No—no—God is not present, but absent; the scenes are not caused by the influences of God's spirit on the heart, but by its withdrawal; for, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O, Lord of Hosts."

"The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." "And the fruit of the righteousness" it imparts "is sown in peace of them that make peace." But this wisdom is not from above, this spirit is from beneath, and is earthly, sensual, devilish; it bringeth forth envying and strife, confusion and every evil work. Hence those born of this spirit of fear and despair, are not born of God, for the perfect love of the god-like casteth out all fear, and induces love to the brethren—they are not born from above, for their long suffering is changed to Pharisaic pride; their love to bitterness, their peace to discord, their order to confusion, and their life to death. They have no rest day nor night, they have no peace in believing, no joy in well-doing—fear, incessant, torturing fear for the fate of their friends, prevents their entering into rest; dread of an angry, vindictive and capricious God, and ever recurring doubts of their own salvation, or spiritual pride in their superior elevation over their fellows, all tend to prove that the tabernacles where they have thus been taught are not amiable, are not the tabernacles of the Lord of Hosts.

Place yourselves in their situation. Can that tabernacle be amiable where a wrathful divinity is preached, and a despairing spirit presides? Can that house be lovely in your sight where you cannot hear of everlasting salvation, without also hearing endless damnation included? Can that place be sweet in your remembrance, and dear to your heart, where you have ever heard inculcated not only the probability of your own damnation, but also the certain endless woe of many dear to you as light and life? And while these bitter streams of torment, and rivers of implacable wrath are made unendingly to flow from the glorious throne of the Majesty on high, and to threaten the destruction of all you hold dear, throughout eternity, could you complacently smile in joy and exclaim with rapture—"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts?" If you can suppose you would, then hear the language of those who attend on such tabernacles, and believe the dogmas there taught. How often do they prove that these doctrines are not desirable, nor the tabernacles amiable, by saying—"If I believed in no hell—no endless misery for the wicked after death, I would never serve God, attend religious worship, nor aid in supporting preaching, or in building meeting-houses!" And I believe therein my friends, for nothing but the fear of hell and the dread of a tyrannical Omnipotence could lead me to bow to such a character as they adore; to offer up groans, and sighs, and fear, and call them worship; to support the preaching of the doctrines which but made me hate my Creator and curse my existence, or to build meeting-houses, dedicated to a divinity of wrath, and a deity of malignant cruelty, or weak partiality! But to erect a tabernacle for the Lord of Hosts, to join in his worship, in promulgating his praise, is to advance our own happiness, to increase our own joy; and needs, therefore, no threats to induce us to the work—for who would refuse to be happy, who would desire a reward for his own joy?

See the approaching of the day of worship, and imagine to yourselves the gathering of the happy, cheerful congregation, who have come up to the house of God to worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. It is the gathering of the children around a father's board. Already they feel in their hearts the welcome of their God, and the assurances of their acceptance with him. The tear of joy conglomerates in their eyes as they remember the happy seasons of refreshing they have enjoyed in his tabernacles; or, as busy memory runs backward, and imagination forward, in the pathway of life and gathers in happy groups, the varied and innumerable blessings enjoyed from their bounteous benefactor. Some come from the house of mourning, some from that of joy; but all come to enjoy greater blessings, for worse woes and trials than those of earth, they well know are not in store for them. And as they come together, the affectionate grasp of the hand, the kindly inquiry after health, and the beaming countenances of mutual joy, tell you that you are in a circle of brethren and sisters, for, "have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" Together they enter the sanctuary, and find the theme which brought them together worthy of their coming. The unchanging goodness of God, the benevolent designs of his wisdom, and working of his power; the gracious revelations of his will and manifestations of his love; the perfection of his character and immutability of his purposes; the impartiality of his grace, and universality of his paternal care, absorb every heart in gratitude and wrap the soul in adoration. The sinner is taught the enormity of his transgressions, and the certainty of his chastisement; while at the same time he is assured that God loves him, even while thus dead in trespasses and sins, and commended that love in that, while he was yet a sinner, Christ has died for him, and is a propitiation for his sins. He begins to love God, because God first loved him; the goodness of God leads him to repentance, and the prodigal returns to his father's house, exclaiming "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O, Lord of Hosts." "For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand; I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." And as there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, so in the heavenly minded assembly on earth, there is a joy also over this brother who was lost, but is found—who was dead but is alive again. Or perhaps the theme is intended for the mourner's ear, and for the consolation of those in affliction and grief. But though a melancholy task, it is not a joyless one. As the losses and trials of life are recounted, we feel sympathy gathering in our bosoms, and pouring her tribute from our eyes. We too have lost friends, or had misfortunes, and the ties of affection bind us closer to those in distress. We find how blessed it is to mourn with those that mourn, to mingle our tears with theirs, and we feel that if we must be separated to different fates in the eternal world, that such separation if endless, must make heaven a hell, and convert bliss into unending despair.

But we may not always dwell on losses and trials. The portals of eternity are opened to the eye of faith, through the revelation of Jesus, and the halo of immortal life and universal bliss is made to irradiate the glooms of grief, and we then rejoice with those who rejoice—we exult at the death of sin and sorrow, and triumph already over destruction. And at every change of the subject, we see but a Father's kindness and love, and rejoice in the goodness of our Father in heaven. And when errors that would poison our minds and destroy our peace, when practices are reprobated that embitter society and render us miserable, with what transport do our bosoms glow, and how gladly do we resolve that we will hold up the hands of the wicked and walk in destruction's paths no more.

But who may describe the overpowering joys enjoyed in the tabernacle of our God—who may tell the pleasures of gratitude, love and adoration when exercised towards our Maker—or the bliss of indulging in those affections and duties which we owe to our race? To be known they must be felt, to be appreciated they must be exercised, to be valued they must be possessed. They are like the name written on white stone named in the Apocalypse, known only to him who has them, inexpressible and incommunicable. Are there any present who are yet ignorant of these pleasures? Would they know, would they feel, exercise and possess them? Let them know their God, let them learn the character of their heavenly Father in its purity and its highest excellence, i. e. so far as mortality can know immortality, so far as humanity can learn divinity, so far as imperfection can understand all-glorious perfection. And let them make this knowledge practical—let them be imitators of God, as dear children, and with all the humility and fond confidence of little children towards an earthly parent, let them trust in God's promises, confide in his oath, rest on his grace and rely on his never-failing goodness.

By these things they will become knowing partakers of the divine nature, see the hand of God exercised for their good in every act of his power; and be enabled to praise and adore him in every dispensation of providence. And you, my beloved friends, who have been called by an holy calling, from the delusions of unbelief and the darkness of error, into a knowledge of God's character, and the marvellous light of his Gospel, long may you be spared, often to meet in the holy and amiable tabernacles of your heavenly Parent in this life. For I know your souls long, yea even faint for the courts of the Lord; your heart and your flesh cry out for communion with the spirit of the living God. May you go on from light to light, and from manifestation to manifestation of his goodness, from strength to strength in your faith—may God be your sun and your shield, give you grace and glory, withhold no good thing from you, and enable you so to walk in uprightness before him, that men seeing your good works, may be also led to glorify their Father which is in heaven.

And when you have seen and worshipped your Father in the varying changes, times, and seasons of this life—in the different places of his holy manifestation on earth, until his voice summons you hence—may you depart with his praises on your lips, and his undying love glowing in your souls, to join in that praise which shall be unmingled with supplication, where God shall be ever felt, being ever revealed, and where shall meet the whole family of man, every sinner converted, every wanderer restored, every sorrow converted into joy, and every dispensation united into that one where God is all in all. AMEN.

THE SKEPTIC'S MOTIVE.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"If 'twas a dream, why wake me?"

I have often endeavored to surmise the motive of the skeptic, in exerting himself to subvert Christianity, and deprive his fellow-beings of all hope of a future happy existence. I can perceive no inducements for his efforts, compatible with the dictates of humanity or mercy. The philanthropist is diligent in diffusing knowledge among mankind, from the assurance that it will be to them a source of benefit and enjoyment. But must it not be a principle adverse to philanthropy, that actuates an individual to spread abroad views, which, he is well aware, detract from the peace and happiness of the believer? "The world should be disabused of error and taught the truth," exclaims the skeptic. To this I assent; and will add, as a criterion, that upon all moral and religious subjects, the belief of the truth gives peace and satisfaction. But allowing the skeptic's system to be true, here is an anomaly—a truth respecting religion, which, so far from adding to the enjoyment of the believer, must necessarily deprive him of consolation in every hour of affliction, when most he requires support—a truth, the belief of which would be like striking the sun from the firmament at midday, leaving the mind in the blackness of darkness, to wander undirected amid the unending labyrinths of mysticism, sophistry and ignorance. This effect of believing would alone satisfy me of the error of the skeptic. Were it, however, true, it would still be wrong to proclaim it, for it is evidently wrong, by every rule of justice, to diffuse sentiments among mankind, the natural tendency of which, is to sink them into despondency and hopelessness.

The experience of every individual will satisfy them of the truth of the poet's expression—

"The future of the present, is the soul."

We may be said to live in the future—all our present enjoyments are colored by the events we behold in the perspective—as the horoscope of the future shadows upon our mind coming scenes of pleasure or of pain, will our present happiness be enhanced or diminished. In every scene of misfortune and of sorrow, we eagerly look to the future for a ray of hope to enliven our burthened souls; and if in that future we can discern nothing to cheer and animate us, oh! with what tenfold weight do present afflictions press upon us.

But the future is not confined to this world. The Christian believer looks beyond the bounds of time, and by faith beholds another world, a fairer clime, a purer, holier state of existence, for the family of man. This faith is to him the fountain of hope—it pours perennial streams of joy and gladness into his heart—it places a smile upon his brow amid the most trying scenes of earthly woe—it is a staff upon which age securely leans as it totters to the crumbling verge of the grave—and affords a power by which we defy the grim king of terrors! This faith in a future existence, is as a sun in the moral firmament of the believer—it sheds floods of light and cheerfulness upon all the paths of life—it dissipates every dark cloud of despondency and irradiates even the gloomy precincts of the tomb. Then why deprive the Christian of this treasure? Why should the despoiler come and with ruthless hand unroll the dark pall of annihilation, dispel the sweet sunlight of hope, and blot from the vision of faith the bright scenes of a happier existence? Can there be one reason for engaging in such a work? Can the individual who would embark in it, appear with a clear conscience before the tribunal of common humanity, for depriving the poor, the needy, the distressed, the sorrowful, the dying, of that support for which their souls yearn—of that hope which gives them strength and endurance to bear the ills which prey upon them? Examine it for a moment. Does the hope of a future life cause any injury to those who entertain it, or to others? No. Is it not, rather, a source of comfort, of peace, of every thing cheering to the human soul? It is—it is! Then why take it from them? Permit me to inquire of the skeptic—could you sincerely believe that when the toils and perplexities of life are ended, you would exist again, in a more perfect and happy world, and mingle with those you love in a life of ceaseless joy, would not such a faith impart unspeakable peace and satisfaction to you, amid the sorrows that come upon you? I am confident you will reply in the affirmative. Then, I again press the inquiry, why endeavor to destroy this hope in those who already possess it? Do you delight in human wretchedness? Does it gratify your soul to behold the smile of hope fade from the countenance, to be succeeded by the heavy gloom of dejection and melancholy? Is it a source of enjoyment to cast blight and mildew upon the fairest, sweetest flowers that spring up along the pathway of human life? Do you experience satisfaction in upturning, strand by strand, the golden cord by which we feel bound to a loftier destiny, to a higher grade of beings and a happier world? If so you will continue your exertions; but if not, you will forbear.

The laws of the land consign to proper punishment, the man who robs me of my property. But how much greater injury does that individual inflict upon me, who robs me of my faith and hope in a happier state of being? Take from me wealth, relatives, friends, even reputation, and spare me a well grounded faith in a future existence, and I am still rich—I have still a foundation for enjoyment and peace. But take from me this faith, and restore me all things else, and I am miserable. Around me are the empty shadows of a fleeting life, and before, yawns the black gulch of deep annihilation!

"But your faith is all a dream," exclaims the skeptic. I deny it. Earth and heaven, reason and revelation, are replete with evidences that man shall exist again. But if it is a dream, it is a pleasant one, and I would not be aroused to a cold, dark reality! No—no! If it is a dream, let me dream on! Let me dream of another world, where fairer climes, and cloudless skies, and smiling forms, and gladsome voices, shall greet me! Let me dream of a world where I can soar aloft in infinite progression—where I can rise higher and higher, and upward and onward toward the throne of infinite Perfection, and drink from that boundless ocean of knowledge, which I know must somewhere exist! Oh! awake me not from the sweet vision. Let me dream of the arrival of that happy period, when a ransomed world shall be reconciled to their Father—when all earth's children shall be released from the tabernacle of this poor flesh—shall be washed in the broad river of God's love—shall be clothed with the spotless robes of immortality and holiness, and cause heaven's wide arches to resound with the triumphant anthem of victory! victory! over sin, and death, and the grave. Let me dream of that blissful meeting, when the severed ties of this world shall all be reunited—when the objects of my love, the cherished ones of my heart—the aged father, the affectionate mother, the dear companion, the beloved offspring, shall be enfolded in my embrace to be separated no more, forever—when we can weave anew those silken bands of affection, which time nor death shall no more sunder! And when the clouds of misfortune lower, and the tempests of affliction howl around, and relatives and friends, one by one, fall beneath the blow of death, let this sweet vision remain to cheer my desponding heart. And when I lay me down upon the bed of death, when the things of time shall with me be done, and the world recede from my view, oh! then let the brightest hues of this heavenly dream irradiate the dark hour, and with the glories of another world, gild the pathway to the tomb! Skeptic, allowing this to be a dream, why would you awake me from it?—answer me—why?

OVERTHROW OF JERUSALEM.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

"One stone shall not be left upon another."

"The Jewish temple is supposed to have been built of marble, so pure and white that it much resembled a mountain of snow; and even on the outside, it was ornamented with gold in such a manner as to make it painful to the eye when the sun was shining upon it.

The city of Jerusalem was overthrown by Titus in the year 70. And it was remarkable that he designed to save this temple, although he solemnly declared he would waste the city. In vain his soldiers were charged to guard this edifice; the voice of inspiration and prophecy was stronger than the voice of Titus. Josephus remarks, "A soldier, moved by a divine impulse, rising on the shoulders of his fellows, cast a brand into the sanctuary." Titus used every possible exertion to extinguish the flames, but such was the fury of his soldiers that his labor was unavailing. The building was consumed; when the most horrid slaughter commenced that the world ever beheld. The city was entirely razed from its foundation, and has never been fully rebuilt.

It is probable that our Saviour forewarned the Jews of this awful overthrow "when he came near the city and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, and thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee and compass thee around, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee, and they shall not leave thee one stone upon another, because thou knowest not the time of thy visitation." This was the time when Christ came to take vengeance on the unbelieving Jews; to sit upon the throne of his glory, and to separate the nations as the shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXII. EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS TO PROMOTE CANDOR, AND COMPOSE DIFFERENCES.—Let us only be convinced, on good grounds, that we love the Lord Jesus, the Christ, in sincerity—let the test and trial of that sincerity be our active and cheerful obedience to his will; our approximation to his example; our piety, our benevolence, our self-government, and in short, a conversation becoming our profession—and be assured, our revered Master will not count us his enemies, though in that great day when truth alone shall stand, and all the varieties of human opinion shall shrink and disappear before the eye of the Omniscient, as dew-drops before the sun; though in that day, it should be found that our peculiar opinions, also, have been among the number of these varieties. Let us then cultivate the above excellencies, and act from a Christ-like spirit, and as if always in the presence of an omniscient Parent, and that countenance whose light will purge our sins, and disperse our errors, and enlighten our darkness, will beam a look of love and mercy upon us: our fearful trembling souls shall be enlightened and purified, but fear not, they shall live.

That which I hope and believe for myself, I hope and believe for all my Christian brethren, even for those who differ most widely from me. They may be in error; but what then? If the love of God and man dwelleth in them—if the law and love of Jesus be written on their hearts, God forbid that I should presume to try by my petty scales of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, call them which you please, those who have been weighed in the balance of the sanctuary, and not found wanting. A heart right with God, a conduct and a conscience void of offence, an unfeigned and active love of the Father and of the brethren—these will far outweigh the most erroneous sentiments; these are the pure and solid gold, compared with which a creed or a confession, whether mine or yours, are but a feather in the scale.

We remember to have been very forcibly struck with the unexpected candor and liberality of a dignitary of the Episcopal church. In the preface to a collection of Theological Tracts, Bishop Watson breathes and inculcates the most meek and candid judgment of those who differ in creed, and speaking of the sect against which the church of England doth vomit forth from some of her pulpits an abundance of malignity and calumny—the Unitarian—he concludes by saying, "both (Unitarians and Trinitarians) are actuated by the same principle, the fear of God; and though that principle impels them into different roads, it is our hope and belief; that if they add to their faith charity, they will meet in heaven."

O! let us cultivate this most amiable and much needed and called-for virtue. The difficulty of acquirement, we acknowledge, is great; but in like proportion is the greatness and the exquisiteness of the reward.

§ XXIII. RELIGION ACCORDANT WITH REASON: A THOUGHT.—What can be conceived more rational than the doctrine of an omniscient and omnipresent Deity, who regards with more than a parent's affection all his intelligent offspring—who, by a Man pre-eminent in goodness and integrity, delivered to his creatures a beautiful and most comprehensive summary of virtue—who, to assure us of a resurrection, has raised this glorious individual from the dead, and who is carrying on all the events of his government, so as to produce the greatest possible sum of happiness and enjoyment.

"From seeming evil still educing good,
And better thence again, and better still,

In these principles there is indeed nothing which the understanding can reject as unreasonable, or the heart oppose as malevolent—the enlightened must perceive them to be just, and the good of all parties must wish them to be true.

§ XXIV. SIMPLE AND SUCCESSFUL PREACHING.—Take the preaching of Paul and others of the first heralds of Christianity, and let us derive from their model a lesson whereby we may profit. A more laborious set of men surely never developed and exerted to the utmost their physical and moral energies in our world. They were in earnest—they put their whole hearts in their work. Not on the Sabbath alone, but daily, "in season and out of season," did they exert every energy to convert and save the world. Nor Alexander, nor Cæsar, nor Bonaparte, were more active and laborious, than were Paul and his associates, to subjugate the world to the sceptre of Jesus, the Christ. Let us imitate them in his devotedness and laboriousness in their work.

Paul in the learned and literary audiences of Corinth was resolved to forget and forego the merit of all other learning, save the knowledge of Jesus. Nor do we find any evidence of his ever attempting learned refinements of style—of any hankering after literary fame—of aspirations to be reckoned among the great—or of attempts to excite admiration. When style and manner are made leading objects in preaching the Gospel, the attention of the hearer is always fixed on something short of the grand purpose which ought to be accomplished by the exhibition of the truth. The delighted audience will generally praise the speaker; seldom condemn themselves, or be roused to make progress in the Christian race. It has long been my opinion that, in the inculcation of practical Christianity, that style is the best, which transmits most lucidly the arguments of the preacher, and attracts to itself—the mere vehicle of his thoughts—no attention whatever, or, as that is scarcely possible, the least degree of attention. The language we employ as the vehicle of our thoughts, and sentiments, and persuasions, may, "with this respect," be faulty either by carelessness, or by being too labored. The beau ideal of the style most suited to the preacher's great purpose is, to be as the "clearest glass."* The more we strain after the great end of preaching—to make the influence of Christianity constantly felt and operative—and the less our language attracts our attention, the more likely is it to be the vigorous expression and the impressive vehicle of thoughts suited to the grand purpose.

Lenawee county, Michigan, June, 1836.

* I think it was Winchester, who remarked of the phrase in Revelation xxi: 18, that the holy city being of "fine gold," signified the precious nature and purity of Gospel truth, and its being like "clear glass," denoted its simplicity and plainness. A style of "pure gold like unto clear glass" is the best imaginable.

I KNOW.

I know some brethren who profess to love the truth "as it is in Jesus"—who profess to rejoice in the "glorious Gospel of the blessed God"—who profess to look upon our heavenly Father as the chief among ten thousands and the one altogether lovely, and Jesus as indeed the Lamb of God that shall eventually take away the sin of the world—who will, when it falls to the lot of a humble herald of the cross, one who is not quite so eloquent as they could wish, absent themselves from their usual place of worship, and go and hear sentiments advanced which they profess to abhor and detest. Yes, they love the truth so much that, unless it come accompanied with just so much sound, they will turn their backs upon it and go and listen to another Gospel—go and listen to the awful doctrine of endless torments—a doctrine which if certainly and infallibly known to be true, and which, if universally believed, would fill all nature with mourning, and cause piercing cries of bitter sorrow and anguish to assail our ears on every hand.

Brethren, these things ought not so to be. Remember that by so doing you not only mortify the feelings of him who is appointed to minister unto you the words of truth and life, but you also cast a reproach upon the great and glorious cause in which we profess to be engaged.

Brethren, think of these things, and act as becometh true disciples of him who is the way, the truth, and the life.

A CRITERION.

"Mr. S.—must be a warm-hearted Universalist," said a good sister, the other day, when conversing respecting the prosperity of our society. Not being acquainted with the brother of whom she spoke, I inquired what reason she had for such an encomium? She replied that, "he was quite a regular attendant on our meetings, though living some ten or twelve miles distant; while there are some, who, though no more than two or three miles distant, do not attend meeting one-fourth part as often." I again asked, if a man's church-going spirit could be safely relied on as a criterion by which to judge of his warm-heartedness and devotion? "Why," she answered, "when I know a man's circumstances—know there is nothing but indolence, produced by an inexcusable indifference to the welfare of our cause, to prevent his regular attendance, I consider myself safe in pronouncing such an individual a cold-hearted professor." And from a little reflection, I am half disposed to coincide with her. For I am utterly at a loss to account for negligence in such a cause, unless it be from lukewarmness—"neither hot nor cold." I would that they were either cold or hot; for it is better not to have a name, than to have one to live whilst we are dead. Experience may have taught every observing mind that, a society had better not pretend to keep up a meeting, than pretending, fail of accomplishing. Yes, strange as it may seem, I believe that our opposers will have more respect for us, a better opinion of our doctrine, and certainly will have less reason to doubt our zeal, if we have no meetings at all, than having meetings, we stay at home to sleep or lounge, fish or hunt, whilst the preacher tells his story to walls and benches.

Brethren, will you think of these things? With what feelings would you prepare your fields for planting, if you had the fear of no harvest before your eyes? What would be your feelings, if, while the pelting hail-storm comes up before your mind's eye, and in your imagination you picture to yourself, your well-grown fields of grain levelled with the earth? and in addition to this, if you have reason to think that, because, "blighted was my corn," it will be again, with what feelings would you "throw the grain into the faithful bosom of the ground?"

"Incumbent o'er the shining share you lean,"

After realizing these things, you can have some faint idea of your preacher's feelings during the week, whilst endeavoring to prepare something for the edification and instruction of his people, the empty seats arise in his mind and dampen his joy in prospect of delivering his message of "glad tidings" to stocks and stones, which have no sense to understand, nor hearts to feel.

I know that there are really some serious obstacles in the way that prevents our attendance, at times; and I know also, that many of the obstacles which exist, may be overcome; and which, if not met with the same decision with which we encounter the obstructions which intervene between us and any important object, will effectually prevent any attention to subjects of a religious nature, as well as prevent an attendance upon the sanctuary. Some excuse, or some inconvenience will nearly always exist; and if they are suffered to plead with our indolence, will surely make us cowards to our duty.

"If every pretended Universalist would practice according to the principles of the 'faith once delivered to the saints,' there would be no necessity for the appearance of articles of this kind; for every house, dedicated to the one living and true God, would be filled each returning meeting. God grant that it may be so. Amen. EMM.

We copy with pleasure, the following excellent article from the Herald and Watchman, a paper issued at Montrose, Pa., in 1833, and edited by Br. Peck. It would have appeared sooner—more in season—but for inability to get hold of the paper containing it. But it is hoped the impression its perusal will make on the minds of our readers, will be lasting enough to answer for succeeding years. We do not fear that the result Br. Peck seems to apprehend, will ever occur—but it becomes every American to watch, as well as to pray. A. B. G.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS—INDEPENDENCE.

BY REV. ALFRED PECK.

The fourth of July!—What an assemblage of pleasing, grand, and sublime ideas does it present, on its return, to the mind of every true-hearted American citizen. That day is set apart by the universal consent—the approved and long established usage of our countrymen—as an anniversary, to commemorate the most important event in our nation's history. It was that day which gave birth to an independent nation, and liberty to thousands. Hitherto our fathers greeted its earliest dawn upon our land, with a salutatory roar of cannon, to arouse a spirit of patriotism like that which nerved the revolutionary soldier—they assembled around the altar of our country's liberty, and kindled the fire, which sent the praise, and triumphant feeling of independence, grateful unto heaven. They recounted the scenes of "days which tried men's souls"—told us how, oppressed and borne down by the exactions of the mother country, a few bold and daring spirits staked their all, on the record of their names, their lives, their fortune, and their sacred honor, in behalf of us, their posterity. On that day were we taught the lesson of the invincible valor of our fathers, their privations and their sufferings in war, their success in righteous contest, and the blessings of liberty; until our bosoms palpitated with the joy of patriotic gratitude, and beat high with the love of country and of freedom. Let not the gratitude thus enkindled, cease to burn,

Let not the recollections of scenes sacred to liberty, be contaminated, even by sectarian religion.

We are shocked beyond measure, that any, calling themselves Americans, should be willing to descend from the grand council of our nation, who in their majesty and mind, stability and strength are performing the most hazardous and important deed in our country's deliverance; to the insignificant assembly of a children's Sunday school,—should descend from the lofty theme of America's independence, and the equal rights of her sons, to the ignoble plans and prejudices of a sect or party.

The Sunday school in its first establishment was truly a humane and benevolent institution. In large and populous towns, numerous children of poor parents, are destitute of the means to acquire the art of reading, whereby the mind is amused, expanded and improved; or the simple rudiments of arithmetical calculation, to perform the ordinary business of life. Such were the objects, first had in view, in the establishment of a Sunday school. But hardly was the benevolence of the projector beginning to be felt, when as the enemy sowed tares among the wheat, the would-be lords and spiritual dictators corrupted the noble design of these institutions, and turned aside the holy charities enlisted, to the promotion of sectarian dogmas, or the unholy strife for a "Christian party in politics." Here in these nurseries, of prejudice which create imaginary barriers and separating walls,—and of party which serves to perpetuate jealousies and strife among men, the mind is burdened with all the weight of system, and enslaved by the fetering inconsistencies of creeds.

There must be but one mode of thinking, and that is the modern, or Arminianized Calvinism. When a Sunday school is formed in connection with the American Sunday School Union; it must adopt the doctrines and discipline of the "Union," or it must be discarded and discounted by them, as much as though they adhered to the primitive design of teaching the rudiments of learning. While the incipient operations of forming a school are going on, our neighborhood is scoured by some petty teacher or agent, and ourselves, or our wives in our absence, are beset, to send our children to the Sunday school. Fair pretences of liberality, and good feeling are held forth. They would fain make us believe that their object was worthy, their design noble, their principles republican, their institution charitable, and its effects moral and religious over the rising generation.

But what privilege can we or our children enjoy, in this professed American, and would-be national institution? Can the Episcopalian be permitted to teach, or require that his children should be taught in the thirty-nine articles, and peculiarities of Episcopacy? Can the Baptist insist on the absolute necessity of immersion? Can the Unitarian present and inculcate the doctrine of the unity of God in one person? Or can the Universalist furnish his children with books teaching the salvation of the universal family of sinners, for whom "Christ tasted death" and "gave himself a ransom?" Nay—none of them! What privilege, then, can they enjoy? If we submit at all to this artful guile and deceptive practice—our children enjoy the blessed privilege of becoming slaves to sectarianism! In their weakness, they must swallow down without resistance, a nauseous creed which poisons the liberal, and pleasant, and kind feelings of childhood; and forever weakens their intellectual energies. For it is a fact, that the observation of every enlightened mind will abundantly confirm; that in a majority of cases, children will imbibe all the prejudices and bitter feelings of sectarianism against names, before they understand a distinction of doctrines; and even before they learn the fundamental principles of the religion of Christ. Nor dare they afterwards call in question the correctness of the religious theory in which they have been taught, or inquire into more extended and benevolent views, for fear of censure from their teacher, or neglect of courtesy from those whom they esteem as great, and good, and popular; or, perhaps upon the pains of eternal damnation.

The American Sunday School Union, say what they will of its character, has not a whit of republicanism in its principles, nor of liberal and enlightened national policy in its management. It is a sectarian institution, managed for the petty purposes of party. In the declaration of independence the principle of universal equality is recognized. In the fundamental principles of our government, no preference is given to any religious denomination, but all are alike privileged. Not so, but the reverse, is the Sunday School Union. The Sunday school scholar, under the present mode of teaching, loses sight of this republican equality among children; and they are indulged, if not encouraged, to look upon themselves as better than the children of those parents who cannot conscientiously support the American Sunday School Union; and like a set of little Pharisees, they will separate themselves from the children of the same neighborhood, or attending the same district school, in their plays and recreations. They will give a preference to a scholar of the American Sunday School Union, to the scholar of any other Sunday school. And what is worst of all, is, that some of these little artificial pietists, even reproach their non-professing parents, as the abandoned reprobates of God; and it is even heralded abroad in the prints as being very wise and pretty!

Yet the managers of this institution, thus sectarian in its character, exclusive in its privileges, and anti-republican in its principles, are endeavoring to bring it forward before the public as a national concern; in its present character intrinsically excellent! They would fain appropriate to their own exclusive sectarian use, the annual, irrepressible burst of a nation's gratitude, at the recollection of those deeds of bravery and toil, which lifted high America, and secured peace and freedom to her sons. Seemingly, they would obliterate the remembrance of that pledge, of "lives, and fortune, and honor," which was the first grand move to the rich legacy of liberty and independence to us their children; and the subsequent privations and sufferings endured, to free us from the tyranny of ecclesiastical exactions, and to secure us the privilege of thinking ourselves not inferior to others, nor obliged to pay deference, nor give preference to any denomination.

But, how much do we, as a nation, owe for our national glory and character, to a Sunday school—where little children learn catechisms, and read tracts? Where is the man that has so far degenerated and sunk, and is so corrupted in his principles, as willingly to forget the blood, and toil, and sacrifice of our revolutionary worthies; and like the idolator who has forsaken God, bow at the shrine of a Sunday school on the fourth of July, and say to his children, these be the—instruments which brought you up out of the land of bondage!!

In the year 1776 and onward, every high-souled and virtuous American, exulted in rapture on the return of the nation's Anniversary. They could fearlessly express by set and volunteer toasts, their pride of national distinction, and the inestimable blessings they enjoyed. There were, however, among them, a few dastardly and unmanly spirits, hostile to republicanism, who could murmur at their freedom of speech, and repine at the proud sentiments of liberty expressed. Americans! look around you. Have you none yet among you, who would either divert your mind from your independence, or ridicule your festivities and triumph, by a mock celebration? Whoever can forget the Declaration of Independence—lose sight of the birthday of our freedom, and feel no national pride on its return: is ready to become the vassal and willing dupe of a religious hierarchy.

Shall we, then, who are Americans, on the fourth of July, countenance and join in the ridiculous mockery and almost wicked perversion of that glorious anniversary, by childishly celebrating the little children's Sunday school? We have no objection that little children, nor grown children, should annually celebrate their Sunday school.—But we have serious objections to making this innovation upon the established customs and policy of our government; and turning the glow of national feeling upon objects never intended. If there is no impropriety in celebrating a Sunday school on any day of the week; why not take the period of its commencement, or the birth, or death, of its founder? But let not our Independence be perverted by ecclesiastical aspirants, and the proud domineering of religious dictators.

In conclusion, let us remark, we may view this subject in a different light from many of our fellow-citizens. We may estimate as less intrinsically important, the various sectarian plans adopted, and priestly schemes which have been formed. We claim, however, what others desire, and what we are disposed to give—the free exercise and expression of opinion, and the right of private judgment. We think we have formed our opinion, as other people pretend to have formed theirs on such subjects: by comparing what has been, with what is, and reasoning as to the probable future.

We do not pretend to be “a prophet, nor the son of a prophet.” But our opinion is, that whoever is allotted, by divine Providence, to write the history of our country, and to record the tragical dissolution of our free institutions; will have to give to posterity, a concatenation of professedly religious circumstances, and boasted benevolent societies, which have alike been feared and fostered, applauded and condemned. And among them, the AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION will stand recorded in flaming capitals, as the vampire, which, while it embraced, gorged upon the life-blood of liberty!

TRUTH AND HOLINESS TRIUMPHANT.

The final triumph of truth and holiness, and the consequent downfall of all error and wickedness, is very clearly taught in the Scriptures, in various ways. The parable of the leaven was used by our divine Master to illustrate this fact. He says:—“The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened.” It is acknowledged by approved commentators of all denominations, that the phrase “kingdom of heaven,” means the Gospel dispensation; that is established in the world, and will operate like leaven in meal, until the whole world is leavened, with the leaven of truth and righteousness. We have no doubt that this universal success of the Gospel was intended to be designated by our Saviour in the parable. “The glorious Gospel of the blessed God,” will continue its operations, till the prediction of the Psalmist is accomplished:—“All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name, forevermore.” Jesus said:—“I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.” This he can only do by the extermination of all error and sin, and causing truth and holiness universally to prevail. Then, and not till then, will all the families of the earth be blessed in Christ, as God promised the fathers. Then, and not till then, the dispensation of the fulness of times will come, in which God has purposed to gather together in one, all things in Christ, whether they be things in heaven, or thing on earth, even in him; so that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and every tongue shall confess, that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Such is the economy of God—such is the counsel of his will. For this end he built the universe—created man—gave us a Saviour—and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. Looking upon the great system of nature—upon all the works of God; then considering this grand scheme of universal redemption, rivers of joy appear before us; goodness rising upon goodness, and glory upon glory, till our souls catch the inspiration which fired the breast of David, and moved his tongue with eloquence, when he said: “Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments hearkening unto the voice of his word. Bless ye the Lord, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his, that do his pleasure. Bless the Lord, all his works, in all places of his dominion: bless the Lord O my soul.”—Trumpet.

CONSISTENCY OF THE OPPOSITION.

We are often surprised and sometimes amused with the character of the opposition that is made to the doctrine of universal salvation. But there is one method of opposing and attempting to put down this sentiment which is so perfectly ludicrous as to excite our risible emotions every time we witness or think of it. And yet by some pious souls it is looked upon as a very judicious and necessary step to be adopted in the suppression of reputed heresy. It is the method adopted by many preachers of declaiming against and denouncing the doctrine in unmeasured terms of abuse and reproach—giving caricatures of it of the most revolting kind—declaring it is the most absurd, irrational, unscriptural, blasphemous doctrine that ever was preached—it encourages all manner of licentiousness and evil, denies a just retribution for sin, maintains that vice is preferable to virtue, that there is no necessity of repentance, regeneration, etc., etc.—in short, that it is the very climax of absurdity, folly and wickedness. And then, to conclude his harangue, the preacher winds up with a most solemn warning to his hearers never to listen to the preaching or arguments of Universalists—for they are so artful, so plausible, so winning, insinuating and prepossessing—that they will, ere one is aware of the danger, insinuate such plausible arguments into the mind as to poison the soul at its fountain, and to appear both scriptural and reasonable, both benevolent and devout—and indeed, adds the preacher, if you ever listen to the preaching and arguments of Universalists, you will hear something and get some ideas into your head, that you'll never be able to get rid of—they will hang about you and stick to you as long as you live.

Such is the method often adopted to deter people from listening to the arguments of Universalists; and it reminds one of the following case and conversation of a father with his daughter.

A father, who feels the most lively interest in the welfare of an amiable daughter, as she is about entering into society and mingling with the various grades and classes around her, wishes sedulously to guard her against all danger; and give her such advice and instruction as will most effectually secure her reputation and happiness in life. He calls her to him and thus addresses her: My dear daughter, you know I have always manifested the deepest anxiety for your happiness and the most ardent solicitude for your welfare. You know, too, that I have always placed great dependence on the integrity of your moral principles, the soundness of your judgment, and your innate sense of right and wrong. But there is one piece of advice which I must on no account neglect to impart to you. My conscience will by no means admit of my being silent here. There is a certain young man in the neighborhood, who is of all human beings the most abhorrent and loathsome. He is deformed in his person, filthy and slovenly in his appearance, morose and petulant in his temper, a hater of your sex, and of all beings on earth the most disgusting and odious. The particular thing, therefore, my beloved daughter, against which I would warn you and have you especially guarded, is the seeing of this young man—I would not have you see him for all the world, lest you should fall in love with him. For if you were but once to set your eyes on him, you would become so completely fascinated and charmed with his appearance that you would never again be able to get rid of his image, so but what it would operate as a secret charm, and cause you to languish after him as long as you live?

What should we think of the consistency of this father's advice to his daughter? Answer. Precisely what we think of the consistency of those preachers who are perpetually berating and ridiculing Universalism as the most revolting, inconsistent, unreasonable and ridiculous system ever advanced in the world, and at the same time warn their hearers never to listen to its advocates for a moment, lest their artful and blandish arguments and the plausible and insinuating charms of the system should steal insensibly upon their affections and confidence and draw them into the snare of a fatal heresy. What a high compliment, too, must the harangues of such preachers be to the good sense and intellectual acumen of their hearers!

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

How little is thought of the influence of females, by people generally, compared with the immense magnitude and power of that influence. How few, comparatively, reflect that it is to the influence of mothers and sisters mainly, especially to the former, that our youth, the rising generation, our men of business, our civil and military officers, our school teachers and ministers of the Gospel, nay, even our judges, legislators, magistrates and governors, all in a very great measure, owe the first rudiments of their knowledge, the foundation of their moral and religious sentiments, and, in many instances, the direction and tendency of their course and conduct for life. Too little thought is bestowed, and too little attention paid to this subject, we are confident, by men whose opinions are often sought, and when obtained decide and give tone to public sentiment and action upon the subject of education and moral culture.

How important that females, especially mothers, should be taught and well understand “what be the first principles of the doctrine of Christ.” How necessary that their minds and hearts should be imbued with the mild and heavenly precepts and principles of the Gospel of peace and love and universal grace—those precepts and principles which are so congenial with the mildness and the gentleness of their hearts—with the mercy and benevolence of their nature! O how necessary and important that woman, tender-hearted, gentle woman, should be kept from the blighting and withering influence of the horrid dogma of unmerciful cruelty and endless woe! This is a scion, it would seem, entirely foreign to her gentle nature, an exotic which, when engrafted thereon, cannot fail of producing evil fruit. If it produce no other effects it seldom fails to wither the dearest joys of her heart, blight the opening buds of hope that were springing up in her bosom, and give a tone of melancholy and sadness, if not of acrimony and bitterness, to all her manners, life and conversation.

The following extract of a letter written by a brother in the faith of a world's salvation, to his sister, now in Albany, (which we copy from the last “Union,”) is worthy of an attentive perusal and very serious consideration. Would to God that every brother would thus feel and thus express himself to his sister, and that every sister were ready and willing to profit by such advice.

D. S.

“It is especially gratifying to learn that you have the privilege of worshipping the God of our fathers in the sanctuary, after the manner that some call heresy, and where as I humbly trust the grateful aspirations of thanksgiving and praise ascend to the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, for the manifestations of himself to the children of men, in creation and providence, but more especially in the gift of his Son. I almost envy you the exquisite pleasure which can alone be derived from such opportunities, and I hope you will reap in rich abundance the consequent blessings, by the improvement of the ‘expansive intellect,’ and by growth in grace and the knowledge of the Lord. Let your devout prayers ascend for the removal of the veil of ignorance from benighted mortals, as the only means for the removal of bigotry and superdition from among men. Remember the power of female influence in giving a tone to public sentiment, and that it is always exerted either for good or for evil. Let yours then be exerted on the side of truth—let not the quick perception, or lively and intense sensibilities of the fairest portion of Creation be blunted by the cold and heartless dogma of endless, unmerciful and indescribable suffering. Rather let every latent sensibility be aroused, and the combined energies of female virtue and excellence be put in requisition for the removal of those untold evils which flow from a belief in endless and unmerciful torture, which if put in practice would make us demons in human form.

"Is sensibility a virtue? Does female influence deepen its exquisitely tender and controlling power over all that come within its influence? If so, then let that influence be exerted to soften the otherwise unsubdued and unsubduing passions of the harder sex. Let her entwine around them the soft bands of constancy and devotion, like the tendrils of the growing vine around the staff that gives to it support. Then shall woman act in her proper sphere. Then shall she exercise her proper influence in the scale of existence. Then shall her powers and charms be properly exemplified, suitably and extensively felt among all that come within the circle of her influence. Let the female portion of society but know and feel the force of these remarks, and the consequent weight of their responsibility; then methinks they would not withhold their aid from the cause of virtue and rational religion—the cause of impartial benevolence."

GOOD NEWS.

'Tis not the building of a meeting-house—'tis not the formation of a new society—'tis not the erection of a new Association out of an old one—'tis not the accession of a new laborer in our Lord's vineyard—neither is it any thing for the especial comfort and joy of our readers—but it is the success of our humble labors, encouraging to our hearts, gladdening to our souls, and strengthening to our hands in our editorial and publishing labors, which I now proceed to record. I believe too that our faithful and able correspondents who have a part in our joy—our numerous and active agents and friends who have assisted in supporting us—will also rejoice in it, and be encouraged by it to persevere in well doing. Like the woman who found her lost piece of silver—the shepherd who recovered his straying sheep, and the father who recovered his erring prodigal son, we call on our friends and neighbors to be merry and glad, and rejoice with us. The instances here given are but a few out of many in which our labors have been highly and greatly blessed in the providence of our heavenly Father. The letter has been before us for a long time. It is from an excellent (because active) brother in Virginia. The following are the extracts, which follow "directions for applying ten dollars" which were enclosed. I omit the names and place of residence.

A. B. G.

"The above names, you will perceive, are not on my former list; and were you interested only in a pecuniary point of view, inasmuch as they present you with the ready money, further notice of them would be needless. But believing that it will be truly gratifying to you to learn that the above gentlemen are men of respectability and seekers after truth, I hand them to you as agreeable acquisitions to your list.

"Mr. P.—has long since dissented from popular Orthodoxy, and formed what he terms a rational system of his own; and, as he expresses it, wishes to become acquainted with the Magazine and Advocate to ascertain whether he is a Universalist or not.

"Mr. O.—is an elderly gentleman who has of late had the perusal of a few numbers of the paper, and through their instrumentality begins to taste the good things which are laid up for those who love God. These two papers you will please discontinue at the end of the year, if not otherwise advised.

Mr. M.—, until quite lately, has been skeptical, as his father was before him. You may therefore conclude that his prejudices against the Christian religion were deeply rooted. But I rejoice to inform you that an old file of your paper which fell into his hands, not only broke up the fallow ground of his mind, but planted deep the seeds of pure religion, and gave him a foretaste of the immortal joys that await the whole family of man. I mention these particulars that you may see your labors in the good cause have not been in vain in this portion of the moral vineyard.

"The case of Mr. B.—, with whom I had an interview a few days since, affords such a contrast to the above, that I cannot refrain from giving you the substance of our conversation. His case is a striking illustration of the deleterious influence of man-made creeds connected with, and assuming the name of Christianity. His reasons for leaving the Methodist Episcopal church were, he did not believe that any good resulted from Christianity, but that the world's people were more virtuous and less deceitful than Christians. 'For,' said he, 'when I first came into this neighborhood all was friendship and harmony; but soon there came a class of preachers calling themselves Bible Christians, who made many converts—next came the Methodists who also made many converts, and gained a strong party. Since then, the hitherto peaceful neighborhood has been in a continual tumult, in consequence of the backbitings and slanders that have been constantly in circulation.' I perceived that he, like thousands of others, had become a skeptic by mistaking the corruptions for the substance of Christianity, and tried in vain to turn his attention to that system of religion which requires its believers to love, not only their own church members, but even their enemies, and as a last resort proposed that he subscribe for the Magazine and Advocate. But no. He declared it was all a speculation. I assured him that the price was so low, it could be no great speculation. Yes it is, said he. The paper builds up societies—the societies support preachers, and it's all a speculation. I will have nothing to do with either.

"I left him: but with a heavy heart. Oh! that by some act of divine Providence a ray of light might illuminate his benighted mind, and cheer him through the remainder of his earthly existence; but if not—if it is his lot to walk in darkness while here, thank God, there is a time coming, when all will come to a knowledge of the truth. Then tears will be wiped from off all faces, and a ransomed universe will unite in ascribing glory and honor, praise and power to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb forever and ever. Go on, dear brethren, in the work of enlightening the ignorant, and emancipating your fellow-men from the bondage of sin and error, and the gloomy paths of skepticism.

QUERY.

If Universalism is so ridiculously absurd and irrational as its opposers, especially self-styled Orthodox preachers, usually represent it, why are the same preachers so very loath to have their people go and hear it preached and read the writings of its advocates? Why not let them, nay, urge them to go and hear it a few times, at least, and read a few of the books advocating it, in order to be fully convinced of its absurdity? Would not this be the most effectual method of convincing them of its errors and forever weaning them from all disposition to believe and espouse the doctrine? Let our opponents try it and see how many of their people would get weaned from all inclination to embrace it.

A RARE CIRCUMSTANCE.

A letter has just been received from a subscriber in Niagara county, who was in arrears, inclosing the pay in full for his subscription from January 1, 1832, to January 1, 1839. If all who are in arrears were to follow his example, we could afford to make some additional improvements in the paper. He gives us the best apology he could possibly offer. It is as follows:—"I have been taught by your paper to believe that a reform is the best evidence of repentance, I therefore inclose fifteen dollars. Deduct from it the amount of your account and hand over the balance to the present publishers, if any there be." We should be highly gratified with a similar apology from each of our subscribers in like condition.

TOUR AND REMOVAL OF BR. E. GAGE.

We give the following extract from a letter just received from Br. E. Gage, dated Genoa, July 30, 1836.

"BRS. SKINNER AND GROSH—I have just returned from my tour West, and have now but just time to send you a few hasty lines, merely to give notice of my intended removal to Michigan. I had truly a pleasant time, both going and coming, and also while in the Territory. I met with BRS. SADLER, QUEAL and HOLLISTER at Detroit. On the day of my appointment there we had a very interesting time. We had three discourses in the city hall, one by myself, one by Br. Sadler and the other by Br. Queal. The congregations were large and of a respectable character. From Detroit I went to Pontiac, fulfilled my appointment there, found the friends rather cold and lifeless—not much prospect of doing any thing there.

"Not finding any public conveyance from here to Ann Arbor, I was obliged to abandon the idea of going there; so I turned me about and went into the town of Bloomfield, where I found many warm friends. Here is truly a fine field for labor. There seems but one general impulse of feeling, and that is to 'go ahead.' It is here where I have engaged to settle. There were five men came forward and gave me their obligations that I might feel safe in moving into that country. They have agreed to organize into a church, and also to build a meeting-house forthwith. They say they are both able and willing. I am to start with my family for that place by the 11th of August. You will therefore please direct my papers after the 6th to Bloomfield, Oakland county, M. T.; and also give notice in the Magazine and Advocate of my removal, and a request to have all papers and letters intended for me directed accordingly. I intend to be in Buffalo in time to attend the Association."

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst. by BR. WHITNEY at Lyons—BR. C. B. BROWN at Fulton—BR. DELOVE at Hamilton Centre and Br. WOOLLEY at New-Berlin—BR. H. ROBERTS at Spafford—BR. O. ROBERTS at Lakeville—BR. D. R. BIDDLECOM at Springwater—BR. SIAS at Palermo, as the friends may appoint.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst. by BR. D. R. BIDDLECOM at North Bloomfield—BR. SIAS at Peninsular Point—BR. HICKS at Newville—BR. C. B. BROWN at Sylvan Springs—BR. J. FOSTER at Brewerton.

BR. WAGGONER will preach in the evenings of Wednesday, 17th inst., at Lowville—18th, at Denmark—19th, at South Champion, and Monday evening, 22d, at Adams as Esq. CHITTENDON may appoint.

BR. D. R. BIDDLECOM will preach at Cazenovia, on Monday evening, 8th inst., and at Spafford the 9th.

BR. GROSH will preach in Buffalo on the second Sunday inst.—attend the Genesee Association in that city on the 17th and 18th inst.—preach in East Sheridan, near Esq. Eacker's—and attend the Chautauque Association at Warren, Pa., on the 24th and 25th inst.

BR. WADSWORTH'S TOUR.—I expect to attend the Miami Association at Batavia, Clermont county, O., on the 20th and 21st inst. After visiting Cincinnati, I propose to preach in the evening of the 24th at Lebanon, and 25th at Xenia—Sunday, 28th, at Springfield, Clark county, and on the 31st, at Columbus, at any hour the friends may appoint—Thursday evening, September 1, at Worthington, and then attend the Central Ohio Association at Concord, on the 3d and 4th September. I then propose to preach on the evenings of the 5th at Delaware—6th at Marion, and Sunday, the 11th, at Perrysburgh. I will preach on my way from Perrysburgh to Detroit, at such places as Br. Biddlecom may appoint. [as Br. Biddlecom is now in this State, probably some brother at Perrysburgh will make the desired arrangement,] following me to reach Detroit, on Sunday, the 16th.

It is my request that Br. Stacy will make appointment from this date until the Association at Adrian, which I design to attend. I wish to see as much of the State as convenient; and when practicable I should be pleased with Br. Stacy's company. Will he please leave a line for me at Detroit to guide my course?

RESIGNATION.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

Father, thy will be done—
I sit in grief no more,
Though 'neath the smiling sun,
Heart never yet before

Quivered with deeper anguish, than the one
Which now thou chastenest—but, thy will be done.

Father, forgive thy child,
If, in his deep despair,
Came sinful thoughts, and wild,
When thou thine arm didst bare.

Oh, I was deeply stricken, but 'tis done—Thine arm hath conquered, may thy will be done.

The crushed flower may not die
When the pitying raindrop falls,
Nor the hand inactive lie
When the voice of duty calls.

I rise, oh Father, by thy goodness won,
To do thy bidding—may thy will be done.

ELOCUTION.

The substance of an address delivered before a class of young gentlemen in the Clinton Liberal Institute at the close of a course of instruction in Elocution

BY PROFESSOR S. N. SWEET.

[Published by request.]

YOUNG GENTLEMEN—Being about to take my leave of you for the present, I am happy to bear testimony to the good attention you have given and the proficiency you have made in the science and art of elocution. But, whatever may be the point to which you have already pushed your instruction; think not, for a moment, that nothing remains to be done. It is related of Dr. Rush, that several young physicians were once conversing in his presence, and one of them said: "When I finished my studies"—"When you finished your studies!" said the Doctor abruptly, "why you must be a happy man to have finished so young; I do not expect to finish mine while I live." You have just entered upon the career of improvement. You have much to learn and do, ere you can become good elocutionists.

"The wide, th' unbounded prospect lies before you."

The Greeks were right in saying that "the gods sell every thing to labor." Let your motto, then, be persevere. Strong in your determinations from a consciousness of the adaptation of the means of which you now have a knowledge, to the purpose of improvement in elocution; and animated in your efforts by the approbation of men of taste and intelligence, wherever they may be found, go forward and never

—"Bate a jot

Of heart or hope; but still bear up, and steer Right onward."

Indulge in no regrets that your portion of human existence was not allotted to you in ancient Greece or Rome. We live in a country, the government of which recognizes in every citizen, the right to form, to cherish, and to express his own sentiments on all subjects, interesting to our common welfare—a country where the opinion of a majority prevails, and where eloquence creates public opinion. If it be true, as I think it is, that some of the Greek and Roman orators addressed public assemblies more gracefully, if not more powerfully, than Americans, or than any other men that the world ever produced; it is because they spent years, in early life, in cultivating their voices and in improving their delivery. Demosthenes was a pupil of Plato; and so great was the ardor and diligence with which he entered on the study of elocution, under the tuition of that celebrated philosopher and traveller, that he vanquished an impediment in his speech; and, almost, in defiance of nature herself, we see him, "drag up drowned honor by the locks;" and that, too, before he reached the age of twenty-one.

Cicero, of whom it has been truly said, that his name is but another for eloquence itself, practiced recitation, for a long time, under the greatest tragedian among his contemporaries. His productions have stood the test of criticism for ages; and are every where received as the standard of Latinity. The names of these two unrivalled orators will be forever sweet in the mouths of all who worship at the altar of Hermes.

If I am correct in believing in the superiority of Athenian and Roman oratory over British and American; it does not necessarily follow that modern times have produced no orators at all. England has had a Sheridan, a Pitt, a Canning and a Fox; and America can boast of a Henry, a Wirt, a Webster, a Van Buren, a Clay and a Preston. There are several senators and representatives in Congress with whose mode of speaking I have been very much delighted. There are others who have yet to learn the first principles upon which good speaking is founded. If you wish to listen to the best speakers in the Union, go into the senate chamber at Washington; if, on the other hand, you are made of "stern stuff enough," to wish to hear the English language literally murdered, by abominable "drawlers, moathers, mumblers, clutters, squeakers, chunters and mongers in monotony," go to the same place, and occasionally step into the other house, and your anticipations will be lost in fruition.

If our national legislators had a knowledge of elocution, as it is elucidated in Dr. Rush's "Philosophy of the human voice," they certainly would be heard with much more attention and interest; and, I may add, they would be more useful to the country. With them, however, the time is passed, in which they would find it convenient, if disposed, to devote any special attention to elocution. The errors which they imbibed when young, they will probably cherish through life. This observation applies with equal force to lawyers and preachers. They are generally too actively employed in the performance of their professional duties to have leisure to engage in elocution exercises. Gentlemen of the legal profession and ministers of the Gospel, in my acquaintance, especially my pupils of those professional avocations, have in numberless instances, expressed their regrets, at their inattention to elocution, in the literary institutions, or at their want of an opportunity to acquire a knowledge of it while members of seminaries of learning. It does really seem to me that there ought to be distinct professorships of elocution in all our institutions in which the higher branches of education are taught.

THE MISERIES OF LIFE.

The thoughtless are often heard to complain of the miseries and trials of life, as if their course had been through one unbroken scene of distress. There are afflictions and troubles in the world which may be called, for they are so regarded, real. And all of us doubtless have our portion, yet some are much more lorn in their complaints than others, as if there was injustice done them, or that the blessings of life were spread with a partial hand. This seeming inequality probably arises more from the state of the mind, than from any very marked difference in the outward circumstances of men. It is a very easy matter for one to be unhappy if they choose to be, and on the other hand, about as easy to be happy if one prefers it. There are extreme cases it is true, where fancy is not necessary to infelicity. But in the common walks of life, no doubt, our troubles are more imaginary than real. It is not the present that pains us so much as what we expect. And when we cast a glance to the past, we usually discover nothing but what we could again endure if need be. Why then this distrust of the future? Are we unwilling to take the past as a pledge of the future? Surely, if we would be wise and save ourselves much needless trouble, we should look more upon the sunny spots of life, and repose a firmer confidence in the providence of God.—Universalist Watchman.

To SCHOOL TEACHERS.—Never deceive your scholars, nor suffer them to practice deception.

Never promise what you do not intend strictly and literally to perform.

Never threaten what you do not mean or what it would be improper to execute.

Never tell your scholars you will cut off their ears, or do anything else you do not intend to do.

Never shut up a child in a dark closet, or say anything that will make them afraid of darkness.

Never allude to mysterious evil, or threaten punishments from causes that children cannot comprehend.

Never speak to them about the Old Man, or the Old Woman or the Old Harry.

MARRIAGES.

In Ellicottville, May 15th, by Rev. P. P. Fowler, Mr. PHINEAS HOWE, Jr., to Miss MARY WOODFORD, both of Ellicottville.

In the town of Otsego, January 28th, by Rev. L. Hyatt, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, to Miss ELSEY ANN HATHAWAY.

In the town of Butternuts, May 15th, by the same, Mr. ABEL HERRINGTON, of Otsego, to Miss LYDIA JOHNSON, of Hartwick.

DEATHS.

In Carroll, May 26, Mrs. ESTHER LAFLIN, wife of Parley Laffin, aged 38 years. The funeral was attended by the writer, on the 28th, and the hopes of the Gospel ministered to the mourning relatives, and a numerous concourse of sympathising friends who assembled to pay the last tribute of respect, from 1 Cor. xv: 21.

In Carroll, on the 14th ult., Capt. ELLIS DOTY, a soldier of the revolution, in the 76th year of his age. It is worthy of remark, that Mr. D. had been blessed with the greatest of earthly blessings, a hardy constitution, and a continued enjoyment of freedom from disease. When dissolution had evidently marked him for its prey, the only concern manifested was a fear of murmuring through the intenseness of corporeal sufferings. In his God he placed the most implicit trust; and he awaited the time when the great change should be effected, with composure and tranquillity. By his request, the writer attended the obsequies, and imparted the consolations of the Gospel, in a discourse from Ps. xc: 12. A. W.

In Rochester, July 16, 1836, of consumption, Mrs. ELSEY M. MOSES, in the 35th year of her age, consort of Schnyler Moses. She died as a Christian, resigned to the will of her Maker, and for weeks waited anxiously for the hour of dissolution that she might be with her Father and her God.

In Otsego, Otsego county, July 20th, of a paralytic disease, Mr. JONATHAN KNAP, aged 67 years. Br. Knap was a firm believer in the Gospel of a world's salvation, and a member of our society in Otsego. He has left an aged companion and several children to mourn their loss. He was a kind husband, an affectionate parent and a beloved citizen. The consolations of the Gospel were presented to the afflicted family and a large assembly of sympathising friends, on Friday, the 22d, by the writer of this, from 1 Cor. xv: 49. L. HYATT.

In the town of Livonia, Livingston county, on the 22d inst., Mr. J. HAVENS, aged 86.

This excellent man has at last, in the ripeness of age; gone to his repose in the mansions of the dead. It is due to the public, and will, I trust, be satisfactory to his friends and relatives, to state that he lived and died in the embrace and enjoyment of Universalism. He had been a firm and unwavering believer of this doctrine for about forty years; and there never was a man who more fully and perfectly adorned his profession, than this beloved and pious brother. It would be next to impossible to speak in too high terms of commendation of his virtues and Christian deportment. Even his opponents in faith were constrained to say that he was emphatically a Christian. His generosity to the poor, his strong and overflowing sympathy for the distressed, his meekness, temperance, kindness to all, and in few words, his constant endeavors to do good, had seemed to him unbounded love and respect. He was a man who endured many hardships and privations in our country's struggle for independence, having once been taken captive by the Indians and led away to Canada; and after suffering for some length of time, their cruelty and savage barbarity, he obtained his freedom and returned once more to enjoy the sweets of the family circle. May Heaven grant its richest consolations to the mourning relatives; and enable them to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory in seeing by faith, him, and his children, and his kindred race universally, resting in the perfect peace of immortality. O. R.

Departed this life on June 11, of congestive fever, at Port Hudson, Louisiana, in the 18th year of her age, Mrs. ELIZA JANE GLASS, consort of James C. Glass, Esq., and second daughter of Major Thomas E. Parmele, late of Utica, N. Y.

She bore her illness, which continued eight days, with fortitude—was conscious of and resigned to her approaching dissolution, and has left a kind and indulgent husband, fond parents, sisters and a brother, together with a numerous circle of friends, to mourn her untimely departure. But they mourn not as those who have no hope—their loss is her eternal gain.

"Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

In New-York, on Sunday morning, 24th inst., after a short but severe illness, (an affection of the brain,) JULIA EMILY PRICE, aged 3 years; only daughter of P. Price, publisher of the Universalist Union.

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

I was very much gratified by your notice of the above very excellent work in the 22d No. of this vol. at page 174. I was rejoiced to learn that its value and worth are already so extensively known as to produce many inquiries for the work, "by ministering and other brethren." To aid the dissemination and consequent usefulness of this most valuable work, is the intention of the few following remarks, and the selections from the work which are appended to them. From the selected passages some will learn the character and excellence of the book more impressively than by a multiplicity of recommendatory notices. "It speaks for itself." And were I permitted to use the liberty of making a suggestion to the Editors of this paper, I would submit it as my impression, that while the pages of this Magazine would be enriched by further extracts from the work, the work selected from might come to enjoy a more extended appreciation of its worth, and a wider field of usefulness.

One of the chief excellences of this work is, the fervor, the enthusiasm, the spirit-stirring power which pervades the whole composition. The importance of the truths which he inculcates, and the ardent desire with which he is animated to contribute to the illumination and amelioration of his brethren, burn and breathe and inspire in every page. Every where we meet with the earnestness and the eloquence of philanthropy. This work is entitled to a first place among that class of works which not only convey important truths, but do likewise call forth, stir up, and invigorate the intellectual and moral powers of the reader. While perusing this work the mind is not permitted to indulge in inaction, in a passive reception of, and acquiescence in its doctrines; it is roused by the energy of a master-spirit pervading every paragraph: the author has aroused him, and displayed Herculean powers, and a portion of his spirit is felt by the reader; the author has felt, and therefore the reader feels, thus illustrating the truth and discernment contained in the ancient observation and rule—Si vis me flere, flendum est tibi ipsi, i. e., If you wish me to weep, you must yourself first feel enough to weep.

Another prominent excellence and characteristic of this work consists in its clear, consistent and eloquent exposition and inculcation of a doctrine which we regard as the true theory of the divine government of the world—namely, the independent existence and operation of the natural laws of creation. These natural laws he apportions into three great classes—PHYSICAL, ORGANIC AND MORAL; and the peculiarity of his doctrine is, that these laws operate independently of each other: that, to secure its rewards and avoid its penalties, each requires obedience to itself; that each, in its own specific way rewards obedience and punishes disobedience, and that human beings are happy in proportion to the extent in which they place themselves in accordance with all of these divine institutions. In illustration of Mr. C.'s views on this subject, we make our first extract:—

"The organic laws operate indefinitely; and hence, one individual who has inherited a fine bodily constitution from his parents, and observes the rules of temperance and exercise, will enjoy robust health, although he may cheat, lie, blaspheme, and murder his fellow-creature; while another, if he have inherited a feeble constitution and disregards the rules of temperance and exercise, will suffer pain, and sickness, although he may be a paragon of every Christian virtue. These results frequently occur in the world; and, on every such occasion, the darkness and inscrutable perplexity of the ways of Providence are generally moralized upon, or a future life is called in as the scene in which these crooked paths are to be made straight. But if my views be correct, the divine wisdom and goodness are abundantly conspicuous in these events, for we perceive that by this distinct operation of the organic and moral laws, order is preserved in creation, and the means of discipline and improvement are afforded to all the human faculties."

Few men, I presume, exist, who cannot recall to their memories moments in which the ways of God to man did seem indeed "a great deep"—a perplexing and impenetrable mystery. "To justify the ways of God to man" has been a task often attempted—it has been the theme of many a tongue and many a pen beside those of Milton and Pollock in their great poems. Yet how few of the homilies and sermons, the essays and poems which have been submitted for the removal of the mystery and the perplexity, are of any avail for that purpose to a strong mind—to a mind that thinks for itself, and must have some more substantial reasons for its faith than the ipse dixit of some expounder of God's word, or the baseless conjecture of any one who pretends to know more of the future than revelation announces or reason approves? If I have understood and explained the sentiment of the author of the 37th Psalm, as detailed in section three of these "Notes," at page 52 of this volume, he approaches more closely to a satisfactory solution of the mystery than any of the many who have attempted it. I shall not here recapitulate the substance of that section; but shall endeavor, very concisely to state my views of the key to this mystery.

The sources and springs of our happiness and felicity—of our inward satisfaction and dissatisfaction are various and manifold. The amount of a man's enjoyment is to be estimated not only by the number or quantity of his pleasurable feelings, but by the quality of them also. Take two men who are both with equal earnestness and activity engaged in different pursuits. The one shall be another Howard, almost an enthusiast in his labors for the amendment and amelioration of the most degraded and hopeless of his fellow-creatures; the other, a supple, cringing, creeping hunter after wealth or political preferment. Both, say, enjoy the pleasures of health in an equal degree; both to attain the object of their ardent desires, require to strain and exert every faculty of their intellect, and from this activity of their powers to derive in equal degrees the pleasures of activity; but as the mind of every man is so constituted as to feel, whether he will acknowledge it or no, that the philanthropical aims of the one are of a more exalted nature than the selfish avarice or ambition of the other, the one doth win for himself the approbation and respect of his own mind, while the other is deprived of this most soul-satisfying reward, if not actually pained by a feeling of degradation in his own eyes. I might multiply instances but would rather that the reader would turn to the pages of Combe, where he will meet with analogous views, eloquently and perspicuously expressed. These will make a deeper and more distinct impression than any brief remarks of mine, which could only be in this concise form, not thoughts fully developed, but only elements of thought.

An interesting portion of this work consists of an investigation of the adaptation of the natural laws to the constitution of man, and an endeavor to discover and demonstrate how far the external world is arranged with wisdom and benevolence, in regard to the human race. Mr. C. divides this part of his inquiry into five separate sections, in which he considers man, 1. as a physical being; 2. as an organized being; 3. as an animal; 4. as an intellectual, and 5. as a moral being. He then compares the faculties of man with each other, and evinces the supremacy of the moral sentiments and the intellect over the animal propensities.

Next follows an interesting inquiry into the sources of human happiness, and the conditions required for maintaining it. From this we quote the following:—

"The first and most obvious circumstance which attracts attention is, that all enjoyment must necessarily arise from activity of the various systems of which the human constitution is composed. The bones, muscles, nerves, digestive and respiratory organs, furnish pleasing sensations directly or indirectly, when exercised in conformity with their nature; and the external senses and internal faculties when excited supply the whole remaining perceptions and emotions, which when combined, constitute life and rational existence. If these were habitually buried in sleep, or constitutionally inactive, life, to all the purposes of enjoyment, might as well be extinct; existence would be reduced to mere vegetation without consciousness." "In the second place to reap enjoyment in the greatest quantity and to maintain it most permanently, the faculties must be gratified harmoniously; in other words, if, among the various powers, the supremacy belongs to the moral sentiments, then the aim of our habitual conduct must be the attainment of objects suited to gratify them. For example, in pursuing wealth or fame, as the leading object of existence, full gratification is not afforded to the sentiments of benevolence, veneration, and conscientiousness, and consequently, complete satisfaction cannot be enjoyed; whereas, by seeking knowledge, and dedicating life to the welfare of mankind and obedience to God, in our several vocations these sentiments will be gratified, and wealth, fame, health and other advantages will flow in their train, so that the whole mind will rejoice, and its delight will remain permanent. Thirdly, to place human happiness on a secure basis, the laws of external creation themselves must accord with the dictates of the moral sentiments, and intellect must be fitted to discover the nature and relations of both, and to direct the conduct in harmony with them."

Mr. C. makes an interesting and useful application of the natural laws which he has expounded, to the practical arrangements of life. The observations which he makes may be summed up as follows:—If a system of living and occupation were to be framed for human beings, founded on the exposition of their nature now given, it would be something like this—1st. So many hours a day should be dedicated, by every individual in health, to the exercise of his nervous and muscular systems in labor calculated to give scope to their functions: the reward of obeying this requisite of man's nature would be health and joyous animal existence—the punishment of its neglect is disease, low spirits, and death. 2d. So many hours a day should be spent in the sedulous employment of the knowing and reflecting faculties—in studying the qualities of external objects and their relations, also the nature of animated beings and their relations, not with the view of accumulating mere abstract and barren knowledge, but of enjoying the positive pleasure of mental activity, and of turning every discovery to account, as a means of increasing happiness, and alleviating misery. 3d. So many hours a day should be devoted to the cultivation and gratification of our moral and religious sentiments, that is to say, in exercising these in harmony with intellect, and especially in acquiring the habit of admiring, loving and yielding obedience to the Creator and his institutions; intellect is barren of practical fruit, however rich it may be in knowledge, until it is fired and prompted to act, by moral sentiment. 4th. A certain portion of time should be employed in taking food, in sleep, and in innocent amusement.

Another portion of Mr. C.'s work well worthy attentive study is that in which he proposes, to consider some of the evils which have afflicted the human race, and to ascertain whether these have proceeded from abuses of institutions, benevolent and wise in themselves, and calculated, when observed, to promote the happiness of man, or from a constitution of nature so defective that we cannot supply its imperfections, or so vicious that we can neither rectify nor improve its qualities. This branch of his inquiry is subdivided into three sections—on the calamities arising from the infringement of the physical laws—on the evils that befall mankind from infringement of the organic laws—and on the calamities occasioned by the infringement of the moral laws. Each of these sections abounds in illustrations most vividly interesting and abundantly instructive. Following these are chapters or sections on punishment as inflicted under the natural laws, and its moral advantages; on the combined operation of the natural laws, and their influence on the happiness of individuals; and on the relation between science and the sacred writings. From this "bill of fare" we hope many will be tempted to partake of the intellectual feast which Mr. C. has prepared.

Before the influence which such minds and such works as those of Mr. Combe are calculated to exert—before the irresistible on-rush of such enlightened public opinion as may be the result of converse with such minds and such works; bigotry, superstition, vulgar fallacies and errors of the learned, with philosophy "falsely so called" and Christianity as existing in narrow, illiberal creeds and sentiments, Christianity in every form save in purity, spirit and power;—all these, with many other scourges of humanity must fall, and be no more. It is from a firmly established conviction, that this work of Mr. C.'s will powerfully contribute to this "consummation, devoutly to be wished," that we feel deeply interested in its dissemination and usefulness.

AN ALLEGORY.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

Mr. J., of this city, was the father of two sprightly and interesting sons. As he was of a noble and affectionate heart, he loved his children to such an extent that their happiness became identified with his own.

As these boys grew up and were surrounded by the allurements, common to the city, it happened that Harry, the younger of the two, became vicious and disobedient. This circumstance caused the father much sorrow of heart, and no pains were spared by him to redeem the wayward child. But he labored in vain; and finding at length that the ordinary means were not sufficient to reclaim him, he chastised him severely, and then conveyed him to a house of refuge where no temptations were permitted to enter.

As soon as Harry came to himself he was ashamed of his base ingratitude to the best of parents, and as he saw the wretchedness which he had suffered for his crimes. And as no inducements to vice were to be found in this establishment, a complete change in his life and conduct was effected in a short time.

The news of this singular change in his character was soon received in his native city. The circumstance was so remarkable that it readily engaged the attention of the inhabitants, but very few of whom could be made to believe the report. He was so vile a wretch, they said, that he could not have been an object of his father's love and compassion.

It happened in process of time that the conduct of the father became the principal theme of conversation. Some were heard to speak decidedly in terms of approbation, but the most of the people were of a different opinion. They said it was an act of partiality and injustice to place this wicked son beyond the power of temptation, by which his evil habits were necessarily broken up and his character reformed; while at the same time the virtuous and obedient child was left to linger out a miserable existence, exposed to all the temptations and consequent evils of the place. Whoso readeth, let him understand.

THE UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE.

An association for moral, religious, literary and scientific improvement, bearing this title, has lately been organized in this city. As we have yet published no Constitution for such associations, and as we think that adopted by this society a very excellent one, we here give it a place. It will be seen that while the main purpose is declared to be the promotion of the doctrine of Universalism, it does not exclude any from membership who do not believe in that doctrine—and that old and young, male and female, can all become members.

The following are the officers of the Utica Berean Institute for the ensuing six months. Alvin White, President; John D. Williams, Vice-President; Orren Hutchinson, Recording Secretary; Rev. D. Skinner, Corresponding Secretary; Woodman Kimball, Treasurer; C. C. P. Grosh, Librarian; Dr. J. P. Newland, Orin Marshall and A. B. Grosh, Directors. A. B. G.

PREAMBLE.

To gratify our social feelings, and improve our rational, moral, and religious faculties by associating with each other in accordance therewith—to cherish due respect and good will for those who differ from us, by learning from themselves the reasons for that difference—to elicit truth by the amicable collision of sentiment in regular debate—to unite the beauties and graces of literature, the teachings of science, the affections of social life, the precepts of morality and the holiest hopes and purest aspirations of religion, and thus advance the doctrine of God's impartial goodness and man's final and universal holiness and happiness, we hereby unite ourselves into a society; and for our government ordain the following

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I. The style and title of this society shall be "THE UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE."

ART. II. Section 1. After the organization of this society, any person sustaining a good moral character, and having been proposed at a previous meeting, may become a member by the vote of a majority of the members present at any regular meeting, and signing this Constitution.

Section 2. Each member of this society (females and honorary members excepted) shall pay an initiation fee of fifty cents, and an additional sum of twelve and a half cents per month, while he shall remain a member.

Section 3. Any member may withdraw from the society after paying all arrearages due from him to the society, by giving written notice of his intentions to the Secretary.

Section 4. If any member refuses or neglects to pay his monthly dues, without reasonable excuse, or if any member, male or female, is charged with immoral or disorderly conduct, he or she shall, if possible, be notified of the same, and of the time and place of trial, and may be heard in self-defence—and if found guilty of the charges, may be admonished, reprov'd, suspended or expelled, as a majority of the members present may decide.

ART. III. Section 1. The officers of this society shall consist of one President, one Vice-President, one Recording Secretary, one Corresponding Secretary, one Treasurer, one Librarian, and three Directors, who shall be elected semi-annually, and hold their offices until others are elected.

Section 2. In case of the death, removal from office, or resignation of any officer, the vacancy may be supplied until the next semi-annual election, at any regular meeting, after notice given for that purpose.

ART. IV. The duties of the respective officers shall be as follows:—The President (and in his absence the Vice-President) shall preside at all regular meetings of the society, decide on all questions of order, subject always to an appeal, to the society on a motion of any three members.

The Recording Secretary shall keep a record of this Constitution, the by-laws and proceedings of the society, and deliver the same in good order to his successor.

The Corresponding Secretary shall correspond with such societies and individuals as may be necessary in the opinion of the society, and hand over a correct record of the same to his successor.

The Treasurer shall keep in trust for the society all money paid into its funds, pay all orders signed by a majority of the Directors, keep an account of all the items of receipts and expenditures, report to the society quarterly, and hand over all pertaining to the office to his successor.

The Librarian shall take in charge all books, manuscripts, prints, and other articles that may be entrusted to him for the use of the society, render a quarterly account of the same and shall hand them over in good order, with a catalogue showing the names and value of the same to his successor.

The Directors shall purchase, with funds drawn from the Treasurer, all articles ordered by, or necessary for the society, furnish the Treasurer with a list of the same, and their cost, and render a quarterly report to the society. They shall also select the subjects for debate, receive and examine all essays presented, and appoint such lecturers and disputants as may from time to time be necessary.

ART. V. The semi-annual meetings of this society shall be held on the first Tuesday in August and February in each year, when the election of officers and review of the business for the past half year shall be provided for. The other regular meetings of this society shall be held at such times and places as may be designated in the by-laws.

ART. VI. All elections of members and officers, and the sentence of members guilty of offences, shall be determined by ballot; and all votes shall be determined by a majority of the members present.

ART. VII. One-third of the members of this society shall be a quorum for the transaction of business at any regular meeting; but a smaller number may organize to adjourn to any period not farther distant than the next regular meeting.

ART. VIII. By-laws, in accordance with the spirit of this Constitution, or for the imposition of fines, the appointment of special committees and the regulation of debates, may be enacted at any regular meeting of the society; but this Preamble and Constitution, or any part thereof, shall not be altered or repealed except by two-thirds of the members present at any regular meeting, and then only after written notice of said alteration or repeal has been given at the previous meeting of the society.

PROFANITY.

Messrs. EDITORS—The Rev. Mr. Maclure, in a sermon against Universalism, accuses Universalists of stealing the oaths of the Partialists every time they wish to swear. "Render unto Cæsar the things that belong to Cæsar" is a divine and excellent injunction which I am sure no Universalist can object to practising. "To lend, hoping for nothing again," is also another blessed injunction which particularly distinguishes every one having and exercising the spirit of Jesus of Nazareth.

Now, as profane swearing is by no means limited to the practice of those who have to borrow oaths from Partialists to swear by—and as the practice is a horrid and unseemly one even when not carried on with a borrowed capital—I move you, brethren, that Universalists not only “render unto” the Partialists “the things that belong to” Partialism; but also “lend” unto them of our oaths, expecting “nothing” in return. Therefore, when any man feels himself inclined to this abominable habit of cursing and swearing instead of calling on God to curse his fellow-beings, or sticks, stones, or animals—instead of indulging in the Partialists’ passions of malevolent fury, wrath and anger—let him cherish a kindly feeling of good will, affection, compassion and forgiveness, and say, “God bless you my brother!”—“Heavenly Father save you, my sister!”—“May God’s will be done,” or “may God do according to his universal and endless goodness with this animal.” Only let the feeling be exercised, and a fit form of sound words can as easily be found, as Partialist feelings will suggest oaths and curses.

One word more. Let our Partialist brethren use our feelings and language without hesitation, in return for the use some of our erring and inconsistent brethren have made of theirs—and even should they largely overdraw the debt we owe, they need never fear our reproaches for so doing. Our object is to banish profanity from the world, and with it, the spirit that prompted it—to make men practice Universalism, even if they will not believe it. Such at least is the desire of one who, while a Partialist, swore much, but by believing in Universalism, was thoroughly REFORMED.

UNCHRISTIAN CONDUCT OF SOME PRO-FESSED UNIVERSALISTS.—No. I.

PROFANITY.

There are some individuals who profess to be Universalists, who are guilty of certain evil practices, that are disreputable to themselves, and to the denominations to which they profess to be attached. For the benefit of this class of individuals, and the Universalist denomination, I design to make a few remarks in relation to the evils to which I have alluded.

That there are any professors of religion who are faultless, and without sin, few only will pretend. But that there are habits or practices that are inexcusable, especially in those who profess to believe in a God of infinite benevolence, who is the Father of all the sons and daughters of Adam, and who will in due time reconcile all his children unto himself, few only can have the presumption to deny. It is asked what those habits are, that are sometimes possessed by the advocates of Universalism, that are so detrimental to its prosperity? I answer, one of them is the practice of taking in vain the sacred name of our Father in heaven, the occasional use of his name on improper occasions, or of using words or phrases, that are commonly considered vulgar. For it is the duty of Universalists, not only to avoid evil, but even its appearance.

Professors of Universalism who are guilty of the practice above complained of, when reproved for this evil, often acknowledge that the practice is not consistent with the principles of Universalism, and excuse themselves by saying that early habits, formed when they were rocked in the cradle of Partialism, still possess such a control over them, as to render it almost impossible, at all times, to refrain from profanity. They also say that they do not make a practice of using profane, or vulgar language, but that their passions sometimes get the upper hand of them, and they, without thinking, are guilty of expressions that are unbecoming the Christian character! Is it possible that there are individuals to be found, whose feet have been taken from the miry clay of Partialism, and placed upon the rock of eternal truth, who can so forget their obligations, as to abuse, and treat with contempt the name of that Being to whom they owe their deliverance, and to bring into disrepute that doctrine which affords them infinite consolation! I answer no! and I unhesitatingly assert that no Universalist believes that he can serve two masters—that he can live agreeable to the principles of Universalism, and wilfully, knowingly, or carelessly profane the name of the Deity. Such individuals are a dead weight to the cause of Universalism. They are strangers to its renovating influence, and are destitute of established principles upon which they can safely rely, to guide them through the stormy sea of life. They are not Universalists. They are Partialists—Partialists because they are governed by Partialist principles, which teach that the way of the transgressor is not always hard, that in the day we depart from virtue we shall not surely die, and that the vicious are not unfrequently more happy in this life than the pious Christian! W.

“The carnal mind is enmity against God.” Rom. viii. 7.

From the Revelation we learn, that “God is love”—hence, if the carnal mind is at enmity with God, or against him, we learn that it must, being an opposite, be hatred. The effect of this principle, when put in exercise, will readily be perceived by all—and it will be seen to have for its object the misery of its subjects. Hence if the being who is exercised by this principle, be a lawgiver, he will be certain to enact such an one, as will produce torment in proportion to his power. If infinite in power, then infinite torment will be the result of his operations—which is in perfect accordance—with the exercise of the carnal mind. Opposed to this, is the exercise of the principle of godliness. Hence, if the being who is in possession of this principle exercise it, in the giving of a law, he will give such an one as will produce happiness to the subject in proportion to the principle in exercise. If infinite and universal, then universal happiness is secured.

Reader, judge you, whether the doctrine of the restitution is suited to the desires of the carnal mind, or whether it is in accordance with the principle of godliness. R. T.

QUESTIONS FOR PARTIALISTS.

If all mankind are born into the world totally depraved, are they to blame for doing evil, and neglecting to do good?

If every sin is infinite, is Santa Anna any greater sinner than a little child who has been guilty of but one transgression? If not, does he deserve any greater punishment than the little child? If he is a greater sinner, is it true that every sin is infinite? And if every sin is not infinite, will any of mankind suffer endless punishment?

Are any who believe in the doctrine of total depravity, and the infinity of sin, within the reach of reason? W.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION.

Messrs. EDITORS—You have been apprised that a public discussion between the Methodists and Universalists of this place, has been some time pending. This discussion has taken place. Names of the disputants—Rev. George G. Hapgood, of the Methodist, (challenger,) and Rev. John French, of the Universalist denomination. I will state the rules of the debate which were written and agreed to by the parties, as near as I can, from memory, (the paper on which they were written being mislaid or lost), pledging myself to give the substance and very nearly the precise language.

1. Question. Is the doctrine of endless misery true? Or is the doctrine of universal salvation true?

2. George G. Hapgood to open the debate, and John French to close.

3. Each party to speak thirty minutes alternately.

4. Either of the parties may close the discussion when they please.

5. Br. Hapgood has the liberty to correct misstatements or misrepresentations.”

The debate was opened on Wednesday morning, the 3d. inst. and continued till Thursday 4 o’clock P. M., when it was closed by Br. French, according to mutual agreement—occupying in the whole seven hours. The discussion was conducted with order, and in the main, in that spirit of candor and Christian good feeling which so highly becomes the professed followers of Jesus. The audience was respectable for numbers—more attending than could have been expected at such a busy season of the year. They listened with devout attention, and manifested a deep interest in the solemn and important subject.

For the fruits resulting from this debate, we must wait till the “harvest.” I feel justified however in stating as “mine opinion,” that Br. French ably met, and triumphantly refuted, every argument of Br. H. that had a direct bearing on the main question. From a conversation which I have had with H. since the discussion, I am also authorized to say that he thinks he fully proved and sustained the doctrine of endless misery, and that his arguments were not met and answered. I have not time to say more at present on this subject.

Affectionately yours,

CHARLES BINGLEY BROWN.

NOTICE.

The first Universalist society in Wilna, Jefferson county, N. Y., to the friends of universal reconciliation, wheresoever scattered abroad, sendeth greeting.

Whereas our well-beloved pastor and brother, Rev. JEREMIAH H. WHELPLEY, in consequence of the precarious state of his health, has come to the conclusion to seek a more favorable climate, and a milder sky, we have thought it no more than an act of common justice to him, to our friends and to ourselves, to say that, during three years, Br. Whelpy has labored with us nearly half of the time—that within that time this society has increased from fifteen, to seventy members—that under his pastoral care, there has been no strife nor hard feelings between brethren—that on the contrary brotherly love and Christian fellowship has in a good degree prevailed—that this society considers Br. W. to be a sound preacher of the Abrahamic faith, and would therefore recommend him as such to any people among whom his lot, under the guidance of Providence, may be cast.

WHY NOT GIVE?

In looking over an old number of the Baptist Register, I find the following language used in an appeal to the churches to raise $10,000 which had been pledged to the Convention. “Think of the condition of impenitent men, women and youth throughout our land, exposed to vice and immorality here, and eternal misery hereafter, and decide what you will do to enable the board to sustain our devoted missionaries in pressing the truths of the Gospel upon such individuals.”

Wonder if sufficient amount of funds were raised to save any great number from “eternal misery hereafter?” Verily of what inestimable value is money! Across the Atlantic, God has placed some poor Heathen who are exposed to the eternal wrath of God, because they have not had the Gospel preached to them. True the kind-hearted missionary is ready to go and save them, but he has not the means—he must have money or he cannot go. Can there be any so hard-hearted as to withhold their money, when, by giving it, they can snatch poor souls from the eternal wrath of Jehovah? X.

ALOHEIM.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

Aloheim is a Hebrew word signifying gods; but when applied to the Deity in the Hebrew Scriptures, it is translated God, the singular being used instead of the plural. The fact that the Hebrews used the plural instead of the singular of this word to designate the supreme Being, has been urged by some individuals as conclusive evidence in favor of the trinity. To add to this evidence it is said that the plural of the pronoun is used in reference to the Deity in several places in the Scriptures. See Gen. i: 26. iii: 22. xi: 7.

This argument has frequently been replied to and satisfactorily answered, and hence it may appear to be a work of supererogation to offer any thing more on the subject. But what Peter says to his brethren on another subject, may serve as an excuse for bringing the present subject again before the public. "I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth." Besides, it is not impossible that something new, at least to some people, may be advanced at this time.

I. In reply to that part of the argument which relates to the use of Aloheim, (in the plural) let it be observed,

1. That the word was never understood by the Jews, for whom the Hebrew Scriptures were principally designed, as expressing the tri-personality of the Deity. If it were the intention of the sacred writers to teach this doctrine by the use of the plural of the word under consideration, it is rather remarkable that the people, to whom the sacred Scriptures were originally communicated, did not so understand it. But they did not so understand it; for the Jews are now, and ever have been Unitarians, believing in one God in one person.

2. The word is indefinite as to the number expressed by it. Gods may mean two, three, four or fifty gods. It may denote any number from two upwards to a thousand or more: and is as much a proof of polytheism as of trinitarianism. Besides, if it were admitted that three was the number designed to be expressed by this word, it would follow, not that there are three persons in the Godhead, but that there are three gods. Trinitarianism, and not trinitarianism, would be established by the term.

3. The same term is applied to men; individually, in the Scriptures. In Ex. vii: 1, God says to Moses, "see I have made thee a God (aloheim) to Pharaoh." Will any one contend that the application of Aloheim to Moses in this passage, proves that he consisted of three persons? It neither proves that he consisted of three persons, nor that he was more than one man. Hence we may remark,

4. That the word Aloheim was used in the plural with reference to God to denote the dignity and excellency of the being, without regard to the number of persons, of which the Godhead may be supposed to consist.

Mr. Stuart, "Associate Professor of Sacred Literature in the Theological Institution at Andover," Mass., has the following language:—"For the sake of emphasis, the Hebrews commonly employed most of the words which signify Lord, God, etc., in the plural form, but with the sense of the singular. This is called PLURALIS EXCELLENTIÆ." Hebrew Grammar, section 437, 2, published in 1831. From this quotation it appears that Aloheim is used in the plural, "for the sake of emphasis," "with the sense of the singular;" and that this usage is called the plural of excellence. Mr. Stuart has too much knowledge of the Hebrew language (having been employed in teaching it nearly thirty years) to place any dependence upon the use of Aloheim to prove the doctrine of the trinity.

II. As to that part of the argument which is founded upon the use of the plural pronoun, we may remark that the same objections are opposed to it which we have said stand against that drawn from the use of the plural noun. And as we consider these objections unanswerable, we can not admit the force of the argument. Besides, in Hebrew, as in our own language, pronouns generally agree with the nouns for which they stand in gender, number, etc. As therefore, the plural noun Aloheim is used to denote the Deity in those passages where the usage we are considering is found, it would have been a departure from the rule, had not the plural of the pronoun been used. Departures from this rule, Mr. Stuart says, are somewhat frequent, and he places them among the "anomalies of pronouns." See Hebrew Grammar, section 476. Whether the singular or plural of the pronoun is most frequently used in reference to Aloheim in particular, he does not, as I discover, inform us. As to verbs, he says that, "the pluralis excellentiæ (plural of excellence) commonly, but not always, takes a verb in the singular," section 484. Mr. Gibbs, "Professor of Sacred Literature in the theological school in Yale College," says in his Hebrew Lexicon, "This pluralis excellentiæ is generally construed with singular adjectives and verbs, but there are many exceptions." From what is here said by Stuart and Gibbs, it appears that the word Aloheim, has sometimes verbs, adjectives and pronouns in the plural, and sometimes in the singular. And hence, if the use of the plural proves the existence of a plurality of Gods, or of persons in the Godhead, the use of the singular would be equally conclusive evidence that there is but one God, and one person in the Godhead.

But the truth is, neither of these doctrines is proved by this usage. The usage is a characteristic of the language. And a singular usage is found in the Greek, Latin, English and probably in most other languages. If I were to say we will soon bring our remarks to a close, would any one suppose that I meant to be understood as teaching that I was composed of more than one person? Surely not. The use of the plural pronoun, in this instance, would be justified by many very excellent writers in our language. But the usage of the plural pronoun in reference to Aloheim, in the Hebrew, is still more justifiable than the one which we have just named as belonging to our own language; for it is in accordance with a general rule by which all language, in similar instances, is governed, viz:—that the pronoun should agree with the noun for which it stands in number. The first clause of Gen. i: 26, literally reads thus, "And Gods said, let us make man in our image and our likeness." The English reader will see no impropriety in the language here used. He does not discover any grammatical inaccuracy. But if it were to read, "And Gods said I will make man in my image and my likeness," the inaccuracy would be seen at once. The obvious reason, therefore, why the plural pronoun in this, and other similar instances, was used instead of the singular, is, that the noun to which it referred was in the plural, the reason why this noun was in the plural, has before been given. And the reason why, on the other hand, the singular of the pronoun, as well as verb and adjective, is sometimes, and perhaps generally used, instead of the plural with reference to Aloheim, was best known to the Hebrews. It might have been that only one being was designated by the plural noun. Hence it would follow that sometimes the Hebrews, in the use of words connected with Aloheim, were governed by the plurality of the word; and at other times by the unity of the being.

The reason of this irregularity is doubtless the same as that of others of a similar kind, both in the Hebrew and other languages. In Hebrew the singular pronoun is frequently used for a plural noun; and the plural for the singular—the masculine for the feminine and the feminine for the masculine. Why is this? All I suppose that can be said about it, is that this is an anomaly of the language; and that all languages have similar anomalies. There are some instances in the Hebrew language in which the singular feminine of the pronoun, is used for the plural masculine of the noun. Would the author of the trinitarian argument we are considering, consider this usage as evidence that the noun referred to, was both singular and plural, masculine and feminine?

We will now close our remarks. What I have written has been rather hastily written, and hence must pass for what it is worth. Besides, I do not profess to have a profound knowledge of the Hebrew language, and consequently could not write as well on the subject as many others. I have, however, a sufficient smattering of the Hebrew language, to be satisfied that the trinitarian argument I have been considering, must have originated in greater ignorance than I am willing to acknowledge as belonging to myself.

We copy the following from an English paper. It will apply equally as well to the American Episcopal church, with the exception of the alterations which our system of government has rendered it necessary for it to make:—

IDENTITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME AND THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Episcopalians frequently speak of the Romish church as if they considered the church of England perfectly free from the corruption of Popery. We have often been surprised at their want of information or honesty. Our present object is to shew that these hierarchies are very much alike.

By the Romish church, we shall not here understand those Catholic societies which are supported by voluntary contributions, as in Ireland; but Popery, maintained by a coercive taxation, as in several continental nations, and by the church of England, that denomination which is established by law in this country.

We cheerfully admit, that there are several points of difference between these churches, to the advantage of the English hierarchy—while it must be conceded that there inconsistencies in the latter communion, which are not discovered in the church of Rome.

It should be universally known, that in the year 1689, a committee composed of ten bishops and twenty other pious and learned dignitaries of the church of England, made six hundred corrections in the prayer book, articles and canons of the establishment; but which were not adopted through the influence of certain bigoted parties in the British Parliament.

In drawing up the following parallels, our object is not to irritate the ministers or members of the establishment, whose condition we sincerely pity—but to expose those errors of their system which require amendment, and which most pious and intelligent churchmen deplore in common with ourselves.

The subsequent remarks will shew that the Puritans had better grounds for their exertions to purify the church than most Episcopalians are willing to admit—and that, if we would be rid of the corruptions of Popery, there must be a second Reformation of the church of England, greater than the first.

As no intelligent persons will question the truth of our assertions, it will not be requisite to refer to proofs for their confirmation. A few prefatory observations may not be unsuitable:—

1. That the prayer book contains little beside the mass book translated into English.
2. That the Pope offered to confirm it, if the church of England would join that of Rome.
3. That Episcopal clergymen of eminence have declared such a union of the two churches practicable.
4. That the efficacy of Episcopal ordination is derived entirely through the Popish prelates.
5. That at the accession of Elizabeth, nine thousand two hundred and eleven Catholic priests, out of nine thousand and four hundred, joined the church of England.
6. That the Papists and Protestants long worshipped together in the English church.
7. That at the Reformation, Parliament transferred the entire powers exercised by the Pope in this country, to Henry VIII. and his royal successors.

PARALLELS.

I. Both churches were constructed by human wisdom and established by national laws, which laws became the rule of conduct and the object of ultimate appeal, both to priests and people. The New Testament is not the rule of law of Episcopalians, or Catholics, as such.

II. Both have visible and human heads, who decree all rites and ceremonies, and exercise absolute authority in controversies of faith, demanding implicit obedience to their commands, whether agreeable to Jesus Christ or not.

III. Both are supported by a coercive taxation—tithes, rates, dues and parliamentary grants. Nothing is left to the zeal, charity, or piety of the people. They can withhold nothing from the most unworthy clergyman.

IV. Both systems impose ministers on their congregations, and very frequently the most unsuitable and incompetent—depriving the people of their reasonable and Christian privileges.

V. Both traffic in the souls of men. Benefices, involving the cure of souls, are bought and sold in the market by auction, equally, with chariots, horses, or any other property.

VI. Both have settled forms of prayer, unalterable liturgies, articles of faith of human composition, to which all parties must subscribe. Nothing is left to the skill, piety or devotion of the clergy. An ability to read is all that is essential.

VII. Both have long grades of officers, with titles and powers unknown to the New Testament—archbishops, bishops, chancellors, prebendaries, canons, deans, etc., almost without end.

VIII. Both make high pretences to supernatural powers. The bishops pretend to confer the Holy Ghost on the persons they ordain; and all the clergy pretend to absolve men from all their sins upon a dying bed.

IX. Both consider baptism a real regeneration; by their ceremony the subjects are made members of Christ, the children of God, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven. They alike employ sponsors, and use the sign of the cross.

X. Both perform a ceremony of confirmation; in which the bishop tells the young people (whatever be their moral character) that they were regenerated by the Holy Ghost at their baptism, and assures them of the favor of God.

XI. Both awfully pervert the sacrament of the Lord's supper. Priests administer it at an altar to kneeling, and often, ungodly communicants. One church calls it "transubstantiation;" the other, in the Homilies, "a marvellous incorporation."

XII. Both have displayed a cruel and persecuting spirit—anathematizing or excommunicating (to the loss of character, property and liberty,) those who do not rigidly conform. (See first twelve canons.) They have alike put thousands of dissentients to death.

XIII. Both are peculiarly sectarian, treating non-conformists with contempt; confining their central, infant and other schools, colleges and charities, to their own parties; and inculcating sectarianism with the utmost assiduity.

XIV. Both systems tend to make ministers haughty, avaricious and petulant—frequently produce strife between pastor and people—introduce idle and ungodly men—and protect their vices.

XV. Both churches, with unalterable creeds and minutely defined rubrics, with vows and solemn asseverations, tolerate every wild notion and heresy in existence and produce a body of hypocrites.

XVI. Both are upheld by the secular arm, fear, ignorance, avarice and corruption, by denouncing the loss of business, reputation, and even of salvation, on seceders; while profligates are seldom marked men.

XVII. Both treat all their conforming parishioners alike, whether good, bad or indifferent. The same words are addressed to all; the same ceremonies performed by all, there is "no difference between the unclean and the clean."

XVIII. Both have a great deal of form and ceremony in their worship—standing, sitting, kneeling, bowing, turning towards the altar, dresses, etc., all calculated to afford ignorant persons a ground of hope and confidence in their own performances.

XIX. Both attach extravagant and unchristian notions of sanctity to their places of worship—their clerical habits, titles, and ministerial performances; their character is indelibly sacred, their churches holy; their doings alone efficacious.

XX. Both enjoin the religious observance of numerous holy days every year, in commemoration of some of the most profligate and tyrannical beings that ever existed. The English hierarchy has appointed (independent of Sundays) ninety-five fast days and thirty-one days of feasting.

XXI. Both churches, either by unction, or words, or by both, professedly send all their people to heaven; bless God for taking the most impenitent wretch to himself; and commit his body to the dust, in sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life.

In a word, both systems are unscriptural, and have sadly failed to answer the end for which millions of money are annually expended, and for which the Son of God introduced his Gospel into the world.

It is a question of some difficulty, whether the church of England be really and truly entitled to the appellation of Protestant. That it is the least reformed of all Protestant churches, must be admitted.

Consequently, the sooner these hierarchies are reformed and assimilated to the model of the earliest churches, the better. Let every member of them put his shoulder to the wheel without hesitation or fear.

INFIDELITY.

The prevalence of infidelity in Christian countries since the revival of learning in Europe, and especially its rapid increase and wide extension within the last fifty years, has been just cause of grief to Christians of all denominations. But it is feared that few, comparatively, have had the sagacity to trace the evil to its source, the courage to look it in the face, and the stern honesty requisite to its successful resistance.

Deluded by absurd and preposterous, if not impious notions of human depravity, and the all but omnipotent energies of the devil, we have found a ready solution of all evil, physical and moral.—And when we have cited the writings of a few talented infidels as the active agents of the grand contriver of all mischief; we seem to suppose that we have accounted for every thing, while, in fact, we have not apprehended the fountain of this wide spread and desolating flood. We give ourselves infinite trouble in combatting fictitious or inadequate causes; but shut our eyes to the obvious abuses and corruptions of the word of life, the true source of the evil, and the solution of the whole mystery.

Who believes that a few such men as Condorcet, Bolingbroke and Paine, however talented or however learned, could have touched the integrity of the Christian church, had the principles and precepts of Christianity been taught with as much of simplicity and truth, as of zeal and ability? Such, however, has not been the case; and the declension of Christianity is to be ascribed to the corrupting and debasing influences of its friends, rather than to the hostile measures of its enemies.

The learning of Europe, during the darkest ages of the church, had been exclusively confined to the clergy, and by them devoted as exclusively to the interests of the church. Religion was the all-engrossing object of the learned world, and degraded by superstition and sophistification, the mere instrument of ambition and passion; it had lost its original simplicity and directness; and had been tortured to mean any thing and every thing rather than the plain teachings of its Author, and to subserve any and all purposes rather than the glory of God and happiness of man.

The Reformation brushed off some of the grosser abuses, but retained, almost unaltered, the absurdities of the Roman system. In the hands of the Reformers, Christianity exchanged the most open, impudent corruptions and frauds of Romanism for the more cautious and concealed, but equally effective deceptions of the Genevan school—open and shameless bargaining with iniquity; evasions, and metaphysical subterfuge. The sale of licenses to sin, on the responsibility of the Pope, was abolished; and in its stead, an irresponsible priesthood undertook to pledge the pardon and indemnity of Deity, on conditions equally derogating to his justice, and equally subversive of every principle of moral right. Within the pale of Calvinism, the sinner found a cheaper and more ample indemnity against the just rewards of guilt, past and future, than had been offered him by Romanism. Hypocrisy was a cheaper commodity than gold; and indemnity for all inanner of wickedness, past and future, for this life and for eternity, a better purchase than had been sold by the Pope. For his indulgences must be frequently renewed, at the cost of the purchaser, and at prices corresponding with the enormity of his offences and the weight of his purse.

I give facts as I find them, without impeaching the motives of the leading European Reformers, or denying to them any portion of credit which may, by the most charitable construction of their conduct, be awarded to them. The fault was rather that of the times than of the men.

Like the sun in a dense November cloud, Christianity had been shorn of its beams—had lost its simple, direct, searching and purifying energies amid the cold fogs of scholastic sophistry, and the pompous, but heart-chilling absurdities of the cloister. The will of God and the duty and destiny of men were sought for, not in the plain teachings of Divine truth, but in the debates, and votes of a convocation of priests. Reason and learning were prostrated at the footstool of superstition and bigotry, and religion had become an instrument of ambition—an engine of state policy and a tissue of absurdities and contradictions.

Deity was no longer the friend and father of his creatures; but a wrathful vindictive tyrant—an exact copy of the despotic rules of Europe at the time. Man was no longer the friend and brother of man—the humble follower of his Redeemer; but a tyrant or a slave. Ruling or being ruled with a rod of iron—inflicting or suffering strange cruelties, tortures and death, in the name of that meek and humble Redeemer; ascribing attributes to Deity, and principles to Christianity, suited to the prevailing constitutions of political society—unlimited despotism in the ruler, and unqualified submission in the subject—the harmonious action of the civil and religious subject—the harmonious action of the civil and religious rulers of the people in the work of human abasement. The successful dissemination of the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance, so essential to the permanent existence of their power, required that the divine right of kings, and the divine authority and superhuman power of the priests, should stand out in bold relief. Nor was it less important to clothe Deity with attributes and passions corresponding with their own high pretensions; and to impress upon the multitude a due sense of their utter hopeless debasement, the total, inherent depravity of their natures, from which no relief could reach them but through the intervention of the priest and by an abject prostration of the mind to its power and will.

If this state of things were hardly excusable during the long intellectual night which followed the subversion of the Roman Empire, and the tardy approaches of a brighter day, the lingering twilight of the 15th and 16th centuries, what shall we say to those who, amidst the whole blaze of intellect and science, attempt to shroud the religion of the Gospel in gloom and darkness! Who shut up the kingdom of heaven against their brethren, and open to them only the gates of darkness and horror! If the facts thus briefly alluded to, have been the nurseries of infidelity in former ages and under the most arbitrary and despotic rule;—when the very thoughts of men were bound down with fetters of iron and chains of brass;—when discussion was death and inquiry a crime, what are we to expect from an adherence to them in the nineteenth century? What is to result from present efforts to stifle inquiry and to stop all progress in religious knowledge; to chain down the mind to the unmeaning dogmas and impracticable theories, of half enlightened visionaries, alike revolting to common sense and derogatory to the character and dignity of God and man! To seal up the Christian religion against the kindly influence of that divine light which is pouring like a flood over other departments of science and knowledge—cheering, expanding and exalting the mind,—teaching it to walk fearlessly over ancient fields of speculation, however hedged in and sanctified by great names and long cherished prejudices, and to explore new regions of thought, and new sources of knowledge, without stopping to search for the footsteps of earlier and less fearless adventurers? Thus furnishing new means and new excitements to higher and yet higher intellectual acquirements and enjoyments?—Let infidel France answer the inquiry. Let Spain, driven by her priests into every extreme of treachery, of cruelty, slaughter and blood—let Spanish America, that great arena of pious gladiators, answer.

Nor is our own peaceful and happy country without its instructive teachings upon this subject. Where is Christianity rejected but amidst the most glaring perversions of the word of life!—Where does skepticism prevail but amid the hotbeds of popular divinity? Liberal Christianity has saved Germany. May it save us and our children, as well from the heartless and soul-chilling influences of modern Orthodoxy, as from the withering and blasting touch of skepticism.

Here then we look with confidence for the preventive as well as the remedy. Teach man the dignity of his nature and the grandeur of his destiny. Teach him to search the law of God in the light of reason to observe and obey it as the fountain of his own happiness. Teach him to worship his Maker as a father and a friend—to serve him by doing good to his creatures, and to follow Christ as a sure guide and a faithful Saviour.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1836.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

It is matter of congratulation that as the establishment of a theological seminary has become the subject of public discussion among Universalists, it should be opposed by one capable of conceiving every reason, and of using every argument in support and defence of his opinions. Such a man is Br. A. B. Grosh.

Far be it from us, to charge the opposers of a theological seminary, with being "lovers of ignorance"—they have a right to their views, and should, and no doubt will receive every token of respect, as well as their arguments every attention, from the friends of such an institution. But we must be permitted to give it as our opinion, that until we have a theological seminary, the denomination will be deficient in biblical learning and theological knowledge.

Mr. Grosh says—"The immediate object to be attained by establishing a theological seminary, is, an increase of facilities for the acquisition of theological knowledge by candidates for the ministry." And that "the ultimate object, is, or should be, the instruction of the GREATEST POSSIBLE NUMBER of our fellow-beings in the doctrines and principles of Universalism—in other words, THE PROSPERITY OF OUR CAUSE." He is decidedly in favor of both these objects—but is opposed to the means proposed for their attainment. Nay—he thinks that they "will much retard, if not wholly prevent, the ultimate and most desirable object."

His reasons are—

1. "The probable abuses arising out of a theological seminary."

The abuses to which anything may be perverted, is no argument against its use. Are our republican and American institutions to be abandoned, because France in the phrenzy of its revolutionary career, and from the want of intelligence in its population, was incapable of appreciating them? Or is Christianity to be rejected, because its doctrines have been misunderstood, and its moral maxims disobeyed? None can pretend this. And although as times have been, theological seminaries have been the instruments of great abuses, it by no means follows that such is their necessary, or even their probable tendency.

Again, we are told—"we are but men, and Partialists are no less than men—yet they have abused such seminaries most grievously, and what evidence have we that Universalists will not do the same? The simple profession of Universalism? Let us see. Did Universalism prevent the Anabaptists of Germany (Bucer, Buckholst and others) from practicing polygamy?" etc.

It should not be forgotten, that the Anabaptists of Germany, to whom allusion is here made, lived in a different age, and under a different state of things—and that they have long since become a moral and an unoffending people. Besides, taking the whole catalogue of enumerated enormities at present, they only prove that they exist—but furnish no evidence that divisions will be multiplied, hostility rendered more inveterate, or fanaticism become more mystical in consequence of the establishment of a theological seminary.

2. It is said, "that a theological seminary, will lead to the establishment of arbitrary, literary, scientific and theological tests."

If this means only that persons about to enter the ministry, shall be required to possess a certain amount of literary and theological knowledge, there can be nothing very exceptionable in such tests. Can there exist in a mind so well informed as that of Br. G. any reason why a minister should not be required to understand something of his profession, as well as a physician, cabinet-maker or printer? Neither of these would he employ without some test by which he could ascertain their ability.

3. Mr. G. says—"To accommodate our measures to the views of those whom we most hope to convert, is laudable and proper, when we can do it without sacrificing principle, or a greater good. But the greatest number of those whom we can most reasonably hope to convert to our cause, are strongly opposed to theological seminaries—while those in favor of such institutions are the least likely to be converted to our faith. If I can establish this point, I prove that a Universalist theological seminary will defeat the main object for which it is established."

Those opposed to theological seminaries, are—"a large majority of those connected with no denomination. The Arian and Freewill Baptists generally—the Baptists in the West—the German Baptists or Tunkers, Omish, Friends, etc. Also the most liberal portion of the popular denominations supporting such seminaries; for they are tired of the beggaries and disgusted with the drones and practices attendant on such institutions. And lastly the great portion of community, which by disgust at the practices and doctrines of our opposers, have been driven into skepticism," etc.

And why not add the Mormons, Br. G.? The reason why all these sects are opposed to theological seminaries, is nearly the same—they maintain that they are moved by the spirit, to believe and to do all necessary things. But this is a very different reason from any that is or will be urged by a well informed Universalist. Besides the fanaticism of most of these sects, is sufficient to exclude them alike from any claims of our imitation, and from all hope of speedy conversion.

The most liberal portion of the popular denominations, are so few in number, that they may very well be excused for not controlling our affairs. But it remains to be proved, that even a majority of this class are opposed to theological seminaries.

Neither is it certain, that "a large majority of all those connected with no denomination"—are absolutely opposed to a theological seminary. Most of them are too indifferent to the subject to give it any attention; some are as confirmed bigots as any others, while none of them can be considered more hopeful subjects of conversion than almost any other class of community. Of skeptics, nothing more need be here said, than that they are no more opposed to a theological seminary, than to nearly every thing which relates to Christianity.

But it is difficult to suppress our surprise that Br. G. should feel some solicitude, lest by building a theological seminary we should lose "the friendship, good will and warm wishes" of all these "classes, for our prosperity! Really, my brother, you and I have had too many specimens of the nature of these warm wishes, to feel very delicate on the subject. And if building a seminary of any kind would tend to cool them, we should by all means unite in the work.

The truth is, the Christian sects included in this catalogue, neither have, nor profess to have any desire for our prosperity. Nor have non-professors and unbelievers any very good wishes for our welfare, beyond that of using us as instruments to crush some other and more obnoxious sects.

The sects named, as probably favoring a theological seminary, though by far the most respectable in the catalogue, I leave to fight their own theological battles with their kindred. Neither class will ever aid us in anything useful, unless overruled by the Almighty. And this fact leaves us where we ought to be—to build, or not to build, as we think proper. Nor is it any loss that we do not embody a greater number of mystics and enthusiasts. Let them by all means remain where they are, till their feelings and professions are better regulated under the reforming influences of enlightened reason, intelligible views of Christianity and practical common sense.

4. Under this head we are told—"not only do we drive from us, the many that are drawing nigh—but we may drive many out from among our midst, by establishing such a seminary. Whole Associations if not Conventions, can be named, which will not remain in a denomination holding such an institution; and will oppose the denomination in all measures relating to it," etc.

That there are those who are violent and absurd enough to take the course above named is not impossible. But when they avow such intentions for the purpose of overawing the denomination, they are certainly mistaken. It is saying—"Brethren, if you will permit us to have things in our own way, we are the very best of friends—if not, you shall feel our displeasure."

If such is the spirit of some part of the Universalist family, the sooner they leave the paternal roof, the better. As one of that family, I shall ever be ruled by, and aid with all affection, the majority in its endeavors to advance the truth. Nor have I any fears that my worthy and much esteemed friend Grosh will abandon the denomination, even if it should build a theological seminary.

5. It is further said—"Nor will the division end here. The measure contains in its very operations, the seeds of disunion. The professor (or professors) of theology, will have his peculiar opinions on those doctrinal subjects which are sufficient to divide Universalism into as many separate systems, as Paulism is now divided into," etc.

This is merely conjecture—and is shown to be incorrect, by the very admission of existing divisions; every one of which have been already rather prominently developed. And whether only one or two professors in a single institution are more likely to sow discord, than some fifty or a hundred preachers, with whom candidates are now in the practice of studying, can scarcely admit of a question. The chances for greater unanimity with a seminary are multiplied in the ratio of the diminished number of teachers.

6. It is said—"The expense of a theological seminary over a simpler and more republican plan (of which, more anon) possessing ten-fold its advantages, without its evils, is another objection to it among Universalists."

There is no doubt that the cost, is the most serious obstacle to the speedy erection of such an institution—and is certainly that which will weigh most in the minds of many. But even this difficulty may be overcome—and probably will be, by the very means which are intended to prevent it. Men are sometimes liberal from the mere fact that others choose to doubt both their means and their generosity. But in this case, none can entertain a doubt of the ability. Universalists are able to accomplish any thing which requires only wealth.

But a case is offered—"If Universalists in the Empire State (nearly one-fourth of the whole denomination) are unable to pay for the Clinton Liberal Institute," etc. They are not unable—but they have never made an effort. Not a dozen persons ever made any sacrifices in its behalf—not twenty ever gave it a hundred dollars each—and not one preacher in every ten has yet shown the least solicitude for its prosperity. It is preposterous therefore to suppose that the denomination cannot endow that institution—they can if they will. One dollar from each Universalist in the Empire State, will make it rich enough. And surely they are not too poor to do ten times as much!

It is also said—"None but the wealthy can lose three years time, and pay boarding, clothing and tuition to the amount of at least three hundred dollars, beside, while enjoying its facilities." Out of about fifty preachers, with whose early circumstances I am acquainted, not one would, and could have done this. Under such circumstances, at least ninety out of every hundred that would now enter the ministry, must be excluded; or hordes of beggars must overrun our denomination, and our temples get up holy fairs, etc.

It is admitted that the rich would enjoy some advantages over the poor, even in respect to a theological seminary. But it is denied, that their advantages would be greater, or even as great, as they now are with reference to the ministry. For such an institution would enable the industrious and prudent candidate for the ministry to qualify himself for the work—not by overrunning the denomination with beggary, but by his own honest exertions. And a year or two more or less thus employed, would be of no consequence in comparison with the almost utter destitution of nearly every species of knowledge, with which they might, and probably otherwise would commence their ministrations.

Again—"But this is not all. The money to found such an institution is to be collected from the laity—For what? To educate those candidates for the ministry who are wealthy enough to afford this loss of time and money. Cannot those collections be so applied as to benefit all—laity and clergy—the poor candidate for the ministry as well as the rich? Certainly it can," etc.

The meaning of all this, is probably explained in the late resolutions of the Black River Association. But we are yet to learn how even the rich can obtain a correct theological education in our denomination, until the means are provided. We have before seen that the benefits of a theological seminary might be attained by the poor. A great majority of the students in the literary institutions of our country are poor. Does any Br. wish there were no such institutions, because the laity generally build them—and the rich derive benefit from them? The laity thought and acted with a view to public good in erecting literary institutions—and when the laity of our denomination recollect how necessary it is that their preachers should be better informed, they will build and endow a theological seminary.

7. Br. G. says—"I cannot admit that such great necessity exists for a material change in educating and fellowshipping preachers, as is supposed by some—not that the benefits of a very learned and theologically educated ministry, are even equal to those of a practical self-educated ministry in the present state of our denomination."

Remove the defects of the present well-operating measures; but do not abolish them for new schemes, which have always been injurious in the hands of others."

Remove the defects of the present system—that is what we wish, and are proposing the only way to do it. But when we are told to leave these in the hands of our opposers, we are reminded of the way in which parents sometimes encourage their children to work—by giving them the best tools. For it is notorious that with our means, few other sects would accomplish any thing of consequence.

But the most extraordinary thing of all, is, that we do not much need a commentary, because "standard Partialist commentaries" are growing abundant and cheap! Why—I should as soon think that bread was no longer necessary, because brimstone was plenty and low-priced!

8. In conclusion, it is said—"Let the advocates of a theological seminary build and sustain one, if they will have it and are able to do so. Let the opponents oppose it, and persuade its friends to abandon it, if they can—or support any measure in opposition which they may devise. But let not the denomination, as a denomination, take sides with or against either party."

This is a most singular way of preventing division—by recommending division, and subjecting one party to all the opposition, and any "measure of opposition" which the other may devise. Rather let us have an understanding of the matter in debate—let us bring our reason and not our feelings to the discussion of its merits—and then let the denomination act. Let the majority decide and the minority acquiesce. Then "shall there be peace and trust in our days."

If the preceding remarks in reply to the article of Br. Grosh, are, as they are believed to be, well-founded; then the best means of securing the ultimate or most desirable object—"the prosperity of our cause," is by the establishment of a theological seminary. For it seems impossible to doubt, that the best "facilities for the acquisition of theological knowledge," are to be found in such an institution.

It is not always certain that strength and prosperity depend on mere numbers. Who that loves Universalism, would not feel that the denomination had gained more—even prospectively, by the conversion and co-operation of the Unitarians of Massachusetts alone, than by that of all the Tunkers, Freewill Baptists, Omish, Mormons, et id omne genus of mystics and enthusiasts in America? And the same is true—and every one feels it to be true, of other sects that might be named and contrasted.

But we need scarcely ask—what measure of acquisition is requisite to bear upon the one or the other of these respective classes. The one requires zeal and fanaticism in its preachers—the other, a literary and theologically educated ministry. And as a body, the latter will never turn from their preference; nor listen with composure and respect to our opinions and arguments, until they come recommended by the attainments which they deem necessary. Hence, the best influence which we can hope to exert, and thereby soonest reach the whole public mind, is that which will most effectually influence those who control public opinion. And if, as is admitted, it is "proper to accommodate our measures" to the views of others, "when we can do it without sacrificing principle, or a greater good"—then it is clear, that the greater good will be secured to the denomination—our prosperity more effectually and immediately attained, by the establishment of a theological seminary. S. R. SMITH.

A WORTHY CASE FOR THE CHARITABLE.

The subject of this notice is a young lady of amiable life and character, whose name has long been familiar to many, probably most of our readers; and who for a number of years contributed frequently to the columns of this paper, both in poetry and prose, over the several signatures of "Laura," "Laura E," and "Laura Eggleston," of "Smithville, Chenango county, N. Y.," the last of which is her proper name. She has always had very feeble health. Her mother has for a number of years been a poor widow with a number of children besides Laura dependent on her for support. She has lately married a gentleman in German, Chenango county, who is in quite moderate circumstances, with a number of children of his own to support, and does not feel able to support Miss Laura, from whom we have just received a letter, dated German, July 29, informing us that she is "very sick, without a home and among strangers," where she has been "wholly confined to her bed for three months," and has "actually suffered for many articles necessary in sickness." We have stated her case publicly for the purpose of saying to those who have an abundance of this world's goods, that any portion they may feel willing to part with for a charitable purpose, will, we feel assured, be worthily bestowed and most thankfully received, if given to the subject of this notice. Donations can be sent directed to her address at German, or handed in to this office, or paid over to almost any of our preachers who, we doubt not, will willingly take it on them to see the same duly forwarded. RECALL OF APPOINTMENTS.

It is with very great reluctance and regret that I am compelled to give up my contemplated attendance at the Genesee and Chautauque Associations. But a return of the fever last Sunday has admonished me that I must stay at home and take care of myself. Besides, though able to attend to business in my study, yet I do not believe I could now well endure the fatigue of travel, until after at least a few days more recruiting.

There is, as it were, sometimes a strange kind of fatality attending certain projects. This is the fourth time that I have been obliged to give up a long meditated and firmly purposed visit to Buffalo and the regions round about. The first time, the cholera—the second time, illness in my family—the third time, a change in the meetings of the Associations; and now my own feebleness, were the causes of hindrance. What will hinder me the next time I purpose to visit the Queen of the Lakes, time only can disclose. But so unwilling am I to believe that I am not to visit that city, that if life be spared, I shall certainly again purpose paying it a visit. A. B. G.

I should have stated in the paper before our last, that the Western Union Seminary is located at Philomath, Ind.

Also—that persons wishing to subscribe for the Philomath Encyclopedia, or to address its Editor, (the General Agent for the Seminary,) should direct their letters to Abington, Wayne county, Ind.—the postoffice most convenient to Philomath. A. B. G.

The annual examination of the schools of the Clinton Liberal Institute, will take place on Tuesday and Wednesday, 30th and 31st days of August, inst. The exercises each day will be closed with a public exhibition.

Friends and patrons of the Institute are respectfully requested to attend.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst. by Br. D. R. BIDDLECOM at North Bloomfield—Br. STAS at Peninsular Point—Br. HICKS at Newville—Br. C. S. BROWN at Sylvan Springs—Br. J. FOSTER at Brewerton—Br. S. R. SMITH or J. WHITNEY at Russia—Br. M. B. SMITH at Lebanon—Br. WOOLLEY at Burlington Flats—Br. M. L. WISNER at North Bloomfield, and lecture at 5, P. M. in the vicinity as brethren may appoint.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst. by Br. T. C. EATON at Madison—Br. C. S. BROWN at Harford—Br. WHITNEY at Paines Hollow, A. M., and at Newville, P. M., as friends may appoint—Br. STAS at South Champion, and at Pinckney at 5, P. M.—Br. HICKS in the schoolhouse on Twelve Thousand—Br. C. B. BROWN at the red schoolhouse, Hastings.

Br. S. R. SMITH recalls his appointment at Madison the first Sunday in September—and will preach on that day at Oneida village.

GENESEE ASSOCIATION.—The committee of arrangements will be at the Universalist meeting-house in Buffalo city, on Tuesday evening next, from 4 to 9 P. M., for the purpose of providing ministering brethren, delegates, etc., who may attend with places of accommodation.

The annual Conference of the first Universalist church, in Oswego county, will be held at Jennings's Corners, Palermo, on the third Sunday inst. It is expected Br. Jones will be present.

BLEST ARE THE DEAD.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

Blest are the dead—the sickening strife
Which marks earth's closing scene, is o'er;
The cares, the ills, the griefs of life
Can rack their bleeding hearts no more.
The clouds which dim our Summer sky,
Are shadowless, as rays of light
When darkness seals the heavy eye,
And wraps the dreary scene in night.

Blest are the dead—the flowers which bend
Like gentle mourners o'er their graves,
And heaven's own choicest glories blend
Fresh to the heart their memory saves.
They speak as do the Summer birds,
Of beauteous life from dim decay
And breathe those sweet mysterious words
Which fright the weeper's tears away.

Blest are the dead—eternity
Showers down its choicest gifts to them,
They sit beneath life's golden tree,
They wear its starry diadem,
Their light, their life is in the smile
Of Him whose love looks down on all,
They fear no change in that far isle
No taint of sin, no funeral pall.

Blest are the dead—more blest than hope
In wildest soarings ever dreamed,
When heaven's eternal portals ope
Upon them, from the dust redeemed.
Blest are the dead—blest are the dead—
And blest are we to whom 'tis given
To seek the same deep, quiet bed,
And wake from death's dark sleep in heaven,
Tosanda, Pa.

ELOCUTION.

The substance of an address delivered before a class of young gentlemen in the Clinton Liberal Institute at the close of a course of instruction in Elocution

BY PROFESSOR S. N. SWEET.

[Concluded from our last.]

Were this the case, good readers and speakers would be as common as they are now rare among us. Then would the young gentlemen and ladies of the United States, give a practical exemplification that they "are of the same species of beings as Cicero." Their voices, being highly cultivated, in the school of elocution, would deepen to chords of grandeur or be softened to cadences which would almost "suspend an angel's harmony to listen." Sweet is the music in the notes of the birds; and, perhaps, sweeter still is the music of the piano and other instruments. But the best music, to which I ever listened, is the music of the human voice, especially when it issued from female lips.

Who that has heard Mrs. Wood is not ready to exclaim that her voice —"Comes o'er the ear like the sweet South

Which breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odor."

In elocution as in music the vowel sounds should, whenever the sense or sentiment requires it, be prolonged. This is called quantity, upon which, although it is one of the most important uses of the voice, and, next to a correct and elegant articulation, and primary beauty of reading and speaking, I will not now dwell. In the course of my lectures, you have had audible illustrations of it, as also of the orotund—a quality of voice, or rather an assemblage of qualities which constitute the highest character of voice to which we can aspire. Its spirit-stirring notes are irresistible. It is to the ear what proper and animated gestures are to the eye. Those who have this power of voice, can communicate their thoughts and feelings appropriately and impressively before large assemblies and in the social circle. In its perfection, it is so completely under the command of the will, that it resembles "sometimes the thunder and sometimes the music of the spheres." In short, it is as much superior to the natural voice as the sun outshines the stars. It falls with such distinctness upon the ear, that its notes may be heard by at least forty thousand people.

Let it not be supposed that I think art is every thing in elocution and nature nothing. None to whom nature has not given original and powerful minds, are destined to excel in the higher walks of oratory. She must lay the foundation, broad and deep, on which for art to build the superstructure. But whatever may be the natural talent, oratorical pre-eminence is unattainable, without laborious and successful efforts to improve upon it. No professor of elocution can describe, in so many words, what is the mysterious power in which true and genuine eloquence consists. He can only say that "it comes, if it comes at all, like the outbursting of a fountain from the earth."

Would you read or speak well, follow nature. She instructs us to enter into the spirit of what we read or utter, and to have the voice and countenance, without a moment's reflection at the time, spontaneously, "conform to sentiment." "Certain sounds" says Lord Kames, "are by nature allotted to each passion for expressing it externally." To read the narrative of the blind man and St. Paul's description of the resurrection; to speak of the turning of a top and of the bright orbs which circle their way in yonder heavens; to tell a story and attempt to pour forth in the same intonations, elocution, quantity, and inflections of voice, is as absurd as it would be to sing, were it practicable, all sentiments under heaven, in Mear or Old Hundred. Such a mockery of nature and gross departure from the principles of elocution, would offend even David Crockett, were he living, "to the very soul." Had he heard, for instance, Milton's apostrophe to light, and the meeting of satan, sin and death, on the oblivious pool, or Woolsey's farewell to greatness, and King Henry's speech at Harfleur, read or recited in the same monotonous manner, he would, I presume, notwithstanding he thought "learning to be pretty much a thing of nothing" have been more "skirt" than when he "sawed a great eternal big caravan of wild varnents." * * * *

—"the resistless eloquence of wo,"

But seriously, I deem it proper to remark, that the cold, sing-song and bungling manner, in which many preachers and professors of religion have presented that solemn and surpassingly important subject to the world, is owing to their ignorance of elocution and their want of those feelings with which the Gospel inspires all who believe and practice its precepts. Religion would suffer less in this way, if its promulgators had humility enough, to learn wisdom from the folly, if you please, of the practitioners of the histrionic art.

Clairon, the great French tragic actress, when complimented for playing her part well, exclaimed, "had I not felt like Dido, I could not have thus personified her." The reason the church is less crowded than the theatre, is because the preacher delivers "truth as if it were falsehood, and the actor falsehood as if it were truth."

A speaker should, like Garrick, "go out of himself," and think of nothing but his subject. He ought to be so familiar with elocution, as to display its graces without any effort. So surely as an individual thinks of his elocution or grammar at the time he is speaking, just so sure will he fail of producing any other effect upon his hearers, than to convince them that he takes little or no other interest in the subject matters of his discourse. As a bird, when taken from the illimitable fields of nature, and deprived of the air and foliage of the forest, loses the brilliancy of its plumage; so the slightest appearance of being governed by rules, withers all eloquence.

But I need not thus speak to you. The recitations which you have been giving with me, from some of the best ancient and modern authors, instead of producing formality, cannot otherwise than, give you freedom from constraint. Hudibras says,

"That all a rhetorician's rules, Teach only how to name his tools;"

but there are in elocution, certain general rules, a knowledge of which will enable us to use these tools with dexterity and energy. A writer of distinguished abilities very justly defines education to consist "in learning what makes a man useful, respectable and happy in the line for which he is destined." Whatever may be the line for which you are destined, gentlemen of the class, let your minds embrace a wider range than the limited pursuits of any profession. Endeavor or rather aspire "To make your own the mind of other men,

The enlightener of nations."

Obtain all the knowledge you can of history, poetry, philosophy and the science of government. Learn, in the Olympic games of politics and law, to grapple in successful controversy, with men of powerful minds. Explore the depths of the writings of the "Swan of Avon," and, in those characters which Shakespeare alone could have sketched, "behold your own image." See there, "in apprehension, how like a God" is man! See, too, how frail we are, and how precarious is the tenure by which we hold this fleeting and feverish existence. Who can tell when he awakes to the splendors of a Summer's dawning, how soon the brightness of the sky may be overclouded. When we "sleep in dull cold marble," our hearts which now sympathize with those around us, will no longer beat, even with wishes, for our country's good. But while we do live, let us do all that in our day and generation may be done, for the promotion of man's happiness in his home on earth, and at his home in heaven.

Upon us devolves the responsibility of perpetuating the existence of our representative republic, that it may be inherited by posterity, while it "rejoices the departed souls of its founders." Being convinced that a citizen may buckle on the armor of patriotism, during life to no purpose, if he cannot express, at least intelligibly, his conclusions; let us cultivate the noble science and art of elocution. Be it ours to aid its friends in placing it upon that elevated ground in the United States, which it occupied in Greece and Rome, during the flourishing ages of those bright republics. Discarding the absurd doctrine of nullification, let us cherish the ennobling principles contained in Mr. Webster's speech of 1830, in reply to Mr. Wayne, and in General Jackson's proclamation of 1832, and exclaim until our tongues are mute,

"By our altars pure and free,
By our law's deep rooted tree,
By the past dread memory,
By our Washington;
By our common parent tongue,
By our hopes, bright, buoyant, young,
By the tie of country strong
We will still be one."

DEATHS.

At Waddington, N. Y., on the 7th June last, Mr. JOHN CHADWICK, clothier, a native of England, aged 57. He emigrated to this country a number of years since. He has left no relations in this neighborhood, but many friends to lament his loss; for he was a friend to the friendless, a reliever of the distressed, and an honest man. B. B.

In Watertown, Jefferson county, on the 23d of July, after a lingering and painful illness, which was borne with Christian fortitude and patience, Mrs. SUSAN WAKEFIELD, companion of Mr. Joseph Wakefield, in the 49th year of her age.

Sister W. died in the communion of the Universalist church, of which she had been a member for the last seven years. She was an exemplary Christian, a dutiful wife, an affectionate mother, an ornament to the church to which she belonged, and died in the full expectation of meeting all the "ransomed of the Lord" in immortal peace and joy. A bereaved family and many relatives are left to mourn her departure. At her funeral the unfailing consolations of the Gospel were communicated through the instrumentality of P. M.

N. B. Editors in Vermont will please copy this notice.

In Upper Lisle, Broome county, N. Y., June 30, Mrs. LAURA HINMAN, aged 53. In the death of Mrs. H., community has lost one of its best members, and the Universalist church in this place a long tried and faithful friend. It is but a few years since Mrs. H. buried a husband and three of her children. About nine months before her death she suffered the most excruciating pain with one of the most distressing complaints that human nature is heir to—a rose cancer, under the left arm. For about four months previous to her death, it might be said, she had not the least possible chance for recovery to health. Under these circumstances I was led to see the consolations of that faith, which enables the believer to contemplate that all mankind shall eventually be subdued to the dominion of that grace which shall reign triumphant in every heart; for she was often heard to say, that if it was not for her faith and confidence in God, she could not have lived under her trials. It was truly affecting to see her bid farewell to her many friends when they called to see her, for the last time on earth; and still more affecting to hear her only daughter, who has been out of health for some time, with a heart overflowing with grief, declare, "O mother, I wish I could go with you."

The funeral was attended by the writer on the 31st, and the consolations of divine truth offered to the afflicted mourners from Job xix: 25-27. C. B. BROWN.

Will our other Editors notice this death for the benefit of distant friends?

THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. S. R. SMITH.

"The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul."

Psalms xix: 7.

The law here alluded to, is doubtless that which was given to the people of Israel on their way to the land of promise. But it will only be used in the present instance as a generic term—denoting all those regulations which obtain in the physical, animal and moral kingdoms, and to which men commonly affix the expressive term—laws.

In following out the bearings of our respective positions, we shall make no pretensions to originality; but shall avail ourselves of any aid furnished by the talents and labors of others, without reference to their language—and leaving the reader to appropriate the credit to the proper authors.—Different authors have been read with much pleasure and profit, who may perhaps furnish ideas and terms which are not remembered.

Were we to see a machine in constant and uniform operation—subject to certain ascertained laws, we should never doubt for a moment, that it had a maker. And we should estimate the wisdom of the inventor, by the observable fitness of the mechanism for the production of a given result. The more complicated the operation—the more numerous the ends answered, the greater would be our admiration of the talents which devised, and the skill that executed the work.

Hence the invention of the cotton mill, raised at once the humble and illiterate Arkwright from poverty and obscurity, and conferred upon his memory the most enduring fame. So with our own Fulton. The application of steam to the purposes of navigation, has immortalized an American mechanic. And the beholder of the cotton machinery, or of the astonishing engine that propels the ponderous vessel up the mighty and rapid rivers of the West, is overwhelmed with admiration of the inventive genius that devised the one and the other; and he is spontaneously carried back to the mind which contrived—to the man who executed. He never doubts—nor can, with all his ingenuity, or sophistry of others, ever bring himself to doubt, that both were invented by reflecting minds, and put together and set in operation by skillful hands.

Now we assume—what will doubtless be conceded by all, that the system of suns and planets, is subject to the laws of motion—surprisingly complicated motion: and that the most superficial observer, perceives that the whole is productive of certain and invariable results. Indeed, we may come down from the consideration of these great moving bodies, to those which have a certain character of fixedness, and we shall still find motion—every thing in motion. And all this is indispensable to the observable results.

The earth travels around the sun, that we may have "Summer and Winter, seed-time and harvest"—revolving on its own axis, that we may have day and night—a time for labor and a season for rest. And more than all this—the amplitude and glories of the universe would never have been apprehended by man, had not the night drawn her curtain and displayed her millions of flaming gems to his astonished and enraptured sight.

Who would ever have known that this planet and its attendant moon were not the only fields on which the sun poured his rays, had it not been for night? Who could have so much as imagined the existence of comets—those swift messengers that flame their eccentric courses through the heavens, and then disappear for ages, were it never night? And it should not be forgotten, that night brings day to half the world. For it is difficult to conceive how the whole of our globe could ever have been enlightened by one sun, were it never night.

But the air and the ocean are also in motion. And if the laws by which each is governed, are neither as obvious nor as well ascertained—the fact is no less certain, nor are the consequences less important. Both are subject to laws, the operation of which is never suspended. The winds and the tides are ever busy; and though all their utilities may never be fully comprehended by us, still they are equally certain and invariable.

And have the operations of these laws which so effectually pervade our world, ever originated in your minds the idea of a lawgiver? Have you never perceived, that they are every one of them indications of design? And that their results evince foresight, wisdom and benevolence? Their operations are infinitely intricate in the planetary system; and yet complex as they are, they are not only uniform, but subject to the nicest mathematical precision. And are consequently perfectly well understood, in all their more important bearings and consequences.

But what are the indications of contrivance, or of mechanical skill in the most curious and useful production of human genius and wisdom, when compared with the mechanism of the solar system? What to be admired in the movements of the works of art, when contrasted with the operation of those eternal laws which sustain, and regulate, and govern the universe? And surely, if the view of the works of man, convinces us that there was both a mind to devise, and a hand to execute; the contemplation of works so grand—of mechanism so vast, so perfect—of results so uniform, and so beneficent, should satisfy us, that this world had a Maker whose wisdom is infinite and whose benevolence is inexhaustible.

Besides, we always judge of the moral feelings and character of an artist, by the good or evil purposes of his work. In the developments made by the suppression of the inquisition, a number of curious machines were exhibited, not one of which appeared to have been designed for any useful or benevolent purpose. One was adapted to draw a cord in such a manner as to cut the flesh to the bone, wherever it was applied—another to break, or dislocate the bones themselves. And the conclusion of the beholders was, that those who invented and those who used them were alike lost to the better feelings of our nature. And they judged right—for they were infernal machines, and exclusively adapted to diabolical purposes.

But in all the mechanism of the universe, nothing of the kind exists. The sun was rendered luminous, that it might give light and heat—the revolutions of the planets are adapted to secure the greatest amount of these blessings; and the winds and the tides to the purification of the atmosphere and waters, thereby fitting them for the uses and the preservation of vegetable and animal life. To say nothing then, of the direct bestowment of unnumbered and unappreciated blessings, which result from the operation of the same general laws, these alone are sufficient to convince us, that this world had a Maker—that is, infinitely wise, and unchangeably good.

2. There are certain laws which relate to the vegetable and animal economy, as indicative of a designing mind, as any of which we can form an idea. And among the most obvious, as well as important, is the law of reproduction of the same species. By what possible process it is, that each plant and tree—each beast, bird, fish, insect—and even man himself, should be propagated through successive generations of the same specific character, and no other, it is impossible to conceive. Were this original constitution the result of accident—chance would long since have deranged its character. For one of the features of chance-work is, that it never continues to operate in the same way in successive instances. This is the ground of all reasoning on the subject; and hence, we most naturally as well as consistently call that accidental, or the work of chance, which deviates from the established order of things. And if such are the legitimate indications of chance—established order is the result only of design.

If design can possibly be argued from any general regulation, the argument will be greatly strengthened by the uniformity of its operation. Besides, both the excellency of the contrivance and the wisdom of the contriver are enhanced, in proportion to the protraction of the duration in which the law by which its movements are regulated continues to hold uninterrupted influence. In the case before us, the operation of the law of reproduction has been unchanged for some thousands of years: plants and animals are the same in all the essentials of their respective species, that they were at the creation. Time and its changes have made no changes here. It is a continued miracle; and one, of which familiarity with the fact alone prevents our perception. For whatever the link of connexion may be, between the seed and the plant—the embryo and the animal, it is unknown to us; and the uniform operations of the law only require to be observed, to be admired as the evidence of a wisdom which controlled and adapted the means to their prospective ends. The Being who exerted this wisdom we call God—the impress of whose mind and workmanship is thus traceable in the multiplied species of conscious and unconscious beings.

3. There is another law appertaining exclusively to animal nature; and which is universally applicable to every species, as far as we possess any means of information. It is the law of kindred. There is every where throughout the animal world, the peculiar feeling of parent on the one hand, and of offspring on the other. The former evincing the warmest and purest affection, by a train of efforts to provide for the wants, and to protect from injury, its tender charge—the latter conscious of its dependence, and looking for succor and safety to the authors of its being.

It may be asked, how all this happens? How, and why is it, that this universal law of kindred, should continue to operate for thousands of years—and among ten thousand times ten thousand species of living creatures, without variation? That it should be exerted with the same power, and with similar results, by the most ferocious and noxious, as by the most timid and harmless—by the most stupid and savage of all animals, as by civilized and reasoning man? Was it chance that warmed the heart of the tigress with as tender feelings for its offspring, as those which expand the bosom of the human parent? And if so—what a chance it was, that the natural enemy of almost every other living creature, should yet in one—and but one instance, feel as keenly the affection of a parent as the most tender mother among womankind?

The truth is—this law of animal nature, was both wisely and benevolently designed for the protection and preservation of the respective species of living beings. Most, if not all of them, would perish in the infancy of their existence, were it not for the very extraordinary provisions of the law of which we are now speaking. The human especially, would soon become extinct, where dependence on one hand, and the efforts of affection on the other, are much longer continued than in any other species.

The means fitted to an interesting end are so palpable in this case—so many and such beneficial purposes are answered, that if any thing in the universe can, they certainly do furnish plain and undoubted evidence of design. And not to admit that both the law itself, and its results were foreseen and designed, is to admit what is immensely more miraculous than any thing contended for by the professing Christian. For it is to admit that a great, a universal, and an indispensable system of benevolence, is in constant operation, without a cause—that the nicest adaptations are perpetually recurring with unvarying order and certainty, without the intervention or supervision of any being in the universe. Is it not vastly more marvellous, that all this should take place, without the superintendence of a directing mind, than that any thing claimed by the Christian Scriptures, should occur under its disposing dictation?

4. But this system of legislation, is not confined to the physical and merely animal—it extends over the intellectual and moral worlds. There are laws, which are as uniform in their operation, and as effectual in their influences, that exclusively attach to the moral and intellectual nature of man, as those which regulate the motions of the universe. And there are many of them—too many to be here enumerated and discussed; a very few will however suffice.

There is such a thing as sympathy—the feeling of which, if not the meaning of the term, is experienced and perfectly well understood by every adult human being. Its operation is evinced in the interest which we take in the "weal or woe"—happiness or misery of our fellow race. This, we call the law of sympathy.

Every one has felt the sudden and strange emotion, inspired by a visit to the house of mourning, or by the sight of suffering and distress. The ordinary interest which we take in the welfare of those around us, is almost instantaneously succeeded by a deep and anxious solicitude—a desire to do something if possible to mitigate the sorrows, and alleviate the sufferings before us. It is utterly impossible not to feel these influences on such occasions; though they may not be exerted with equal power, or produce equal effects on all minds. But the most giddy and thoughtless—the most indifferent and hardened—the most philosophic and stoical, all yield to the contagion of feeling, and enter undesignedly into the sorrows of others. The riot and merriment is in a moment suspended—the sober decency suited to the occasion spontaneously succeeds, and the heart unused to the feelings of grief, swells with sympathetic emotion.

On the other hand, the voice of merriment, the joy-beaming eye, and cheerful countenance awaken in us on all ordinary occasions a kindred feeling. The cheerful, social, friendly circle, proverbially operates like a charm upon the gloomy and low-spirited. It awakens the music of nature, whose melody vibrates upon the heart. And Saul was not more readily pacified by the harp of David, than the melancholy and sorrowing soul imbibes the congenial spirit of cheerfulness. Such are the never-failing workings of this law, that we do—and the injunction of the apostle only requires that it be done more effectually—"weep with those that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice."

And there are many—very many valuable purposes answered by the operations of the law of sympathy. It is not an empty and unmeaning thing, merely calculated to awaken strong emotion—to be forgotten; it is one of the links in the chain of humanity, which binds heart to heart and man to man. It mitigates the woes of the suffering, even by its simple expression, and we can probably all recollect scenes in which we ourselves have felt its power. And it prompts the performance of a thousand acts of kindness and generosity. How many eyes keep vigils over the sick—how many charities are bestowed upon the destitute poor, in consequence of the workings of human sympathy! How many eyes now sparkle with delight, that had been dim with tears—how many live in comfort and respectability, that had languished in wretchedness, or sank in crime—but for this blessed and blessing law of moral nature.

But whence was this law derived? And how came it to possess those very adaptations which render it so useful, so important? It is not enough to say—that the condition of human society produced it. It overleaps the boundaries of social existence, and loves to brood over the happiness or misery of every living thing. And it is equally vain, to urge, that it is the result of education. It exists in the bosoms of your little children—swells in the heart of the rude sons of nature, triumphs every where, and throughout all generations.—Education may give it a new impulse—or neutralize its power; but it no more originated the feeling, than it created the man. And we have the same reason for supposing that human society is a consequence of sympathy, that we have for believing that sympathy is the result of such society. The truth is, they were made for each other. And like the adaptation of the stomach to its appropriate food—they are still very different things, and could have no concern in each other's production. And if any fact can be proved by mere testimony—these things do prove, that the law of sympathy was designed, and adapted by a wise perception of its necessity and utility to the circumstances of man as a social, sensitive and moral being.

5. Another law of moral nature, is that which impels respect for virtue in others, and generally prompts to its practice in ourselves. We need not stop to inquire whether the world is more inclined to the practice of virtue, or vice. In either case it supposes the thing for which we contend—that there are certain moral feelings which attach to every human being. And the experience and observation of every one, sufficiently prove that even the vicious respect virtue—and that were it not for interference of some foreign cause, or principle, men would always do right. Indeed, it may very safely be assumed—that the perception of the difference, and the nature of the difference between right and wrong, is not more steady and universal, than respect for virtue and virtuous actions. And that the promptings of right feelings and views, are so ready and efficacious that we have a hundred instances of virtuous practice for one of vice.

Nor should this remark be restricted to a particular class of mankind, whose circumstances were peculiarly favorable to the development of moral feelings, and the cultivation of virtuous principles. Such a situation may, and doubtless will greatly augment the proportionate number of moral and virtuous actions: still it will be found true—that virtue greatly preponderates over vice, throughout the world.

It may not indeed at the moment, strike the mind that this is so—the many instances of crime will throng together in confused and tremendous array, and perhaps cast the shadow of a doubt over the statement. But when it is recollected, that virtues are in general, more quietly performed—that they attach a vast number of comparatively little things—that they are the indispensable appendages of every household, and mingle in all the intercourse between man and man, the number of places and circumstances in which good and right is surely done, will appear surprisingly multiplied. Besides, when the greater readiness with which mankind are prompted to do right, is taken into the account, we shall find additional reasons for believing that virtue is much more common than vice.

And that it is so, every one must perceive who attends to what passes in his own mind, or within the range of his observation. Children for instance, are proverbial for the frankness with which they speak the truth; and it is not until greatly perverted by the force of example, or the pernicious influence of a defective disciplinarian that they ever utter falsehood. And when we trace the operation of a moral rule so clearly, in the unsophisticated mind of childhood, we have all the evidence that can be needed, to prove that it is a law of universal moral nature.

But we go further, and maintain what has already been stated—that in the intercourse of society, in the business transactions between man and man—the great majority generally practice equity and mercy. Were it not so, our prisons would be entirely inadequate to hold the villains of the State. But as it is, they are happily quite sufficient. And the number of their inmates furnish us with very sufficient data whence to estimate the proportion of actual criminals, to the whole population. But this will by no means furnish a criterion by which to calculate the comparative amount of virtue and vice. For a single vicious act, might place an individual in durance, whose life had been spent in acts of integrity and obedience.

But it will be assumed perhaps, that justice and mercy are practiced, because they are indispensable to the good of society, and that it is the consideration of their utility which induces their performance. That they are indispensable to the well-being of society, is undoubted. But it remains to be proved, that their practice is founded on that consideration. Men—at least the majority of them, do not reason and refine so much upon the motives of action. They generally act, from the impulse of the objects and interests with which they are immediately concerned. When an accident befalls some one, and every by-stander urges his good offices, is it the result of a train of calculations on the social utility of the office of mercy? No man can suppose it. It is the spontaneous effort of native benevolence, called forth by the view of distress. There was no process of reasoning in the case, nor is there generally any such slow and cold calculations observed.

In the ordinary intercourse between man and man, it may well be questioned whether the perception of social security prompts the practice of common justice. Why—does a man pay his honest debts, merely because he is convinced that it is necessary for the public good? There may be such men, but who respects their honesty? Who confides in their pledges—who considers them men of principle? No—we are every day of our lives, talking and acting on the supposition that there is in men a native principle of virtue—a sense of mercy, truth and justice. Nor can we do otherwise and maintain that respect for others, which we claim for ourselves. For every man will take it as an insult to deny him a principle of honor and virtue. And this is as it should be—and shows, that system and prejudice apart, men feel the truth of what we argue—that by the law of their moral nature, they are disposed to respect and practice virtue.

And in view of all this we ask—who adapted this law to the condition and wants of man? If accident called it forth in the circles of polished life—how came it to find a dwelling among the most untutored sons of nature? Why does it warm the heart of the wrecked and tempest-beaten mariner with such force as to induce him to jeopardize his own life, for the comfort of a suffering comrade? If all this is the work of chance—then chance is not blind. She saw and provided for wants, while yet they were not. But chance could not do this, because she never wills nor designs. It was God, the great, the good, the all-providing God—who looking through all time, perceived the moral wants and dispensed the requisite moral principles to man.

6. There is in man a religious feeling—an irrepressible desire to worship and adore some Being greater than himself. This feeling operates uniformly and universally among mankind; and men of every age, country and condition, have observed certain ceremonies which they esteemed sacred, and addressed their devotions to a superior power. This devotionality, we call—the law of religious feeling.

It is indeed true, that the devotions of the human heart, have not always been directed to the proper object; nor accompanied with the most becoming rites, and moral practices. Almost every thing has been deified by the fertile imaginations of men, and almost every folly and every crime identified with what was called—the services of religion. No apology can be offered for the weakness that made gods of four-footed beasts and creeping things; nor for those unnatural rites, with which they were vainly served. But the invariable operation, as well as universal presence of the principle proves that from some cause, man is a religious—a devotional being.

Now the question is—how come he to be so? could this have been the result of accident—and if so, how did it happen to occur in the infancy of our race? How does it happen to continue with such undeviating regularity, and to exert the mighty influence which is so perceptible over every generation? And could all this have been done more effectually, or more uniformly, or more usefully, if it had been arranged by the wisdom of an all-disposing intelligence?

But possibly it may be urged, that the devotional feeling is the result of education. That superstition or craft first imposed the belief of a divinity, and have ever since maintained their empire by force or fraud. To this it may be answered—that if religion was not more congenial with our nature than infidelity, it could not have been sustained. France in the wantonness of revolutionary extravagance, banished the priests and demolished her temples, or converted them to other purposes than those of religion. But by so doing, she not only outraged the religious feelings of all mankind, but found it necessary to retrace her steps—to restore her priesthood, her altars, and her religion to their sanctuaries. Here, then, we have the practical illustration of the native feelings of the human heart. And the conclusion is, and must be that man is a religious being—that the devotions of his heart, are inspired by a law of his nature.

When once the religious feeling was implanted in human nature—what is it natural to suppose would be the result? Not surely, that it would be left, to waste itself in vain and abortive efforts to find satisfaction in the pollutions of a fanciful and degrading mythology. But rather, that the proper and legitimate object on which the religious feelings might rest—and which intelligent man might consistently adore, would be revealed. And it is as much in the order of events, that the devotions of the heart should be directed to their proper object, as that man should instruct his child in the choice and exclusive use of nourishing and wholesome food.

But this, we shall be told, supposes a revelation—and a revelation implies a miracle. Very well—and is not the world made up of miracles? What can be more miraculous than man—that he should possess the functions and capabilities that he does, and that to his wondrous physical organization should be superadded the mind and the sympathies, by which he is distinguished? We have been all along discoursing on a set of particular subjects, every one of which is miraculous. And but for our familiarity with them, we should esteem them as much so, as the act by which the Deity makes known the purposes of his moral government.

Another objection to a divine interposition, is, that it traverses, or violates the established laws of nature. But are we so conversant with those laws, as to determine with certainty, that it was no part of the original constitution of affairs to give a revelation or to raise the dead? It should be remembered, that because an event does not occur once in a century—or in twenty centuries, that it is not the less a part of the primeval law of the universe. This is demonstrated by the fact, that comets sometimes traverse the line of the earth's orbit—though some early astronomers might have considered it impossible—or at least miraculous, and, to impart a divine impulse—to inspire the prophets, or to raise the dead, can be no more wonderful, than that we exist.

And such revelation is necessary to the perfection of the system of things. All the laws of the merely physical universe, are perfect in their adaptation to their respective and obvious results—so are those which relate to the vegetable and animal economy. But the moral and intellectual system is complete, only, on the ground of a revelation. Without it, the religious feeling wanders over an infinity of objects, and like Noah's dove returns again to seek the being who sent it forth, without finding a place of rest. But with a revelation, it is at home—finds kindred in its Creator, and in him alone the centre on which its devotions rest as their undoubted object. Then, and not till then, is the mind satisfied with the object of its reverence, or with its appointed destiny.

Such a revelation was professedly given; and no man conversant with its avowed record, and acquainted with the evils and sorrows incident to human nature, can doubt for a moment, that it is well adapted to the condition of man. For he sought to know God—and his character is there revealed; he desired the knowledge of his duty—and it is there fully explained, and practically illustrated; he longed to be made acquainted with his final destiny—and behold, “life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel?”

Let the unbeliever then, devote the same amount of attention to the consideration of those laws, which appertain to the physical sentiment and moral universe, which he so manifestly does to the objections of speculative unbelievers, and there is good reason to suppose that he will “find a God employed, in all the good or ill that chequers life.” This he is not accustomed to do, and much as he complains of the illiberality of some Christians he is too often a bigot to his unbelief. And, it may be added—is too often an unbeliever because he is a bigot.

Not a few are confirmed in skepticism, from the narrow and selfish systems, supposed to be founded on revelation. But it is believed, that when the broad and generous benignity which is every where observable in the world around us, is carefully and candidly investigated—when the evidences of design are suitably weighed in the balance of judgment—when the laws of kindred, of sympathy, and of morals are duly considered—and when the religious feeling, so universal in man is allowed its proper place—no man can complain that the plan of the divine government is defective, or that the system of revealed truth can be unworthy of belief. To this conclusion, the plain and simple deductions of mind have carried mankind in all ages—to this conclusion, many and most of the men of profound research into the ample cabinet of nature have been led—and to this conclusion, the candid and truly liberal among unbelievers themselves, will be brought whenever they will read Nature as patiently as they do Gibbon—or the Bible as diligently as they now do Voltaire, or Bolingbroke.

And when this desirable result shall have been realized—when the doubts of skeptics—when the ridicule and hostility of unbelievers shall have ceased, and when the law of the Lord shall have reclaimed man from error, then shall be realized the comfort and the conversion of the soul.

This is the tendency of truth—the uniform tendency of all the laws physical and moral which bind, and control and sustain all things. And the era of closer research, and more general information respecting these will be the age of sound reason, of more pure and practical morality, and of holier and higher devotions to the giver “of every good and perfect gift.”

A SUPPOSITION CONSIDERED.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

It is often supposed that Universalism has no inducements to obedience, because it promises nothing beyond this life as a reward. This supposition cannot be well founded; for men have frequently been led to use the greatest exertions by nothing but temporal motives. The farmer labors and toils incessantly to remove the forest, to cultivate the soil, and to gather the harvest. Does he expect, for these hardships, a reward beyond the grave? Certainly not; his motives are of a temporal character, and he expects but a temporal reward. The mariner launches from his native shore, exposed to all the dangers of the mighty deep, when nothing but the acquisition of wealth and present happiness were brought into the account. He has never indulged the reflection, that his fortitude and perseverance are to be crowned with eternal felicity. The soldier, who foregoes all the enjoyments of domestic society and enters the field of battle, when death stares him in the face at almost every moment, has never thought of looking beyond this mortal state for the reward of his sufferings. The honors of the field, the happiness of his family, and the liberty of his country, are all that he can or does expect. If the farmer, then, can endure the scorching of the summer sun to obtain that food that perisheth with the using, shall we not labor for that spiritual food which gives us health and happiness of mind? If the mariner can quietly submit to the dangers of the ocean, to gain the riches of this world, shall we not perform that delightful service which brings to our enjoyment the true riches of Christ? If the soldier can face the cannon's mouth devoid of fear, to achieve the liberty of his kindred and his country, shall we shrink from the use of those means which are calculated to deliver us not only from the power of earthly monarchs, but from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God? Reader, think of these things.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND BIBLE CLASSES.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

It appears to me to be very desirable that Universalist societies should more generally establish Sunday schools and Bible classes. By these means a more correct knowledge of the Scriptures can be obtained; and in the same proportion the truths of the Gospel will be disseminated among mankind. In this way especially will the present generation prove a blessing to that which is to follow. Children, by belonging to a Sunday school, will become familiar with the language of the Bible; and in after life, will deduce from it, with greater facility, the sentiments it is intended to convey.

Sunday schools are best adapted to the young, but Bible classes may embrace old and young, that is, all who have arrived to years of discretion, for who is there that is too old or too wise to improve in knowledge? Both these means of acquiring religious instruction and biblical knowledge may be had in every society where stated preaching is sustained without any essential inconvenience. The intermission between the forenoon and afternoon services affords sufficient time for the exercises. If it be inconvenient to attend to both a Sunday school and Bible class, at the same time, let one precede the other. This will give to each half an hour at least, which is time enough to acquire many important and useful ideas. Besides, to prepare themselves for these exercises, the members will improve many half hours during the week, that otherwise might have been squandered in useless sport or idle talk. The advantages arising will be many and great. The minds of the youth will be furnished with a knowledge of the Scriptures which will serve as a bulwark to protect them from the enemies of truth and virtue. The knowledge they obtain will increase their reverence for the Deity—strengthen their resolutions to do whatever is right and finally add happiness to their lives, and comfort to the hour of death. And may not the old as well as the young be benefited? Certainly they may. And how much better to employ their time in acquiring useful knowledge, than to employ it as too many do—sleeping upon the benches, roving in the fields, or lounging about the tavern.

Nothing annoys an enemy more than kindness, it is an arrow that generally hits the mark.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXV. A FATHER'S SUNDAY EVENINGS WITH HIS FAMILY; OR FAMILIAR ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE GOSPELS. MATTHEW, CHAP. II.—You will observe that all the incidents related in this chapter are here recorded for the purpose of proving that the very circumstances which the Jews had been led to expect, from prophecy, to attend the early history of their expected King and Deliverer, did really happen to Jesus, who therefore, the writer argues, must be the Christ—the promised and expected King. In verse 4, you will see that the Christ is used as synonymous with the King of the Jews, as in verse 2. There was at this time a very general expectation of the promised Prince making his appearance at this time, and many impute the inquiry of these philosophers, or, men of learning, to this general expectation. Verse 3, you can easily conceive why a reigning king should feel disturbed by the announcement of the birth of a rival, if not to himself, yet, at least, to his family. Herod the Great, was now of considerable age himself, having reigned in Judea thirty-six years; but he was troubled at the prospect of his family being superceded on his throne. To secure his crown and the succession of royalty in his own family, he lays the plan of which you have the outline in the succeeding verses. Herod, you observe, showed a strange mixture of regard for the word of God, and contempt for it. He took for granted that the ancient prophecies would be fulfilled, and depended on this in guiding him to the birth-place of his intended victim; but inconsistently thought that his plan would defeat their further and final accomplishment. In verse 8, you have an instance of what has often happened since—the most hardened and determined wickedness concealing itself under a mask of piety and religion. An intending murderer pretending to worship! Between verse 6, and the passage referred to in the prophecy of Micah, there seems a discrepancy. To your brother R. I have given it as an exercise to point out the source of this seeming variance between the original prophecy and the sense in which the priests and scribes understood it. He says he has found the disagreement attempted to be solved in several ways by men of learning; but that he thinks the best way of reconciling the two passages is, to suppose that the Hebrew words in Micah ought to be read interrogatively, that is, as follows:—"And thou Bethlehem Ephratah, art thou little or the least among the thousands of Judah? No." No being the understood, though not expressed answer, is equivalent to saying that it is not the least. This I also think the right solution of this little difficulty and discrepancy. In verse 11, you observe they treated Jesus as it is the custom in Eastern countries generally to treat a king, prince, or illustrious person. No potentate in the East is to be approached without presents. You will find from the following passages in the Old Testament, that it was an ancient custom—Gen. xliii: 11, 25. 1 Sam. ix: 7, 8; and x: 27. 1 Kings x: 2. Psalm lxxii: 10. Prov. xviii: 16; and in several late travellers' accounts of the Eastern countries you will find that it is also a modern one. It has been retained as a custom to this day. After the Magi or men of learning had paid court to their future Prince, they returned to their own country, without complying with the commands or wishes of Herod to return to him when they had found the Christ, so that he might have an opportunity, also, of paying fitting homage to the future king of the Jews. The character of Herod, his circumstances and very probably his manner while in conversation with him had suggested to them, undoubtedly, the foul intent with which Herod was actuated in eliciting from them all the information he could obtain relative to him "who had been born king of the Jews." It was quite natural, therefore, for them, or for any other men in similar circumstances, to prefer the good will and patronage of the "rising sun" to that of him who had far declined to him in his wane. The historian who wrote this passage, there is every reason to suppose, knew neither these foreign men of letters, nor any more of their motives for not returning to Herod than does any one of the present times. Yet what historian of the present times would have recourse to the supposition of the interference of the Supreme by a dream, overlooking the very obvious motives to which I have made reference? Yet among the Jews of that and every preceding age, we find some writers who were so puerile, so semi-barbarous that to account for any little event out of the ordinary course of interposition of the Deity was considered necessary. Your brother can show you in Lightfoot's Horæ Hebraicæ, extracts from the writings of Jewish Rabbis which you will at once pronounce to be "very silly stories." Good writers, however, among both Jews and Romans of that age, held this practice as contrary to the dictates of good sense and the laws of good writing. Among the precepts of a writer of the age of Augustus occurs one forbidding this heretofore common practice: "Nes Deus intersit," etc. that is, let not a Deity be introduced without a proper and worthy occasion. While the obvious motives of their interests and welfare being much more likely to be promoted by the generally expected Oriental Prince, than by him whose throne was soon to be vacated, and whose power was soon to be at end, are at hand and quite sufficient to account for their neglect of the orders of Herod, no enlightened mind would even dream of calling in the direct interference of the Deity to account for the result. I have desired all of you to endeavor to ascertain if any similar mode of speaking—any other warning by God in dreams is spoken of in the New Testament; and none of you have found such phraseology in any other part of the New Testament, except in these first two chapters of Matthew. Nor can I find any. This characteristic of these two chapters might be urged by those who doubt or deny this authority and authenticity as another proof of the propriety of their skepticism. The same remarks I wish you to apply so far as they are applicable to the next verse, v. 13, in which you find mention made of an angel appearing to Joseph. His removal to ensure safety to the object of Herod's jealousy and hatred you can easily account for, I should presume, without alleging any miraculous or supernatural interposition. On verse 15, I have only to remark that whatever cogency this argument might have in the opinion of those to whom it was addressed, it appears to us to have very little now. The prophecy referred to as fulfilled by the sojourning of Jesus in his youth in the land of Egypt you find in Hosea xi: 1. To us the literal deliverance of Israel, and that only, seems to be meant in this passage. Dr. A. Clarke who would have been glad to have seen any applicability of the quoted passage to the purpose and object of the historian is unable to make it out. He says that as the deliverance was extraordinary "It is very likely that it passed into a proverb so that 'out of Egypt have I called my son' might have been used to express any signal deliverance. I confess, I can see no other reference it can have to the case in hand, unless we suppose, which is possible, that God might have referred to this future bringing up of his son Jesus out of Egypt, under the type of the past deliverance of Israel from the same land." To us this is not very satisfactory. "It is well known" says Doddridge "that, from the time of Julian at least, the enemies of Christianity have been cavilling at the application here made of a prophecy to Christ, which, in its original sense, seems to belong to the people of Israel. Learned men have labored with great solicitude to prove it literally applicable to Christ." A labor which not any of the many who have attempted the task have as yet succeeded in! The "enemies of Christianity" i. e. of Christianity misrepresented and rendered ridiculous by the narrow, illiberal views of its pretended friends, would in this case have nothing to object, if the sordid (the self-styled) friends of Christianity would admit that these first two chapters of Matthew are a special pleading in favor of Jesus being the Christ, and that the advocate made use of any argument, even such as might gain him one convert. And why should not this allowance be made, even on the supposition that the advocate was Matthew, though this seems not very satisfactorily made out? I for one can see nothing in this mode of arguing derogatory from the dignity of an advocate of Christianity taking into consideration the state of intelligence and sentiment among the Jews who were expected to read this argument; but I am very much inclined to suppose that these first two chapters are the production of a much less enlightened and enlarged mind than that which was concerned in the authorship of the rest of this book. Verses 17, 18, the direct applicability of the passage here quoted cannot be made out any more satisfactorily than of that upon which we have just been commenting—verse 16. "Tempora mutantur—the times are changed, praised be the wise promoter of the progress of his children towards perfection. In our days, and our country, hatred, jealousy and tyranny dare not show themselves in such horrid forms. Even in the monarchies of Europe the human race—the children of our Father are making progress. A comparison of the human mind en masse at the present time with what it was a few ages ago is an exhilarating thought. Verse 19. Egypt was at this time a province of the Roman Empire, throughout which, extensive as it was, were not all wanting roads and other means of internal communication. The news of Herod's death would in no long time reach the inhabitants of Egypt: the occasion therefore, for a supernatural interposition is not very evident. Verse 22. How frequent the occurrence of such phrases as "warned of God in a dream," etc., in this and the former chapter, and how surprising that such never occur in any other portion of the New Testament! Verse 23. It is difficult says Dr. A. Clarke, to ascertain by what prophets this was spoken. It is indeed difficult! Several commentators have agreed with Chrysostom in the opinion that the passage referred to has been lost.

At the conclusion of Dr. A. Clarke's notes on this chapter are quoted some very sensible, beautiful and pious reflections by Sturin on the birth-place of Jesus, and on the places of our birth and habitation in general. Take as a specimen these few sentences. "It is also a matter of small importance to us, where we may live, provided we find genuine happiness. There is no place on earth, however poor and despicable, but may have better and more happy inhabitants than many of those are, who dwell in the largest and most celebrated cities. Do we know a single place on the whole globe where the works of God do not appear under a thousand different forms, and where a person may not feel that blessed satisfaction which arises from a holy and Christian life? For an individual, that place is preferable to all others; where he can get and do most good. For a number of people, that place is best where they can find the greatest number of wise and pious men. Every nation declines in proportion as virtue and religion lose their influence on the minds of the inhabitants."

In Doddridge we have the following beautiful reflection on the massacre by Herod:—"What is our fallen nature that it can be capable of such enormities as we have now been surveying? or what imaginable circumstances of grandeur and power can free the mind of an ambitious creature from servitude and misery? Who can behold Herod under the agitation of such a barbarous rage, and not see the vanity even of royal dignity, when the man that sways the sceptre over others hath no rule over his own spirit? Surely none of the innocent victims of Herod's wrath felt so much from the sword of their barbarous murderers, as the guilty mind of the tyrant from its own unnatural transports. The indignation which arises in our minds on the view of so much wickedness finds a secret satisfaction in this thought."

§ XXVI. THINGS AS THEY ARE: A PICTURE.—It is no uncommon thing in the religious world for an outcry to be raised against opinions, without any knowledge of their nature or evidence, and for aspersions to be cast on the characters and motives of their professors, for no other reason, but because they are known to be dissenters from the creed of the multitude. Thus men of honest minds and of a scriptural faith, who have followed the dictates of conscience in rejecting the dogmas of the popular theology, are held forward to the indignation and contempt of the uninquiring majority, as schismatics, infidels, atheists, "enemies of Christianity," and deniers of the Scriptures; and thousands, with kind hearts and good intentions, are led astray by these alarming representations to refuse to the persons designated by these reproachful epithets, any share in their Christian or neighborly communion and intercourse. Of this species of persecution, of which the credulous and unsuspecting many are the instruments, but whose authors are the interested few, whose emoluments or preferments, or ambitious hopes, or worldly influence, are most likely to be secured by the continuance of things as they are, every man who dares to think for himself and to avow his sentiments; is at some period of his life the object.

INFLUENCE OF AUTHORITY.

"What was the opinion of Jerome, I regard not; let us inquire what is truth."

So said the eminent but too often unappreciated reformer, John Calvin. The remark is worthy of his mind. It is equivalent to the saying of an ancient philosopher, "I love Plato much, but I love the truth more."

The influence of human authority has been the bane of the Christian, no less than of the Jewish church. In the former as well as the latter the law has been made void through traditions. The authority of God has been set aside, to admit that of man. Great names have received a homage which nothing but inspiration deserves. The fathers or the church, as they have been called, have proved its corrupters. And succeeding leaders, instead of guiding back to the simplicity of the Gospel, have rather labored, it would seem, to gain the veneration of after ages by contributing something to the general stock of tradition.

The principle set forth by Calvin in the sentence at the head of this article, affords the only remedy to the evil of which we speak. "What is the opinion of Jerome, I regard not; let us inquire what is truth." In other words, "Let us cease to regard any opinion merely because it is the opinion of this or that great man, in whose talents, learning and judgment, we repose confidence; and let us inquire what is truth." We shall be induced to adopt this course by considering, that truth is wholly independent of belief or unbelief, i. e. truth is truth, whether believed or not. A truth is none the less true because it has been unknown, or rejected by a few individuals, or the whole human race. Nor is a falsehood improved by lapse of time, nor the number or character of its advocates or believers.

This consideration enables us to meet an objection often urged against Universalism. Some people seem to think that the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of the whole human race cannot be true because so few have believed, and so many have rejected it. While, on the other hand, the doctrine of endless misery, as the fate of a large portion of the world, is thought to be put almost beyond dispute by the general suffrage it has received. To this we reply. What was the opinion of this or that man, or of the world, we regard not; let us inquire what is truth.

We are sometimes reminded of the conduct of the Jews, so severely censured by our Saviour, when he likened them to children sitting in the market place. Our opposers are almost as difficult to be pleased. Sometimes we hear complaints that Universalists pay too little deference to the opinions and belief of past generations. And it seems to be inferred that they are necessarily wrong because in this wicked and misjudging world they are a minority. At other times, and particularly of late, since we have become more familiar than formerly with the opinions of the most valuable commentators, we are censured for so often quoting their notes and interpretations. In this latter complaint there is more reason than in the former. At least it has proved equally disadvantageous to the doctrine of endless misery.

ERROR CORRECTED.

"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii: 5.

There are two important errors committed by Limitarian teachers in their use of this text.

The first error is in their treatment of the text.

The second error is in their treatment of the people.

The first error, that which consists in their treatment of the text, is all that we shall find room to notice in the present number. They use this scripture without the least attention to the connexion in which it stands. They quote it as a threatening to the people of a state of never-ending sufferings. When they say to the people, in these words of our Lord, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish," they mean to be understood as saying to them, and that by the authority of Christ, that unless they repent in the present life, they shall eternally perish in the world to come. This is the perishing with which they would have it understood that Jesus threatened the people unto whom he addressed these words.

Suppose there are several families in a neighborhood, who are noted for nightly rioting, which they sometimes continue until they slumber in exhaustion and drunkenness, without the thought or ability to look to the safety of their dwellings. At length one of their dwellings is burned down, and the whole family perishes in the flames. Afterwards I fall in company with several of the other families together, who are even more notorious for their night revelry than the other, and they speak to me of the calamitous event of that family's destruction by fire. Whereupon I say unto them, "Think ye that this family was more riotous and heedless than you all? No, but except you reform, you will doubtless all likewise perish."

This conversation, together with the circumstance which led to it, gets a place in the columns of some public journal; and one of you, who is acquainted with my religious faith, falls in with a company of strangers, who are conversing on the subject of my system of faith. One comes forward and says, "Mr. C. believes and preaches the doctrine of endless misery." On hearing this, you take the liberty to assure him and the company, that he has made a misstatement. "I am acquainted," say you, "with the religious belief of the person you speak of. I have sat under his ministry, and know that he distinctly maintains the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. He maintains that God is good and merciful to all his children, and pursuant to his infinite goodness he has commissioned and ordained his Son to be the Saviour of the world;—and that the Son is both able and faithful, and will prosecute his work until he shall completely finish it, having destroyed the works of the devil, which are all manner of evil, swallowed up death in victory, subdued all unto his kingdom of love, and wiped away tears from off all faces." You also present my published letters and discourses, in which I maintain, in the most unequivocal manner, the same sentiment. But the person who before asserted it, still insists that I am a believer and preacher of the doctrine of endless misery. He admits that I have employed the language which you assert, but contends that I must have meant by it something else, or nothing—and to suppose this position, he opens the public journal in which my conversation with the riotous persons whose neighbors perished in the flames that devoured their dwelling, when I said unto them, "Except you reform you will doubtless all likewise perish." This he resolutely insists upon as proof that I hold the doctrine of men's eternally perishing in the resurrection world! What would you think of that person? You might be at a loss to determine whether he were engaged in a boyish sport of words, or whether he were really in a state of mental blindness.

And so with respect to the above mentioned use of the scripture before us. We are often in doubt to determine whether it proceeds from mental blindness, or a disposition to trifle with the sacred word. For the connexion in this case is just as clear as in the case above supposed. Read, and judge. The chapter thus commences: "There were present at that season some that told him, (Jesus) of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices." This seems to have been an event which had then recently taken place, and they told it as a piece of news to Jesus. Josephus tells us that the Galileans were the most seditious people in the land. They were under Herod's jurisdiction, but as they kept the great feasts at Jerusalem, it is probable that their tumultuous behaviour at some one of these feasts, gave Pilate, who was a mortal enemy to Herod their governor, a pretext to fall upon and slay many of them. It appears that he slew them while they were attending to their religious services, offering their sacrifices upon the altar, so that their blood was mingled with their sacrifices.

Hence it is seen that the perishing of which some spake unto Jesus, was the perishing of numbers of Galileans, around the altars in Jerusalem, by the swords of Pilate's soldiers. "And Jesus, answering, said unto them, suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered these things? I tell you nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise (or in like manner) perish." Perish likewise, or in like manner, as who? In like manner as the Galileans you speak of. And how and where did they perish? By immortal fire in the resurrection world? No. By the sword of Pilate, in Jerusalem. "And except ye repent ye shall all likewise," or, in some similar manner, by some fatal judgment, "perish."

But Jesus adds to the case of perishing of which some spake unto him, another case. "Or those eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell, and slew them; think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem?" Here the perishing of eighteen inhabitants of Jerusalem is spoken of, who perished by the fall of the tower of Siloam, which was probably built over one of the porticos near the pool of Siloam mentioned by St. John, and also by the prophet Nehemiah. And Jesus said to the Jews that stood by, "Think ye that they (on whom that tower fell) were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? I tell you nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

What could be more plain, than that Jesus held up these cases of certain numbers of Jews perishing by the sword of Pilate, and by the fall of a tower, as a specimen of the suddenness and manner of Jerusalem's generally perishing, if they persevered in their corrupt and wicked course? It certainly discovers a deplorable want, either of attention and discernment, or else of seriousness and honesty, when persons employ this scripture as a threatening of endless torments;—when, in spite of the numerous testimonies which promise the triumphant success of Him who was appointed to destroy evil, and subdue and save the world, they contend that he must ultimately fail, and destruction hold its victory forever,—because Jesus said unto the Jews, that unless they should reform, they should all likewise perish, as did those whom Pilate slew before their altar, and those who were crushed by the fall of a tower!

The people did not turn from their evil ways, and the destruction came upon them which Jesus here forewarned them of. The force and aptness of this warning, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish," is illustrated to great advantage by the history of what, within forty years from that time, did actually take place. The Galileans, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, had gone to Jerusalem to worship. And so when destruction encompassed the whole nation about, it was when the whole nation, i. e. all who could leave their homes, were come up to Jerusalem to worship. Then was "Jerusalem compassed about with armies," and "the desolation thereof was nigh." The whole nation, as it were, perished; and for a time their blood was mingled with their sacrifices. Eleven hundred thousand, at least, literally perished during that last siege, which consummated the overthrow of the nation. Besides these, great numbers also perished at other times and in various places, between the time of our Lord's speaking the words under consideration, and the political perishing of the nation. Multitudes also perished in like manner as did the eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell,—being buried as Josephus informs us, beneath the ruins of the walls, temples, and houses of the city. And the remnant of the unbelieving Jews, who were not literally destroyed by the sword, the pestilence, the fall of houses, walls, temples, etc., were carried away captive into all nations, who trampled them under foot in such a manner, that they actually perished as to their civil, social, and religious privileges and enjoyments.

AN OBJECTION CONSIDERED.

Among the many objections urged against Christianity by the captious and cavilling opponent, or the honest skeptic, who for want of information or reflection is unable to believe in the glorious Gospel of the blessed God, the following is perhaps as common as any, and as often and pertinaciously brought forward, viz:—

"If the Gospel is a revelation from God to men, and necessary for their instruction and guidance in life, it is equally as necessary that this revelation should be made to all men as to any man or set of men. Or in other words, if he has revealed it to one man, and not to another, to a few men in one age of the world, and not to all men in all ages of the world, then he is partial and unjust; and though it may be a revelation to the few, it cannot be to the many, nor are any bound to receive, believe or obey it except those few to whom it is first specially made."

We propose briefly to answer the above objection, or rather objections, perhaps we should say, as the language is so shaped as to make it amount to two, instead of one objection. When analyzed, they stand thus: 1. God is partial and unjust if he give a special revelation to some men which he does not in the same manner to all men. 2. Those to whom the revelation is not specially, personally and primarily made, can be under no obligation to receive and obey it as a revelation from God, although convinced that it is a revelation which God has specially made to other chosen individuals.

1. The first part of the objection, if it has any force or pertinency, would be equally pertinent and bear with equal weight against any, even the slightest differences in the constitution or condition of men, either physically or morally. It might with equal propriety be urged, that if God give to one man a more hale and robust constitution, or grant longer life than to another man, he is partial and unjust. That if he give to one man stronger powers of mind, a more energetic intellect, a quicker perception, a more retentive memory, than to another, he is partial and unjust. It might with equal propriety be urged that as God allowed the world to grope in comparative darkness in respect to some of the most important and interesting sciences for many ages—as he allowed, the world till very recently, to remain in ignorance of those great and interesting philosophical and astronomical truths discovered by the immortal Sir Isaac Newton; and then raised up this prince of philosophers and endowed his mind with the astonishing powers of investigating and grasping with almost absolute intuition, facts that the world and all previous philosophers had never been able to discover, and to demonstrate those facts with a clearness irresistible and alike convincing to all; that therefore God was partial, both to the age and the country in which Newton lived, and especially to that philosopher himself, and unjust to all other ages, to all other countries, and to all other men. The objector might with equal propriety urge that God was partial or unjust because he did not make Sir Isaac Newton the first man that ever existed, and so allow all the race of men, from this first progenitor and great philosopher through all succeeding generations of men, to be participants of the great privileges and blessings derivable from his discoveries. Or else, what would have conferred equal benefits, raised up a Newton in every age to enlighten that generation, or in every community to bless that particular community with the important knowledge which his system develops.

But the objector to Christianity will perhaps say, the introduction of the Newtonian philosophy is impertinent—not to the point—not a parallel case; because the world was not prepared to receive that system prior to the period at which it was introduced—that the world had previously been in its infancy comparatively, or in a state of ignorance and barbarism, in which it was unprepared to receive so great an influx of light at once, and that such is still the case with many communities, tribes and nations of the earth. We answer then, that such was, or such might have been the case with the world and its different ages and different communities, with regard to Christianity and its introduction into the world.

If the objector now change his ground and say the cases are not parallel, because the Newtonian philosophy does not claim to be a special revelation, a communication from God to men, but Christianity does; we answer that there is no force in this form of the objection when coming from a deist, or any one who believes in a Creator who superintends and governs the affairs of the universe. (And if the objector be an atheist, he will find it no easier matter to settle the difficulty with his chance God, than the theist will with his intelligent and designing Divinity.) For though the Newtonian philosophy does not claim to be a special revelation from God to men, yet no sensible man will deny but what it is of vast moment to the world—of great advantage to society, or to mankind, wherever it has been received; and therefore, if its light has shone on some ages and some countries and not on others, the providence of God has been partial and unjust if the objection under consideration have any force. Nor will any deist deny but what God created and raised up Newton exactly when he did, where he did, endowed him with the identical powers he possessed, and for the very purpose of his acting precisely the part he did act on the stage of human life. If then, the deist admit, (what every consistent deist must acknowledge,) that God did raise up Sir Isaac Newton at the time, in the manner, and for the purpose of acting the part he did in life, and that his system of philosophy and discoveries in astronomy were of great advantage to the world; this admission will either prove that his God was partial and unjust in the time and manner of bestowing on the world the benefits of the Newtonian philosophy, or that he is not partial and unjust in the time and manner of making the revelations he has made to the world. For the Newtonian philosophy is even more partially diffused than Christianity. We cannot forbear here to make the remark, that frail man, who can see but an inch ahead, and trace at most but a few links in the infinite and illimitable chain of events connected in the all-comprehensive survey of the omniscient Divinity, ought to be extremely modest and cautious in speaking of the justice and impartiality of the Deity—not to arraign or question them unless he can see as far as the Deity himself, or onward to the end of the chain, and absolutely know that the result, in the end, shall be bad instead of good.

Now although we profess not to fathom the depths of infinite wisdom, nor to know why God did not bestow the Gospel on the world sooner than he did, or why he did not make a special revelation of it to every man: yet, imperfect as our perceptive faculties are, we think we can discover that all the good would not have resulted that the objector supposes, even had his requisition been complied with, and that probably many evils that he does not think of would actually have ensued. Man, as an individual, has his infancy, childhood, youth, manhood, etc., and is not prepared, during the first stages of his being, to receive and appreciate the knowledge adapted only to a maturer age. So the species or race of man had its infancy, youth, etc., and during its earlier periods of existence was not in a condition to receive revelations which were only adapted to it at a more advanced age. The world is still advancing and maturing in light and knowledge. Moreover, had a special and full revelation of God's character and purposes, and of man's future state and condition, been made to all men alike in all ages, it would have precluded entirely the exercise of faith by substituting absolute knowledge. It would have allowed no scope at all to faith, imagination, hope, fear, patience, research, mental exercise, advance in knowledge, etc., and many of the virtues and graces that now adorn the Christian character would never have existed, because there would have been no field in which they could act. Moreover, had God made to all men a full revelation of all his glories and all the happiness in reserve for him hereafter, man would have been entirely unfitted for filling the sphere allotted to him in this world. The sight would have so dazzled his eyes and absorbed his mind as to have excluded all other objects from the former and subjects from the latter.

2. We come now to consider the second part of the objection, which is, that those to whom the revelation is not specially, personally and primarily made, can be under no obligation to receive and obey it, although convinced that it is a revelation which God has specially made to other chosen individuals.

Before we proceed to give a direct answer to this objection, we wish to propound a few questions, to be answered by the objector. We ask then, is man under any obligation to promote his own good, or secure his own happiness? Is he under any obligation to provide for either his physical or his moral wants—to seek the procuring of food or clothing for his body, or knowledge, instruction and mental satisfaction and happiness for his mind? All will doubtless answer in the affirmative. Well, if such obligation rest on man, is he not also under obligation to avail himself of the most ready and likely means within his reach, that are lawful and proper, for the supply of these physical, intellectual and moral wants? The answer will doubtless still be in the affirmative.

Well, then, now for an application of these questions and their answers to the objection under consideration. If God has made in the Gospel a special revelation to a few chosen individuals, though sufficiently numerous to confirm beyond a doubt, the fact that what he has communicated, is a direct revelation to those individuals, not for their own private emolument or personal advantage, but for the benefit of the community at large, yea for the whole world—and moreover, if the principles brought to view in that revelation coming from God, are clearly seen to be exactly adapted to the moral and spiritual wants of mankind—principles essential to their happiness and peace—principles too, which most clearly could have originated in no other source but God; is not man, yea, are not all men who become acquainted with those principles, under obligations to receive them and be influenced by them? Most surely they are, if they are under any obligation to seek for good instead of evil, for happiness instead of misery. If a community were afflicted with some dreadful malady, some distressing and fatal epidemic, and God, by some peculiar providence were to make known to one individual in that community, a certain plant of healing power and efficacy, that should prove a certain and sovereign remedy against the malady with all who partook of it, what should we think of the sense, or sapience of this community, were all the rest of the members thereof to refuse partaking of the plant and set up the plea we are now examining, viz., "God has been partial and unjust in revealing the knowledge of this plant to one individual in our community and not revealing it to the rest of us, and though we witness the efficacy of the plant on him and all that partake of it, and though we are satisfied God revealed it to him, yet we are under no obligation to partake of it—we choose rather to remain sick or to perish than to use the medicine that has been revealed in so partial and unjust a manner!" I apprehend that neither we nor even deists themselves would think very highly of the sense or sanity of such a community.

Well, the cases under consideration are parallel. And he knows but little of the order and arrangements of nature and nature's God who will raise against revelation the objection we are now considering.

All the important improvements and discoveries in agriculture, the arts, the sciences, philosophy and morals, physic, surgery, navigation, the numerous inventions in mechanics, etc., have been made first by one individual or a very few individuals, and through them communicated first to a small community and then to nations; yet all these improvements have acknowledgedly been made in accordance with the perfect wisdom and impartial equity of God. Why then should we expect an essential deviation in the introduction of the great light and improvements under the Gospel dispensation, from all the dealings of God in his ordinary providences by which other great blessings have been communicated to the world? Why should we expect the Gospel to be revealed to all men and nations at once, when no other great physical or moral improvement which God has bestowed on the world has been bestowed except by slow degrees and through the medium first of one or a very few individuals? The skeptic often objects to the Gospel and its truths because he says they exhibit a great departure and deviation from all the ordinary paths and common course of nature, and yet in the objection now under examination he complains, and objects to the Gospel because in its introduction into the world God has not deviated far enough from his ordinary providence and the usual course of things in the improvements the world receives. UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

As the time is now drawing near, when the United States Convention of Universalists will meet in annual session, it may not be improper or useless to notice several subjects, which have been published respecting that body.

1. It has been observed in amount, that the Convention was organized, and convened from year to year, not so much for the purpose of preaching—as for business and deliberation. To this, little other reply has been made, than that it was very agreeable to hear preaching—and therefore desirable to have as much preaching as possible on the annual meeting.

We have accordingly had as many sermons at each meeting of the Convention, as could well be crowded into two days and three evenings. So that business and deliberation were almost out of the question. It requires the concentrative talents of a Bonaparte, to deliberate under the constant excitement of preparation to attend church, or the absorbing influences of some spirit-stirring theme to which we have just listened.

And yet, all the business that is done, is discussed and acted upon under one or the other of these influences—and necessarily done in haste. For an hour or two in the morning, and as much more after having listened to two or three sermons, is all that can be snatched from an attendance on the sanctuary. And even this pittance is sadly diminished by the allowable interchange of salutations and inquiries, and by friendly conversation.

Whether any change in this mode of procedure be practicable, time alone can determine. But the only important obstacle seems to exist in the desire of hearing preachers whom we may not have heard before—or who are reputed popular. Would it not, in view of the immensely important interests of the denomination—and under the actually existing variety of subjects which demand the most earnest and devoted attention, be well to repress this desire for preaching, and do more business? And would not that business be done more effectually, and the objects for which the Convention was organized be more certainly attained, by devoting more time to the discussion and patient consideration of the business in hand?

To protract the duration of sessions as things are now conducted, will not essentially remove the difficulties and embarrassments under which the Council labors. The time appears to be sufficient if employed in business. Would it not be well, then, to adopt the course recommended by Br. Sawyer—to have no preaching after the occasional sermon, except perhaps in the evening?

2. It has been objected to the Convention, that it did not give visiting brethren a seat in Council, nor avail itself of the benefits of their advice.

Whether the present organization of the United States Convention be the best, is a question entirely aside from the subject under consideration. But in its present form—it is quite clear, that the Convention has no proper power to admit visitors to a seat in Council. And if it could, the privilege should be extended to all alike—laymen as well as clergymen. For as the delegation is now composed of as many at least of the former as the latter, consistency requires that the same relative proportion be retained as nearly as practicable.

Again—of the hundreds of visitors, clergy and laity, either the whole, or merely a part must be admitted. If a part only, the discrimination so made will be productive of far worse and more painful results, than if the whole were excluded. This it seems impossible to question. But if the whole are admitted, then nothing like a proper representation of the denomination will take place; as a majority of visitors will always be present from the immediate vicinity of the session.

And were it otherwise—were the visitors from the different States in nearly equal numbers, the admission of any, or all, would effectually remodel the Convention.

Besides, if the admission of only a part of the visiting brotherhood would give offence—the admission of all would destroy all responsibility of the delegates, and all respect for the Convention. Because, the delegates might—and we can easily imagine cases where they would—plead that they were overruled. The Convention would then become a self-constituted body, its delegation useless, and its proceedings nugatory. S. R. S.

CREDIT.

Some weeks ago a piece of poetry was wanted for our paper, and Br. Hutchinson picked up an old number of the Gospel Herald, and having marked one piece entitled "Saturday Night," handed it to the compositor. It was not marked as original in the Herald, neither was there any credit appended to it. Of course, we gave it as we got it. Some person unable or too careless to distinguish between our original and our selected articles—and the distinction is certainly plain enough—copied the article, and credited it to the Magazine and Advocate. Br. O. A. Skinner, of the Gospel Sun, seeing it in this last paper, copied it thence with the false credit attached. Br. T. Whittemore immediately recognized it as an old acquaintance, and says:—

"Saturday Night, a piece of poetry which Br. Skinner credits to the Magazine and Advocate, appeared in the Universalist Magazine nearly eighteen years ago. Br. Grosh has no desire to glisten in borrowed diamonds."

Br. Price, of the Union, copies these remarks, and points the Trumpet to an article taken from the Christian Messenger without credit—and thus endeth the first lesson.

We have always endeavored to be careful to give credit—and I believe have always done so when we knew to whom to give it—and never have we taken an article from another paper, and palmed it off as original in our own. Sooner would I be found with another man's sheep on my back. But if blunderers will not distinguish between our articles, and credit us with our selections, lay the blame where it is due. As to the article in question, "Br. Grosh" cannot even claim the credit of selecting it.

Be it forever hereafter known unto all persons, that we claim no article to be original in this paper, (except the editorial) unless it be called original, or headed, "For the Magazine and Advocate." A. B. G.

IRA SPENCER.

I see by "The Glad Tidings," published in Pittsburg, Pa., that this gentleman has located himself in Milton, Trumbull county, Ohio, and is again passing for a Universalist preacher. Dr. Davis, and our brethren generally, are respectfully informed that said Spencer came from Ohio to Livingston county, in this State, some years ago, as a Christian preacher—wished to join the Universalists, but never could obtain their fellowship for lack of some moral qualifications, and, after a time, (the Universalists having been publicly warned against him,) he was converted to Methodism, and removed back to where he now is, and again professes Universalism! I am sorry that his pretensions render it necessary so soon again to notice his course, and to ask that he may be judged by his actions and not by his professions, before he is received into a confidence he never could win in this State.

The following is the resolution of the Genesee Association above referred to, passed at its session in October, 1833.

"Whereas this Council is informed that Mr. Ira Spencer has, for sometime past, been preaching in the name, and under the pretended sanction of Universalists—therefore Resolved, To notify the public that the said Spencer has not said sanction: that he is not, nor ever has been in fellowship with this or any other Association of Universalists." A. B. G.

LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—Gurdon Smith, Esq., Potsdam, N. Y., and Dr. Lewis, of Hamilton, are authorized to receive and transmit donations to the funds of the Liberal Institute.

DONATION.—Dr. D. Budd, West Turin, N. Y., will accept the thanks of the friends of science in the Clinton Liberal Institute, for the present of a box of about seventy specimens of minerals and fossil remains—carefully done up and labelled by him. S. R. SMITH. Clinton, August 8, 1836.

SUMMER.

BY MRS. JULIA H. SCOTT.

We welcome, beautiful Summer,
With joyous hearts and free,
The music of thy dancing winds
Through wildwood bower and tree—
Thy golden sunshine 'mid the flowers,
Thy birds so bright and rare,
And th' soft delicious scents which steal
Along thy balmy air.

A charm thou bearest with thee,
Sweet season of delight,
To turn the weeper's tears to smiles,
To glowing day the night.
The school boy's laugh is merrier now,
Upon the shaven green;
And the wild young girls play brisker far,
Beside the river sheen.

The eyes of careful wealth is seen
Relaxing from its gloom,
While gazing on thy far stretched fields
Of bright and varied bloom;
And the lips of sorrowing age are wreathed
With many a languid smile,
When sunset calls around the door
A noisy, youthful file.

Thou bindest, gentle Summer,
All spirits unto thee;
The farmer 'mid his ripening fields,
The sailor on the sea—
The poet 'mid his moonlight dreams,
The student at his lore,
All givest thou hopes of coming bliss,
Ere thy sunny days are o'er.

But mostly in the forests,
Sweet Summer, dost thou send Thy winning ministers, the charms
Of all thy reign to blend.
The whispering leaves, the waterfalls,
The happy bounding deer,
The murmuring bees, the moss clothed flowers,
The deep streams gliding near—

The wild grape bower, through which the sun,
At midday faintly smiles;
The mimic lake, upon whose breast
Sleep fairy-seeming isles,
The rocky cells, where quiet birds
Rejoice the livelong day—
Oh, season dear to all the earth,
Why wilt thou pass away?

Yea, Summer, beautiful Summer,
Why wilt thou pass so soon?
Leaving the hopes thy beauty raised,
To perish in their moon?
Thy lovely things will seek the halls
Of cold and stern decay—
But I know a land where thou dost come,
And never pass away.

AMERICAN SOCIETY.

"There is perhaps no region of the world where there is such an amiable docility in imitating every thing that is either praised, or imported from abroad, as in the United States. We certainly approach as nearly as animal can come to vegetable life, to the species called squashes, which are said to become pumpkins, by being planted in the same bed, and moreover to impair in no small degree the flavor of melons, by virtue of propinquity. We seem to have exhausted our independence in resisting the Stamp Act, for we receive every other stamp with the most exemplary submission."—PAULDING.

To a calm and unprejudiced observer, the society of our cities presents rather a singular appearance. From the highest to the lowest grade, it is in a state of effervescence. The struggle for place and precedence—the fancied superiority of one class over another—their mutual jealousies, their groundless distinctions, and the insane grasping for that wealth which will enable them to eclipse or rival their neighbors—these are the passions that agitate the heart of society, and whose effects are felt through all its members. In our political relations, we have one unerring standard by which to judge of our own station as well as that of others, that "all men are born free and equal." To maintain this truth, our fathers "sprinted unto blood," and to see how gloriously they have established it, we need only to look abroad over our bright and prosperous country—the land of liberty and equal rights. In our [system of] government, all is order, beauty, and harmony; but in our social system, we are still whirling in the vortex of revolution. It is true, we are no longer the oppressed subjects of a foreign king and parliament; our bodies indeed are free, but we have voluntarily surrendered our minds to the bondage of European usages, and European opinions. Our houses, our equipages, our dress, our conventional rules, our attempted divisions of rank, are all copied after what is seen and practiced abroad. We are not satisfied to appear in the true glory of the American character—its republican simplicity and independence—but we hanker after the "leeks and onions of Egypt." As a people, we have vanity—inordinate vanity. Like Goldsmith's personage, who, not content with his fame as an author, tried to rival the tricks of a mountebank, of whose applauses he was jealous, so we are not contented with our birth-right, as noble and independent freemen, but we must servilely strive to be thought equal to Europeans, in luxury and false refinement. It is this that exposes us to the ridicule of foreign tourists, and renders us so morbidly sensitive under their gross caricaturing. Were we to respect ourselves as we ought, their satire would fall as harmless, and their criticism appear as futile, as that of one who would find fault with a noble structure, because its surface was not polished, like the slab of a pier table. It is true there are follies among us, egregious follies, that are sufficient to excite the lash of the satirist, the smile of the philosopher, and the anxiety of the patriot. Fearful of wounding the self-love of our countrymen, we pass them by unnoticed; and we are only brought to a consciousness of their existence, when we see them exaggerated and caricatured by some hireling scribe, who is remunerated in proportion to his success in hiding our glorious privileges as freemen from the European populace, by blazoning forth the weaknesses and faults that still enslave the fashionable society of our cities.

Our government, in all its fair proportions, its chaste simplicity, its noble architecture, stands on an eminence, in the sight of all the world. And the people of all nations are beginning to turn their eyes hitherward, and to desire it for a habitation. It is founded upon the rock of human rights, it is safe from the attacks of outward assailants, and if it fall it will be owing to the folly or turpitude of those who dwell within the walls. Let us examine ourselves, let us look into our society, and see if there be not imported customs and manners among us, that tend to undermine the very foundation stone of our liberties. What will be the effect of this jealous exclusiveness between fellow-countrymen—this fearful increase of luxury and display—this idolatrous worship of foreign customs—this burning thirst for gain—that is consuming the honor and the integrity of our citizens? Alas, alas! we truly have departed from that republican simplicity which should characterize our social as well as our political institutions. In this simplicity consists our glory and our strength: and thanks be to God! we have yet a host who have not "bowed the knee to Baal"—men who are worthy of the name—whose characters and whose principles show the elevated stand that man may attain when "liberty and equality" is his watch-word and his birth-right. RULES FOR PREACHERS.

1. Be very sure you understand the text yourself, before you attempt to make others understand it.
2. Be animated—be emphatic. Convince your hearers that you are in earnest; but do not insult their judgments by extravagant appeals to their passions, without enlightening their minds.
3. Remember you are placed in the pulpit to teach. Study, therefore, your subject thoroughly, and do not follow right or wrong standard commentators. Think for yourself, and when you have new thoughts, communicate them, even if they do tread a little upon the toes of their expositors. And, at the same time, a preacher should not aim to be original, merely for the sake of it.
4. Approach your subject at once, and be short.
5. Study to be eloquent; if you have powers of oratory, improve them. But let theatrical affectation be banished from the sacred place.

TEACHING THE YOUNG IDEA HOW TO SHOOT.—A Western contemporary has a series of essays and memoranda on experiments in the education of children, and points out and discusses, in a forcible manner, many of the mistakes into which parents fall, in this all-important matter. He observes very justly, that the besetting sin is to arrive at a certain result with the little people, and that we care not by what means we effect a stated object, provided we accomplish it; that by this means children learn hypocrisy, and are taught to consider that duties are but forms, and that the inducement is the essential point, while the thing to be done is irksome and unpleasant, and to be got over as soon and as carelessly as possible. An apt illustration of this, is afforded in the following little story. Mrs. — is very anxious that her child should be religious, and no pains are spared to make him so, as will appear by what follows. The boy (not four years old) was brought down to the desert. In due time the nurse came in to take him to bed, when this conversation ensued:—

Mamma. "Say your prayers, my darling."

Boy. "I won't."

Mamma. "Oh, yes; now be good; show Miss — how prettily you can say your prayers."

Silent, pouting lips.

Mamma. "Come now, you don't know what grandmamma has for you."

Boy. "What?"

Mamma. "An orange."

Grandmamma. "There's Shamrock," (the dog,) "now make haste, or we'll get Shamrock to say pretty prayers."

Mamma. "Yes, dear, now do, because of the orange, you know."—New-York Mirror.

A PURITAN REBUKED.—"Ah, Eliza," cried a puritan preacher to a young lady who had just been making her hair into beautiful ringlets, "Ah, Eliza, had God intended your locks to be curled, he would have curled them for you." "When I was an infant," replied the damsel, "he did; but now I am grown up, he thinks I am able to do it myself."

MARRIAGES.

On the 25th ult., at Grand Rapids, M. T., by Darius Windsor, Esq., Mr. SYLVESTER GRANGER, to Miss CLARRISSA A. CLARK.

In Hudson, on the 27th ult., by Rev. Mr. Whittaker, Rev. L. C. MARVIN, of Newark, N. J., to Miss ANN M. MOORES, daughter of the late Reuben Moores, Esq.

DEATHS.

In Ulster, Bradford county, Pa., July 27th, after a long and distressing illness of several months, Mr. HENRY PLOWMAN, aged 45. In his youthful days, we understand the deceased was a member of the Methodist society, and a public exhorter, but for the last eight or ten years, after a conversion from the error of his former profession, has been enabled to rejoice in the whole truth as it is in Jesus. Willing to suffer reproach, because he trusted in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe, he lived an exemplary, devoted and useful advocate of his profession, and died full in the faith of universal reconciliation. The deceased has left an affectionate family, and an extensive circle of friends and neighbors, to mourn his departure. In accordance with his request (which he made just before his death) the funeral was attended, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a respectable and attentive audience from Rom. viii: 38, 39, by G. S. AMES.

In Fort Plain, on the 1st inst., PETER W. EHLE, in the 48th year of his age. The whole family of the deceased have been severely ill—some of them were unable to attend the funeral. May the Lord grant recovery to all! A discourse was delivered by the writer from John xviii: 11. J. BODEN.

In Marshall, July 17th, of tetanus, Mr. ALEXANDER GREEN, aged 23 years. A bereaved wife and one child, and a large circle of relatives mourn his early death. A discourse was delivered at his funeral from 2 Cor. v: 1.

Very suddenly, at his residence in North Norwich, on the 13th ult., SYLVESTER CORBIN, Esq., aged 56 years. He had for many years been a consistent and exemplary believer in universal salvation, and so continued to the last of his mortal existence. He lived much respected, and died deeply lamented. Thus a good man has fallen. GEORGE MESSINGER, Jr.

SKETCH OF A TOUR TO NEW-ENGLAND.

BY REV. L. C. BROWNE.

Br. GROSH—I must now be indulged in narrating a tour, having nothing else on hand, and never having, as yet, perpetrated any thing of the kind. I will forewarn the reader, however, to expect nothing marvellous or exciting—no "hair breadth 'scapes"—no controversial tilts or shrewd retorts. Indeed, the longer I live the more I am convinced that I am destined to live and die, a plain, plodding, matter-of-fact, every-day sort of being. But to the tour.

Left home on Friday, April 29th, having engagements to spend the first two Sundays in May at Albany, and the last three at Hartford. On the morning of the first Sunday, our friends having no morning service appointed, went with Br. Van Schaack to the North Dutch church and heard Mr. Vermilyea, a man of talents and a pointed speaker. Preached in the afternoon and evening to good congregations, and appointed three services for the next Sabbath. In the interim, visited a brother who resides in Berlin, about thirty miles from Albany, and some friends in Hancock, Mass., and preached a lecture at each place. In the former I had once spent a year in the "delightful task" of teaching "the young idea how to shoot." Here are two societies—a First Day and Seventh Day Baptist. Neither made the offer of their church, but both gave a very liberal attendance, and the pastor of the latter, an amiable and interesting man, closed the services with prayer. Took stage from Hancock on Saturday morning, and arrived in Troy at evening, having had the tedium of a rough road agreeably beguiled by the conversation of a fellow-passenger—Rev. Mr. Tison, of Charlemont, Ms., an "old measure" Congregationalist, a man of liberal education, good address, and the most candid Unitarian clergyman I have ever conversed with.

In Troy I had the happiness to meet Br. Marvin. He being there on an exchange of two Sundays with Br. Rayner, it was agreed that he should preach next day, morning and afternoon, at Albany, and I remain at Troy. Sunday afternoon, having preached two sermons to good congregations in Troy, and shared the hospitalities of Mrs. Britton and Cadwell, proceeded to Albany and preached in the evening. On Monday, finding by reference to the Magazine, that no supply had been procured for me on the next Sunday, was obliged to return home to supply my own desk, and to attend the funeral of an acquaintance who died in New-York, and was brought to Minden to be interred. Arrived home on Tuesday evening, and dropped a line to the friends at Hartford, postponing my engagement till the fourth Sunday. I will start again, patient reader, after saying a few words about THINGS IN TROY AND ALBANY.—In each of these cities we have an elegant brick church, and in each an able preacher. The church in Albany is worth about $14,000, and that in Troy about $11,000. Br. Williamson has ministered for several years in Albany; and probably no society in the State are more united in their pastor, and, considering circumstances, more prosperous. Br. Rayner removed to Troy last Fall, and has a good congregation. The choirs in both churches are excellent.

Troy is unquestionably the most delightful city, for a residence, in the "Empire State." The streets are regular—several of them beautifully shaded with the buckeye or horse chestnut, and the whole city finely watered. The water is brought from an eminence so much higher than the city that the use of fire engines is, in a great measure, superfluous. You have only to unscrew the caps from the stone penstocks, at the corners of the streets, and screw the end of the hose on, and the force given the water by the descent is sufficient to convey it to the highest roof. In front of the Mansion House is a beautiful marble urn, surrounded with a circular grass-plot, twenty-five or thirty feet in diameter, and enclosed with an iron fence. From the top of this urn there are metallic pipes branching out and bending over like the boughs of a willow, from which the water streams downward and falls upon the surrounding grass. The new church which the first Presbyterian society is erecting for Dr. Beman, is an unique but splendid affair. The most singular feature is the lion's head, with open teeth, at each corner of the roof, carved of wood. This, however, is quite in keeping; as the church is under the administration of one of the most lion-like of the new school ultraists. In the rear of the desk is an Italian painting, representing, I was informed, a front view of the church itself, and which cost five hundred dollars. When the new church shall be completed and the old one removed, the park in front of the Female Seminary will be extended down to First-street, which will be a great addition to the beauty of the already beautiful city of Priam. The Trojans are truly a tasteful and enterprising people.

Monday morning, May 16th, set out again for Hartford. Arrived in Albany at evening, and tarried with Br. Williamson. Before morning we were joined by Br. Rayner, on his return from Newark. In the morning, after receiving letters of introduction from Br. Rayner to some friends in Hartford, embarked for New-York, at 7 o'clock, on board the Robert L. Stevens.

There was a fellow-passenger, who, from the moment he met my eye, I seemed to recognize, but could not identify him. He was about middle aged, finely apparelled, tall and dignified; but quite corpulent and his face excessively bloated and disfigured, evidently from habits of dissipation. When I looked him full in the face, he seemed a stranger. But when I caught a profile view, there was something left of the prominence of a forehead and the curvature of a classic nose which seemed familiar. I had seen those features; but they were not encircled by such a carmine complexion and had not surmounted such a chest. After considerable suspense, I went to the captain's office, and running my eye over the list of passengers' names, it rested on the name of D—. Was it possible! I had known him eight years since in Troy. He was then a spare man, a lawyer by profession, and a model of classic taste, legal accuracy, and purity of life and conversation. The progress of intemperance had preyed no less deeply on his mental powers than his external appearance. In conversation he exhibited, (to use the language of a fellow-passenger, a legal gentleman from New-England,) "the wreck of scholarship—the twilight of genius."

The scenery along the Hudson is so familiar to most citizens of our State, and has been described by so much abler and more graphic pens than mine, that I shall not attempt it. Familiar and indifferent as the objects along the banks of this noble stream have become to the business man, who passes them four times a year asleep, or absorbed in the contemplation of stocks and merchandize, to the literary amateur it is classic ground and every mile is fraught with interest. West Point, Fort Lee, the Donderberg, Tappan Sea, Anthony's Nose, the Sugar Loaf, etc., etc., are all embalmed in the history and literature of our country. They are no longer common hills and peaks—a Cooper, an Irving, a Paulding and a Sedgewick have looked upon them with the eye of genius, and they have imbibed a classic hallowedness.

Arrived in New-York at 6, P. M., and stopped with Br. Sawyer. Next morning visited the new church at the corner of Bleeker and Downing-streets, in company with Br. Sawyer. Dined with Br. Le Fevre, who had just returned from Europe, in excellent health and spirits, having lost none of his good companionship in the land of aristocracy. He accompanied us to Br. Pickering's, to whom Br. Le Fevre and myself were introduced by Br. Sawyer, and who accompanied us out into the city. Next day took rail-car from Jersey city to Newark, a distance of nine miles, most of the way over barren, salt meadow. Called on Br. A. P. Ely, at Newark, who accompanied me to the residence of Br. Marvin.

THINGS IN NEW-YORK AND NEWARK.—Newark is a pleasant city, containing, it is said, a population of twenty thousand. Here, for the first time, I saw canal boats ascend and descend an inclined plane. This is a substitute for locks, adopted where water is scarce, in order to save the waste which is unavoidable in lockage. The canal terminates at the top of the hill, and commences again at the bottom. When the boat arrives at either termination, it runs into a portable frame, is fastened to it, which then slides up or down the plane, as the case may be, its movement regulated by stationary machinery, so complicated that I am not mechanist enough to describe it. This work is on the Morris canal.

We have a good church in Newark, an excellent organ and a numerous congregation. Br. Marvin ministers in word and doctrine to good acceptance. Although the opposition here is chronic and malignant, Br. M. is making inroads, and will doubtless eventually succeed in silencing, if not in subduing it.

In New-York we have three churches, located in Duane, Orchard and Bleeker-streets, and occupied by Brs. Pickering, Sawyer and Le Fevre. The cause of truth in this city, although a few years since in a most wretched condition, is now highly flourishing; and there is little reason to doubt that, if no untoward circumstances occur to intercept it, a few years more will see one or more new societies organized.

Friday morning, May 20th, embarked at 7 o'clock on board the steamer New-Haven, for New-Haven, a distance of ninety miles up the sound. The breeze was fine and we had a delightful passage. The fog was so dense, during some portion of the day, that we had the satisfaction of being "out of sight of land." Arrived at New-Haven at 1 o'clock, P. M., and immediately took stage for Hartford, thirty-five miles. New-Haven surpasses in beauty any thing I have ever seen or conceived of. It is level, quiet, lovely; and the whole city, one continued feast of beauty. Its groves and walks, so beautifully shaded with tall and ancient elms, particularly about the Colleges and State House, remind you of Tempe and Academia. From this place to Hartford, we pass through the little village of Berlin, where our friends have a house of worship and a good congregation, to which Br. Stickney ministers. Arrived in Hartford at evening, and stopped at the Connecticut Hotel, an excellent house kept by Br. Denslow, where the society had procured lodgings for me.

THINGS IN HARTFORD.—Hartford is a delightful place on the western side of the river, and thirty miles from the sea. The streets are broad and cleanly, and, the situation being elevated, the atmosphere, in the outskirts of the city, was fragrant with the aroma of clover-fields and fruit-tree blossoms.

soms. Our church is a good brick building, located on the south side of State street, directly opposite the capitol, and has a ground story which yields a rent of $900 per annum. The meeting-room above, is large and convenient, and furnished with a good organ. There is also a good choir, and in general, a good congregation in attendance. They are, at present, destitute of a preacher, and complained that the congregations had dwindled. Yet the smallest number I preached to there, (and the Sabbaths were both unpleasant,) was probably not less than 400. I afterwards learned the difference between a thin audience in New-England and in Western New-York. In the former it is a house not quite full; and in the latter, a house not quite empty. Such is the church-going character of the New-Englanders.

In this place repose the remains of Winchester. They are interred in the Presbyterian burying-ground, and the funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Strong, with whom Winchester used to spend a great portion of his time. The place of his rest is marked by a marble head-stone, erected by the General Convention. The monument is in a good state of preservation, while most of the surrounding ones, being of red free stone, are going to decay.

Hartford is distinguished for its public institutions. The principal of these are the Insane Retreat, Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and Washington College, which latter is under the jurisdiction of the Episcopalians. Visited the Asylum in company with Br. R. O. Williams, Editor of the Inquirer, who resides at Hartford; but the time of our visit being during vacation, we had no opportunity of witnessing the exercises in school. The steps and hall were crowded with little girls, as bright and interesting in appearance as I ever saw, frisking about as blythe as lambs, and jabbering away with their fingers, with as much apparent fluency as other people do with their tongues. The most interesting subject here is Julia Brace, a deaf, dumb and blind girl, apparently about 24 years of age. She was engaged in sewing, and it was interesting to see her thread her needle. In the attempt she dropped it, and after feeling about in vain to find it, she sat up a most dismal lamentation. One of the superintendents gave her another, but as soon as she felt it, discovering that it was not her own, she threw it down in anger. At length her own was found. She then laid the eye of the needle on the end of her tongue and pushing the end of the thread along upon her tongue guided it directly into the eye.

Another object of interest is the "Charter Oak"—a tree in which the charter of Connecticut was concealed, to prevent it being taken from them by Sir Edmund Andross, acting under the authority of king James II. (For a history of the transaction, see Hale's History of the U. S., page 64.) This tree is still standing, on the premises of a Mr. Buckley, enjoying, literally, "a green old age." It is about 10 feet through at the base, owing to knotty protuberances, but farther up it is considerably smaller. One large limb projects over into the road, which is lawful plunder for the antiquary. Like a zealous pilgrim of liberty, I plucked a twig to embellish my cabinet of antiquities, when it shall be collected.

A sight of the tree suggested an inquiry for the charter. This is still preserved in the State House. It is a parchment manuscript, written in the old English character, and embellished with an engraved and painted likeness of Charles II, who gave the charter soon after his restoration in 1660. Another antiquity presented in the capitol, is a sword which belonged to Sergeant Heyden, of Windsor, and was used by him in the Pequot war, in 1637. It is a rusty old affair, with iron guard and buckhorn handle, and looks as if it might have "done some service." C. A. Jones, Esq., Editor of the Hartford Times, who was a fellow-boarder, acted as my cicerone, and treated me with much politeness.

Hartford is a place of much business, and the business-like habits of the people render them, in general, somewhat distant and inaccessible to strangers, and rather unsocial among themselves.

To this, however, I found a few happy exceptions in the families to whom I had letters. The society of Br. R. O. Williams was like a fountain in a desert. He has not yet become acclimated.

On Tuesday morning, May 31st, after spending the last two Sundays in Hartford, took stage for Providence, via Windham, Willimantic, etc., a distance of 70 miles. Dined at Windham and arrived at Providence at evening, having passed through a sterile, manufacturing country, some portion of which is distinguished for the culture of silk. This is becoming a business of much importance in many portions of New-England.

Called on Col. Andrews, in Providence, with whom I had a written acquaintance, and who accompanied me to the residence of Br. Balch. Next morning Br. B. and myself procured a sailboat and made a trip of eight miles down the bay, which gave me an excellent appetite for dinner. In the afternoon we proceeded to Wrentham, Mass., twelve miles distant, in order to attend the Massachusetts State Convention, which was to be held there the next day. Here I met thirty-nine of our preachers, twenty-eight of whom I had never seen before. We had a good meeting and crowded congregation. Forty of the Providence friends came out to attend. Two young brethren were ordained to the work of the ministry. The ordaining prayer, by Father Ballou, was particularly impressive, and moistened a hundred eyes. During the intervals between the sessions of council and religious services, we united in singing those old familiar pieces which almost every one knows. The brethren gave these exercises no new name, but I suppose they were what are sometimes called "Concerts of Praise." At all events, they were interesting, and I hope to see them adopted in our own State. One good purpose they serve is, to call a council together, after the exercises of the sanctuary. After the evening service, went home and tarried with Gen. Pond, in company with Mrs. Cobb and Hastings. Next morning, after visiting Br. J. C. Newell, who resides in that neighborhood and labors a portion of the time in Wrentham, took stage for Boston, via Dedham, Walpole, etc., a distance of twenty-four miles, and arrived about two P. M. Here I tarried five days, enjoying the hospitalities of Mrs. Streeter, King, Whittemore, H. Ballou, 2d., Bazin and Mussey.

THINGS IN BOSTON AND VICINITY.—We have in Boston five good societies. Br. S. Streeter, ministers to the first, who worship at the corner of Hanover and Bennet-streets, in the same building occupied by Murray. It is an old, yellow, wooden building, seventy-five feet square, standing in a very valuable part of the city, and familiarly termed "The Hive;" the other societies in the vicinity having swarmed, as it were, from this. In the vestry of this church there has been a conference meeting every Friday evening, since the days of Murray. In these meetings there is usually a lecture, and then remarks and exhortations by all who please to speak. I attended on Friday evening, June 3d, and heard a lecture from Br. Vose, who lives down on the Cape. After the lecture, we sung in "concert" those simple effusions which give the heart-strings play and cause the eye to brighten as it moistens. There stood the fathers and mothers of our little Israel, their voices tuned in praise; above us hung a portrait of Murray, looking down with that benevolent expression for which he was distinguished, and apparently smiling approval upon the exercises of the evening. In these exercises, there was nothing noisy or extravagant; they were animated, chaste and devotional.

Br. Dean ministers to the second and Br. H. Ballou to the third society. Both have excellent brick churches and well located. The latter is the larger, and the former the more elegant. Br. Whittemore ministers to the fourth society, worshipping in south Boston, whose church I did not see. The fifth society commenced holding meetings last January, and still hold them, in Boylston Hall, a large and commodious room fitted up with settees, a rostrum and table, an orchestra and an organ which cost $6000 belonging to the Handel and Haydn society, this being the room where they hold their concerts. Our friends have the use of the room and organ, on Sundays, for $300 per annum. In fair weather it is sometimes so full, that it is difficult finding a place even to stand. With this congregation I spent the first Sunday in June, and preached two sermons to large congregations, and was favored with excellent music.—They have, as yet, no settled preacher, but will probably procure one, and build next season.

Br. King ministers at Charlestown, just across the bridge from Boston, and in reality a part of it—Br. Paige, at Cambridgeport, two miles from Boston, which is the residence, also, of Br. T. Whittemore—Br. Bacon, at East Cambridge, four miles—Br. H. Ballou, 2d, at Roxbury, two miles—Br. Cobb, at Malden, four miles, and Br. M. H. Smith, at Quincy, nine miles. What facilities for exchanging!

Br. T. Whittemore, Editor of the Trumpet and our missionary at the East, being located with no society, is pursuing a judicious, mild and practical course. He gives many temperance lectures, and takes the ground of the new pledge, which excludes "all intoxicating liquors." Though not yet prepared to discountenance the use of wine, on certain occasions, and though doubtful whether community will ever come to this standard, I do not condemn those who take ground with Br. W. nor deny the expediency of the measure, under existing circumstances. When a room has become perfectly cold in winter, it requires a greater fire to bring it to a comfortable and healthful temperature, than is necessary to be kept up on ordinary occasions. So, when a denomination of Christians have grown cold and phlegmatic, it will require a warmth of preaching bordering upon enthusiasm, to bring them to a proper standard of zeal. The same argument may perhaps apply to the circumstances under which the temperance reformers are called to labor.

"The common," in Boston, fronting the State House, forms an area of forty acres, beautifully shaded, in many portions, with venerable elms, with a fountain near the middle, covering, perhaps, a quarter of an acre. The corporation have recently contracted for inclosing the whole common with an iron fence, at an expense of $40,000.

Bunker Hill monument is twenty-five feet square at the base, composed of blocks of granite eight feet long, four wide, and two and a half in thickness. It has been extended to eighty feet in height, tapering gradually from the bottom; and if ever finished, will be creditable to the Bostonians. In the wall of Brattle-street church is a ball, I should think a twenty-four pound, which was fired in during the battle, probably from the water. The church has since been rebuilt, and the ball carefully replaced in the wall of the new church. It is sunk into the brick about one-half its diameter. Tuesday, June 7th, being the old election day, the "Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company" celebrated its 198th anniversary; and although the day was rainy, there were probably fifteen thousand people assembled on the common. The annual sermon was delivered by Rev. Mr. Robinson, in Chauncey Place, after which the Governor received the resignations of the old officers, and gave the new ones their commissions, verbally, on the common. The dome of the State House commands a fine view of the city; and in the vestibule below, is a statue of Washington, in Roman drapery, from the chisel of Canova.

Wednesday, June 8th, took car for Providence, at 1 o'clock, P. M., and arrived at 3, a distance of forty miles. Next day attended the meeting of the Providence Association, at Attleborough, Mass.—Returned to Providence after services. Next morning embarked with Mrs. Balch and Handy on a sailing excursion down the bay—made the port of Bristol at 12 o'clock; and after "procuring supplies," set sail for Mount Hope bay. Here we landed on Rhode Island, near where Sarah Cornell was murdered, for which Rev. E. K. Avery was tried and acquitted. Nearly opposite is Mt. Hope, on the summit of which there is a monument erected to commemorate that heroic exploit of our pious ancestors, the capture of king Philip. After reconnoitering a short time, we put to sea, directing the prow of our little craft homeward, and made the port of Providence at sunset, having sailed about sixty miles, much fatigued with the "toils of the deep."

THINGS IN PROVIDENCE.—This is a pleasant and healthful city, with a population of about twenty thousand and built on both sides of Providence river, which is a part of the sea setting up into the land. Here are Brown University, under the direction of the Baptists, and a Quaker College.—There is also a steam factory, a very extensive establishment. None of their public buildings, however, are remarkable for beauty or richness, except the Arcade. This is built of granite, even to the stairs; and is not surpassed for strength and neatness, by any granite building I have seen.

Our church, which is one of the best, if not the best in the city, is conspicuously and centrally located on Westminster-street. It was originally of stone, but was burnt, and the old walls still standing, were inclosed with brick. They have a good choir and organ—a numerous congregation—a large and well organized Sabbath school—hold Wednesday evening weekly conferences, and are highly prosperous under the labors of Br. Balch. With suitable exertions, it is thought another society might be gathered on the east side of the river. For republican simplicity, hospitality and social feelings, the people of Providence stand pre-eminent. "Welcome to Providence," was the familiar salutation; and their subsequent attentions proved that this was not mere French.

On Monday, June 13th, took a reluctant leave and started with Br. Balch, in his own conveyance, for Philipstown, Mass., where Br. B. had an engagement to attend the erection of a church. On our way thither we passed the copperas factory in Hubbardstown, and stopped to observe the process of the manufacture. The soil in that vicinity abounds in sulphate of iron. This is quarried and piled in an immense heap. Water is then conducted on it by means of troughs. By this means it is leached, and the lye is conducted from the bottom of the heap through troughs into a large chaldron, where it is boiled down to a proper consistence, and then conveyed, by other troughs, into a vat. Sticks are let down into the liquid, suspended by handles, like candles suspended by the rods, in dipping; and through the perpendicular sticks are driven pegs in every direction. To these the copperas adheres, in crystalizing; and when taken out of the vat, it presents a curious appearance.

Arrived at Philipston on Tuesday evening. Next morning we repaired to the spot, where the friends had assembled to erect their church. An ingenious and highly appropriate address was delivered on the occasion by Br. Balch, in which he carried out the figure introduced by Paul, Eph. ii: 20, 21, representing the plan of divine government under the similitude of a building. We then united in prayer. After seeing two or three bents erected, with perfect order and safety, and with the aid of no stronger stimulant than sweetened water and ginger, we took leave. Br. Balch started for Providence and I took stage for Albany, via Athol, Mass., Hinsdale and Winchester, N. H., and Brattleborough and Bennington, Vt. Arriving at Brattleborough at 10, P. M., and leaving at 3, A. M., had no opportunity of calling on Br. Woodhouse and other friends. Arrived in Bennington Tuesday noon and tarried over night, in order to visit our unfortunate Br. Bushnell. Found him entirely helpless and speechless, save in the softest whisper; but with tolerable appetite, clear mind, and good spirits. He entertained hopes that he should yet be restored to usefulness. Heaven grant it!

Took stage again on Friday afternoon, and passing, a part of the way, over the yet unfinished McAdamized road between Troy and Bennington, arrived in Albany at dusk. Next morning took car for Schenectada at 6, and packet-boat thence at 8, and reached Port Plain at 6, P. M., realizing that

"Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home."

FRIENDLY LETTER.

To Rev. Hiram Whitcher, of the Freewill Baptist connexion, Aurora, Erie county, N. Y.

BR. WHITCHER.—The importance of the subject upon which I now design to address you, will, I trust, be deemed a sufficient apology for this letter, if indeed any shall be thought requisite. You have written some, and preached much, professedly against Universalism, but in reality against what no one, that I know of, believes or professes. So far as I have learned the facts in the case, you have scarce touched the doctrine in your professed attacks upon it; but have employed yourself in showing the falsehood and folly of certain anti-scriptural and absurd notions, which you are pleased to call Universalism, but which are in fact no part of the doctrine.

In support of this position, permit me to place before you the following extract from a printed article over your signature, which extract will furnish a sample of your allegations, both in writing and preaching. "Universalism teaches that the murderer, thief, robber, liar, drunkard, swearer, Sabbath-breaker, whore, whoremonger, adulterer, covetous, proud, and all other wicked men and unbelievers, shall go directly to heaven with the righteous believer in Christ." The above, as you are aware, is extracted from certain prefatory remarks accompanying the famous renunciations of Universalism by Lewis C. Todd and John S. Thompson, as printed together, in pamphlet form, "for Hiram Whitcher," by some printer most likely, though his name does not appear.

Now, brother, if you can find, in the wide world, a set of people who hold what you say Universalism teaches, I am perfectly willing you should visit them and refute their error. Yea, you shall have my best wishes and most ardent prayers in your behalf, that your labors may be crowned with abundant success. But I shall seriously object to your telling the people that this doctrine belongs to, or forms a part of, a religious system which in the United States is called Universalism; for the word Universalism is universally understood to be the name appropriated to the religious sentiments of the people called Universalists; and I happen to know, what indeed every one who is acquainted with the subject well knows, that the Universalist faith does not teach what you here assert. Or if you choose rather to remain in this land of Bibles, and preach against what nobody here holds, or pretends to hold, you have at least a legal right so to do, and I shall not be first to object against such a waste of time and talents; but I hereby enter my protest against any man's appropriating to doctrines of his own imagining, the distinctive appellation which for a number of years, has, by common consent, been given to the religious views of that denomination of Christians to which I have the happiness to belong.

Things by their right names. A physician would have a right to spend much time in cautioning people against the small pox; would have a right to lecture and print a great deal on the subject; to adduce the testimony of the most eminent medical writers that the small pox is a dangerous disease, and by no means conducive to health; but he could have no right, civil or religious, natural or moral, to say that in this he was opposing the botanic system of medicine; much less to declare in public that that system recommends the production of the small pox, as an infallible and safe preventive against all other diseases.

But such representations would not be more unfair than yours are respecting Universalism. For I am under the necessity of saying to you, that many of your representations of this doctrine are extremely disingenuous and unjust; as for example, your setting of Universalism and Christianity in opposition; as in the expression, "it is better to be a Christian than to trust to Universalism." This you said by way of enforcing the worn-out argument, usually denominated "the safe side." Again, adverting to the rare fact that some had renounced Universalism, which fact you adduced as an evidence that the doctrine was untrue, (without considering, I presume, that the many instances of people's renouncing the contrary doctrine would do quite as much towards proving that also untrue,) you spoke of their "renouncing their doctrine and embracing religion." Again, you told us you had never heard of any one's renouncing the Christian religion on a death-bed, and embracing the Universalist doctrine; but you intimated that the contrary had often happened.

I cannot now stop to comment upon the popish arrogance displayed in these representations; but must pass to observe, further, that many of your assertions respecting Universalism and its votaries, if taken in anything like the ordinary sense of language, are positively false and slanderous. I need instance only the passage already quoted, "Universalism teaches that.....wicked men and unbelievers shall go directly to heaven with the righteous believer;" that is, as I am compelled to understand it, that there shall be in heaven both righteous men and wicked men, believers and unbelievers. (A number of kindred declarations are found in the same paragraph.) Now do not misunderstand me—I do not accuse you of intentionally violating the truth; but I do aver that the assertion above quoted, with some others in the same paragraph, and many representations and insinuations which I have heard from you orally, are wholly untrue. Such misrepresentations may have arisen from honest mistake respecting Universalist sentiments. If so, permit me to suggest to you the propriety and expediency of immediately setting about informing yourself what Universalism actually and professedly is; so that, in case you should still remain an opposer of the doctrine, you may be prepared to oppose it understandingly.

To misrepresent our sentiments, may perhaps subserve the interests of your cause for a while; but the time must come, sooner or later, and I think soon, when the facts in the case will be generally understood; and it certainly does not require the gift of prophecy to be able to foresee that this must occasion a reaction.

It has been suggested to me, that in the extract herein given, you may not have meant what your words most naturally import, that according to Universalism, there will be all descriptions of wicked men in heaven; but merely this, that Universalism teaches that all will be cleansed from sin, and made holy, through the operation of that grace by which Jesus tasted death for every man. If this suggestion be correct, you must have been extremely unfortunate in the selection and arrangement of words. But the Scripture you quote in refutation of what you assert Universalism teaches, fixes your meaning, in my mind, beyond a doubt. You introduce 1 Cor. vi: 9, et. seq., quoting a part of the 9th verse, and referring to the 10th. Well, what does Paul here say? He first asks his brethren if they did not know that "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God." He next says, "Be not deceived;" and then goes on to specify various classes of the unrighteous, such as I suppose abounded at Corinth, and declares that none of these shall inherit the kingdom of God. You adduce this as proof that all shall not "go to heaven;" hence you would have us understand that heaven and the kingdom of God are the same. Very well. Did Paul in this passage mean to be understood that no individual who at any time sustains the character of an unrighteous person, shall ever inherit the kingdom of God, or heaven? Most evidently he did not; for he immediately adds, addressing his brethren, "And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God."

We discover then that Paul believed that "the unrighteous" could be cleansed from their unrighteousness, and then inherit the kingdom; and as you quote a part of this passage to prove that the teachings of Universalism are false, it is evident to me, that you meant to assert that Universalism teaches that the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God, or heaven, as you explain it, without being washed.

Having alluded to certain "renunciations," which you have taken much pains to circulate, it may not be amiss to state, what to Universalists is as obvious as the sun at noon-day, that neither of the gentlemen whose renunciations you have republished, have therein given anything more than a caricature of our belief and feelings. If the one believed, and the other felt, as they respectively say they did, I commend them for renouncing the one his faith, and the other his habits of mind. Such Universalism I have very little more fellowship for than they themselves.

It was not my design, in this letter, to go into a discussion of those points of doctrine upon which we doubtless disagree. My object has been to call your attention to the fact that you are in the practice of misrepresenting Universalism, and try to prevail on you to do so no more. I shall, with God's permission and assistance, publish before a great while, a connected view of Universalism, addressed to the clergy of the contrary faith, in this town and vicinity. Of this, I shall make it convenient for you to avail yourself, after which time, I expect to be unable to frame for you, any tolerable excuse for misrepresenting our faith. In the mean time, I am your friend and brother,

JASON LEWIS.

THE ORPHAN'S TALE.

How dear to our minds is every thing that pertains to the recollection of a fond mother who has terminated her earthly pilgrimage. Even the chidings and chastenings which at the time seemed grievous, which we have received from her maternal hand, appear genial to our fondness.

When we reflect upon her fostering care—her guardian protection—her daily and nightly vigils to our comforts and gratifications—her continual ministrations of practical affection, we are filled with a lively happy sense of filial gratitude to overflowing, which vents its fulness in a rivulet of tears. These reflections are in their nature holy, for they swell the heart with love. Love for our heavenly Parent is holy, and genuine love for our earthly parents must be of some relative kin. But to my tale.

My father was an industrious mechanic and lived, whilst he did live, by daily toils. He struggled hard with the hypocritical and deceitful world for his livelihood; for he believed in one God and one Mediator between God and man, and in the final salvation of all men, even the Pharisees, from sin and all uncleanness—which belief called upon him such a general opposition that nothing but such a faith could have supported him and his family from hunger, nakedness and ruin. "R. (my father) is an honest man," one Pharisee would say, "undoubtedly, but then I will go without a table as long as I live before I will have one made by one who believes such a licentious doctrine." "Such a man as R.," said another, "ought not to receive one hour's employment until he renounces his heretical and abominable doctrine—he don't believe in endless punishment at all—he believes the sinners will be saved as well as church members. I guess such a man will go without bread a good while before I employ him." Thus operated the popular piety—throwing out its legitimate bitterness and corruption, and casting a blighting mildew upon virtue and worth. I am indebted to friends for what little knowledge I have of my father and his troubles; for he, poor, yet blessed man, died before my recollection.

I was an only child. My mother on the death of my father was left destitute and went to live with my uncle, her brother; a man who was a good liver and had a competence secured. My mother had, whilst living with my father, learned the truths of the Scriptures, and accordingly believed God was no respecter of persons, and that all would finally be restored to the love of God and be made holy and happy. She was a woman of that submissive and peaceable nature which forbade her to contend or dispute; but on the contrary, when her religious sentiments were opposed with violence or uncharitableness, she would return silence, though with deep sorrow.

My uncle was a professor of the Arminian faith, and a close and influential member of the church. His outward character, and devotion to ceremonies, ordinances, Sabbath and solemn assemblies, were such as to give him popularity and importance in the society in which he belonged, and which then was larger than any other in that section of the country. He felt and took pride in his standing, and he assumed to dictate matters of religion as if he was commissioned of God, and was not to be contradicted in any thing on the subject which he advanced. I must say, that my uncle, aside from the dictates of his unnatural creed, was a good man. But after he had been wrestling with his crooked, selfish and contracted church sentiments, his mind seemed to be harnessed in a kind of chafing straight-jacket, which made him morose, sternly uncharitable, and bitterly unfeling toward all who differed from him in religious belief. The idea that all souls should be made happy, he could not bear for a moment; and he at all times had some hard expression upon his tongue ready to utter against those who believed in the salvation of the world. He labored for months and years after my mother went to live with him to win, or rather drive her over to his faith. But he found her firmly immovable, and he finally declared her a rebel—given over to hardness of heart, and left her, as he told her, "to be the sport of devils in hell forever." He abandoned all argument with her, but never desisted his uncharitable denunciations of her faith to her whenever the subject arose.

My mother was wretched. She would not contend. She sometimes attempted to quote Scripture in her defence, when my uncle would sternly say to her, "the devil helps you to quote Scripture, and I don't want you, with his aid, to preach such a doctrine to me—so stop. If you live with me you must not expect I shall suffer such a heresy as you believe in to be advocated in my house."

She became depressed and melancholy. Many and many a time have I seen her retire to her chamber after receiving those uncharitable denunciations from my uncle, and weep alone and bitterly. Nothing but her own cheering faith in, and reliance upon, the goodness of her God, and the ardent love she had for me, her only child, gave her strength to bear up under her troubles. As I said before, my uncle was naturally a good man. My mother had access to an abundance to eat, drink and wear for herself and me; still that cold blighting uncharitableness, the natural child of Partialism, ever practiced toward her and her religious faith by my uncle, seemed to prey upon her vitals like an insatiable leech, determined upon the last drop of blood.

How distinctly can I see, figured in my recollection, my mother sit silent, pensive, pale and melancholy, under the cold denunciatory lecture of my uncle. I can, and often do, weep at the painting. O how joyfully would I have flown to her rescue had I then been armed with the weapons of truth, and possessed of the means of life that I now am. How different would have been my mother's day, and how much prolonged would have been her years had she been taken from the frosty habitation of my uncle and cherished in the plentiful home of an affectionate child!

I was in my infancy when the trouble and sorrows of my mother brought her upon the bed of languishing and death. I was like a solitary lamb in the flock, that knew none but its mother. I was not old enough to understand the source of my mother's trouble. Even when I found her alone and weeping I felt buoyant and happy, and would hang upon her lap whilst the tears were trickling from her eyes, unconscious that they were the fruits and expressions of grief. My uncle and his family seemed to view and treat me more as the little wicked offspring of a corrupt origin—more to be shunned than befriended. Although I and my mother lived upon my uncle, still I thought all I ate, drank and wore came from my mother, and I looked upon her as the source of my being and living. I played about her room, week after week, where she lay wasting, for we were ever either's company and friend.

"James," said she, "come here to my bed." I went to her—she put her hand upon my head, and whilst stroking my hair, said she, "do you know I am going away?" "No, ma'm—when are you going?" said I. "In a few days," she replied. "Mother, may I go with you?" I asked. She wiped her flaming eyes, hushed her emotions, and said, "I am going to your father—you cannot go now, but you shall afterwards. You must be a good boy, mind your uncle and aunt, and play with your little cousins. Now remember what your mother tells you—don't cry—"

I dropped my toys upon the floor and began to cry, when I was taken and kept from the room by my aunt, until the decease of my mother, which was in a few days. I then entered the room where she lay, when I saw she was not yet gone, but, as my aunt told me, she laid asleep. I hung across and around her bed, hour after hour, as I could steal into the room, with the greatest anxiety that she should awake. At last my patience became exhausted and my hopes wasted, and I gave issue to my feelings by a burst of crying, when my uncle scolded me and sent me from the room with orders not to allow me to return. I saw the procession move to the burying ground, about half a mile distant, where I had often seen persons buried in the ground, and I conceived they had carried and buried my mother there. I stole away into the room where she had lain, and found her not there. I shall here leave the reader, for the present, to imagine the grief of a child, rather than attempt to describe it.

Being now, as it were, left friendless, I was truly a child of sorrow and grief. No tongue can describe the gloomy despondency that settled upon me. It is true that my uncle would occasionally take me upon his lap and say many pleasant things, but still I was not his child. Whilst my little cousins were caressed and gratified with toys and kisses, I was an isolated and neglected, motherless boy. How many times have I seen my aunt and uncle return from an absence with playthings and toys for my cousins, and distribute them around without a word or expression, or any notice of fondness to me. I could not happily associate with my cousins, for each and all of them, and even those younger than myself, were my masters and mistresses, and so allowed and encouraged to be, by my uncle and aunt. My uncle was a Sunday school man. Every Sabbath-day I and my cousins were sent to Sabbath school. O how irksome was the task imposed upon me of learning a lesson of the Bible, and of what they called religion, the use or application of which I could not at all see or appreciate. I could not forget my mother. I marked the mound thrown up by the people when they carried her to the grave-yard, and I, for many years, did not, could not look towards the yard without my eyes fastening upon her grave until hidden by my swelling tears. I dared not go to the grave alone, because I had frequently been told "dead folks were in the grave-yard, and that they sometimes appeared to people in their white shrouds." I many times was irresistibly inclined to go to her tomb, when I would steal along the boundary fence of the yard to the nearest point, and stand as mute as night and survey, in lonely solitude, the place of her secret rest. There seemed in even this distant visit to my mother's grave a kind of brief, refreshing consolation. But why it was so, kind Heaven only knows. My uncle, when ever he caught me making those visits to the burying-ground, would severely rebuke me, and threaten a punishment if I did not leave off. But threats of annihilation could not have destroyed the disposition I had to go to the place of her rest. I would have forgotten my troubles and have been happy if I could; but when my source of happiness was buried in the silent dormitory, I could not do otherwise than be inclined to approach the solemn place. My affection was too deeply rooted to be effaced or up-rooted, and nothing could separate between her and my love.

As I advanced more in years, my uncle used the more to give me religious advice and admonition. It seemed that he took more pains to put restraint upon me considerably, and impose more religious strictness, than upon his own children. If upon the Sabbath-day, in the buoyancy of my youthful spirit, I forgot my melancholy and ventured a little mirth, a check would be immediately put upon me, whilst my cousins could continue to enjoy their sports. "James" my uncle would say—"you should not play on the Sabbath-day—it is wicked—the Sabbath is God's day, and if you play he will punish you after you die, in fire—you must please God for you have got to die one of these days—you know your father and mother both died, and are buried in the ground, and we don't know that they will ever get out of their punishment—we don't know that they will ever get to Heaven. You should be a good boy—go to Sunday school—be still on the Sabbath, and please God, and then you will go to Heaven." This seemed to tell me I might not ever see my father or mother again, and that they both might be unhappy. O my soul! what depression and sorrow have I suffered! my spirit how it would sink within me! But I could not see but even this peace-killing admonition was kindness and truth from my uncle.

But I would ask myself why my uncle did not talk just so to his children.

As I grew up the prejudices of my uncle's sentiments were being fastened upon me, yet I recoiled at the doctrine he taught me. He would often denounce to me the doctrine my parents believed, although I had no knowledge of what they did believe. I had never heard an expression from my mother creating any dread of God or of the future. But my uncle was ever warning me against the wrath of God. The prejudices of this his belief went before, and increased my melancholy, and no hope of joy for the future opened to my mind. He finally told me I had better give up the idea of ever meeting my mother again, and become reconciled to God, and make my own salvation from God's wrath sure. Here was the dagger to my bosom—I could not forget my mother—I could not forget her last words to me—"James do you know I am going away—you cannot go with me now, but you shall afterwards." I could not give up the idea of seeing her afterwards. (See John xiii: 36.)

One evening just as the dusk was spreading its mantle over earth, I could not resist a visit to the grave-yard. I watched the absence of my uncle and stole along the fence to the place which I had so often been before, where I stood for a few minutes in sad reflection. I had yet never been to the grave. All the past seemed to press upon my mind with double force; the newly imbibed apprehensions of the future came like a two-edged sword to my heart, and subdued all fear of the dead, and I, as if frantic, sprang over the fence and went to the sacred mound. I cast myself on the green grave of my mother, buried my face in the long grass that grew over it, and gave free vent to grief. I wept loudly.

The burying-ground lay beside the highway, and my mother's grave was two or three rods from the fence. As I laid upon the grave and turned my face I saw standing beside me a stranger gentleman. He had heard me in my grief as he was riding along, and seeing me lying as I was in the dusk of the evening in the grave-yard, he had left his carriage to learn my trouble. I was startled as I saw him, but as I raised my eyes to his I saw the tears running down his cheeks. He learned by my wailings I was mourning and lamenting the death of my mother, and his sympathy had moved him to tears. "Come my son," said he, taking me by the hand, "don't feel so unhappily—don't weep—your mother is happy and at peace—you will see her again—you will be happy with her. Come my son, the dew is falling, you will be sick—dry your tears—jump into my carriage and ride." He led me along to his carriage and urged me to ride, though but a short distance, to my uncle's house. I yielded to his request. His words seemed to give me new life; for I had never received such tenderness from any one after the death of my mother. I jumped out of the carriage and went into my uncle's house, and the stranger rode away. My uncle had missed me, and saw me get out of the carriage and seemed to know with whom I had been riding. He sternly asked me where I had been. I was silent. "To the burying-ground, I suppose," said he. "Yes," he added, "to the burying-ground, and rode home with the devil. Now if I catch you going there again I shall not let you go without a severe punishment. I will let you escape, but this once on trial without chastisement."

The words of the stranger sunk deeply into my heart, and it seemed as if I could embrace him in my arms, and rest upon his bosom. But who he was I knew not, and no hope existed of ever knowing. He taught and spoke so differently from my uncle, that his words were like a soothing balm to my wounded spirit, whilst my uncle's were like the goading thorn. I reflected upon the conduct of my uncle towards me, his austere, unyielding manner, and upon the affectionate treatment of the stranger. The latter extended a kind hand and wept over my affliction, and soothed my grief with his tenderness. He was truly to me the kindly ministering angel, for over the grave he administered, and showed to me, love.

EXAMPLE OF THE SAVIOUR.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

"O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done."

The supper had been partaken, the benediction pronounced, and nothing now remained but the closing scene of the great tragedy which was then enacting. As the curtains of night enshrouded the earth, a little company is assembled in the retired shades of Gethsemane. While his companions recline upon the grassy couch, locked in the balmy embrace of sleep, there is one standing apart, from whom slumber has fled. A mental agony rends his soul; and lifting up his voice, he exclaims: "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done!" It was the Saviour of the world. His hour had come, and the sufferings of a cruel and ignoble death, were before him. There is a simple pathos in the exclamation of Christ, which cannot fail of reaching every susceptible heart. Here was the Redeemer of men—he who had been the friend of the friendless, the assuager of human woe—he who had rolled the grievous burden of sorrow from the children of misfortune—he who had relieved the distressed, given hope to the despairing, and caused the widow to rejoice, had now himself become a suppliant for relief!

For a moment, the weakness of human nature prevailed, and instinctively he shrunk from the dreadful trial which awaited him. The dark events passed in rapid review before his mind. He was to be apprehended by a multitude, with swords and staves; he was to be arraigned in the judgment hall; he was to be spit on, and buffeted, by the priests and elders; the crown of thorns was yet to pierce his brow; up Calvary's rugged acclivities, was he yet to toil beneath his cumbrous cross; and yet was he to be suspended as a degraded malefactor, before assembled thousands of his enemies, and endure the painful struggles of a lingering death! It was a view of these sufferings and indignities, that reduced him to the depth of sorrow, and caused him to pray: "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." As if he had said: Have I not yet sufficiently suffered to establish the truth? have I not toiled from city to city, throughout Judea, laboring in behalf of humanity? have I not endured hunger and thirst, and every bodily privation? have I not suffered shame, reproach, and contumely? is not this enough? Must my trials still be increased? Must I become the scoff and derision of the profligate multitude, and be reduced to the companionship of thieves? O my Father, is it not possible that this last, bitter cup can be removed; must I drain it to the very dregs? And in the intensity of his mental anguish, "his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood, falling down to the ground." Yet amid this inexpressible agony of mind, and in view of all the suffering before him, we hear him sweetly exclaim, in the voice of affection, and in full confidence of the superior wisdom of his Father: "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt!" Oh! what deep resignation, what full trust in the unfailing benignity of the Creator; what dutiful obedience to his Parent; what entire devotion to the cause of his God, the cause of his Gospel, the cause of salvation and love, are manifested in these words!

There is much valuable instruction to be drawn from this example of the Saviour. It teaches us to repose the most implicit confidence in our Creator. The sufferings through which Christ was to pass, were extremely severe; and could he have followed the promptings of his frail earthly nature, he would gladly have avoided them. But from his knowledge of the benignity of his Father, he was assured he would not call him to endure sufferings that were useless, and with entire trust, he therefore exclaimed: "Thy will be done."

Hereby are we instructed never to relinquish our confidence in the goodness of the Creator, even amid the most trying seasons of sorrow. When clouds and darkness surround us, and misfortune and adversity overtake us, we should never doubt the unfailing love and mercy of our God; a thought of this nature should not be permitted to enter the mind for a moment. But with a perfect assurance that his infinite wisdom will cause good to flow from temporary evil, let us submit to the dispensations of his providence, with the exclamation of Jesus:—"Thy will be done."

Here was an example of filial affection and obedience. The mighty Messiah, the Prince of Life, the Saviour of the world, bows before the King of kings, and addressing him by the endearing appellation of Father, testifies his willingness to obey his severe requirements, although nature shrinks from the trial: "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink, thy will be done." How confiding! Here is obedience the most perfect; here is a bright example worthy the imitation of mankind. God is our Father; and he has testified his parental love in showering unnumbered blessings on our heads. He has made requirements of us as his children, and desired us to obey his will. And it evidently devolves as highly upon us to allow God's will to be done, in preference to our own, as it did on the Saviour. Yea, more so. The sacrifice which the Deity required of Jesus, was not for the Saviour's benefit, but purely and solely for the good of others. But our Maker asks not this of us. He does not command us to make ourselves miserable, or to relinquish any real enjoyment. All he requires, is that we abstain from that which is the cause of wretchedness to ourselves and to our race; which would make us degraded and unhappy; and to practice the rules and precepts enjoined in the Gospel, and which when obeyed, will impart the purest enjoyment of which our nature is susceptible. And it Jesus unhesitatingly obeyed the requirements of God, when they led him to suffer solely for the good of others, ought we not with equal alacrity to fulfil the requirements of the same Being, when he enjoins it upon us to do that which is for our own peace and happiness? Judge ye.

The resignation exhibited by the Redeemer, is a bright example, worthy of imitation. When the path of a cruel and ignominious death lay before him, the contemplation of which caused "his sweat, as great drops of blood, to fall down to the ground," he avoided not the trial. Once fully satisfied it was the will of his Father that he should thus suffer, and he was wholly resigned to his fate. Not a murmur proceeded from his lips; not a repining thought entered his heart; not an emotion of opposition was visible. What a beautiful example for the world. There is no quality of the mind more valuable, or which should be more assiduously cherished and cultivated, than cheerful resignation to the allotments of Providence. We too often repine, because we have no clear perception of any beneficial results to flow from our misfortunes. But we should not forget that in this life we discover but detached portions of the operations of the laws of God's universal providence. Our foresight is confined to a circle very limited, while the omniscient mind of Jehovah spans eternity. From the beginning, he shapes the end of all things. We have every reason to believe that those events which we denominate misfortunes, are but counter revolving wheels in that vast yet harmonious machinery of events, which under the guidance of Infinite Wisdom, will terminate in God's transcendent glory, and man's eternal happiness. A reasonable confidence in the benevolence of the character of Jehovah, will lead us to adopt this conclusion, which will lessen every misfortune and sweeten every pain. This view of the movements of Providence, will "Teach us the hand of Love divine,

In evils to discern;
'Tis the first lesson which we need,
The latest which we learn."

The many valuable qualities exhibited in the character of Jesus, commend him in a high degree to our admiration and love. Let us often retrace in our minds, the history of his life; let us realize his philanthropy, the excellence of his doctrines, and the purity of his precepts; let us embalm his memory in our hearts, love his virtues, copy his examples, and obey his teachings.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. E. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1836.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

PERSONAL MATTERS, ETC.

There is an explanation due, why Br. Smith's last article, in reply to mine, on this subject, was published as editorial, instead of being inserted as a communication, as the previous articles had been. It is this. Br. Skinner was absent at Saratoga Springs, and I was confined to my bed by a re-attack of bilious fever. There was not sufficient editorial on hand to fill out the space allotted to that kind of copy—consequently we were compelled to publish Br. Smith's article as editorial.

As I wish to avoid mixing up personal matters, motives and influence with this subject, I will here notice two items of this kind in Br. Smith's article, to save notice of them when I come to reply to it formally.

When, in his first article, he alluded to his long experience, and his constant services to advance the cause, to strengthen his recommendation of a theological seminary, I regretted that he thus based it on his merits, which are so much greater than his own. But in his last article he seems to intimate that my cause is indebted to merits which he attributes to me, but which it is evident no man on earth possesses—viz., that my side must be well defended, for I am "capable of conceiving every reason, and of using every argument in" its favor! Now I need not say, what every reader of this paper knows, that a theological seminary has for its advocate one who is far my superior in age, in experience, in talents, in learning, in usefulness, and consequently in reputation and in influence—nor what I might with truth declare, that if kept down, it will be because the people oppose it, and not because great talents and learning are wanting among its advocates—but, I do say, that personal considerations connected with the advocates on either side, have nothing to do with the question. And may I not earnestly entreat all, to look only at the MERITS of the QUESTION?

Under the fourth division, after declaring a separation from the denomination, for certain causes, by certain Conventions and Associations, to be "violent and absurd," and appearing to intimate that such intentions may be avowed "for the purpose of overawing the denomination," and that they arise from a determination in those who separate, to "have every thing their own way"—after all this, Br. Smith says, he has no fears that his "worthy and much esteemed friend Grosh will abandon the denomination, even if it should build a theological seminary."

I am fond of praise, and dread censure from a friend so beloved as Br. Smith—and were I silent on this personal notice, it would imply, either, that I agreed with him in the above—or, that I was too fond of the praise and too much afraid of the censure, to dissent publicly from him. Neither is true—therefore will I dissent from him, candidly and frankly, at all hazards. I am one of those whose motives Br. Smith has misunderstood, and whose declarations (that, in certain cases, they would be, in conscience, compelled to leave the order) have been wrongly construed, by many, into "threats" to "overawe the denomination." Permit me, then, to answer for myself.

Had the Universalists been aristocratic, partial or despotic in their principles of ecclesiastical government, agreement with them in doctrine, alone, would NEVER have induced me to enter their fellowship. But I found their government based on the doctrine of divine impartiality and paternity, and on human equality and fraternity. A minister was not a spiritual lord and master, but a brother—a man; and a layman, instead of being his slave, was his friend and equal, and might, whenever he could get hearers, and sustain a good moral character, become a preacher also. In short, I found their government to be, like their doctrine, republican—for the whole people—and I united with them gladly. Now, the adoption of any measure which will destroy this religious liberty and equality—which will take power from one portion of the people (the laity,) and bestow it on a smaller portion (the clergy)—would compel me to leave a denomination whose principles of government I must detest and oppose—whose tyranny I would not share; whose slavery I could not submit to. Nor would this be all. I would wage an everlasting war of extermination against Universalist aristocracy and ecclesiastical usurpation, as readily (if not more so) as I ever have done against that of the Methodists, or any other sect. And I need not tell Br. Smith that many thousands of us do most solemnly believe, that the establishment of a theological seminary, by our denomination, will ultimately lead to the usurpation of power from the people, (by making the clergy, with their literary and theological tests, the judges of who the people shall employ to preach to them,) and the consequent establishment of a clerical aristocracy among us. I will only add, that should such a seminary be established, (which I now do not fear,) and our belief in its effects be verified, (as I am certain, in that case, they will be,) neither the fear of ruin from present pecuniary obligations, nor the fear of destroying the pleasant hopes of a long desired competency, which glitter eight or nine years ahead, would deter me from adhering to principles which I trust to cherish through my future, as I have done through my past life. Hard as it might be to bankrupt myself and beggar my children, I had rather do both, than be either a tyrant or a slave.

But do not mistake me. I do not believe that a time will ever come, which will render this dread alternative necessary. I am persuaded that the great mass of our laity—nineteen out of twenty, if not ninety-nine out of every hundred—are opposed to a theological seminary, with its attendant literary and theological tests. And even if one should unhappily, be established, I would not deem a separation necessary until all hope of overthrowing it was gone—nor then, until satisfied that even the development of its baleful consequences would not rouse the people to come to the rescue. Hence, as I said before, I have no fears at present of disunion in our denomination—and hope to live long and die rejoicing in its republican and fraternal fellowship.

I have done with personal matters on this subject—I trust I am fully understood in what I have said. My hand is yet unsteady, and perhaps my mind is not quite clear and strong as usual, but these clogs on the main question I was anxious to put out of the way. As soon as our Father in his providence restores me to former health and strength, I will attend to the arguments of Br. Smith with all the candor and respect to which he and they are so justly entitled.

A. B. G.

THE UTILITARIAN.

Rev. O. A. Brownson, Editor of the Boston Reformer, a sui generis working man's paper, thus notices my last number of the Utilitarian in his paper of the 30th July, the "weekly" of August 5th.

THE UTICA MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE, of Saturday last, asks the question, "Who will show us any good in being religious in thought or feeling?" and answers, after a long and very well written article, "It is good to be religious in thought and feeling, because religion is natural to man, and a conformity to nature is necessary to happiness."

We notice this not to dispute the truth of the answer, but to question the philosophy it involves. The utility or inutility of religion is no argument for believing or disbelieving it. We cannot believe a thing because it would be useful to believe it, or disbelieve it, because it would be injurious.

To be religious because religion is necessary to our happiness, is impossible. Religion is an end not a means. He who attempts to convert it into a means, and to measure it by its power to gain a certain end, would act as absurdly as he who should attempt to judge of poetry by mathematics, or to measure its worth by geometry.

To propose to a man to be religious for the sake of promoting his happiness, is to appeal to his selfishness, and can, in the long run, have no other effect upon him than to make him selfish. In religion there is always abnegation of self. Religion carries us out of ourselves, makes us seek a good of which self is not the centre, and binds us to interests and principles which belong to a world above and beyond all that which concerns our own immediate or ultimate happiness.

There is a species of spiritualism, or mysticism in the foregoing, with which I cannot pretend to cope, unless Mr. B. will first define his terms. "Religion" signifies, "to bind together again." If so, it is a means, and not an end. The object of the practical portion of the Christian religion is to make us god-like—if so, it is a means, and not an end. The doctrinal portion is to make us acquainted with God as our Father, "whom to know is life eternal"—if so, it is a means, and not an end.

As to utility, if Mr. B. can persuade men to be religious without any considerations of utility, I shall rejoice at it—but I find one main obstacle to people's embracing religion, to be the belief that "it is of no use—they are better off without it."

As to selfishness, only let a man become truly religious, and it will be as impossible for him to be selfish, as it will be for black to be white, and yet be black at the same time. But by "selfish" I apprehend that Mr. Brownson understands any regard for self, however connected with the good of others. If so, I must again disagree with him—for the religion of Jesus, so far from producing an "abnegation of self," (by which I understand Mr. B. to mean a total disregard or consideration of self,) makes the love of self the very standard—the very first principle—the foundation—of the greatest duties it enjoins between man and man. "Do unto others"—how?—"as you would have others do to you"—"Love your neighbor"—how?—"as yourself."

As to the absurdity of judging poetry by mathematics, or measuring its worth by geometry, I agree with Mr. B.; but I cannot see how he can compare these with a recommendation of religion because it promotes happiness. His bump of comparison must have got into the mist of mysticism about these days, or had its spiritual eyes opened so as to see what is, to such poor matter-of-fact mortals like myself, perfectly invisible.

LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

WELL DONE, BR. PRATT.—Truly, Br. Pratt, thine was a noble deed, and the friends of the Institute will long remember it with gratitude. We most cordially and heartily concur with thee in wishing that thine example may "stand in the rear of hundreds" of similar cases, which we may have the pleasure of recording. And we are confident that there are hundreds of places where a greater donation might be obtained with what Br. P. calls "a little resolute activity." Brethren, friends of the Liberal Institute, friends of untrammelled science and unsectarian education, try it—try the experiment for once—test the liberality of your fellow-townsmen and neighbors, and see what kind of stuff they're made of. I'll warrant it shall do no harm. Here follows Br. P.'s letter, which was so unexceptionable in its form, and so doubly acceptable in its contents, having the real matter-of-fact substance within.

D. S.

"Stockbridge, August 18, 1836.

"Rev. D. SKINNER.—I was appointed an agent sometime last Spring, to collect funds for the Clinton Liberal Institute. Something had already been said to our friends in this quarter upon the subject, but with little encouragement from them. When the appeal from the General Agent to the Universalist ministers appeared in the 30th number of the Magazine and Advocate, as there is no Universalist minister in this immediate vicinity, I resolved to act with more energy, and to do it quickly. In conversation with some of our friends, when I was first appointed agent, we thought we should be able to get ten dollars by asking for a dollar each from as many persons; but on applying, we found little encouragement. But when the appeal to the ministers appeared, it was resolved by the friends nearest to me, that thirty dollars should be raised, and I set about it accordingly; and I now send you forty-five dollars and fifty cents, as the result of a little resolute activity.

"I am persuaded that this transaction should not be a prominent case, and do wish that it may stand in the rear of hundreds that you may have the satisfaction soon to have reported to you, that I may have the pleasure of learning that those who have been the immediate guardians of the Institute, are relieved from that weight of anxiety which has so long hung upon their minds; and the liberal part of community exonerated from that censure which must be their companion, until the relief is fully given.

MATTHEW PRATT."

ANOTHER—AND BETTER STILL.

Since the above was prepared we have received the following from Clinton, dated August 22, 1836:—

"LIBERAL INSTITUTE DONATION."

"R. W. Haskins, Esq., of Buffalo, N. Y., has recently purchased the beautiful hill and other contiguous grounds immediately in the rear of the Clinton Liberal Institute, and generously presented the whole to that institution. The present cost was about seven hundred dollars. By direction of Mr. H. the hill is to be planted with suitable trees and shrubbery, and the top leveled for future use.—Communicated."

We have now only room to remark, that the above is indeed a splendid donation, and will by the officers and friends of the Institute generally, be appreciated and remembered with true and lasting gratitude. Oh, that a score of able and as truly liberal men as friend Haskins would give each of them a similar exhibition of their liberality.

SECTARIANISM OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

How great is the pity that as widely circulated and popular a literary paper as the New-York Mirror, which claims to be "devoted to literature and the fine arts," "To catch the manners living as they rise," to feast the intellectual man, to give tone to public morals and sentiments on an elevated key, to amuse, instruct and edify the youth of both sexes and the fashionable circles throughout our land—should stoop to the narrowness of sectarianism, and crowd into its columns, from week to week, some of the absurdest dogmas that ever man believed, and which had their origin during the darkest ages the church ever witnessed! It is bad enough, in all conscience, for such papers as the New-York Observer, the Evangelist, the Methodist Advocate and Journal, the Philadelphian, the Presbyterian, and other kindred prints, to publish such absurdities; to swallow which their most devoted followers, have as much as they can possibly get along with; but it is really too much for the enlightened public to bear with silence, to see our highest literary papers, stoop to so ignoble a calling. Take for example, the following from the Mirror of August 6.

"THE NECESSITY OF AN ATONEMENT.—It springs from the attribute of divine justice. The Judge of all the earth must do right. His justice is the regulator of his holiness and mercy in the government of the world, and maintains its universal order, harmony and peace. Man has broken the law of God. God is bound, from the holy necessity of his being, to protect his own law. He cannot permit an impeachment of that law, without an impeachment of himself. Either he must trample on his own law, or his justice must punish the offender, and thus make room for the exercise of mercy.

'Die he, or Justice must.'

To this view of the necessity of the atonement, it is frequently objected, and it may be well here to meet the objection. If it is man's dignity to forgive without satisfaction, why should God extend pardon to a sinner only on the ground of an expiatory atonement. The reply is, because he is God and not man. The same mode of procedure that would impart glory and dignity to man, would stamp with impurity the divine government, and derange the harmony of all the divine attributes. To illustrate the idea, I will cite the case of the king of the Locrians, who, to prevent the commission of a particular crime, enacted a law, punishing the perpetrator with the loss of his eyes. His own son was the first to offend against the law. The king, yearning over his son with a father's love, yet bound by his own law to punish him, resolves that he himself will lose one eye, and thus evince his love for his son; and that his son should lose one eye, and thus sustain the dignity of the law. Now, only admit that God is what he has declared himself to be, immaculately holy, strictly just, and you have at once an argument pleading for the absolute necessity of an atonement. God has framed a law. It originated in his own principles of holiness and justice. It is a pure, equitable, and reasonable law. To suppose that he would extend the act of pardon to a criminal, who had wilfully infringed upon that law, without such a satisfaction as would maintain its purity, and illustrate its equity, would be to suppose him capable of denying his own existence. The mercy that glows in his heart would pardon, therefore he gives his own Son. The law that the rebel has broken, demands satisfaction, therefore that Son dies. Thus the law is honored, holiness secured, the sinner saved, and God is a just God and a Saviour. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God."

"The necessity of an atonement!" yes, we readily grant the necessity. But what kind of an atonement was there a necessity for? Not such an one as the writer supposes by any means. For that, so far from being a satisfaction to justice, would have been a most flagrant and eternal violation of every principle of justice. No such atonement as he supposes is ever mentioned in the New Testament. The only atonement known to, or mentioned in the Gospel, is reconciliation—not the reconciliation of God, for he was never irreconciled; but the reconciliation of man. He was the irreconciled party—he needed, and he it was that received the atonement. See Rom. v: 10, 11; 2 Cor. v: 14-21.

This Orthodox writer says, "Either he (God) must trample on his own law or his justice must punish the offender, and thus make room for the exercise of mercy.

'Die he, or Justice must.'

Well, does God punish the offender, according to this writer? No, by no means. So far from punishing the offender, he lets him escape all punishment, and punishes his innocent Son, who, so far from being an "offender," was entirely "without sin—holy, harmless, undefiled." If then, the Deity tormented and punished the innocent, and let the guilty go clear, he must have committed the most flagrant violation of justice conceivable. Surely his justice, if he ever had any, must have expired in the act.

Again, he says, "It is objected that, if it is man's dignity to forgive without satisfaction, why should God extend pardon to the sinner only on the ground of an expiatory atonement;" and replies to it thus: "Because he is God and not man. The same mode of procedure that would impart glory and dignity to man, would stamp with impurity the divine government, and derange the harmony of all the divine attributes." Why so? we ask. Is God holy? yes. Well, does he not command us to be holy because he is holy—to be like him—to be imitators of God as dear children? Surely he does. We deny then, in toto, the principles laid down by this writer. It is not true, that what would be in principle to the honor and glory of man, would be dishonorable and inglorious, in principle, to the divine Being. We know that certain overt acts in men may be wrong, in themselves considered, without any knowledge or reference being had on the part of man, to the ultimate bearing and final results, which acts, if performed by God, might be right, as viewed in reference to their ultimate and certain results, which man did not see; as for example, the conduct of Joseph's brethren in selling him into Egypt. But if the same motive, or principle of action, operate on both, then both must be right or both wrong. The principle cannot be right in one that is wrong in the other, and vice versa.

The reference to the conduct of the king of the Locrians is a most unfortunate reference for this writer. His law must be honored and its dignity maintained, therefore he puts out one of his own eyes and one of the guilty son's eyes! Now if this story has any bearing on the question in hand, it is this: The human family all deserved endless damnation—God had absolutely threatened it. Therefore to fulfil his threatening and honor his law, he concludes to divide the penalty between himself and his offending creature—so he inflicts half of endless damnation on himself and the other half on man! Will this writer have the goodness to tell us at what period in eternity this endless damnation is to be divided between God and his creatures, and which is to endure the first half of it! But there appears to be another difficulty in maintaining the honor of the law and the veracity of the law-giver; for the former demanded and the latter threatened, not half, but the whole of endless misery, not to the innocent, but to the guilty! This position allows the law to be but half fulfilled and the threatening to be but half true, or half verified: and after all the position is half heretical. For genuine Autodoxy maintains that no part of the penalty was inflicted on the guilty violator of the law, but all on the innocent Son! Therefore no part of the threatening is executed on the sinner!

The law that the rebel has broken demands satisfaction; therefore the holy legislator—punishes somebody else with the most vindictive fury, and lets the guilty go clear! Admirable consistency! Dignified and glorious Justice! How art thou honored by those who profess so high a reverence for thee! And how are our polite literary papers honored by such articles! D. S.

LOST.

Br. D. R. BIDDLECOM, on the 8th or 9th inst., either at Madison or Cazenovia, or between those places, lost his POCKET BOOK, containing between twenty and thirty dollars, and some other papers of no value but to the owner. His name is on the Pocket Book and some papers in it by which it can be identified. The finder will please leave it with Mr. Ward, Cazenovia; Mr. Curtis, Madison; Rev. S. R. Smith, Clinton; or Rev. A. B. Grosh, Utica; and accept the thanks of the owner.

LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—Gurdon Smith, Esq., Potsdam, N. Y., and Dr. Lewis, of Hamilton, are authorized to receive and transmit donations to the funds of the Liberal Institute.

POETRY.

From "Hours of Song."

IF THOU HAST LOST A FRIEND.

If thou hast lost a friend
By hard or hasty word,
Go—call him to thy heart again;
Let pride no more be heard:
Remind him of those happy days,
Too beautiful to last—
Ask, if a word should cancel years
Of truth and friendship past?
Oh, if thou'st lost a friend
By hard or hasty word,
Go—call him to thy heart again;
Let pride no more be heard.

Oh! tell him from thy thought
The light of joy hath fled;
That in thy sad and silent breast,
Thy lonely heart seems dead—
That mount and vale—each path ye trod,
By morn or evening dim—
Reproach you with their frowning gaze,
And ask your soul for him.
Then if thou'st lost a friend,
By hard or hasty word,
Go—call him to thy heart again;
Let pride no more be heard.

AMERICAN SOCIETY.

'Undoubtedly, simplicity of manners is one of the great pillars of morality. It circumscribes our wants, and thus diminishes those besetting temptations to extravagance and dishonesty which originate in and receive their power from the love of dress, splendor, display and luxury. Those who set an inordinate value upon the gratification of these vanities, will come in time to sacrifice to their attainment all that solid stock of happiness which is derived from the possession of integrity and independence. An age of simplicity, is, therefore, an age of morality; and hence it is, that the wisest writers of antiquity have made simplicity of manners essential to the preservation of that liberty which cannot be sustained by a luxurious and corrupt people. That our own high feelings of independence are rapidly fleeing away before the quick steps of ostentation and luxury, and that the love of wealth, as the means of attaining to these gratifications, is becoming the ruling passion, must be obvious to all observers.'—PAULING.

It is to the agricultural portion of our country that we must look for the preservation of our liberties. The simplicity of their manners, and their isolated situation, enable them to think, and judge, and act for themselves. Uninfluenced by the power of sympathy with the many, and devoid of that restless excitability which places the populace of our cities in the power of every demagogue who harangues them from the polls or the market place, and who can fire them either to acts of destruction or deeds of patriotism, this sober and independent body of freemen govern their feelings by their reason, and their actions by their sense of right.

With what consciousness of superiority must the farmer look down upon those who are childishly triumphing in the possession of fine houses, fine furniture, and splendid equipages; and with what pity must he regard those who are wearing out their lives and energies, to gain those gilded play things and gewgaws of mature age. As for him, he treads the imperial carpet with as much indifference as he does the dusty pathway; and the grassy bank affords a more inviting seat than the most luxurious ottoman or fauteuil.

From my heart, I honor the countryman, in whatever situation he may be found. Look at the wagoner beside his team; the manliness of his gait, the flourish of his whip, the very wearing of his hat, show that he is a freeman—that he feels no superior. Contrast him with the journeyman mechanic of the city. The latter is either a copyist of others, in a different station in life, or he is embittered by jealousy and envy of that class whom he styles the aristocracy, and whom he imagines to be leagued in an unholy alliance against the rights and privileges of his fellow-workmen.

Look at the wealthy farmer—the man of character and intelligence. When among his laborers, he gives them the right hand of fellowship, and converses with them as with fellow-countrymen. Conscious of his own standing and influence, he assumes no superiority, but admits them to his house, and often to his table. And in their turn, they always regard him with that deference and respect which is due not to his estate, but to his mind and character.

How different is the man of fortune in our cities, whose riches are the result of a life devoted to gain. His workmen, his clerks, his less wealthy neighbors, are those whose society he most wishes to avoid. Fearful, lest those with whom he cannot help associating in the way of business, should make this acquaintance an opportunity of visiting him, he wraps himself up in the mantle of self-consequence, as the only way of preventing personal contact. He looks at his lofty mansion, his hired servants, and thinks all beneath him, whose means will not enable them to live in the same luxury and ostentation. Having commenced as a pedler or mechanic, he tries to banish it from his memory, and strives more anxiously to keep this unknown from his children, than he would do had he been a forger or defaulter. He would rather meet an enemy than the friend of his father, or of his own early days; and his near sightedness prevents his recognizing any one who patronized him in his former trade. Such are the pitiful shifts, the meannesses, of those whose only claims to distinction are their riches and their gorgeous display.

A country life appears to be as favorable to the moral healthfulness of man, as it is to his physical well-being; and its effects are equally manifested in the day-laborer as in the landed proprietor. It is this noble stock of American freeman that will prevent our becoming a puny and degenerate race. It is amidst this host that we must look for the true worship of liberty, which is well nigh extinct in the bosoms of those who bow at the crowded shrine of mammon.

Wherever human beings congregate in masses, there will always be found the workings of human corruption. In the society of cities, the influence of evil will ever be more apparent than that of good, even if it be not greater, as some have said. It is true, there is much that is pure and elevated, there is much that is high and holy, among the dwellers in cities; but its effects are not sensibly felt beyond its own immediate circle of action. The "still small voice" of religion and of reason is only heard in the hours of retirement and reflection. The hurrying crowd are impelled by their passions—those impetuous leaders, whose clamor overpowers the claims of truth, integrity and virtue.

The multitudes that throng our thoroughfares, are divided into two prominent classes—those who are toiling and grasping for wealth, and they who are ostentatiously spending it. Look at the money-seeker; observe his care worn, his anxious countenance. Follow him to his counting room; see him clutch with nervous eagerness, the sum he has just gained in the way of trade, but not in the way of upright dealing. Look at him as he goes over page after page of his ledger, and sums up column after column of his figures, to estimate, the profits of the past year. Newton could not have shown half the trembling anticipation, the eager delight, as he was about concluding the calculation that was to establish his great discovery, that this man exhibits as his pen writes down the thousands that have been added to his former gains.

This craving desire for wealth is the fruitful source of fraud and forgery, and of every species of gambling, from the wild speculation to the lottery and the card table. This lust for gain—this master passion that deadens every other emotion—has spread its baleful influence far and wide throughout our cities. It is not confined to the avowed worshippers of mammon; it is not only amidst the money changers in the outer court of the temple, that its corruption is seen; it has entered within the veil, and those who have openly professed to have renounced "the world and its lusts," by becoming the followers of Him, who, when on earth, "had not where to lay his head"—even these will lift the sacramental cup to their lips, while every desire of their hearts is devoted to the accumulation of money. I have heard Christian mothers try to convince their youthful daughters of the happiness to be enjoyed in the possession of splendid establishments, and in having wealth at command. I have seen Christian fathers give their blooming, lovely girls to the arms of sensualists and dotards, and then complacently and smilingly receive the congratulations of their friends on the happy occasion. Is this a false picture? Would that it were! But it is too true! The canker of gain hath eaten deeply into the very heart's core of society.

Let us now turn to the money spender, and see what was the object for which these treasures were so anxiously laid up. He has now left the worship of mammon for that of fashion. He surrounds himself and his family with the splendor that is to gain him admission into those circles that have been the haven of his desires and endeavors. At first he may meet with something like a repulse; but if he repeat his advances, and continue to increase the number and the brilliancy of his gilded trappings, he will see the gates unclosed, and find himself most warmly welcomed by those who most loudly condemned his presumption. This being gained, it is now requisite for him to copy the notions, the manners, and the fashions of those around him. He finds that these are all drawn from European models, and in order to make a faithful imitation, it is considered necessary to take his family across the Atlantic, that they "may catch the living manners," from seeing the nobility passing in their equipages, from living near their palaces, or perhaps by the supreme happiness of gaining admission to an entertainment given by some one who is second cousin to a lord or a baronet. Oh, fashion! what follies are committed in thy name! To an European observer, these follies would be a fit theme for ridicule, but in a true American, they excite feelings of the deepest mortification. Can such an one read or hear of the conduct of some travelling Americans, and of American society in Paris, and not feel his ears tingle and his cheeks blush with honest indignation? And it is by society like this, both at home and abroad, that Americans are judged by Europeans. The fashionable world, in any country, is but an unfair specimen of national character. It is generally composed of the imitators of other nations—the idle, the vain, and the unintellectual—and this is especially so in our own country. Our men of character and intelligence are occupied on the busy arena of life. Our women of cultivated minds and simplicity of manners are found in the social circle, or at their own firesides. In fashionable society, as it is at present constituted, there is little to attract such men or such women, and it is unfortunate that this is the case. For, however pretty or light may be the materials of which it is composed, its prominence in the public eye, its blazonings, its efforts to draw attention and admiration will always give it influence. And the influence is powerful. From the Almack system of London, to its pitiful imitations in our own cities, we see the uncontrolled sway it can exercise at will. And what are the effects of this influence? It is to this we owe that love of splendor and display which has infected all classes of our citizens. It is this that has made wealth so attractive that men will sacrifice their integrity, their reputation, and even Heaven itself, to obtain it. It is this that is undermining the fair fabric of our national prosperity, by giving rise to those jealousies and heart-burnings that cause the cry of "Down with the aristocracy!" to be muttered between the teeth, or boldly to be proclaimed, in times of popular excitement. To this also is owing that fearful tide of foreign notions and foreign innovations that is pouring along our commercial emporiums, and which, unless arrested in its course, will swallow up every thing like American individuality and republican simplicity.

In tracing the unhappy effects of this influence, let us go back and see what portion of this society gives the tone to its usages and opinions. If we discover the origin of this evil, we may also find the remedy that is needed. I hope I shall not be considered a libeller of my own sex, when I lay the blame at their feet. The influence of fashionable society is the reflected influence of woman, and to her we must look for the reform and reorganization of American society.

Let the female of intellect and judgment, who has leisure at command, consider whether she has done her duty in leaving such power in the hands of coxcombs, silly women, and girls who still need a teacher. If men of integrity, when disgusted with the chicanery and corruption of some politicians, were to retire from public life, and leave every thing to mercenary office seekers, what would become of our government? But such men know and perform their duty better: exerting the whole weight of their influence to counteract the evil doctrines disseminated by designing men, and striving to bring the unthinking mass to a sense of their true interests, they firmly fix their feet on the rock of political principle, and point out the course to the ignorant and unwary, while the tide of calumny and corruption rushes by them unheeded. It cannot move them from their place, for their object is their country's good.

Our government—the bulwark of our liberties—is entrusted to the care of America's sons. And let them guard it well, for it is the Freedom of the World that is committed to their charge. And since they have left female influence to regulate society, let the daughters of America remember their responsibility. Let them speedily unite in throwing off the yoke of European bondage, and claim their independence of foreign fashions and imported customs. And then, and then only, will American society be, what it ought always to have been, a beautiful illustration of republican simplicity and republican principles. G.

Fear never was a friend to the love of God or man, to duty or conscience, to truth, probity or honor.

DEATHS.

In Rock Port, Loraine county, Ohio, on September 2, 1835, Mr. JONAS W. MILLS, in the 40th year of his age. He lived in the faith and died rejoicing in the hopes of the Christian religion. His funeral was attended by Br. D. Tenny, and the consolations of the Gospel, tendered to the congregation from 2 Tim. 1: 10.

Address to Youth.....A Sermon.

BY REV. T. J. SMITH.

"Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." Eccl. xii: 1.

In essaying to address the young, I cannot avoid the embarrassment which the delicacy of the undertaking necessarily imposes upon me. Aside from the consideration of failing to attract their attention, by anything that can be said on the subject so commonly thought loathing and disgusting, there is still another consequence which we would gladly avoid—viz., the infringement of the right of dictation which belongs to seniority, or the relative bonds of family connexion. Hence, in trying to avoid Charybdis, we may run against Scylla. Or, in other words, in trying to awaken the attention of the young to the subject of pure religion and undefiled, and to place their feet in the paths of wisdom, which are pleasant and full of peace, and to urge them to run the race set before them, as virtue and religion require—there is a fear of treading on forbidden ground and coming in direct contact with the prejudices of parents, brothers, sisters and friends, and thus dashing our little barque upon the shoals.

The father, with his attention all awake, is ready to criticise every word spoken, to approve or condemn as the case may be. He wishes to scan the counsel that is given to his son, whose actions are watched with careful anxiety, and every means tried to prepare him to fill his station in life with satisfaction and honor. And this paternal care is worthy the bosom of the father. Without it, he would not be worthy the name; and with it, he will not fail to approve all judicious advice for the well-being and happiness of his child.

The mother, likewise, wishes to hear the words spoken to her daughter, whose happiness Providence has made as dear to her bosom as her own existence. She feels a lively interest in all that concerns her, and wishes that her course in life may be bright and glorious—her character as fair as the vernal flower, and her innocence unsullied as angel purity. While the young, themselves, if aroused at all from indifference, are apt to anticipate nothing from a religious discourse but a dull monotony of dismal opinions, or gloomy advice. They are ready to exclaim, What have we to do, or what want we to do, with the many-headed thing called religion? The unreasonable and contradictory forms it has appeared in, leads us to doubt the possibility of finding religion reasonable and consistent, or pure and undefiled.

My young friends, it is the counterfeit of religion which you have seen, and been taught to believe was the true—the angel commissioned from Heaven, to bless the children of earth with the eternal radiance of her peerless form, and guide them to the haven of peace.

With these preliminary remarks, permit me to call your attention to the words of our text. "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."

We design giving a clear explanation of these words, and the doctrine deducible therefrom; and closing with some appropriate observations addressed directly to the youth. These words were the fruit of experience and wisdom. They were penned by the wise king of Israel, where the costly and magnificent temple reared its massive walls in the city of Jerusalem, where the ark of the covenant, overlaid with gold, was hid from all but the favored Jews. When the sacerdotal robe hung over the form of the sanctified Levite, and the regal sceptre, with all the splendors of royalty, were found with the worthy Solomon. When the rites and ceremonies of the legal dispensation were at their zenith—when the emblems and types of a better dispensation were in existence, and practiced—when the blood of the helpless lamb freely flowed through its silken fleece, and its tender form was stretched upon the smoking altar, from whence the incense floated to Heaven as an offering of peace—when the priest, bearing the breast-plate of judgment, set about with twelve stones of different colors, whereon were inscribed the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel; with the hem of his garment hung around with golden bells; with all these about his person, once a year he went into the holiest of all, and symbolically died for the sins of the people—when the Mosaic covenant, with its binding force, alone was known; then it was that the son of him whose simple sling had brought the proud boaster of the Philistine host low with the dust, sat upon the throne of Judah and governed his people in righteousness and wisdom. Then it was that our text had its origin. Long since then the sacerdotal robe has fallen from the shoulders of the faithful Levite—the altar has ceased to smoke with its accustomed victims, and the walls of the splendid temple, after having echoed seven years in succession to the prophetic woe pronounced against it, have had their frail materials hurled from their dizzy height into one mouldering mass of ruins—and long since, also, has the regal staff departed from the powerful tribe of Judah—for wasting time has been near them all, and touched with its crumbling hand the glorious monuments of antiquity. The circumstances of man also have changed; for since that time, one more glorious than the brightest constellations in the religious horizon, has arisen, and sounded the trump of the Gospel of peace—even the Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings, has unfurled his golden pinions over this once benighted clime, and lighted up the concave of heaven with the matchless glories of infinite love. As the twinkling luminaries of midnight's gloom retire before the king of day and veil their faces in obscurity, so passed the legal polity away before the superior and transcendent brightness of the Gospel dispensation. Still, the words we have chosen for a motto, are worthy the careful consideration and remembrance of all concerned, and may as well be applied at the present time unto that class to whom they were addressed, as to those in like circumstances in years long gone by.

What, then, are we to understand by remembering our Creator? Are we to understand it to be our duty to remember what to us is unknown? Far from it: we have no remembrance of things of which we have had no previous knowledge; for we cannot remember until we know something to remember. Before you properly can be called upon to remember your Creator, you must possess some definite idea or knowledge respecting him. No one has lived to the years of discretion, without receiving more or less instruction respecting the Creator of all. In every scene of earth, he is found; his very being is necessary to the existence of the world. Without his energy, the grand movements of the harmonious whole would fall back to chaotic confusion, and darkness again cover the drear abyss. He is ever present, ever felt, with all that live, move, and have being, and "where he vital breathes, there must be joy." The works of nature around, above, below, all bear testimony to the intelligence of man of the character of their Creator. The sun is a bright emblem of his goodness, glory and immutability—the stars are the workmanship of his hands; and with all created things, the marks of his forming hand are found, and his goodness richly enjoyed by every animated being, at every moment of its life.

But to the written revelation of his word must we turn, to find the regulations of which he would have us mindful, holding in remembrance to do the commands and laws he has instituted for the observance of man.

To remember him, is to remember his words and works for our good. His works are full of instruction, and worthy the careful attention and examination of man; but his words are what should be held in sacred remembrance. His requirements were made, not for the good of himself, alone, but for the good of us, his children. The laws of the physical, as well as of the moral world, were ordained for the happiness of each constituent part of his wonderful universe. It is said, in regard to what is required of man, "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?" The Saviour tells us, the first and great command is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind and strength; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: on these two commands, hang all the law and the prophets." These being the first commands to Christian obedience, they are therefore the basis of all religious duty.

Think not, then, that there is anything debasing in loving God; for to love him is to love his works, and give a willing obedience to his commands for our joy and peace. It is to love ourselves—the principle by which we are sustained in life—yea, to love life and all its blessings. And his commands are but guards to those blessings, to keep us from evil, and insure us the continual sunshine of happiness and love. For, "from the Father of lights cometh down every good and every perfect gift, with whom there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning." "The same to-day, yesterday and forever," loving all he has made; for he never would have created anything to hate it—whose very nature and essence is love—yea, infinite love; and his love has moved him to make ample provision for the universal and enduring happiness of all his children. Mistrust not, then, the sovereign goodness of your Creator; who does not permit a sparrow to fall to the ground without his notice, and who has numbered the very hairs of your heads—he will not be unmindful of man, but will bless him in goodness; for he is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all the works of his hands.

Such, then, is but a brief sketch of the character of our Creator, whom we are commanded to remember in the days of our youth, when the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when we shall say, we have no pleasure in them.

Again: to remember our Creator, is to keep in mind the commands he has given us with regard to one another. The love of God, of his works, and of life itself, are the foundation of religion, and indirectly lead to all the duties of man; but for the sake of more clearness we make a distinction and class the remaining duties of life under the head of fraternal obligations. The Creator has instituted, for our remembrance in practice, the command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." And if we wish anything more full and definite than this, let us hear our Saviour's words, "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." Wise and holy law! Would to Heaven it were written on the tablet of every heart, in everlasting characters of gold, burnished so bright that it would shine clear and full in every action of human life. To remember these things, to do them, is to be religious—'tis to follow the steps of Christ, and entitles all who love God and their neighbor, to the name of Christian. To love our neighbor as ourselves, to do unto others as we wish them to do unto us, is but a reasonable duty for us to perform, and is far better than burnt offerings and sacrifices. The requirements of our Creator, all, directly or indirectly, have our good in view, and it is well for us to heed them in practice, thereby planting deep within our bosoms the principles of life, of love and happiness, that shall grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength, open our bosoms to love all the works of creation, and give us joy in seeing the happiness of all that move and have being. Then will you "remember your Creator in the days of your youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when you shall say, I have no pleasure in them."

It may be said, in truth, that when we do not remember our Creator, the evil days will come—yea, have already come to him who disregards the laws of Heaven and abuses the works of his Creator, despises his brother man, and plunges in every scene of guilt. To him, the years have drawn nigh, and his lips declare he has no pleasure in them.

You love your parents—and why? Because they love you, and strive to procure every needful blessing for you to enjoy. How much more, then, ought you to be "in subjection to the Father of spirits and live?"—how much more reason have you to love your Creator, who is the author of your existence, and giveth ample means to your parents to provide for happiness—yea, from whom cometh down every good and every perfect gift? Even in the days of thy youth, it is well to remember thy Creator—his being, his power, omnipresence, justice, mercy, truth and love—and to practice all his commandments. This remembrance will plant within your bosoms the germ of holiness, which will root itself in the native soil there found—will vegetate and grow—will give strength to your weakness, consolation to your troubling cares and perplexities in the busy scenes of the world, and enable you to conquer all opposition that may arise, and finally will sweetly bloom and blossom, exhaling its rich odors at the portals of the tomb. Without this remembrance of these practical duties of religion, in vain may you hope for success in any undertaking in life. Darkness, confusion and doubt will be your portion—trouble, perplexity, and every evil work—grief, pain and sorrow, with bitter disappointment, will mar every scene in your wanderings from the light of Gospel truth, and the sun of your earthly existence will set in darkness, and no lingering ray of hope dissipate the impervious gloom of the grave.

There must be a fixed principle of action, in order to warrant uniform success in any enterprise of man. All the regularity of the material world is owing to such a principle, and without it all matter would tend to original chaos. Without this fixed, governing and directing principle, who could safely calculate the result of human actions from the means employed? In vain would the mariner try to guide his frail barque over the foaming surges of the trackless main without the trusty helm. Without this principle of order in creation, in vain might he stand beside his binnacle, rocked to and fro by the billowy deep—in vain might he stand, when midnight's sable curtain clothes the scene in starless gloom, and watch the trembling steel, his only pilot. Let order be destroyed, and the faithful needle in the compass no longer vibrates—the pole has ceased its attraction—the North, the South, the East, and the West are Babel terms, and the poor sailor must drift with the wind, without a guide to lead him to the ocean's verge, or sink within the giddy whirlpool's roar. But thanks be to Heaven, there is a principle of order throughout the Creator's works. The sun knows his time to rise and set—the moon remembers her changes—the stars know their orbits in the skies—the seasons do not forget their order—the dew and rain know when to fall—the wind when to breathe her balmy gales—the ocean knows when to heave her tides—the needle, in storm or calm, in light or darkness, knows where to find the northern star.

And shall it be said that man knows not where to find his Maker—knows not his laws and his duty to his fellow-man? To find his Creator, man looks above, below, around, within, and sees him every where. Her laws are found in the revelation of his will, and he knows his duty to his brother is love—yea, his duty to all is love. This love to all is a principle of action, and it is remembering God—it is the stay and staff of life—it is the sun-beam of heaven shining over this vale of tears, and irradiating it with the rainbow of joy and peace.

"Remember, then, thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."

Suffer me now to address myself directly to the young. You now occupy that station in life which has been called the season of dreams—a time of dreams, indeed, when happiness flutters around the downy pillow of repose, and infantile hopes give us extacies of delight. But the chill of coming years too often awakens us to a full sense of the vapory delusion. Youth has been compared to the morning—and well to the opening day may it claim a similarity, for it is the morning of human life. The sun-beams dart their rays of light through aurora's veil—the dew-drops sparkle on the spires of grass and on the painted flowrets of hill and dale—they all are in fragrant bloom—the wind awakes from its caves of rest, and begins its sport with the aspen's leaf—the birds inspired with love anew, at day's return, tune their various notes and chant great nature's harmonious hymn. All is lovely, bright and gay.

"Young thoughts have music in them,
Love and happiness their theme;
And music wanders in the wind
That lulls the morning dream.

"And there are angel voices heard
In childhood's frolic hours;
When life is but an April day
Of sunshine and of showers.

"Youth is the vision of the morn,
It flies the coming day;
It is the blossom on the thorn
By rude winds swept away.

"'Tis like the image of the sky
In glassy waters seen,
When not a cloud appears to fly
Across the blue serene.

"'Tis like a cloud of fleecy form,
Seen on a vernal day,
That veers before the coming storm,
Then weeps itself away.

"'Tis gentle as the sounds that flow
From an Eolian lyre,
When passing spirits seem to throw
Soft magic o'er the wire.

"'Tis like the soft and spicy gale
That flutters round the grove,
When morning mists ethereal sail,
Where angel spirits rove.

"'Tis transient as the vivid gleam
Of forked lightnings in the sky,
Or, like the fitful morning dream,
With waking hours—to die."

This season is now yours. The beams of morning shine upon you. The opening scenery of life, in perspective, extends the flowery lawn to your longing visions. The hope of happiness lures you on with hasty steps. You now begin to emerge into the busy scenery of the changing world. You are forming habits or moulding characters that will go with you through coming years. Then how important—how all-important, that you have some principle fixed and sure, that shall temper, guide and control your every movement in life—some polar star, with its attractive powers, toward which all your various actions shall uniformly tend.

And what shall this principle—this power of attraction be? what can you expect it to be but your Creator's character—the lovely features of the Christian religion—the choice moral duties of human life? Think not that the great Creator is unworthy of remembrance—imagine not that religion is a many-headed monster—"God is love"—"pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the widows and fatherless in their affliction, and keep oneself unspotted from the world." Superstition and bigotry, alone, are of hydra form. The Saviour's "yoke is easy," and his "burden light." "The ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Your Creator is not an enemy to the innocent amusements of youth. He who has painted the flowers of the field, is no cynic to censure them for vanity and pride, and to excommunicate them from the ranks of the faithful. He who has given the powers of risibility to the human system is not offended with the playful smile. He who has caused the quivering leaf to play, and given activity to the various grades of animated being, is not offended at the sprightly play of healthful activity and grace, or displeased with the mellow tones of the human voice in cheerful song. He loves them all—beauty, order, activity, music, combined with innocence, are his delight. And he who shuts his eyes because there is beauty around—who stops his ears at the sound of harmony—who mourns over the innocent sprightliness of youth, and draws his face into a sanctified frown, at the levity of childhood's hours—he is himself the child of superstition, the disciple of ignorance, the votary of bigotry. God does not require this—to rightfully serve your God is to serve yourselves, and to serve yourselves aright is to happy your fellow-beings. Oh, then, "remember your Creator in the days of your youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when you shall say, I have no pleasure in them."

Let it not be said that we stand here the advocate for vice, or the justifier of sin. We are not the friend of either; and we say, lest we may have been misunderstood, let all your amusements be tempered with innocence, and let modesty be the companion of your sports. When intemperate excess or any vice or disorder, makes its appearance, withdraw in haste from the scene, and shun every appearance of evil as you would the cruel jaws of the grave. Put far from you the intoxicating bowl, and be temperate in all things. Be consistent in word and deed. Let not your lips be polluted by taking the name of your God in vain. Suffer your right arm to drop from your shoulder—your tongue to cleave to the roof of the mouth, before you are guilty of a malicious deed, or of one wilful lie. And on all occasions, as you prize life and happiness, never fail in ceasing to do evil and learning to do well.

A little time, and the hours of youth will pass, and you will become your own dictators in life. The guardian protection of your parents will cease—the warning voice of age will be hushed in the stillness of the grave, and you, alone, will be the actors in the drama of life. Then be induced to lay hold of pure religion and undefiled—imbibe the spirit of your Master, act on his principles, then will your hearts like the needle, continually vibrate to one fixed point, the polar star of universal love. Receive religion, it will be the chart to direct you safely over the billowy ocean of life—it will enable you to pass unsullied through the vices of the world, and teach you the pleasant practice of every virtue, to love your God supremely, and your neighbor as yourself.

A short time and you will climb from the vale of youth up the busy eminence of middle age—the sweet and endearing scenery around you now, will then only be seen through the dimness of distance, in memory's train, and the place that now knows you, may know you no more forever. The song of hilarity will be hushed in age, the gambol of youth will cease, the withering hand of time will pluck the roses from your cheeks, and leave the wrinkles there. Then remember, oh, "remember your Creator in the days of your youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." When the hoary locks of age are low in the dust—when the voice of him who now stands before you is stilled in the chamber of death, remember your Creator still.

Let pure religion be your companion—go with her hand in hand through the journey of life, and when the frosts of age shall chill your brows, and your change shall come, she will be near to give you peace, she will seize the flattering spirit in her snowy hands, and bear it above to mingle in the joys of infinite love. Which may God in mercy grant as your portion, and that of our race.—Amen.

MATTERS AND THINGS.....No. VIII.

BY EV. J. LEWIS.

The Bible contains sixty-six books bound together, or that number of volumes in one. It is literally therefore, a book of books. And if we take into consideration the importance and value of the religious information contained in it as a whole, we shall be justified in styling it "the book of books."

The Bible contains the most ancient historical records which have come down to us, also passages, both in prose and poetry, which present the finest specimens of the ancient style of writing that are now extant.

The Bible contains, among many other things, an account of a revelation to mankind from the invisible God, accompanied with many specifications of the subject matter thereof. We learn from this the perfect and all-glorious character of the Deity, his providential dealings with the children of men, his gracious designs toward us with respect to our ultimate destiny, our duty to him, to our fellow-creatures, and to ourselves.

The Bible contains (see the Gospel of Jesus Christ) the most conclusive and convincing evidence that can be afforded to man in the present state of being, of the fact of an after-death existence for all mankind, in an incorruptible and immortal organization, exempt from decay, disease, dissolution and death, where we shall be saved from sin, be strangers to transgression, be perfected in holiness, be equal to the angels, be like our glorified Redeemer, be the children of God.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE GENESEE ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS FOR 1836.

1. Met at Buffalo, on the 17th of August, agreeably to the adjournment of the last year.
2. Organized the council by choosing Br. J. S. FLAGLER, Moderator, Br. A. Peck, Clerk, and Br. T. P. Abell, Assistant Clerk.
3. Opened the business of the council with prayer, by Br. Archelaus Green.
4. Received the credentials from the delegates.
5. At the request of the Boston society, Erie county, said society was received into the fellowship of the Association.
6. Heard the report of the committee of discipline—"No cause of complaint"—Report accepted.
7. Chose Brs. Skeele, Flagler and Peck a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.
8. Voted, That there be as many Conferences within the limits of this Association, as there are fifth Sabbaths in the months of the coming year.
9. Council approved of the doings of their committee on letters of fellowship, etc.; in conferring ordination on Br. T. P. Abell.
10. In consequence of an unexpected call upon the Moderator, to return and minister the consolations of the Gospel at a funeral—chose Br. Skeele, Moderator; pro. tem.

11. Chose Brs. Tomlinson and Lewis, ministers; and Br. B. Caryl, layman, of Buffalo; a committee on letters of fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year.

12. Resolved, That all requests for letters of fellowship and ordination, be presented to the standing committee chosen therefor, at least three months previous to the time of acting thereon, or granting such letters, or conferring such ordination; and that said committee report their doings to the next session of the Association.

13. Resolved, That all ministers, holding letters of fellowship in connexion with this body, shall devote one-half of their time to the work of the ministry, while in the possession of health; or return their letters to this body. And in case such neglect shall continue during the term of one year, the council of this Association shall require from such delinquent his letters to be returned. And it shall be the duty of the committee of discipline, to make examination in relation thereto, and report such information to the council, at the next subsequent session, for their deliberation and decision.

14. Resolved, That we will recommend to all Universalists and societies, the organization of churches, and the adoption of that discipline, which shall be calculated to restrain them in their conduct, and guide them in the practice of the examples of their Lord and Master—and also to preserve those ordinances that may be thought to belong to the Gospel institution, subject to the conscience of individuals.

15. Inasmuch as the cause of temperance is closely allied to, and inseparably connected with the advancement and prosperity of the doctrine of Universal grace, therefore—

Resolved, That we do earnestly and seriously recommend to every individual of our denomination, a strict observance of temperance in all things, but more especially in the use of ardent spirits.

16. Voted, That the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication, and send them to one of our papers, with a request that other Editors in the State copy them.

17. Voted, That this Association adjourn to the village of Perry, Genesee county, to meet on the third Wednesday and following Thursday of August, 1837.

ALFRED PECK, Clerk.

ORDER OF SERVICES.

Wednesday morning.—Introductory prayer, Br. J. Potter. Sermon, Br. W. Andrews, 1 John iv: 16—"God is love."

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. E. Gage. Sermon, Br. A. Peck, Luke ix: 55, 56.

Evening.—Prayer, Br. J. E. Holmes. Sermon, Br. L. L. Sadler, Eph. i: 6-14 inclusive.

Thursday morning.—Introductory prayer, Br. A. Green. Sermon, Br. H. Roberts, Isa. i: 18, 1st clause.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. Williams. Sermon, Br. J. Potter, 1 Cor. iv: 20. After which the celebration of the eucharist took place, administered by Br. Skeele, assisted by Br. Potter—and the usual addresses by Br. Tomlinson.

Evening.—Prayer, Br. Tomlinson. Sermon, Br. Townsend, Matt. iii: 8, 9.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

A. Peck, Pavilion; J. S. Flagler, Darien; S. A. Skeele, Bennington; L. L. Sadler, At large; T. P. Abell, Perry; H. Roberts, Rochester; J. Lewis, Boston; J. Potter, Lockport; A. Green, Virgil; R. Tomlinson, Buffalo; E. Gage, Michigan; W. Andrews and L. L. Spaulding, Gaines; J. E. Holmes, Michigan; A. Williams, Carroll; K. Townsend, Victor.

The following eight societies were represented with but eleven delegates—viz: Alden, Boston, Buffalo, Covington Darien, Le Roy, Middlebury, and Perry.

We were received with abundant kindness, and had a very good session. A. P.

ANECDOTE.

The following anecdote will show that there are some females in the country, who can put to silence the armies of the Philistines.

Not long since some half a dozen women met at a neighbor's house for the purpose of spending the afternoon, and making a social visit. They were all members of different Partialist sects except one, a Universalist. During the interview, they severally, A. B. and C., expressed their views of a sermon they had just heard, as follows:—

A. What a good sermon we heard yesterday—I don't know when I have been so well entertained.

B. I was much delighted—the idea which he set forth, comparing Solomon's temple to the church of God, was entirely new to me.

C. Yes—and how just it appears; the different denominations are like the stones of the temple—now, there are the Baptists, the Methodists, the Presbyterians, etc., all striving for heaven, and no doubt will be saved.

D. Well, I have charity to believe they will all be brought from the mountains, and fitted for the great church triumphant.

Our sister who had listened for some time, at length concluded to put in for a share. "But your building is not finished yet—you know there was one stone which the builders rejected—they threw it to one side, and thought it did not belong to the building. But the temple could not be completed until that identical stone was brought and put in its place. Now that is Universalism—it is despised by all the rest—by all the builders refused and rejected." (Silence reigned throughout, and every countenance manifested surprise). "Remember, that this must be brought in to complete the work. The design of the Great Master Builder will not be accomplished, until universal holiness and happiness shall pervade the whole. When this head stone (which shall complete the work,) is brought in, there will be shoutings, crying, grace, grace, unto it."—No response. Good. RURAL.

LETTER.....No. III.

To Rev. Mr. Smith, Boston, N. Y.

Br. SMITH—At the close of my last letter to you, I partly promised to write you again, and to give you a brief statement of the Universalist faith. It proved inconvenient for me to do this at the time I intended; and circumstances which have since transpired, have led me to form the design of taking up the subject more extensively than I then proposed, and to address not yourself alone, but also your fellow-laborers in the promulgation of the doctrines of the endless existence of sin and misery, who reside in this town and vicinity. The communication will appear, the Lord willing, in due season. Inquire at the Post-office.

Yours, etc.

CONFERENCE.

The Conference at Perry, was held on the 30th and 31st ult. The following twelve preachers were present—A. Kelsey, L. L. Spaulding, N. Brown, L. Paine, J. Babcock, J. Todd, O. Roberts, J. Gage, 2d, T. P. Abell, J. S. Flagler, L. L. Sadler and A. Peck. We had an unusual attendance; a very interesting season to the believer, and in all seven sermons were delivered. On Sunday, in the afternoon, Br. T. P. Abell was set apart to the work of an Evangelist by the laying on of hands. A part of the ordination service was as follows:—Sermon, by Br. A. Peck. Consecrating prayer, by Br. L. Paine. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures, by Br. L. L. Sadler. Right hand of fellowship, by Br. O. Roberts.

Love for love is but justice and gratitude; love for no love is a favor and kindness; but love for hatred and enmity is a most divine temper, a steady and immutable goodness that is not to be stirred by provocation, and so far from being conquered, that it is rather confirmed by its contrary.

BR. FULLER'S LETTER.

BR. SKINNER—In the Magazine and Advocate, for July 16th, I was happy to meet with your notice of my sermon on the sin against the Holy Ghost. In thus commending it to the attention of the public, you have done me a favor for which I return you my sincere thanks.

The sermon was published that it might be read, not that it might be implicitly believed. You were right, therefore, in saying, "I do not believe the author will blame me for the exceptions I take to one or two points in his sermon, while I so cordially agree with him in all the rest." Permit me to observe, that my long and intimate acquaintance with you justifies me in saying, there is no man with whom it gives me more pleasure cordially to agree in religious sentiment than with yourself; while at the same time there is no one to whom I should express a difference of sentiment with less reluctance. For I well know it would induce no abatement of your fraternal good will.

I do not, therefore, write you this letter because you have taken exceptions to one or two points in my printed sermon, but because your doing so has furnished me with an opportunity of enlarging upon those points which the limits assigned to my discourse prevented me from laboring at length therein.

1. You say, "If sinners are not saved from their sins in this state of being, and it is impossible they should ever have any sins in another state, then it is impossible they should ever be saved by Christ, in the sense of Matt. i: 21; Acts iii: 26; Rom. xi: 26, 27." I will quote these passages in the order you have cited them, that the reader may have a full view of the Scriptures upon this point. "And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." "Unto you first, God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." "And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, there shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins."

In these passages we are plainly taught, that Christ shall save his people from their sins—that he was sent to bless them in turning them away from their iniquities—that he shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob and take away their sins.

But how is all this to be done? By what means are these results to be secured? Jesus says, Matt. xxviii: 18; "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." You will agree with me that this power was given to him to fulfil the purposes of his mission—the salvation of his people from their sins. Christ has power to chastise. But for what purpose does he exercise this power? Only in fulfilling the objects of his mission. Punishment is one of the instruments by which Christ "saves his people from their sins." If a man is saved from his sins by chastisement, is he justified in denying that Christ saved him? Certainly not. Christ is none the less his Saviour because he employed means in effecting that salvation. How then is it impossible that men should be saved from their sins by Christ, if death is the grand instrument by which he saves them or frees them from their sins? I can conceive of nothing that will subdue, even annihilate every fleshly passion and appetite that leads to sin like the all-conquering power of death. I know of no good reason why he who has all power given unto him, and who certainly has power over death, should not employ death as an instrument in delivering his people from their sins. Nor do I consider those who are saved from sin by the instrumentality of death less indebted to Christ for their salvation, than those who are saved by any other means at his command.

2. You say, "you do not consider Rom. vi: 7, to relate at all to natural death." I think otherwise. But what I have to say is not designed to convert you to my view of the text. I wish only to give my reasons for holding the views I have of it.

I think the good sense of all the context depends upon its relating alone to natural death. And had the apostle intended to be understood of death to sin, it is very singular that he did not insert the words which are virtually added to the text when understood to relate to any but natural death. It would then read, "For he that is dead [to sin] is freed from sin." But so it does not read. And it is manifest, from the whole tenor of the apostle's reasoning and exhortation, in connexion with the text, that the disciples were not so free from sin, in one sense at least, as he wished them to be, hence he earnestly entreats them to live up to their profession of being dead to sin.

Again, in the 11th verse, the apostle says, "Likewise, reckon ye yourselves to be dead in deed unto sin," etc. Like whom, I ask. Who else reckoned themselves to be dead to sin? Nobody. Who else was dead to sin? Had the apostle just asserted, verse 7, that they were dead to sin, in reality, and then, verse 11, called upon them to "reckon" themselves so? I cannot see the propriety of such an interpretation.

Now if they were to look upon themselves as having experienced in an emblematic and moral sense what they would have experienced in a literal sense, had they been literally dead with Christ and risen again, according to verse 8th, "Now if ye be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him," then the whole matter is plain to my mind; and may be paraphrased thus:—

The disciples had been planted in the likeness of Christ's death—his literal death. This was done by a figure or emblem, viz: baptism. And as Christ not only died but rose again to a new life, the disciples were called upon to put on as distinctly, the likeness of the new life, in which they believed, as they had done the likeness of death. And as he that was literally dead and risen again was entirely free from sin, so they, to be consistent, must be free from sin in their lives, else they did not imitate the new life, as they had imitated the death which precedes it by baptism. So I understand Rom. vi.

In confirmation of my view of this subject, I beg leave to add, that as the apostle's reasoning and exhortations, chap. vi, are founded upon the fact, that he that is literally dead is freed from sin, so in the commencement of chap. vii, his reasoning is founded entirely upon the fact, that the woman whose husband was literally dead, was loosed from her husband, according to the law of Moses. The plan of these arguments illustrates the subject.

3. You say again, "Nor do I consider it true that man can carry nothing out of the world with him but what he brought with him into the world." You refer to knowledge, moral principle and love to God, as attainments of this life, and deem the idea irrational and untenable which denies that we carry these things with us to another state of being.

As nothing is more foreign from my mind than controversy upon these topics, I shall barely give my views upon them. It is certain then, that we are gifted by our Creator, with all our mental and moral faculties upon our entrance into this world; and these I believe, we shall carry with us to eternity. And these, being gifts independent of flesh and blood, may, for ought I know or believe to the contrary, carry with them to another state all impressions or improvements made upon them in this state. But I do not believe that sinful impressions, made upon the faculties of one who dies without being converted in this life, will mar the happiness of the individual in the resurrection state, any more than evil impressions made upon Paul's faculties will mar his happiness there. I cannot see why the impressions of one will not be as distinctly retained as those of the other.

Our fleshly faculties, or appetites and passions, we derived from a different source, viz: the earth.

They are of the earth, earthy. Their range is, I believe, confined to this state of being. And whether abused or used for the purposes for which they were given, they must, with all their consequences, be annihilated by natural death.

But if all our knowledge, our present knowledge should "vanish away," according to 1 Cor. xiii: 8, I believe it will be succeeded by a wider range of thought, and a vaster field of intellectual glory—by a knowledge of God and his works in the resurrection state, which will so far transcend the little we now know, that it will be cast in the shade of inconceivable distance. And should our present, imperfect ideas of right and wrong, be supplanted by a perception of the righteousness which God has, I am sure we shall not be losers by the exchange. And for one, I feel sometimes that I should be ashamed to enter that better world and more perfect state with so little love to God as I now possess. So feebly can I now reflect his boundless love. Nay, I believe we shall all have inconceivably more love to God, in a future state, than we can carry with us through the valley of the shadow of death.

4. I know not on what authority natural death is esteemed a "mere physical change." It seems to me, that the dissolution of any one sinful organ is always attended with moral effects in man. And why the destruction of every unruly member at once should not be a moral as well as a physical change I cannot tell. Several times I have been brought apparently near the gates of death, and thought myself that the time of my departure was at hand. I imagine my feelings, my moral feelings were very different from what they would be, were I to approach the shores of England with the expectation of landing. Besides, should I land in England, I should find myself possessed of all my fleshly passions and appetites—be still a subject of hunger, thirst, anger, hatred, love, fatigue and ennui. Moreover, the wicked might trouble me. I should not be where "the wicked cease from troubling; and the weary be at rest."

5. I have often met with those among our Partialist brethren, whose cherished feelings seemed to revolt at the idea of God's making wicked and wretched men good and happy in any other way than that which they had marked out. Nothing seems to afflict them more than the supposition, that the antediluvians arrived to heaven before righteous Noah—that the Sodomites were in glory sooner than Abraham and Lot, and that Judas outstripped John, the beloved disciple, in the race to glory, etc. They are grieved at the idea that these and other similar characters should escape endless punishment and become good and happy at any rate. They seem not to be satisfied without an exhibition of human misery without end. For my part I have learned to feel very differently upon this subject. I never saw a sinful, miserable man made better and happier too soon to suit my feelings. I am sure it would give me no pain to see scores and thousands of my sinful fellow-creatures made better and happier in the twinkling of an eye. Dead or alive, I envy not the wicked, nor can any representation, exhibit them in happiness so soon as to be grievous to me. And I cannot believe that you would be displeased, if it should be true, that God frees men from sin at the article of death, and prepares them for glory by the spirit and power of the resurrection. But whether this is true or not is another question. Let us be fully persuaded in our own minds.

To conclude, I have said much upon this subject, much more than I intended to say. But if you see no impropriety in so doing, please lay it before your vastly numerous readers. I have not written for controversy. But whatever instructions you are pleased to give me upon the subjects of this letter will be thankfully received, without my feeling called upon to reply.

I take pleasure in subscribing myself fraternally, yours, etc. S. W. FULLER.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1886.

REPLY TO DR. FULLER'S LETTER.

Bless me! what a long lecture Dr. F. has read us on the subject of the very brief remarks I made in the few exceptions I took to his sermon on the sin against the Holy Ghost! I did by no means intend to provoke, nor did I anticipate so long a chapter from him. However, he is abundantly welcome to the room he has occupied, and shall be to twice as much more at any time he is pleased to occupy it, with this or any other subject, on which he may please to write. I can most cordially reciprocate the sentiment he expresses towards me, when he says, "there is no man with whom it gives me more pleasure to agree in religious sentiment than with yourself; while, at the same time, there is no one to whom I should express a difference of sentiment with less reluctance. For I well know it would induce no abatement of your fraternal good will."

With a full view, and I trust under the influence of this sentiment, I shall proceed to make a few remarks by way of reply to Br. F.'s letter.

1. Under the first division of his letter I see nothing calling for any special remarks except what is said towards the conclusion of it, on the means, or "instruments by which Christ saves his people from their sins." And here, too, I most cordially agree with Br. F., that "punishment is one of the instruments" which Christ employs for the salvation of sinners. But I cannot agree with him in the idea, that under any and all circumstances, death is necessarily "the grand instrument of saving or freeing all sinners from iniquity." For if I did thus believe, I should be compelled to admit and argue that however great in number or magnitude any man's sins might be, he has only to add one more to the black catalogue, viz., suicide, to enter into and at once enjoy the salvation of Christ to its full extent! I should be obliged to consider the suicidal act of the greatest sinner, and salvation by Christ, as synonymous phrases; or at all events, that the former was the direct and certain method of obtaining the latter! That to every person vexed with remorse, harrassed by guilt and pursued by justice, there was the greatest inducement and highest premium offered for suicide, inasmuch as he could "with a bare bodkin" at once free himself from all sin, and guilt, and misery, and enter on the full fruition of immortal beatitude in heaven! That, if the disciplinary punishments and emendatory chastisements of God, and the death of this mortal body, by whatever means effected, were alike, and always with equal certainty, to be regarded as the means of salvation by Christ, then two great sinners, both equally guilty of the blackest of crimes, might be detected in the perpetration of their nefarious deeds—the one, conscious of guilt, and dreading a public trial and ignominious death on the gallows, at once plunges a fatal dagger in his own heart and dies in an instant. The other shudders at the thought of adding to his crimes the act of suicide, submits to the officers of justice, is for months imprisoned, has a public trial where all the long catalogue of his crimes is rehearsed, endures the most pungent remorse of conscience, and after many months, perhaps years, of severe suffering, he experiences a genuine reformation of heart, and undergoes a disgraceful execution on the gallows. Now of these two sinners one has experienced the salvation of Christ by a momentary act of suicide, but the other by the instrumentality of disciplinary punishment, which required years of suffering on his part, while the first was, by means of his own rashness, all that time, in the bosom of perfect bliss! Which mode of salvation, allowing both equally sure, but the first much the quickest, would be preferable to sinners? Which would they be most likely to choose? From a system involving such conclusions, consequences and tendencies as the above, we must beg leave to dissent. We cannot, Br. F., no, no, we cannot go with you in these ideas: and we cannot believe that a man of your excellent heart and naturally clear head, would ever have espoused or undertaken to defend such ideas, unless it had been through the blinding influence of that devotion to a particular system that warps the better understanding of too many excellent men in our world, or through prepossessions that should have been shaken off, or at least carefully examined.

2. The reasons assigned by Br. F. for supposing Paul spoke of a literal or natural death instead of a metaphorical, in Rom. vi: 7, are far from being convincing to my mind. It appears to me very clear from the whole scope of the passage and context, the whole that is said on the subject in the 5th, 6th and 7th chapters, that death to sin and a moral renovation to newness of life, and new obedience, in view of the life, example, sufferings, death and resurrection of Christ, was the principal and main object of all the apostle says in this passage and its dependencies. He begins the subject in the 5th chapter and says that "sin entered into the world by one man, and death by sin," (to be carnally minded is death), that "death passed upon all, for all have sinned,"—"by one man's disobedience many were made sinners"—"sin hath reigned unto death," etc. Then in the 6th chapter he continues and enlarges on the subject, makes the practical application of the principles he brings to view, and asks, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid. How long shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" He next speaks of the believers being baptized into Christ—and into his death, verse 3, and then exhorts them as follows: "that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." Then, verse 5, he says, "For if we have been (not shall be at natural death) planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." The 6th verse is still more conclusive in fixing the meaning of the context, thus: "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified (not shall be at death) with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin." Why? Because "he that is dead is freed from sin"—i. e., in exact accordance and confirmation of what he had before said, the body of sin being destroyed, the old man with his deeds being crucified, the believer having put on the new man, which was renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him, (Col. iii: 10,) was, as declared in verse 22, made free from sin, or its reigning power, and had become the servant of God, having his fruit unto holiness and the end everlasting life, or the enjoyment of God in the Gospel of his Son, being thus made "the Lord's free man." The whole of the following context goes to confirm this view. The only literal death spoken of was that of Christ—the believer's was metaphorical. Verse 8, "Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him," i. e., after his example, in his spirit and temper, with his precepts and life constantly before us. Verses 9 and 10, "Knowing that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God." Verse 11, "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Br. F. seems to think the words likewise and reckon imply a very different construction from that which we suppose, and asks, "Had the apostle just asserted verse 7, that they were dead to sin in reality, and then verse 11, call on them to reckon themselves so?" I answer yes, he had in substance asserted that he that was dead to sin was freed from its dominion or reigning power, agreeable to verse 16, for "to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are, whether of sin unto death or obedience unto righteousness." The word likewise refers to verse 10—to Christ's dying unto sin once and living unto God—hence, the follower of Jesus should, in like manner reckon, i. e., count, consider, and regard himself, and act in all his conduct in accordance with that fact, as dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, etc. That such was his meaning is apparent from the very next words, where he says, "let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof; neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin; but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead," etc. "For sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law but under grace." "Being then made free from sin (the same phrase that occurs in verse 7) ye became the servants of righteousness. For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. But now, being made free from sin, and become the servants of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness," etc.

Then again, in the commencement of chapter 7, I think I see, so far from a confirmation of Br. F.'s views, a direct refutation of them and confirmation of mine. Thus, the introduction of the woman, bound to her husband as long as he lived, but released from him by his death, was designed to show the obligation of the subjects of the Mosaic law to regard that as long as they lived under it: but as he had before declared, "ye are not under the law but under grace," so he explains the figure of the woman and her husband in verse 4, thus: "Wherefore, my brethren, ye are also become dead to the law, by the body of Christ, that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God." Thus I understand Rom. vi: 7, with all its context: and the whole appears to me so perfectly clear and conclusive in this light, that it seems difficult to conceive how any good mind, unworped by prepossession or prejudice, can understand it differently.

3. Br. F. admits that "our mental and moral faculties" may "carry with them to another state all impressions and improvements made upon them in this state." Such then being the admitted fact, I see not how the conclusion can possibly be avoided that sinful impressions may last longer than this life, or extend beyond this state of being: for the above admission allows identity and consciousness to remain. It matters not from what source the impressions were received, whether earthly or heavenly; identity and consciousness remaining, the impressions themselves must of necessity remain, according to all the moral and intellectual laws of man, until they are eradicated by some other cause beside the mere dissolution of the body. For though the mind be not naturally impure or corrupt, yet by reason of sympathy with the body, the mind itself, becomes contaminated, and descending from its naturally high and exalted station, it sympathises with the body in all its debasing passions and evil propensities, and calls all its mightiest powers into requisition to aid the body in these unworthy pursuits. The conscience becomes seared as with a hot iron, so that it ceases to act or feel. Paul speaks of men of "corrupt minds," 1 Tim. vi: 5 and 2 Tim. iii: 8, and in various other scriptures the same sentiment is reiterated. In Titus i: 15, after speaking of men of corrupt practices, he adds that "even their mind and conscience is defiled." The mind, the conscience, the soul may be corrupted; and though there is a mode of purification for the same; yet we no where read in the Bible that natural death is the means or mode of purification. Peter says, 1 Epis. i: 22, 23, "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart, fervently, being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, even by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." This was a gradual but efficacious work performed in the soul. And John says, "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure."

I have not said that sinful impressions made on the intellectual and moral powers in this life would mar the happiness of man in the consummation of his resurrection glory. I have said nothing about the resurrection but about the condition of man immediately after leaving this earthly state. I believe that a lapse of time intervenes between the death of the body and the consummation of man's resurrection glory, and that during that lapse of time man may experience such discipline and change in his mind and affections as are not incompatible with the nature of man and the laws of God's moral government with which we are acquainted here. What will be the duration of that period I pretend not to determine.

As Br. F. admits that "our mental and moral faculties" may "carry with them to another state all impressions and improvements made upon them in this state," (which I most firmly believe,) it follows as a matter of course, that those who have received no favorable impressions and made no improvements in this state, must enter on the next without those improvements which others carry with them. Therefore, I think he is bound to admit that either there will be an eternal difference in the improvements and happiness of men in the resurrection state, or that a moral process (besides merely natural death) will be necessary to precede the resurrection, by and through which those departing this life destitute of those moral improvements shall be prepared for enjoying the same advantages as those who attained them here. I shall make no objections—for I have no ground for any—to what Br. F. says in the closing part of this division on "the wider range of thought, and vaster field of intellectual glory, and the inconceivably greater love to God" which we shall be permitted to enjoy "in the future state, than we can carry with us through the valley of the shadow of death." I fully accord with him in this sentiment.

4. The fourth item I shall dismiss with two brief remarks. 1. An effect may last after the primary cause has been removed. The putting one's hand into the fire will occasion severe pain certainly while it is in: and after it is taken out, the pain will be likely to continue a length of time at least. The destruction of a knife or instrument with which we wound ourselves, will not heal the wound—it may prevent its repetition. 2. Br. F.'s approach apparently to the gates of death was by no means a parallel, to many real deaths that occur among men. His mind and all his moral powers were in exercise—and in exercise too, on the very subject of death and his approaching change; so that had death actually ensued at that time, his change would have been both of a physical and moral nature. But how many are cut off, instantly without any mental or moral exercise whatever! The lightning's flash, the axe of the guillotine, the assassin's sword, may terminate one's earthly being instantly, while engaged in acts of the deepest depravity and wickedness, without one moral, intellectual or spiritual thought or feeling being awakened. And what is this but a mere physical change, or dissolution of the body? Is this operation alone sufficient to fill a deeply depraved and corrupted mind instantly with love supreme to God and holiness? Nay, it cannot be.

5. If by what Br. F. says about some of our Partialist brethren feeling grieved at the thought of the wicked becoming finally holy and happy, and the Sodomites and Judas, etc., getting to heaven so much sooner than better and holier men, he meant to insinuate that I was unwilling men should become holy and happy as soon as he really supposes they will, he is entirely mistaken in such a supposition. He however disavows attributing any such feeling to me. In this he does me justice and has my thanks for his candor. It would not be at all grievous to my feelings to believe, or even know, that all men throughout this country and the world will become perfectly holy and happy to-morrow; but however congenial such an event might be to my feelings, I cannot admit, I cannot believe such an event will occur; for I see no cause, or train of causes, in operation capable of producing such a result. Were I to see a little child thrust its hand into a bed of burning embers, and hear a by-stander remark that it would feel no pain after taking it out; and were I to say, I cannot believe it—I am confident the burn is deep and will require a number of days or even weeks to restore it to perfect ease and soundness; what should we think were the person then, to charge me with an utter destitution of compassion and mercy, and say that I felt grieved at the thought of that little child's being free from pain and well of its burn so soon? The truth is, our feelings alone are not to be the criterion of our faith. But we are constrained to believe according to the weight and force of evidence, taking into consideration both the physical and moral laws of the universe, so far as understood, together with our own observation and experience in regard to the operation of those laws, and the probable results from the existence of well known causes. But if Br. F. does in reality believe what a writer of a set of wretched doggerel verses against Universalism a few years since says, viz:—

"That all the filthy Sodomites,
When God bade Lot retire,
Went in a trice to paradise,
On rapid wings of fire—

"That Judas, that perfidious wretch,
Was not for crimes accurst,
But by a cord out-tripped his Lord
And got to heaven first!"— and that the instantaneous death of the vilest wretch in existence, is certainly the instantaneous transition of that wretch into perfect bliss, why, then it seems to me he must totally disregard all the known laws of God's moral government, so far as they relate to the character and object of punishment, or the requisite preparation for perfect spiritual happiness. It seems to me, also, that this view of the subject takes away one strong restraining motive from vice, and offers but poor encouragement for virtue. I need not here stop to explain the why and wherefore. They will occur to every reflecting reader.

To me there appear connected with this subject three very strong reasons in favor of a future disciplinary punishment. The first is, that many crimes of the blackest dye do not appear to be punished in this life. Such for instance as those of the monster Varndall, of Paris, in this county, who lately deliberately murdered his innocent wife and the amiable young Babcock, and then immediately cut his own throat; and innumerable instances of robbery, rape, arson, murder and suicide, immediately following each other, all by the same hand.—When and where I ask, are such crimes punished if not beyond this life? If it be answered they are punished in the death of the perpetrator; I answer this cannot be, for they merely suffer death; and this they must suffer sooner or later either by their own or other hands, or by natural diseases, or old age; and they frequently suffer much less in such death than many virtuous men who die by disease. If it be argued that they got their punishment before perpetrating their crimes; I answer, this would be to suppose the effect precedes its cause! Or else that the Deity acts on the principle of a certain Baptist deacon in New-Hampshire, who a few years since, prepared in the Spring to make maple sugar in company with one of his neighbors. The buckets, kettles, etc., were all prepared for the operation, and the plan was for the boys of the two neighbors to gather the sap, boil it into sugar, and then divide the product between the two. At length the good neighbor bethought him that there might some mischief occur to frustrate their calculations: so he posts over to Deacon V.'s and very gravely addresses him thus: "Deacon, 'twill be of no use for us to set our boys to work making maple sugar, for they will surely eat it all up as fast as they make it." "No, no," says the Deacon, "never fear that, I'm sure mine never will, for I've whipped every one of them before hand!" Now unless it be maintained that effects precede their cause, or that God acts on the principle that this Calvinistic Deacon did with his children, it appears obvious that some heinous sins are unpunished in this life, and therefore must be punished in another state, if at all. But we are expressly assured that the wicked shall not go unpunished—that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong that he hath done, and there is no respect of persons. Therefore future punishment follows of course.

My second reason in favor of this doctrine is this, viz., punishment in very many instances does not produce its destined end in this state of being; therefore its continuance in another is a legitimate and necessary inference. Br. F. says, and every Universalist I believe will allow, that "punishment is one of the instruments by which Christ saves his people from their sins." The design, or at least one prominent design of punishment is, to humble, subdue, correct and amend the sinner. As the infliction of punishment upon sinners is often commenced in this life, and continued for a time without humbling, subduing or amending the sinner, but he rather grows worse under it, (as some refractory child grows still more refractory under his chastisements,) and finally dies in the most determined and hardened rebellion against God, it appears to me impossible to avoid the conclusion that the punishment will be continued by a wise and righteous God, in another state, long enough to accomplish the end for which it was commenced—until it "yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who are exercised thereby." If such is not the case, then what has been inflicted has apparently been worse than useless, and God has acted like some foolish parent, who begins to correct his child; but because the child does not submit at once, but flouts, and raves, and bites, and kicks at him, he relinquishes the job as a bad one, gives up the stubborn child to his own course, and thus his chastening only hardens in iniquity, instead of reclaiming the child. Now I believe as God chastises men for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness, he will never leave his work half done, but will "accomplish that which he please—his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure." Myself and brethren who hold to future limited punishment, are sometimes accused by brethren disbelieving it, of holding to a "cruel and unmerciful doctrine—of not being satisfied without having men tormented in another world—we must have some hell for them hereafter—the miseries of this life are not sufficient," say they, "to satisfy the vindictive spirit of those who hold to future punishment—indeed, they might as well hold to endless misery and done with it, and have no half-way work about it," etc., and yet these same brethren will maintain that all the punishments inflicted on mankind in this life are mercifully intended—inflicted by a parent's hand, with a view to the benefit, the emendation of the sufferer—evinced the benevolence of God, so clearly, that were he to withhold them from the sinner, he would be both unjust and unmerciful to them and do them an essential injury. Now when we believe—and give our reasons for believing—that these same merciful chastisements will be extended into the future world, with the same parental design, the same benevolent purpose—that they will be continued till they have accomplished the purpose for which they were allowedly commenced, and terminated in the lasting benefit of the sufferer, why, we ask, should we be accused of holding a cruel doctrine, and these punishments be denounced as unmerciful? (I do not include Br. F. in thus alluding to what some say of the sentiment I hold).

My third reason is that many go out of the world with such deep stains of guilt and sin upon them, and so utterly devoid of all virtue, holiness and love to God, that they are evidently entirely unfitted and unprepared for heaven and happiness, and therefore must in the very nature of things, endure for a time, either actual punishment, or negative punishment from the deprivation of happiness which is to be enjoyed only by those in love with God and goodness. The removal of this unhappiness and alienation from God, and the implanting of holiness and love in its stead, must be the work of time, or a progressive work, according to all the mental and moral laws of man with which we are acquainted. Man did not become deeply depraved and hardened in crime, instantly, or at once; nor will he be transformed instantly, from this character when formed, to one of perfect holiness and supreme love and obedience to God. It requires the exercise of the mental and moral powers, the act of conscience, and volition, the reflecting, weighing, and choice of objects. Though a miracle were wrought in the conversion of Paul, yet he was three days blind, and the progress of his mind was gradual from the bitterness of his bigotry and the depths of his moral darkness up to the light, and liberty, and glory of his Christian faith and hope. It is true, doubtless, that none of the human family in this life are perfectly holy, entirely free from folly and fault, from darkness and error; yet it is also true that there are many who truly love God and goodness, and are prepared to relish and admire all that is holy and excellent; while there are others who have no relish whatever for aught that is holy and good. Therefore, it appears to me unavoidable that the latter should experience for a limited period, either a positive or negative punishment; and as positive punishment, consequential and corrective in its character, is by me regarded as a merciful and necessary process, I can see no objection to that, so long as its design be the same as that of present punishment.

I have now done. What I have said has not been said for the purpose nor for the love of controversy; but simply with a view of stating more definitely my faith, and the grounds of it, touching the subject of future punishment. I thank Br. Faller for the freedom he has taken, and having myself used the same, and twice as much room as I intended to occupy, I part with him on the subject, as since our first acquaintance I have always lived, with undissembled friendship and sincere brotherly affection.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

The different delegates to this body are reminded that it meets in New-York city, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in this month. As the facilities for travelling are so great, and the season a pleasant one for journeying, it is hoped all will attend—or, at least, appoint substitutes who will attend.

The friends in New-York are busy in making ample preparations to entertain the delegates and ministering brethren during the session, (which, be it remembered, will begin on Tuesday evening previous, by organizing the Council,) and ask of the delegates and preachers, in return, the following observance, which will be found a benefit and convenience to all who attend.

A. B. G.

“GENERAL CONVENTION.—The General Convention of Universalists for the United States will hold its next annual session in this city, (New-York,) on the third Wednesday and following Thursday, of September ensuing, agreeably to the adjournment of last year. It is expected that services will be held in both the Orchard-street and Beeker-street churches, on the Tuesday evening previous. Of this further notice will be given. It is designed to have ample provision for all the ministers and delegates present, and it is earnestly hoped there will be a full attendance. Ministering brethren and delegates will please call at the office of the ‘Union,’ No. 2 Chatham Square, foot of the Bowery, immediately on arriving in the city, and enter their names in a book to be kept for that purpose, and they will then be directed to their respective quarters. This is especially desired of all; whether they have friends with whom they stop or not; as this record will serve as a directory to the stopping place of each individual, and will be found very serviceable to friends in seeking out each other. We ask particular attention to this matter, as it will save much trouble during the session, and will enable the committee to be sure that the members of the Convention are all provided for.”—Union.

THE GLAD TIDINGS.

Br. S. A. Davis, the Editor of this excellent two-weekly periodical, assures us that the Sentinel and Star has but two subscribers in Pittsburg, and but few within a distance of one hundred miles from that place, and that, consequently, it will not injure that elder periodical. I am really glad to hear this, for I had feared that it would be otherwise. As to any injury it may do the Magazine and Advocate, if it does more good to the cause, without injuring its proprietors, we shall never fret about it. He may rest assured he is beyond the reach of our “jealousy,” for we have none now and had none when we wrote our notice of the Glad Tidings.

But our brother’s comparison about societies getting popular preachers from a distance, once or twice a year, in preference to employing one oftener, nearer home; and getting a popular periodical from a distance, in preference to starting one at home, will not hold good—it is out of tune. The pay of the popular preacher, and his travelling expenses, swallow up as much as would support a preacher at home for five times as many days. But the periodical at home being poorly supported, gives less matter at a proportionally greater cost, than the well supported periodical from a distance. The popular preacher can be had but twice or thrice a year, while, for the same sum, the preacher at home can be had for ten or fifteen Sundays. But the periodical at home can be had but twenty-six times a year for one dollar, while the well supported paper can be had, with more matter, twice that often, for one dollar and fifty cents—to which add twenty-six cents difference in postage, when both are sent by mail.

However—as I said before—if Br. D. can do the more good, without any injury to himself, I shall rejoice at the result—and I sincerely wish that he may succeed to the full extent of every lawful and laudable wish of his heart.

PHRENOLOGY.—[CROWDED OUT FROM OUR LAST.]

Mr. Dunkin, late of Harvard University, is now delivering a course of lectures on this interesting science, in the hall of the “Young Men’s Association,” to numerous, respectable and apparently deeply interested audiences. He is evidently no quack or empiric in his calling. He is a most fluent and interesting speaker, master of his subject and of language in which to express himself in relation to it. We have been highly edified by the lectures thus far, which our health has enabled us to hear; and we doubt not but all who have attended or may attend will be able to say the same. He has effectually and triumphantly met the puerile objection which some anti-phrenologists raise against the science, on the ground that it necessarily runs into and supports the doctrine of materialism, (in its modern acceptance,) or that it stands necessarily opposed to the doctrine of man’s spirituality; or that it is at war with religion in general, or Christianity in particular. He speaks with the most profound reverence of the Creator and the Holy Scriptures, and seems to be a devout believer in Christianity. To all who are fond of the study of the science and phenomena of nature, we would cordially say, you will be both gratified and edified by Mr. Dunkin’s lectures on Phrenology.

A HINT.

The following is from the pen of Br. D. D. Smith, of Portland, Maine, Corresponding Editor of the Gospel Banner; which is not only an excellent paper, but contains many of the neatest and best dums for subscriptions, and solicitations for new subscribers, etc., I have ever seen. All Editors and newspaper proprietors are interested in having the Banner well supported, if for this merit alone.

“Reader, are you now perusing a borrowed paper? or have you become a subscriber to the ‘Gospel Banner and Christian Pilot?’ If you are not a subscriber, do not read another word, until you have handed in your name as a subscriber: for your assistance is much needed. If you are a subscriber, have you paid for the paper? If not, you will not enjoy yourself in reading this journal, until you pay the subscription. Send on the money due, and you will read with a clear conscience, and your soul will delight itself in fitness. If you have done all this, go one step further, viz., persuade your neighbor to go and do likewise.”

To this I would add, for the especial benefit of our own subscribers, who may be persuaded by the above to send in what is now due to us, that the amount for each subscription of more than three month’s standing, is now two dollars—but by sending a new subscriber, or paying for next year in advance, they may save fifty cents. We will take three dollars in such case, for the two subscribers, or the two years.

This is as they please—yes, even if they prefer waiting till the year is up, and their paying us two dollars and fifty cents, we shall not complain. The main point is that they be sure to pay.

FUTURE PUNISHMENT.

The two long articles from Br. S. W. Fuller and myself, on this subject, published in this day’s paper, occupy more room than we ever have at one time, or probably ever shall at any one future time, allow to this subject in our columns. We have generally, for reasons that must be obvious to our readers, avoided the direct discussion of this subject to any considerable extent. We have now admitted each side to a hearing for several reasons. Br. F., in a private note, says his reasons for wishing the publicity of his article are these: “1. Many of my old friends, readers of your paper, have repeatedly requested me to publish my ideas upon those points which I had from time to time advanced in preaching. 2. Several of my brethren in the ministry have wished me to say what I could in favor of my views on those points. 3. I thought by addressing you, my ideas would perhaps receive more attention than in any other form.” The same reasons offered by Br. F. have operated with me to induce me to lay my views on this subject, with my grounds of faith, more distinctly before the public. I was glad of the opportunity of publishing Br. F.’s article, because it breathes so kind and good a spirit throughout, and chose rather to publish my own views in connexion with his than either by themselves. And I have endeavored not to depart in language—and am certain I have not in feeling—from the good spirit his letter breathes. Having each of us expressed ourselves freely on the subject, I hope we may feel as much better for it as a certain New-England divine was, by his servant, supposed to have felt after and in consequence of preaching. He had been in quite ill health, and doubted on Sabbath morning whether it was prudent for him to preach during the day. He finally ventured the experiment, and on his way home remarked to his servant, the driver, that so far from feeling any injury by preaching, he thought he felt even better than in the morning. “Yes, Massa,” said the shrewd servant, “me tink you feel great deal better after gitin so much trash off your ‘tomach!’”

GIVE CREDIT.

My name has been several times Sum-ned, and Trum-pet-ed, and put in Union with complaints about no credits and wrong credits, within a few weeks past; and all without any cause or provocation on my part. I must rouse up, and look out for my own in these dis-crediting times. What is worth copying is worth crediting, if you know who or what to credit.

Br. Everett of the Southern Pioneer copied from our paper, “Incidents in the life of a Preacher,” by our correspondent “Barnabas,” (an excellent article, by-the-by, and well worth copying,) and forgot to give us credit for the same—he must, surely, have forgotten it. Well—what was the up-shot? Why, Br. Davis, of the Glad Tidings, copies it from the Pioneer, and forgot that it appeared there as a selected article—he, surely, must have forgotten it—and so he credits it to the Southern Pioneer! Be careful, brethren! look, before you give credit—and be sure to give credit.

A. B. G.

ERRATA.

Two typographical errors, calculated to destroy the sense, and which every reader may not have been able to correct, have been pointed out to us. In number 29, last page, first column, sixteenth line from the top, for “breasts,” read “breath”—and in number 33, first page, first column, ninth line from the bottom, for “indefinitely,” read “independently.” Also, same number, last page, second column, seventeenth line from the top, for “elocation,” read “elevation”—and same page, third column, twelfth line from the top, for “Wayne,” read “Hayne.”

A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—It is with regret we are obliged to defer the conclusion of the tale till our next number; in consequence of a miscalculation of our own.—“Nemo,” and Br. Kingsbury are also deferred till our next. Several other articles which have accumulated during our illness, will appear as fast as we can find room for them.

A. B. G.

The Star in the West, and the Southern Pioneer have commenced new volumes. The latter has been enlarged to about the size of the Universalist Union, with four columns however, and presents a very fair appearance.—The former has the name of Br. George Rogers added as Associate Editor. Br. R. will travel extensively, correspond, collect subscriptions, etc. Both are filled with interesting matter, and we hope will do much good and be well supported.

A. B. G.

Editor of Universalist and Ladies Repository—send current volume, from commencement, to D. Dickey, P. M., Siloam, Madison county, N. Y.

Br. T. P. Abell has removed from Wyoming to Perry, Genesee county, and desires all letters, etc., directed to the latter place.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. GRISH at Little Falls—Br. WAGGONER at Leyden—Br. ASPINWALL at Salisbury—Br. WILCOX at Trenton Falls and at Newport at 5 P. M.—Br. BODEN at Nelson Flats.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. J. M. AUSTIN, of Danvers, Mass., in this city, and by Br. SKINNER at Herkimer—Br. WHITNEY at Newville, and at Paines Hollow in the evening—Br. WILCOX at Corporation, in the town of Bern, and at Rensselaerville city at 5 P. M.

Br. O. WILCOX will preach on the evenings of Wednesday, September 7th, at Sheldon’s schoolhouse in Remsen—Thursday, 8th, at Webb’s in Russia—Monday, 12th, at Newville—Tuesday, 13th, at Middlefield Centre—Wednesday, 14th, at Leesville, as friends may appoint, and Thursday, 15th, at Middleburg Bridge, as Dr. Wells may appoint.

The Ontario Association will meet at Geneva, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (14th and 15th) inst.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FAITH AND UNBELIEF.....A DIALOGUE.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

ABRAM.

Hager, I bid thee go! This bottle take, the water
It contains will serve to allay thy thirst, while lonely
Through the wilderness thou roam'st.
Take Ishmael and begone; your mistress' watchful eye,
With jealous thought intent, inspects us both, and fain
Would grudge my blessing on this child, with whom I now Forever part. That God to whom I've taught thy humble Knee to bow, will condescend to hear thy prayer,
And lend a gracious ear to thy support; he'll not Forsake, or e'er refuse his faithful aid to Unprotected innocence and thee. Be quickly
On thy way, for God ordains thy lot. Farewell.

HAGER.

Not for myself I crave a boon, or favor ask
Of one whose heart is callous—deed to each demand
Of soft humanity—whose ear is deaf to nature's Voice, whose soul melts not before the quick'ning rays
Of pure affection, sympathy and love.
Not for myself I sup—I spurn the humbling thought!
Let thine own offspring plead, this tender blossom here,
Thy son, thy first born son, him whom thou'st fondled
Of upon thy knee with gentlest kiss—in soft embraces Wrapped his infant form, and smiled to see his opening Graces shoot, expand, and twine around thy heart.
How oft I've seen thee weep, and mingle tears and blessings
On his head! and dost thou cast him out an exile
From the world and thee? O, do not quench, nor strive to Stifle now, a father's ardent love that's kindling
In thy breast; for if thou dost, thou too shalt feel
The dire corrosive fangs of conscious guilt, when
In thy rambles through this dreary waste, thou'lt call
The bones of this, my son and thine, not clothed as now
In nature's blushing robes, and artless innocence
Divine, but stripped by beasts of prey, and whiten'd 'neath
The blast—

ABRAM.

Hold, Hager, hold! I need not this rebuke. The hand
Of the Supreme I view, his voice I hear. Obedient to His high command, I bid thee go; from danger, and from Harm of every kind, he'll save thyself and child.

HAGER.

My lord, I do beseech thee, name not a Supreme—
In each perfection of his nature, say he is infinite!
Then tell that he commands a deed so black with crime!
A crime that reads our nature's kindest sympathies,
And makes a whirlwind in a mother's breast.
The gods, to whom my fathers bowed, an act so base
Would scorn, and also blast the tongue, that such aspersions
Vile, should cast on beings styled as gods.

ABRAM.

O, Hager, Hager! weak thy faith, but powerful
Is thine unbelief. 'Tis thine begets in thee
Disquietude and grief; trust thou in God,
And be at rest.

HAGER.

Tell me, alas! what arm shall save, what being Succor this our helpless boy, when beasts voracious
Round his hapless form shall roam, and howl, and snuff,
In midnight gloom, for prey? What power defend him
From their furious rage? And what alas, if they should Spare, will save his soul from parching thirst,
Or hunger's deadly gripe?
If Ishmael, at the feast, in sport or scorn did err,
As foul mendacity, in guise of truth did broach,
He being thy son, once thy delight, why not with Mildness chasten him, for his reform, and therefore Act a parent's part, and him reduce to due
Obedience to thee? 'Tis jealousy with envy mixed,
Which long in weakful fermentation strove for vent,
And now hath burst—emitting fire brands—arrows—death—
Aimed to destroy—and would this innocent deprive
Of that prerogative which nature gave, and from
A father's heart, and safe protecting care, supplant
A tender scion from the stock where all its Nourishment it drew, and thus the feeble tendrils
Withers, droops and dies.

ABRAM.

Hast thou forgotten, Hager, say! when from thy mistress'
Ire thou fled'st, while on thy way, the angel of the Lord that spake from heaven to thee, and Ishmael's Destiny made known—that he a nation should become—
A countless multitude of beings should descend
From him, as sands upon the ocean's shore?

And hath he not with me renewed this promise, since?
Then, wherefore doubt? He is not slack concerning these
His promises confirmed, because there was none greater,
By himself. Believe, therefore, his word, and Peace be unto thee!

Henderson, N. Y., 1836.

THE SOLITARY.

BY MISS MARTINEAU.

In the early morning, a Solitary went forth to worship on the sea shore.

The sea was calm, and the beauty of the bright expanse delighted his eye, and the solemn murmur of the waves soothed his soul.

And he mused awhile, and was about to begin his prayer.

But children approached, and as they sported on the sands, their cheerful voices met his ear.

And he was vexed that the calm of his thoughts was disturbed. And he frowned on the little ones.

Soon some fishermen approached; and they cast their nets into a skiff which was on the beach, and committed it to the deep.

And the wife of one of them was there; and the Solitary heard her thank God that the sky was clear and the ocean calm.

But again he was vexed that he was not alone.

Soon he beheld a busy scene. The boatmen returned from their night voyage, and were met with a joyous greeting. Young and old also came forth to enjoy the freshness of the morning. Sea birds spread their long pinions and rose and fell on the surface of the waters.

Then the Solitary said, "I cannot worship here, where I love to behold the waves advancing to my feet; I will go higher, where all is still."

He climbed a cliff which rose from the beach, and there he found an open down where the turf was soft and green. The blue sea spread a wider expanse before him. The small boats were cradled on the deep beneath, and fleets pursued their course along the horizon.

The Solitary composed his thoughts to prayer.

But soon music fell on his ear. To him it was harsh, for he wished for silence.

Then he turned, and beheld a shepherd leading forth his flock.

And the face of the shepherd was marked with thought, and a mild light beamed from his eye. The music of his pipe also was soft and sweet.

Yet the Solitary looked on him with anger, and arose hastily, and plunged into the depths of a wood which skirted the sunny down.

And he traversed its shades till he came to a quiet nook, where a spring burst forth from a thicket, and the closely woven boughs shut out the sunshine.

"I can see no more the spreading main," said he to himself, "but here I can be at peace. No eye followeth me here, and no cup is dipped in this spring."

He drank thereof, and his soul was once more hushed to stillness.

But after a while the breeze brought a sweeter music than the rustling of the boughs or the plashing of the spring.

Infant voices were chanting near. The song of their praise was sweet and the words thereof were holy.

The Solitary left his covert, and beheld a cottage which the thicket had hidden from him. It stood on a sloping grass-plot. It was open to the heavens. The sun shone on its humble roof, and the ivy which twined around tossed its branches in the breeze.

An aged woman sat on the bench beside the door, and around her were little children gathered.

She had read to them the word of life; but her feeble voice was not heard afar off.

She taught them to sing hymns, and their praises were holy as the hermit's prayer. But his soul was not as a little child's, and he could not bend to listen.

And the aged woman rose up, and the children besought his blessing. But he hardened his heart, and yet again hastened away.

A rock towered high above the wood. The ascent thereof was steep, and the path rugged. But wrath glowed in the breast of the Solitary, and impelled his steps.

He paused not until he had reached the summit, and planted his foot where the step of man had never before trod.

There again he beheld the sea spreading farther than eye could reach. The roar of its waves ascended not so high. The ships appeared to be motionless on its bosom; and the small boats were no longer seen.

Then the holy man exclaimed with joy, "Now at length I am alone!"

But, as he spoke, a living cry arose. He turned and beheld! the nest of an eagle. And the flapping of wings was heard.

The young eagles arose at the approach of their parent; and she fed them from her beak.

Then the hermit saw how she spread her wings, and bore her young thereon, and flew gently a short flight, and returned again, that they might not be weary.

And the Solitary looked down abashed and sighed.

And a still, small voice whispered within his breast,
"Behold! in all the universe of God, praise aboundeth unto Him; and is thy worship so pure that none other may mingle therewith?"

"Lo! the eagle hath wings that bear her up to the gate of heaven. She can battle with the storms of the sky.
She can also gaze on the noonday brightness of the sun;
for her eye shrinketh not, nor is weary."

"Yet she heareth the cry of her little ones, and beareth with their weakness till they can soar with her on high."

"Therein is her wisdom greater, and her heart more expanded than thine."

HUMILITY.

They who in reality know much, are the most easily satisfied that they know but little. The last sentence uttered by the distinguished La Place was, "What we know, is little; what we are ignorant of, is immense."
Sir Isaac Newton, before his death expressed a similar sentiment. "I do not know what I may appear to the world; but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, while the vast ocean of truth lay still undiscovered before me." What a lesson to those who are puffed up with vain ideas of their own great attainments.—Star.

SABBATH MORNING.

How calm and serene are all things around me. Worshipping mortals are bending before the altar, and the men of God, are calling down from on high the blessings of Omnipotence. "Nations are hymning his praise," Princes are lifting up their voices and kings are bending the knee on a level with the subject. "On the solitary ocean, the mariners prayer is heard amidst the dashing of the wave," and yet thousands of sinners remain silent—even when the Saviour of the world is waiting to hear their confessions of penitence and their songs of deliverance.—Intelligencer.

MARRIAGES.

In Penfield, Monroe county, June 30th, by Rev. W.
E. Manley, Mr. ABNER W. BROWN, to Miss CORNELIA
M. SMITH, both of the former place.

In Litchfield, August 22, by Rev. S. R. Smith, Mr.
ANSON COWLES, of Natches, Miss., to Miss MARIA GAGE, of the former place.

DEATHS.

Of inflammatory fever, at his father's residence in New-Hartford, August 18, Mr. DAVID BIRGE, aged 17 years.
He was a youth of reputable habits, and a worthy student in the Liberal Institute. The estimation in which he was held, was evinced by the attendance of his associates and young friends at his funeral.

At Clinton, Lenawee county, Michigan, on the 31st July, SIMON BINGHAM, Esq., aged about 50 years. He had recently removed from Vernon, Oneida county, N.
Y., where he had long resided, and where he will be long remembered as a good citizen, an honest man, and a most devoted believer in the salvation of all mankind.
To the preachers of the restitution, his house ever offered a home, and his heart accorded them a cheerful welcome.
Peace to his ashes, and the ample consolations of the Gospel to his bereaved family. S. R. S.

Time advanced, and forgetfulness, like a friend, gradually wore away the poignancy of the recollections of the loss of my mother; still I cherished a remembrance of her and refreshed it in my devotions by prayers, with religious fondness, and still do. But whilst God in his providence thus gradually assuaged my grief, the sentiments of my uncle were wearing upon my mind like a thorn in my flesh. I was allowed to read nothing except what was first adjudged proper by him, and his library was composed of such books only as inculcated his peculiar religious sentiments. His meetings I was compelled to attend; and this manner of life gave preference in my prejudices to his Arminian views although nature could not fellowship, and be satisfied with, so cruel and unreasonable a doctrine. I could not give satisfactory assent to the articles of faith framed by the church, but at the same time I had fears of refusing assent. I heard so much said about "the church" that I had a kind of negative belief that it was the ark of safety. I advanced to my fifteenth or sixteenth year. One day I heard that Mr. M. was going to preach the next Sabbath-day at the schoolhouse in our neighborhood, which information I gave to my uncle, who immediately told me not to think of going near the house, for he taught nothing but lies and abominations. I had heard that Mr. M. believed just as my father and mother used to, and I had, in my doubts and apprehensions, an ardent desire to hear the stranger preach, but dare not think of going because of my uncle's prohibition. My uncle always took me with him to his church and saw and guided me home again. And I cannot at this day believe but that he was my friend and desired my welfare, but was led away from real affection and kindness by the influence of his creed. The Sunday came and as usual all day I attended church with my uncle. At evening it so providentially happened that my uncle was somewhat indisposed, and so told me he could not attend evening meeting, but that I must go.

I started on my way, and having to pass the schoolhouse in which Mr. M. had been preaching, I concluded I would, if Mr. M. preached that evening, attend and contrive some way to keep my uncle in ignorance of it. I saw a light at the schoolhouse, and with fear and trembling I approached and found he was to preach there that evening. I went in and took the most retired seat, but felt most wretchedly in apprehension of a judgment from my uncle if he should find me out. The house soon became filled, and I saw many who belonged to the church which my uncle attended, who would not attend in the day time. This somewhat reconciled me.

Soon the clergyman arose, and after the usual ceremonies gave for his text, James i: 27, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

His manner of reading and emphasising made an impression upon my mind so different from the preachers I was accustomed to hear—and the character of the text so variant, that I doubted whether he read from the Bible; for I never heard of such a definition of religion before—never read it, or if I ever read, I never noticed it. But he proceeded with his sermon. The house was perfectly silent and every word fell distinctly upon my ear.

He pictured out the character of God—the benevolence of Christ—the love imposed upon us by revelations to direct our practical lives, and the need we stand in of exercising love toward one another. The fatherless, he showed why they should be visited with kindness; and he disclosed the reasons why the widow should be treated with attention and love. "It is in their afflictions, that they are to be visited, and they are to receive religious ministrations of kindness, consolation and affection from their fellow-children of God—in their afflictions when they feel as if their heavenly Father was forgetting his parental love and bearing a grievous burthen upon their souls—it is then they need to be visited, and strengthened, and assured that God forgets not his love nor willingly afflicts the children of men, but will return in a little season to be their Father and their God." O! the happy impression his words made upon me. He pictured out the widow in affliction, and I saw my mother in every trait. He described the afflictions of the fatherless, and it seemed as if he spoke from a knowledge of my life and even of my very thoughts and intellectual pains—every word applied to me, and the effect was such as to subdue me and I sunk down upon my seat and covered my face with my handkerchief. Nature seemed to respond to the teaching of the speaker, as if in embrace—yea the "spirit bore witness with my spirit, of the truth." I saw many of the hearers were affected by the discourse, but none could receive it with the application of myself.

He concluded his sermon with a warm exhortation to charity, and showed from the many manifestations of God's kindness to us through the advent and sufferings of Jesus Christ, that we as children of God ought, in imitation of him, to love one another; and ended with these words—"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." (1 John iv: 10, 11.) This was a new doctrine to me. I felt as if a mighty weight was being raised from my troubled spirit. I looked upon him as something more than man, but whether an angel of heaven, or a subtle fiend of hell, I did not know. The audience left, and as the clergyman approached the door and toward me, something fastened my eyes upon him, when I soon recognized the features over which the tears had rolled in sympathy for me in the burying-ground many years before.—I was agitated—greatly agitated. He came within my reach and some unknown power raised my hand and I grasped his, but my tongue refused to move. He was somewhat surprised to witness my conduct and appearance, but seeing me full of agitation and apparent sorrow, he asked me to sit down and be calm. As soon as I collected myself I told him I must apologize for what I had done, and then asked him if he recollected of ever having found a boy in that section of country weeping and mourning at the dusk of evening over the grave of his mother. He replied he did. I told him I was he. I shall not describe the affectionate counsel and exhortation he gave me. I was satisfied that he was a minister of love, as well as an exhorter to it.

I returned home, when I learned that my uncle had been informed where I had been to meeting. He had retired to his bed, but called me to him and said—"James, to-morrow morning I shall disclose to you my determination which I have formed since I learned you attended meeting at the schoolhouse. Go to bed and be prepared for the morning." I said nothing, but retired with an additional bitter in my cup, expecting some serious accounting in the morning.

In the morning I arose with a heavy heart. I saw my uncle was calm and of thoughtful countenance, and I knew at once that a judgment was resting upon me. As I passed him he, in low accents, told me to meet him in the sitting-room immediately after breakfast. At the time appointed I went into the room where my uncle was sitting and took a seat near him. I saw he was much affected. "James," said he, "the time has come when you must give pledges of a reformation or you and I must part. I have discovered in you for years past an opposition to the religious sentiments I profess, and a seeming determination not to embrace them. I have viewed your destitute situation, and have felt for you. The indifference you have for the religion which my years of experience have taught me is true, is a very unfavorable expression of your future welfare and final lot. You seem to be going in the same road to ruin your parents went, notwithstanding my watchfulness and prayers. I see the germs sprouting in your bosom of that tree of evil which is a Upas to the soul—the licentious and damning doctrine of universal salvation. I cannot suffer such a poisonous tree to grow in my garden to whose fruits my children may have access. I pity you James, but God's will be done—the goats must be separated and taken from the fold of the sheep. You are old enough to earn your living. This is my determination—that you pledge yourself to me that you will discountenance in every way the doctrine taught by the heretic Mr. M. and give yourself over to instructions and the religion of our church, or else leave my house forever. I will give you until evening to think of this, so that if you conclude to leave you can start in the morning." On concluding thus, my uncle left the room, but, as I plainly saw, full of grief. Even though I was a slave to my uncle and aunt, and a servant of my cousins; my uncle's house was a home—I knew not where else to lay my head. I reflected upon the injunction put upon me, and saw I must choose that day which course to take. My prospects of happiness at my uncle's were dubious and dark, and to discountenance the teachings of Mr. M. seemed like discountenancing everything parental, friendly and kind; still I knew nothing of the distinguishing characteristics between the religious sentiments of my uncle and Mr. M.

After laboring in affliction through the day I resolved to quit my uncle's house and venture into the world, and let my fate abide blind fortuity. Evening came—I disclosed my determination to my uncle, and I saw it struck him heavily. His sedate, manly countenance gave way, and the uncontrolled tear rolled down his cheek. He said nothing. The family were all present, and I saw my cousins and all were sad. I felt a kind of sorrowful pleasure in witnessing the scene. I thought that they manifested the truth that instead of an innate depravity in every child of man, there were links of natural love associating all as one family. My uncle, I saw, seemed to repent of his resolution, yet his unyielding spirit would not allow him to change his determination. He first ordered my clothes to be packed up—then hesitated—then ordered them again. How it was I do not know, but my burthen seemed to be lessened, as it seemed to be increased on my friends. My uncle was greatly troubled, for he suspended his evening devotions, which I never knew him to do before.

I passed a sleepless night, and so I think did all the family. In the morning I found my clothes all neatly packed and prepared to lash upon my back, but I saw nothing of my uncle. I felt as if it would be a great relief to my uncle's family if I were absent. So I arose early, took my clothes upon my back and started from the house. I had gone but a short distance before I heard a noise in the house, and as I turned my eyes, I saw the whole family had rushed to the windows, to witness my departure. All expressions of a formal leave were swallowed up in intensity of feeling. I travelled on two or three miles before it occurred to me that I knew not where I was going. I was penniless—knew no person beyond the town in which I was born, and my course seemed completely blocked. I sat down beside the way, and half concluded to return—and then death appeared the preferable alternative.

I sat but a short time in this sad mood before I saw a carriage coming, and I sought to evade discovery by concealing myself behind the fence, but it happened the man saw me in my efforts to hide, and when he came up opposite me he stopped his carriage and said to me, "be not afraid, 'tis I." I at once recognized the voice of Mr. M. I left my hiding place and went to him. I expressed by my appearance, trouble.

He recollected me—I briefly disclosed my difficulty and the cause of it, and he sympathized with my misfortune. It appears to me that in my greatest afflictions, Mr. M. was sent to me of God to be my comforter. "The world is before us and full of troubles, and apparently hard to be borne," said he, "but then we are in the hands of a God who does all things after the counsel of his own will, and will temper the storm to the shorn lamb—he is a Father as well as a God, and chastises only for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness. Come, be of good cheer—go with me—I will find you a home, in about two days' ride." I got into his carriage, and we rode on.

I had dressed myself but plainly when I started away, and having fallen in company with the stranger who had taken me in care, I concluded, that at the first opportunity, I would put on my Sunday dress. So when we had stopped at an Inn after a few miles travel, I took out my clothes for a change, and as I took out my vest I saw the pocket was closely pinned up, and upon examining I found in it, rolled up in a piece of paper, two ten-dollar bank notes, and on the envelope was written in my uncle's hand-writing—"Good-bye James;—be saving." This incident again aroused a keen sense of feeling. I saw a friendship in my uncle, and I did not know but that I was greatly in the wrong and returning ingratitude to a fond protector. And as a wounded heart is ever subject to the frailty of weeping, I felt wounded afresh and wept, but determined to pursue my course. I was now enabled to defray my expenses of travelling, and relieve my kind friend from this burthen, though he valued it as no burthen. We travelled happily along. I say happily, for my friend and protector so beguiled my hours with so much apparent affection, that I forgot all my troubles. Toward the latter part of the second day we arrived at his house, where I was treated with the attentions of a son. The next day after our arrival, Mr. B., a member of Mr. M's. church, came to me with Mr. M., and offered me terms of living with him until the age of one-and-twenty. Mr. M. acted on my behalf and secured the best terms I could be taken upon, and I become a member of Mr. B's. family—a member and not a slave or a servant.

Several years had taken their rapid flight—when I received a pressing and warm-hearted solicitation, by way of letter, from my uncle to pay him a visit. I had in the mean time had no communication with him; for he and his house had lost their endearing attractions, although a fresh occasional recollection of by-gone years, even with their troubles, would cause me to bedew my pillow with my tears. Early impressions seem always to hang around the heart with a sort of magic power, and take full possession of the soul on every retrospective glance of the mind. O! that those impressions could bring happier pictures to my mind!

My means had by this time enabled me to travel upon my own resources, and in a comfortable and respectable style. Mr. M. used to take his occasional pilgrimages through the country of my uncle; and it was by that means that my uncle obtained information of me. I had a longing desire to revisit the tomb of my mother and erect to her memory, as well as that of my father, the marble slab. I pondered long, sadly, and happily upon the letter of my uncle, wondering what should cause such a change of feelings in him towards me as that kind letter evinced.

I started upon my journey to visit him. The peculiarity of my feelings on my way—the thought of once more meeting him and my cousins, and of the dormitory of my mother, I shall not attempt to describe. I arrived at my uncle's in his absence and met with a happy reception by my friends. I had, in my growth, very much altered in my appearance; and it was desired of me by my aunt and cousins, that on my uncle's return I should remain undisclosed and see if he would recognize me.

On the second day he returned. I was spoken of as a stranger who had called for a passing entertainment. I saw afresh the noble, manly expression of my uncle's countenance which I had ever recollected as gracing him. His head had received additional frosts of age, and had acquired almost a matured whiteness. I saw his eyes were frequently fixed upon me as if in an anxious inquiry.

He walked across the room and carelessly viewed the olden picture of my mother which was there suspended, and returned again to his seat and again scanned my countenance.

I observed his movements, and as he cast his eyes again upon me I smiled. This subdued him; and trembling with internal emotions, he arose and advanced towards me—I met him—he took me by the hand—"James—James—James," said he, "you have wronged me. How could you seek to deceive me so. You are here—yes, you are here—sit down." We were both full, to silence. But I must close my tale. I was most happily entertained for some days by my uncle. A most radical change had visited him—not so much of his heart as of his faith and practice. His heart I believe was ever good, but restrained and held in bondage to an unnatural, partial and cruel system of religious belief.

He had been brought to see the truth as revealed from heaven, "that of a truth God is no respecter of persons," which gave full scope and exercise to nobleness of heart. He had emerged from his intellectual bondage, and had got into the liberty of the Gospel, and was free indeed.

He had erected marble monuments to the memory of my parents as a kind of satisfaction for the wrongs he felt he had committed against them, by the many uncharitable attacks he had made upon them because of their religious sentiments. "They were true believers," said he; "yes, saints they were, else they never would have braved the persecution and trials of this wicked world in the manner they did. Your father would have labored with sleepless nights to earn a morsel of bread for his poverty-stricken family, before he would have denied his faith and acted the hypocrite, even though hypocrisy would have brought him worldly opulence. Yet I abused him. And your mother, as firm in her faith as your father—how happy would she have been in the exercise of her faith if she could have had freedom and society to enjoy it in. I visited her without charity—I sought to compel an abandonment of her sentiments—I was honest—Heaven knows I was honest—I knew no better. O! the thoughts of my persecutions are intolerable; and this house—the room to which she has so often retired and wept because of my severity, is a hell to me. The thoughts of my persecuting cruelties is an undying worm—an unquenchable fire. I repent—I sorrow—'tis all that I can do."

Thus talked my uncle over the recollections of my parents. He had kept himself ignorant of the truths of divine revelation against opportunity, and confined himself to the teachings of his "church rulers." Although he openly and boldly opposed and denounced the doctrine of the restitution of all things, still it was owing to his gross ignorance of what he thus opposed. It had so happened in the dispensations of Providence, that he was inclined to attend a funeral occasion where Mr. M. administered the consolations of divine truth, when the faith of "that sect which is every where spoken against," was truly and powerfully portrayed. A gleam of light entered his mind, and inquiry increased that gleam to a perfect illumination of the soul. His family with slow and gradual steps followed him in his new faith, and in proportion to their advancement in the knowledge and profession of the doctrine of impartial grace, they received the frowns and persecutions of the professedly exclusive children of God. I was received and deeply engaged in his friendship, and so continued until he departed for heaven.

Through the remainder of his life his benevolence shone around him. Often he used to utter these words—"if we would be children of God, we must imitate him and be kind to the unthankful and the evil!"

He is gone—gone to heaven. Peace to his spirit. I am yet here, the lone, and now bewidowed orphan, peacefully awaiting the time of my departure. My head begins to cast its frosty covering, warning me hourly to set my house in order, preparatory to my departure. It is ready. I look with deep solicitude to the future, often reflecting upon that spirit who wept over me at the grave of my mother, as the spirit of a guardian angel, that directed me in the way to meet the spirits of my earthly parents in the blissful presence of my celestial Father.

And may I continue to hold in grateful remembrance my benefactors and friends, in obedience to the supreme will of Heaven, and be prepared on my exit to say in the dying expression of my uncle—"O happy thought—I shall soon be permitted of Heaven to greet with happy salutation my departed first minister of light and love—the sainted Murray."

REFLECTOR.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE TESTIMONY OF DR. CHALMERS.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

I have heretofore had occasion to advert to instances wherein writers of celebrity, in their efforts to establish a favorite theory, have advanced and defended propositions, which, when applied, will entirely undermine some prominent trait in their religious system. I deem it of importance, occasionally to notice these cases, because some of the most valuable truths connected with religion, often in this way, receive the support of powerful minds, who, in other circumstances, would oppose them as errors. When a writer in expatiating upon a religious topic of a general character, which is elevated above doctrinal differences, advances arguments which militate against some sectarian tenet which he entertains, his evidence is deserving of more weight, than when writing in direct reference to that peculiar point in his creed. In the former case, his mind being drawn off from the disputed doctrines of sects, by an absorbing interest in the more general point he is endeavoring to establish, is freed from prejudice and every improper bias, and is at liberty follow untrammelled, the dictates of reason and judgment to their legitimate conclusions. But in the latter case, when his mind is especially directed to the distinguishing doctrines of his sect, it is extremely liable to be warped by prejudice, superstition, interest, popularity, and all those improper influences, which darken the judgment and drown the reason.

These remarks are exemplified in Dr. Chalmers' Astronomical Sermons. It must be evident to all who peruse these sermons, as well as his other writings, that the Dr. is a staunch believer in the doctrine of endless suffering. And yet he frequently supports propositions, which, when applied and followed to their conclusions, utterly sweep away that dark and unholy sentiment.

The Deist contends that the science of Astronomy reveals such an infinitude of worlds and systems, scattered through immensity of space, that it is unreasonable to suppose the Deity would lavish so much attention upon our small, dark planet, as Christianity teaches. Dr. Chalmers, in his third Astronomical discourse, opposes this argument as follows:—

"The more we know of the extent of nature, should we not have the loftier conception of Him who sits in high authority over the concerns of so wide a universe? But is it not adding to the bright catalogue of his other attributes, to say, that, while magnitude does not overpower him, minuteness cannot escape him, and variety cannot bewilder him; and that at the very time while the mind of the Deity is abroad over the whole vastness of creation, there is not one particle of matter, there is not one individual principle of rational or of animal existence, there is not one single world in that expanse which teems with them, that his eye does not discern as constantly, and his hand does not guide as unerringly, and his spirit does not watch and care for as vigilantly, as if it formed the one and exclusive object of his attention."

This sentence is as eloquent as it is true; and affords an ample refutation to the objection of the deist. But again he exclaims:—

"I cannot fly from His presence. Go where I will, he tends me, and watches me, and cares for me; and the same Being who is now at work in the remotest domains of nature and of providence, is also at my right hand to cke out to me every moment of my being, and to uphold me in the exercise of all my feelings and of all my faculties. Now, what God is doing with me, he is doing with every distinct individual of this world's population. The intimacy of his presence, and attention, and care, reaches to one and all of them. With a mind unburdened by the vastness of all its other concerns, he can prosecute, without distraction, the government and guardianship of every one son and daughter of the species."

This sentence is also equally beautiful and reasonable. But the attention of the Dr. in penning these truths, was directed exclusively to the overthrow of the deist's position; and their equal bearing upon his own sentiments, probably did not occur to him. They can, however, be applied with the same propriety and force to the partial doctrine of ceaseless woe. Dr. Chalmers maintains (and with the utmost consistency) that notwithstanding the vastness of God's works, he being infinite in his perfections, exerts all the energies of his nature as directly in watching over, governing, guarding, directing, and upholding each individual of the human family, as though they were the only objects of his attention. Let us illustrate and apply this argument. Suppose the Deity had never created but one intelligent being, whom he endowed with the faculties, and propensities, and powers of man; and that from eternity his sole attention had been engrossed wholly, in upholding, guiding and instructing this one human being. Now is it to be believed, that, under these circumstances, the Creator would allow this individual to stray so far away into sin and error, as that he would be compelled to condemn him to unending misery? Is it to be supposed that Jehovah does not possess a sufficiency of power, or influence, or of inducement, to cause this single being, however depraved he may have been, to come into a participation of his own holiness and happiness? There, can in reason, but one answer be returned to these inquiries. Every mind which can reason from cause to effect, must perceive and acknowledge that, in this case an infinite God, could whenever he thought proper, so bring his boundless capabilities to bear, as to influence and induce the creature to become righteous and happy. Now, remember, the argument of Dr. Chalmers, above, is that the attention, the influence and the power of the perfect Jehovah, is not distracted or weakened by the multiplicity of its objects; but what he could do, were there but one being, he can do with countless millions. And thus he furnishes a most powerful, irrefragable and convincing argument in proof of the final purity and felicity of all mankind—inasmuch as God, would unquestionably be able and willing to induce one to comply with all his requirements, were he the sole object of his care, and therefore is able and willing to induce all to do so!

The Dr. reiterates the same truth in another paragraph—

"It is a cheering evidence of the delight he [God] takes in communicating happiness, that the whole of immensity should be strewn with the habitations of life and of intelligence; but it would surely bring home the evidence, with a nearer and more affecting impression to every bosom, did we know that at the very time his benignant regard took in the mighty circle of created beings, there was not a single family overlooked by him, and that every individual in every corner of his dominions, was as effectually seen to, as if the object of an exclusive and undivided care!"

We have seen that were but one individual "the object of the exclusive and undivided care" of Jehovah, he would lead him from sin and error into the paths of righteousness and peace. And if "every individual, in every corner of his domains, is as effectually seen to, as if the object of an exclusive and undivided care," then, beyond every possibility of doubt, "every individual" of the human family must eventually be brought from the power of transgression into a state of endless purity and joy.

Speaking of the fall of this world into the power of sin, he exclaims—"Nor should we wonder, though, among the multitude of other worlds from which the ear of the Almighty was regaled with songs of praise, and the incense of a pure adoration ascended to his throne, he should leave the strayed and solitary world to perish in the guilt of its rebellion. But tell me, oh! tell me, would it not throw the softening of a most exquisite tenderness over the character of God, should we see him putting forth his every expedient to reclaim to himself those children who had wandered away from him?"

As the Dr. here asserts (by way of interrogation) that the omnipotent God is "putting forth his every expedient to reclaim to himself those children who had wandered away from him," does not the idea that he will fail in these laudable and holy efforts, amount to an absolute absurdity? Yea, does it not become a certainty that he must succeed in his righteous exertions? And "tell me, oh! tell me, would it not throw" a still more "exquisite tenderness," a superlative beauty, and glory, and excellency, and majesty, over the character of the benevolent Father of spirits, to believe that he will accomplish his beneficent desires, and finally brings all his intelligent offspring to enjoy the purity and happiness of heaven, than to believe that he will fail, and millions will blaspheme his name forever?

Again—"Is it for us, in the face of all this experience, ungratefully to draw a limit around the perfections of God—to aver, that the multitude of other worlds has withdrawn any portion of his benevolence from the one we occupy—or that he, whose eye is upon every separate family of the earth, would not lavish all the riches of his unsearchable attributes on some high plan of pardon and immortality in behalf of its countless generations?" If it is ungrateful for the deist "to draw a limit around the perfections"—the power, wisdom, or love of God—is it not equally ungrateful for the Partialist to do so? If the Deity, as Dr. Chalmers asserts and the Scriptures confirm, has "lavished all the riches of his unsearchable attributes on some high plan of pardon and immortality in behalf of the countless generations" of earth, is it not plainly drawing a limit around his perfections, to contend that he will fail in accomplishing the heavenly plan? It assuredly is; for a perfect being would never form a plan which he could not fully execute. And to say that God will fail in his plan to save the world, can be nothing less than attributing to him the most glaring imperfection—can be nothing less than limiting the operation of all his powers!

Referring to the deist's objection, Dr. Chalmers once more observes—"The perverse interpretation we [the deist] put upon the fact, that God can diffuse the benefits of his power and of his goodness over such a variety of worlds, is, that he cannot or will not bestow so much goodness on one of those worlds, as a professed revelation from heaven has announced to us." Now observe how fully this absurdity of the deist corresponds with that of the Partialist. It is proclaimed in the Bible, and professors now almost universally admit, that Deity designed to save the whole world, through his Son. And "the perverse interpretation," which Partialists put upon this fact, that God designed to save all men, "is that he cannot or will not," bestow that righteousness and salvation upon each one of the human family, that he declares he intended for the whole race!! What ingenuous and candid mind, on beholding this absurdity, will not forsake the doctrine which cherishes it? To believe that Jehovah with his infinite perfections, really designed to save all men by the mission of his Son, and yet will fail in fulfilling this design, through lack of means, is exceedingly unreasonable and unscriptural. And to suppose that a pure and holy God has ample means at command to accomplish it, and yet rather than effectually to apply them, will permit sin, and error, and ignorance, and misery forever to live and triumph over his offspring, appears to me to be not only sinful, but absolutely bordering upon blasphemy!

The testimony thus afforded in the suggestions of Dr. Chalmers, affords as strong a groundwork as can be desired, to prove the doctrine of universal salvation. No deductions can be more clear to this point than those they furnish. Let the reader duly reflect upon them, and the propriety of this assertion will be perceived. And should these brief remarks tend to throw light upon the minds of any who have been cherishing error, the object of the writer is fully attained, and he is abundantly rewarded.

SERIOUS QUESTIONS.

When a person has become so lost to decency, as to refuse to attend a funeral, because a minister whom he judges to be a heretic, is expected to preach the sermon, does his righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees? If not, can he enter into the kingdom of heaven?—Matt. v. 20.

Are there any such characters in this enlightened age? If there are, who are they? Will some of them answer the above questions? W.

QUESTIONS FOR EVERY PROFESSED UNIVERSALIST.

Do you sincerely desire the prosperity of Universalism?

If so, Do you do your duty as an individual in exerting your influence in its promotion?

Do you openly and fearlessly stand forth in defence of the doctrine when you hear it reviled or its advocates slandered?

Do you attend Universalist meetings in preference to those which are termed the most popular by the world?

Do you, by your example, encourage virtue and strict integrity, and in short, do you, in every respect, live up to the principles of Universalism? X.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

I DO NOT LIKE.

1. I do not like to see people who profess to be Universalists, act as though they wished the community to look upon them as the shining ones, and the fashionables of the meetings which they attend. Such conduct shows that the heart is governed by some other ism than Universalism.

2. I do not like to see people, especially Universalists, make vinegar faces when strangers get into their pews. To me, it looks too much like saying, "Begone! you shall not hear the Gospel preached in our pew." W. R.,

ENJOYING ONE'S OWN OPINION.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

In conversation between persons differing in opinion on religious subjects, the following remark is often made: "I am willing that every one should enjoy his own opinion." The intention of the remark is evidently to make known one's charity. And so far as the intention or the exercise of charity is concerned, the author of it has our entire approbation. But in the remark itself there are several inproprieties which I wish to point out; and I trust that they will be corrected.

We should endeavor to make use of language expressive of the meaning we intend to convey. But is this the case with the language under consideration? Is there a Christian or philanthropist that is willing every one should enjoy his own opinions?

The fact that every denomination of Christians and every sect, religious, political, and of every other kind, is striving to advance and propagate its own opinions in opposition to those entertained by others, gives a negative answer to the question. Knowing that there are many false and pernicious opinions in the world, the man who entertains the least regard for his fellow-men, cannot be willing that every one should enjoy his own opinions, i. e. continue to entertain them, provided he has the power to change those opinions.

I have heard Universalists say of Limitarians, that they were willing they should enjoy their own opinions. And I regret to say that many professed Universalists act up to this concession, in that they make use of no means to remove from the minds of their Limitarian neighbors the false and pernicious sentiments that are harbored there. But the real Universalist, believing as he does, that the distinguishing sentiments of Limitarians are not true, is not willing that they should retain them. And his unwillingness to see error, and consequent vice and misery, prevail in the world, will arouse him to active exertion to propagate the truth, knowing that, as light advances darkness will recede.

To say we are willing that every one should enjoy his own opinion, is inconsistent in, at least, two respects. The first is, that the remark stands in opposition to our conduct, which is constantly aimed, and ought to be, against many opinions that are entertained in the world. Why labor to remove from the mind of a man, his opinions, if we are willing he should enjoy them? The second inconsistency in this remark is, that there are many opinions in the world, that cannot be enjoyed; and many others that ought not to be enjoyed, if they could. And since we know this to be the case, it is improper for us to say that we are willing every one should enjoy his own opinion. To enjoy an opinion, I understand to mean, to receive the happiness it imparts, to relish it. Now, since there are opinions which can impart no happiness or enjoyment; and which the benevolent mind cannot relish; and others which, though they may be relished and enjoyed by the most wicked and abandoned of our race, are of the most pernicious and ruinous tendency, is it, I ask, proper to apply to them the remark in question?

1. Among the opinions prevalent in the world which cannot be enjoyed, there is none that stands out to view more prominently than the doctrine of endless misery. It not only has no enjoyment to impart, but the belief of it is attended with the keenest anguish. The prospect of the endless damnation of a part of mankind fills the reflecting and benevolent mind with the utmost horror. To say that a man can enjoy a doctrine, that exhibits before him such a prospect, is wholly preposterous. If there be any beings in the universe by whom this doctrine can be enjoyed, they are those that inhabit the fabled hell of Limitarianism. And to express a willingness that men should enjoy this doctrine, is equivalent to saying that we are willing they should become demons.

For my part, I am not willing that men should become demons, and thus be deprived of all regard for mankind, and filled with infernal satisfaction in view of their misery. Neither, indeed, am I willing that men should become saints, if the same result is to follow. In other words, I am not willing that people should be so changed, whether it be by going to the Limitarian heaven or hell, as to enjoy the doctrine of endless misery. In this world, I am satisfied that they cannot enjoy it; and as it can afford no enjoyment, but on the contrary produces the most heart-rending sorrow, and the bitterest anguish, I am not willing that they should even harbor it. It is a deadly viper that constantly infuses its poison into the vitals of human enjoyment. How gladly would I wrest the devoted victim from its influence.

2. Among the opinions prevalent in the world that ought not to be enjoyed, if they could, I will name only one, which I regard as most destructive of the virtue and consequent happiness of mankind. It is the doctrine that, in this world virtue produces misery, and vice happiness.

It is in vain to deny that such a doctrine exists, even among the most popular religious denominations: for it is often asserted, and brought to bear against the doctrine of the final salvation of all men. "Do you not see," says the popular religionist, "that the most virtuous and most pious people are miserable in this life; while the wicked and profane are revelling in all the enjoyments which this world affords? How, then, can you vindicate the justice of God, if the righteous and wicked are all to fare alike at last?"

I do not introduce this Limitarian remark for the purpose of replying to it; for this has often been done; but to show that it teaches the doctrine which I before said, ought not to be enjoyed. To enjoy such an opinion is to avoid every virtuous action, and to commit every possible crime. As no man wishes to be miserable, so no man that enjoys this opinion, will seek to be virtuous. And on the contrary, as happiness is "the being's end and aim" of every man; so every man who enjoys this opinion, will seek to be vicious. It is in vain to bring the doctrine of endless misery to counteract the influence of this opinion; for the history of the world proves that endless misery never exerted any influence in the prevention of crime. And it is reasonable that it should not; for it is placed at such a distance; and is to be avoided on such easy terms, any time before the expiring moment, that it loses all its terrors.

Besides, it is contended that the most vicious man is not only the most happy man in this world; but that there is the most prospect of his repenting, and consequently avoiding all punishment hereafter.

Thus it is that the man who is very wicked in this world, is more happy than the one who is not, and has more prospect of happiness in the future world! Is there any way to avoid the conclusion that this doctrine is licentious? There is not; and hence every lover of humanity must desire its suppression. No one can be willing that such an opinion should be enjoyed, whose eyes are open to its pernicious tendency. And it would seem that no one, but the blindest bigot, could help discovering that such is its natural influence.

QUESTIONS FOR PARENTS.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

1. Can disobedience destroy the tie that binds the parent's heart to the child?
2. Can parental love be weakened by ingratitude, or alienated by vicious habits?
3. Will a good parent hesitate to save a child, because it has become wicked and depraved?
4. Does the strength of your love depend on external circumstances?
5. Is not love an active principle?
6. If so, will it not always lead you to promote the happiness of your child?
7. Could you become the willing tormentor of your child, except for its subsequent happiness?
8. Could you willingly entrust your child with a weapon which you knew would destroy its life?
9. Are you willing to compel your child to disobey you through life, because it has fallen into a few errors?

10. Are you happy in anticipating that you shall live again without affection for your children?

11. Would not the destitution of this love, leave us a principle which we ascribe to demons?

12. Can we conceive of perfect happiness where those we love are not permitted to associate with us?

13. If you believe your unconverted children will sink to eternal despair, is your faith "the substance of things hoped for"?

14. Which would afflict you most, for a child to go to the penitentiary, or die in an unconverted state?

15. If the former, as would doubtless be the case, is not your faith in endless misery a dead faith?

16. And if it is a dead faith, can it be a means of uniting you to Christ?

17. If you should hear your child was suffering in a strange land, would you not seek expedients to save it without regard to its character?

18. Could you exclude a child from your favor, because it had been deluded into the service of your enemy?

19. Does the love of God differ from yours, except in degree?

20. Is it possible for a "mortal man to be more just than God, or more pure than his Maker"?

21. If not, how many, think ye, will be left to linger out an eternity of hopeless sorrow?

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Some of our lay brethren have a desire to express their opinions on this subject; we therefore give the communication of our well known correspondent, Nemo, a place in this paper; and, to save room, we have omitted a few unimportant and prefatory remarks in the following from our venerable brother, Col. Kingsbury, of Sheshequin, Pa. His very extensive acquaintance with the Universalists in that region of the Lord's heritage, enables him to speak with confidence respecting the views of our brethren on this subject—while his high standing in our order, for many years as a prominent and active lay brother, entitles his opinions to a respectful consideration. Let them be judged by their merits; as the question must be, by its merits.

A. B. G.

"I have been an opposer of this scheme of a theological seminary, from the first time I ever heard it mentioned. It appears to me, that it would be laying a foundation for a kind of religious feudal system, unworthy to be based on the pure principles of the Gospel. The time has been when it has answered a very good purpose for the leaders of the Partialists; but this vassalage even among those orders, is now becoming very uneasy, and is being shaken off by thousands. It will never do for Universalists—they will enjoy the pure liberty of the Gospel.

"I have often been astonished at the zeal of some of the advocates of this feudal system—astonished, because I could not impugn their honesty. As Universalists we are yet too young in organization, and too poor, to adopt any measures to stimulate aspirants for ecclesiastical distinctions; it could not be brought about in the days of the promoters of the scheme—and if seen darkly in prospective, why should they want to introduce discord and confusion among us, to bring about that which they could not participate in themselves? It ought not so to be. But how shall we account for this strange infatuation? I am unwilling to say (prompt as I usually am in expressing my sentiments) that the advocates of this theological scheme, manifest more zeal than knowledge. But I must say, that, in my humble opinion, they have in their zeal to promote the popularity of the cause they would advocate, overlooked the fatal consequences which would follow the means they would adopt to promote their object. It does seem to me, that these brethren want to get along too fast—and that they do not see that the progress of the Gospel, though slow, is sure—that it appears evidently to be the special work of almighty God, and that all we ought to do, is to preach it, love one another, and live in peace and harmony, that the world may know that we are indeed brethren. Pursuing this course, we should gain more members to our societies, than could be gained by any number of artificial priests—whose habits, manners and way of living, would not assimilate in all these things, with the working class of the community. Besides, this sort of priests would be expecting a homage they could not receive, except from sycophants—and therefore, to manufacture priests in the way proposed, would be a sure means, in the end, to make hypocrites, also.

"Moreover, as you say, none but the rich could be made priests. Now, some of our most eminent preachers sprang from the working class of our citizens. Father Ballou, in the early stage of his life, shouldered his axe, and went from Vermont to Chenango county, N. Y., where he worked, one summer at least, on the trees of the forest. Has he been the less respected—less useful as a preacher and writer? Surely not. I could name many others. Indeed, the most of our preachers were from the working class of the community. What of all this? They can preach, (and so could the fishermen and shepherds of old,) and that to the acceptance of the people. I am apt to think that the greatest geniuses, generally, spring from the working class of the people. And should we adopt a plan that would cut off from preaching, this class of our citizens, because they happened to be born of parents that were poor and not able to send them to a theological seminary, we should be laying the axe at the root of the tree of our prosperity. I hope, therefore, that this measure will never succeed. Indeed, here, there is not one in favor of it. And so far as my knowledge extends, but very few, among the laity, any where else.

Sheshequin, August 7, 1836.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Mental acquirements are, in this era of the world, peculiarly necessary in order to shine in society, or press our way through the crowd to an eminence in the pursuits of life, either as agriculturalists, mechanics or in any of the learned professions. Literary attainments seem necessary, in this age, more than in the preceding, to cause that shining in society, that qualification which commands, and carries a kind of license to respect.

It is likewise conceded with pleasure, that a public teacher ought to possess a perfect knowledge of the art, or mystery, which he proposes to communicate to others; and if he teaches as a public lecturer, to his other knowledge, that of rhetoric, ought to be superadded, that his pronunciation may be clear, and his diction elegant. If he seeks to enlarge the boundaries of science, or to push the march of intellectual knowledge beyond the ground already occupied, he must give his nights and his days to hard study and mental toil; must learn all of that particular science which preceding adventurers have recorded, and after having digested the whole in his mind, he is then, and only then, in the way of making fresh discoveries, and adding new trophies of mental triumph.

The preceding remarks may apply with propriety, to any of the learned professions, or more common avocations of life, not by any means wishing to exclude divinity from the catalogue.

It will, I think, be admitted by all, that the quantum of knowledge really needed to expound any science, may be supposed to bear some proportion to the abstruseness, or simplicity, of the subject which the teacher undertakes to elucidate. There are very few universal geniuses, who are capable of learning and teaching many, or all of the sciences; and hence those who have professed to apply their time and talents to one particular art or science, are called professors of that art or science, and open seminaries for public education. Some of these are patronized only by those who wish to reap immediate benefit from them. Others have been endowed by the public, or by individuals, that the professor may have a constant salary, whether he gets pupils or not. It is his duty to teach—it becomes to him a routine of business, consisting of a beginning, middle and end,

They are thought to keep up the spirit of a thing, which would else languish, or be forgotten. And an attendance on them is called fashionable, and increases the consequence, as well as celebrity of the pupil.

Amongst other abstruse sciences which retain professors' chairs, theology has endowed hers. To the gone-by ages, perhaps some apology might be made as a way to clear up what was held to be most mysterious, and give an air of dignity to a subject the most sublime. But the age has vanished—the era has gone by; it now becomes the duty of all to assert the benefit of revelation, and no longer to study at, or endow seminaries of theology; but forget the term, or at least neutralize it in the more comprehensive idea conveyed under the word Christianity.

Call, if you please, Christianity a science; it is one of the most simple of the simplest. Call it an art, the practice of it is the pleasantest in nature; whose constant application wearies not, but the more it is practiced, the sweeter it becomes.

Christianity has, it is too true, been long split up into sects; and professors of theology have perpetuated those sects, and marked the outlines of each with geographical accuracy; and received their well-earned endowments in defending this or that well-defined territory: thus theological professors have become mutually belligerents, and given lessons to skeptics and infidels. They are, in fact, hirelings, as much so as hired soldiers who defend with courage, that party which hires and pays them. Their instruction is a routine of words, their pupils too often pedants: they are more likely to be corroded by the rust of learning, than to shine in the beautiful practice of their calling.

The grand desideratum in all public teachers, is, first that they learn what they wish to teach; a knowledge of the first rudiments, as well as of the higher deductions of science, is an indispensable requisite. And who cannot learn Christianity without the aid of a professor, endowed at a theological seminary? And who, having thus learned it, but may become a teacher of it? What tenet is there so abstruse, that the humble disciple of Jesus cannot demonstrate it? For the express purpose of its easy acquirements, a revelation was made of it: and the terms revelation, and mystery, for ever stand opposed to each other.

But it is said, that "until we have a theological seminary, the denomination will be deficient in biblical learning and theological knowledge." The denomination here alluded to, is doubtless the Universalist, who as a denomination will ever be deficient in biblical and theological knowledge—they will never study at a theological seminary, if there is one established. But I suppose, students for the ministry are meant.

And what part of biblical knowledge is beyond the acquirement of a warm-hearted, determined seeker? If he has funds to spare for the pay of a professor, and time to attend his teachings, those funds would buy him books, if he could not borrow them; and that time rightly used, would master them; and his industry would be crowned with success. How many have, by dint of application, learned enough of the learned languages to read the sacred books in the original? and how many more will, if they are excited by proper emulation?

If Universalism is to become a sectarian dogma or mystery, let it have professors appointed, like sentinels, to guard the passes, and instruct novices in the avenues and labyrinths. But then, remember, Universalism will not be Christianity; it becomes a feeble party—it wants support—while Christianity soars like an eagle—unaided and independent. In vain may theological seminaries endeavor to paint the diamond, and such is Christianity.

The first step towards a good Christian teacher, certainly is piety, ardent love to God and men, the next, a good critical knowledge of the Bible, church history, etc.; and the acquisition of these is attainable by any person of industrious habits. Lessons in elocution and rhetoric are, perhaps, the only embellishments he need seek to learn by a teacher; a professor of which, would be of more real use to a young tyro, than one of merely book theology. Then would the Christian teacher be an ornament to his profession; his acquirements would be his own—earned by the sweat of his brow—and he would never relax his studies, having once tasted their sweets, but progress all his life time. Not like one dismissed after an ordeal of probation for a fixed period, as a qualified practitioner; who has learned all his teacher knew; and received his diploma; proud of his acquirements; little anxious to improve them. Those things Cowper speaks of, "who skip into the pulpit, and then skip down again."

If Universalism will not stand and flourish by its intimate union with Christianity, as being parcel of it, it must fall; and those who, by human hands, seek to support the ark, may find their meddling worse than useless.

It is lamentable to reflect, as it is also ridiculous to observe, what an apparatus is put in motion—what large sums are expended—what a world of trouble taken, to educate a select individual, for the ultimate end of placing him in a pulpit—from whence he discourses to the people in a language scarcely one-tenth of them understand; of matter, which it may be almost said, has ceased to have a meaning to them; which seldom reaches their intellect, their imaginations, or affections, and has lost all power over the will. While the same ends are obtained by a far easier process, more simple in its movements, more powerful in its operations, and more certain as to its results.

Nature's maxims are; When any one has first learned, he is authorised to teach. His commission to teach is not derived from any man, or set of men, or from any society; it is a thing no one possesses, therefore none can confer what they do not possess. A teacher's commission to teach, or preach, commences with a number of persons to hear him: it continues as long as his hearers attend on his instructions; and when he can no longer obtain auditors, his commission, ipso facto, ends, to be renewed at any subsequent period, or when he again gets hearers. Nemo.

OCCASIONAL PREACHING.

I was lately perusing some Universalist papers, in which I discovered some remarks by Messrs. Hammond and Grosh, relative to preachers of the order who "only preach occasionally." I am a friend to the doctrine, and feel interested in the prosperity of the denomination. Therefore I take the liberty to say a few words to the gentlemen above named.

I am well acquainted with a preacher of your order, living in my own neighborhood, who doubtless would be grieved were he subjected to such a resolution as you seem to require. True, he is not one of your greatest preachers, but he preaches to the satisfaction of the society in which he resides—they put great confidence in him, and respect his every-day example as a Christian. He manifests a sincere devotion to the cause of truth. He owns and occupies a farm, on which he maintains his family by the labor of his own hands, receiving little or no support for preaching. He lays no claims to talent and eloquence—makes few pretensions, but those are chosen and permanent. His learning is trifling—he can read so as to be understood, and write a tolerable old-fashioned hand, well enough at least to keep his own blotter and do his little home business. His best friends say that diffidence is his greatest failing—and, indeed, if this is a crime, I think it is less hurtful than its opposite. Many would become discouraged were they placed in his situation. He preaches steadily in his own society, of which he cannot collect more than eight or ten at a time, and about the same number generally, (sometimes more,) at others.

But the time has been, when, surrounded by various discouragements, he has not preached more than "one or two sermons," or "some few times in a year." What should he have done to have suited you? you would not have him leave his home, and especially his business, (his only support,) to preach in distant towns, or take a tour to the West—or, like the travelling tailor, stick his needle in his coat-sleeve, catch his thimble and run to some other place, for the sake of preaching more than "a few times in a year"—and all this to retain his letter of fellowship, which would otherwise be discontinued. I think, gentlemen, that circumstances will alter cases. Of course, you see the necessity of an amendment in some of your constitutions—but I believe a deliberate cautiousness should be exercised previous to the forming, or "reviving resolutions" of this nature. "Look before you leap," or you may ruin some of your "field and workshop preachers," who "may preach acceptably and usefully to country congregations—may possess good common sense, general knowledge and excellent moral characters." It may be no hard matter to feed some, while you starve others.

Some years ago, a worthy preacher of your order, living not a thousand miles from Rochester, became discouraged about the preaching business—concluded to preach no more, and sent in his formal resignation—all done in good faith, no doubt, believing it was the best course he could take. What was the consequence? Why, many sorrowful hearts—exultation and ridicule from the enemies of Universalism. And what more? Before a year came round, he regretted the movement, came forward at the next session of the council, and again requested fellowship. I mention these things, gentlemen, to show that through fear, a man may sometimes run into error, or neglect his duty, or, in some way give advantage to the enemy. "I have written in sincerity, and with fulness of charity to all." Read it, gentlemen, and if you will, notice it as seemeth good to you. MINOR.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1836.

SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETER.

"And he [Elisha] went up from thence [Jericho] unto Bethel: and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald head; Go up, thou bald head. And he turned back, and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the Lord: and there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them." 2 Kings ii: 23, 24.

An inquirer asks concerning this passage, whether there is not some error—some mistake—for as it is, he conceives it affords much ground for the cavils and objections of the skeptic. Firstly, the offenders are called "little children." Could they be so deeply responsible for, and conscious of the criminality of their language? Secondly, the language itself is but trifling—playful—though contemptuous; and such as heedless, saucy children might readily offer to any aged, poorly clad person. Thirdly, the spirit of the prophet—his cursing the children—is inconsistent with that which should be borne by a man of God. And, fourthly, the punishment is too severe for children—disproportionate to the offence—revengful and cruel. Such are the objections.

To which I reply, there is an error in the translation of the passage—and a greater misunderstanding of the facts of the case, as I shall show.

1. The original Hebrew word, nearim, rendered "little children" in our common version, also means young persons who have attained to years of maturity. The same word is applied in the original Scriptures, to Isaac, ("lad,") when he was twenty-eight years old; to Joseph, when he was thirty; and to Rehobam, when he was forty years of age. See Horne's Int., p. ii, b. ii, ch. vii. sec. v, and art. 18. Hence, and from considerations yet to be named, it is most probable, if not certain, that the "little children" were actually dissolute, profane and irreverent young persons, upwards of twelve years of age and under forty.

2. The language is not playful—not merely saucy—not merely contemptuous—but irreverent, scoffing and irrereligious in the highest degree. Consider the prophet merely as an aged, wayfaring man, and they deserved severe punishment; for the abuse of a stranger, and especially of an aged stranger, is a great crime. But they alluded to Elijah's ascension, and to Elisha's succession to his prophetic office, when they said Go up, thou bald head—meaning, tauntingly, "Ascend thou, also, thou bald head." Hence they ridiculed the wonderful act of God, and the departed and living messengers he had chosen and honored, thus insulting God and man. Why they did this, is evident when we consider that Bethel, the place of residence of these scoffing young persons, was a principal seat of Ahab's idolatry—that they scoffed at the work and servants of the true God, because of their adherence to Baal, and their hatred of all opposed to their impure, cruel and idolatrous practices.

3. It is manifestly unjust to apply to the people of that remote and partially barbarous age, the standards by which we measure characters and actions in this more civilized and enlightened period. Still more unjust is it, to require of the patriarchs who lived in, and were governed by the imperfect and dubious twilight of the Mosaic dispensation, the same perfection which is required in the full meridian light of a dispensation irradiated by "the Sun of righteousness." Reflect that God adapted his revelations to the circumstances, wants and capacities of his people—that he led them on from light to light, and from glory to glory, until they should be prepared for greater knowledge and more perfect principles—that even now, he is gradually preparing even the Christian world for the better understanding and more perfect practice of the Christian religion—and surely, you will not expect nor require Elisha to act on principles he yet knew not, neither could have understood, and the practice of which were not adapted to his age nor its circumstances.

But even this extenuation is unnecessary in Elisha's case before us—for he manifested no more a revengful spirit, than does the judge on the bench, in pronouncing the sentence of death on a murderer duly tried and convicted. The punishment of idolatry, or of blasphemy, or of speaking against the spirit of God manifested in miracles, was death. These persons were guilty of all these crimes—crimes, which, under the theocracy, were high treason, because committed against God as the supreme ruler of the Jewish people. And Elisha, acting as the ambassador of God, pronounces this sentence ("cursed them") not in his own name—not as of private pique or revenge, but "in the name of the Lord."

4. Consider, now, all the foregoing circumstances—the nature of the crime, and peculiar customs of the age—and you will not call the punishment unsuited to the Mosaic dispensation, or too cruel for its provisions, or disproportionate to the crime for which it was inflicted, viewed, as it should be, in the light of that dispensation.

A DREAM.

The following article is from the pen of my deceased brother, Rufus K. Grosh, who departed this life in March last. It is published for the sake of his many friends, (and I cannot but believe it will also be interesting to many of our readers who knew him not,) who will doubtless be gratified in reading and possessing these few lines written by a beloved friend, who is now "mouldering in the dust." It bears evident marks of having been hastily penned, is uncorrected, and possibly unfinished. I found it among his papers. He wrote but little, excepting letters to his friends, and that little he mostly destroyed as soon as written. He never could be persuaded that he wrote well—and though gifted with great talents, for description, a keen perception of the beautiful, and of the ridiculous, and an exhaustless fund of sly, chaste humor, yet the determination never to indulge in the petty ambition of publishing what he deemed but common place, prevented him from ever writing for the public; or even for the private amusement of but a very few friends. I mean not this as a panegyric, but simply to explain why this is, probably, the only piece of his that any of our readers ever saw, or will see.

In order that the article may be fully understood and its humor be relished, I will briefly explain the circumstances connected with it. It was written during one of the numerous protracted meetings held in this city, (then a village,) probably in 1832. Many of the most popular, and well paid, and highly fed, and richly clad Presbyterian clergymen, were collected here to aid and participate in the meetings. Dr. Lansing, then a resident in this city, was very active and important in their promotion, and was easily distinguished from the other speakers by "a slight impediment in his speech." Much merriment was indulged in about this time, in regard to a warm recommendation of the "Welch Medicamentum," given by Dr. L., and published in the newspapers. I think the Doctor certified that he derived much enjoyment, or comfort from its use; and I believe many suspected that it was more in consequence of the brandy or other stimulus, than of the drugs, contained in the medicamentum. The following is the dream. A. B. G.

On Sunday evening last I attended the preaching of Mr. Kirk, [of Albany,] in the First Presbyterian church in this village. The text was the parable of the rich man and Lazarus—one which, in my mind, has always excited interest; and when he commenced I hoped he would, by his explanation, relieve me from the many distressing doubts, which possessed me in relation to this peculiar parable. But I was disappointed—for, instead of sound argument, logical reasoning and common sense, I heard but furious rant, poor declamation, and the horrible fancies of a diseased brain.

After treating it as a historical account—saying that it was told us by one who had been an eye-witness of the scene, Jesus Christ—he withdrew the curtains of the invisible world—described the misery of its inmates, on account of the excruciating pains of its fire and the tormentings of their consciences—told us that our memories there, would be far more tenacious than in this life—that we would recollect the good offers of salvation which we had refused, the "good things" we had enjoyed in this life, the charities we had neglected to perform, etc. On finding by the drift of his discourse, (which was intended to terrify rather than convince,) that I would derive but little information from hearing him, I locked myself up in my own thoughts, and pondered on the meaning of the awful words of the text.

Our Father! (I ejaculated inwardly) is poverty the only test of admission to thy blessed kingdom? and will riches (no matter if they are employed in benefactions to our fellow-beings, relieving the distressed, furnishing the poor with thy Word, or what not) land us in heart-rending agonies in the eternal world? I groaned in spirit at the thought. I remembered my many friends, who are blessed (or cursed?) with wealth, and many who use it in a proper manner—dispensing good gifts to all around them—relieving the distresses of the widow and the orphan. Yet all this availed nothing when the alarming words of the text flashed across my brain; for there, nought is stated against Dives, save, that he enjoyed the good things of this life. It is not even intimated that he did not feed the hungry, clothe the naked, etc.; nor that he was an infidel, a Sabbath breaker or a hypocrite—his only crime stated, is, that he was a rich man—that he "was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day."

Ah, thought I, if this is "the head and front of his offence"—if this is the damnable crime—what, oh Father, what will be the portion of the watchmen on the walls of thy Zion—the ministers of thy Word—even those who, this night, are calling on sinners to flee the wrath to come, and seem almost willing to give their natural lives for the salvation of the poor sinner's immortal soul? Are they not, respectively, receiving from five hundred to three thousand dollars per annum, as salaries, besides other perquisites—do they not clothe in the best superfine cloths, and wear the finest linens—do they not fare sumptuously every day? And must they, after all their labors to save the souls of the poor, be themselves consigned to that ever during prison of fire, “where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched”?

To relieve my agitated mind, I reclined my head on the front of the pew, and (what I never before done in church) fell asleep. But it was a sleep full of horror! My thoughts were still troubled, and in my dreams I was transported to that “tormenting Hades” described by Mr. Kirk. The description given by him was but too true, and my worst fears as to who would be its inmates, were fully realized. The question of my mind, whether riches would consign their possessors to hell, was answered by seeing none but those who, in the upper world, had been wealthy—enjoyed the good things of that life—clothed well and finely, and fared sumptuously every day. Kings, nobles, men of wealth and influence, well salaried priests—these seemed to compose the whole population. It was very affecting, indeed, to hear their vain regrets and various cries. One, (as if he thought good deeds could have saved him,) lamented that he had not aimed more at being truly pious, instead of striving to become popular; and instead of wearing a seventy dollar coat, he wished he had expended at least fifty dollars of that amount in providing for the poor of his congregation. Another, a long-visaged, cadaverous looking genius, who appeared, by his pomposity, to hold some office under his satanic majesty, was yelling out, with a slight impediment in his speech, for “another bottle of Welch Med—Medicamentum!”

Just then a loud noise at my side, resembling thunder, awoke me. It appeared that, while I was sleeping, they assembled the anxious in that part of the church where I was, to be prayed for—and their cries, sobs and groans had formed the Hades of my dream. The noise which awoke me, came from the nasal organ and throat of a poor, snoring sinner at my side, who feared going to Mr. Kirk's hell so much, that she was, like many others around me, terrified to—SLEEP!

A CIRCUIT.

Br. Sias informs us that, in connexion with Br. C. B. Brown, he intends establishing a circuit for the supply of destitute places in the bounds of the Black River Association. Any persons wishing to have appointments made in their vicinity will please address either of the brethren, giving the requisite information, in order that the appointments may be made in this paper. Br. Sias resides in Henderson—Br. Brown in Mexico. The circuit will be continued at least until May next, if supported in their labors by the brethren in the places visited. For appointments, see this and succeeding numbers of this paper.

N. B. I owe an apology to Br. Sias, for the delay of the above notice, as well as its imperfect details. My excuse is this. On the reception of his first letter, I condensed its statements into an editorial article, giving a full account of the intended circuit, and sent it to the office. Being very unwell, I did not notice that it was not published—but on the arrival of his second letter, really believed my notice had duly appeared. An examination convinced me it had not. His first letter is—I don't know where; consequently I can give no more of it than the above, which is all I remember. My former notice, also, cannot be found. I regret it—but know not how to mend the matter further than is here done. A. B. G.

BROKEN APPOINTMENTS.

A respected correspondent at Lyons, in this State, requests us to publish no more appointments for our preachers at that place, unless they can be fulfilled, or a reason given why they are not attended to. They have twice been disappointed, they do not know why or wherefore, and people who came ten or fifteen miles to hear the preacher have had their ride of twenty or thirty miles for their pains.

As be very justly remarks, we are not to blame for publishing the notices; but really it is a vexation to be often disappointed, and never even informed of the reason why. These remarks are intended for the benefit of all to whom they are applicable. The brethren referred to directly, had, undoubtedly, good and sufficient reasons for not keeping their appointments. We beg our friends at Lyons to have faith enough, at least, to believe this. A. B. G.

BENEVOLENT.

I have been informed that the ministering brethren who attended the Chenango Association at Oxford, generously waived their shares for travelling expenses in the usual collection taken up for that purpose, in favor of our long and much afflicted sister, Laura Eggleston, now of German, Chenango county. The people present, were also generous, and the collection amounted to about fifty dollars; which, with about ten dollars remitted from this vicinity, will, we trust, for sometime aid in defraying the great expenses incidental to, and procuring the many small comforts necessary in, a lingering and wasting illness. It was well done, and much needed, and deservedly bestowed. A. B. G.

UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE.

This society has been noiselessly pursuing the “even tenor of its way” for several weeks, and may be said fairly to have surmounted all the little vexations and difficulties that attend a first organization—the difficulties of getting a good Constitution, judicious by-laws and inuring the members and officers to their duties and labors. Last Tuesday night, the discussion—the first discussion—was very animated and interesting. The question was continued, as many wish to speak on it who then had no time to do so. (See religious notices.)

A word to many. The society is trying to raise a library—those who can make donations in books or money are requested to see what they can give, and will give, and let us know it—we will call or send for the donations.

Another word. The terms of admission are peculiarly low, (though morally, high,) and there yet is room—young and old, males and females who will make good (by which I mean active) members, will undoubtedly be gladly received. A. B. G.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.—The sermon from Br. Mauley is gratefully received. The extract from a sermon, by Br. Aspinwall will appear soon, to the pleasure and edification, we are certain of our readers. Three sermons from the pen of an excellent young brother, now deceased, have been on hand a long time, but are carefully preserved. One or more, after some corrections have been made, will appear. Several inquiries for explanations of Scripture, will be attended to soon—also the Utilitarian will be continued in due time.

Br. Peck is informed that all—sermons and shorter articles—will be very acceptable. The delay in the publication of his obituary notice, was my fault, or rather misfortune. It was in my possession when I was taken sick, and I forgot it entirely. I know he will excuse me. A. B. G.

REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1837.

This valuable though small periodical has been published at Geneva, and will be for sale in a few days at this office. Price $4. per hundred, 63 cents per dozen, 6 cents single.

We will give a table of its contents in our next.

A. B. G.

HARD TIMES.

Almost every necessary of life is now enormously high, from food to eat to fuel to cook it by. What will poor printers do? Our subscription price is fixed for easy times and cheap markets, and will not increase with the prices of other articles. If the present state of things lasts through any considerable period of time, mechanics and all laborers will raise their prices to correspond with other things, and our state will be still “worse and worse.” May we not ask an increase of support—a rigid adherence to our terms—and prompt payment of what sums are due, without being deemed too importunate? A. B. G.

APOLOGY.

Since the last day in July, with the exception of a few days, up to the 1st inst., I have been confined to the house, and a part of that time to my bed, with sickness. During the greater part of the same period, Br. Skinner has been very unwell with a severe cold—a species of influenza—which almost disqualified him for business. He is now slowly recovering, and I am gaining strength daily. Consequently, we have been obliged to select many articles from other papers, to save the labor of preparing original articles on hand, for the press. Some items were also forgotten—perhaps some errors were committed in those we have prepared—some letters have been suffered to lie unanswered—and, in short, “we got along the best way we could.” If health continues her advances, we shall soon be able to clear off old scores, and do as we were wont in former days. Patience, dear readers and correspondents; it is a valuable article as I can assure you from my own experience, especially in pain and illness. A. B. G.

P. S. In addition to the above I would now state that my own family (wife and child) have been sick during the same time—for some days dangerously—though we hope now convalescent. This must account to any of our readers, correspondents or friends, for any seeming neglect, either in editorial matter, the preparing of communications, answering correspondents, or attending to any other business. We fondly hope all the invalids are now improving in health, and in all respects our business affairs will improve in the same ratio. D. S.

NEW PREACHER.—Br. Alanson Kelsey, has lately commenced preaching. He is a young man of good talents and unimpeachable moral character. He preaches at the new meeting-house in Stafford, in his own neighborhood, to large congregations, and to good acceptance.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

THE UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE will meet in their room, in the basement of the Universalist meeting-house, on Tuesday evening next, at 7 o'clock, precisely.

The question for discussion, (continued from the last night,) is—“Unaided by Revelation, would man have arrived at a knowledge of the true God, and of a future state?”

By request my appointment for to-morrow, at Little Falls, is recalled—in lieu thereof, Br. C. S. BROWN will preach at Eatonville to-morrow. A. B. GROSH.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. J. M. AUSTIN, of Danvers, Mass., in this city, and by Br. SKINNER at Herkimer—Br. WHITNEY at Newville, and at Paines Hollow in the evening—Br. WILCOX at Corporation, in the town of Bern, and at Rensselaerville city at 5 P. M.—Br. S. R. SMITH at Russia—Br. GROSH at New Hartford—Br. ASPINWALL at Collinsville, and at the schoolhouse near Major Coe's at 5 P. M.—Br. Sias at Hastings, as Br. Devendorf may appoint, and at Parishville in the evening—Br. BODEN in Lebanon, and Br. WOOLLEY in Marshall—Br. C. B. BROWN at Williamstown—Br. H. ROBERTS at Wellington Square, U. C.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. SKINNER or Br. WAGGONER at Newport.

Br. Sias will preach in the evenings of 12th inst., in Hannibalville—13th, in Wheeler schoolhouse, same town—14th, Weed's Basin—19th, Williamstown—20th, Sandbanks—21st, Washingtonville—22d, near Br. Wright's, Ellisburg. (See Sunday notices.—The rest did not reach us in time for publication.)

Ohio Western Reserve Association.—Each society in this Association will appoint a person to confer with those appointed by the other societies, to ascertain the amount that can be obtained for the purpose of employing and supporting a circuit preacher in this Association, and report to the council at the next quarterly Conference, to be held in Austinburg, on the first Saturday and following Sunday in October next. H. H. BURN, Standing Clerk.

SUPERSTITIOUS TENDENCIES.

"Opinionum commentadelet dies, naturæ judicia confirmat."

Nothing more strongly attests the weakness of the human intellect than diversified forms of mythology, and prevailing systems of superstition, among beings created by the same divinity, and looking with the same eye upon the stupendous manifestations of His power. They have, however, left their features on every age and nation. They have imparted coloring to character, and given direction to conduct. They have controlled the current of human action, and governed the tide of human destiny. While monuments of material grandeur proclaim their power in the darker places of the earth, the light of reason has not yet revealed all their odiousness in the more enlightened lands of wisdom and learning.

We should search in vain for the origin of superstition in any age or in any country. Although it first assumed a systematic form in Egypt, it was because the human mind there made its first advancement in intellectual cultivation, and was first capable of embodying its absurdities into a written language; we find it existing however in the earliest periods of every nation. So that we must seek its origin in the first dawns of mind—in the natural feelings of the human heart. It doubtless arises from that glorious aspiration after an intelligent first cause, which is among the earliest breathings of the soul—from that instinctive belief in the immortal principle within us, which proclaims our triumph over the grave, and the correspondent beautiful conception, that disembodied spirits hover around us, and, with the sacred guardianship of angels, watch over our destinies. The imagination of an ignorant age has modified these sublime conceptions into the various forms of popular superstition. Ignorance is always dangerous. The relations of nature can be understood, only by rigid and careful investigation. By neglecting to trace effects to their true causes, and by considering only the relation of proximity of time, men have been led to the most startling errors, and glaring absurdities. Such has always been the case in barbarous and uncivilized nations.

Imagination, lending its assistance to ignorance, forms the wildest and sometimes the most fantastical associations. The white vestment of the ghost contrasted with the darkness of midnight has struck terror even to the soul of the brave, and the chirping of the cricket has changed the plans of the statesman.

Of the dangerous tendency of ill-regulated imagination, its influence over enlightened minds affords striking illustration. It has even been regarded as the most uncontrollable of the faculties, and hence, required the most philosophical discipline. When subjected to the dominion of the judgment, its influence is salutary; but when allowed to usurp the throne of reason, how disastrous the results!

There is also, especially in the infancy of society, when all the phenomena of nature are new to the observer, a period of peculiar sensibility of character. The imagination, dazzled by novelty, associates every change with the operation of invisible agency. The solitude of the forest and the darkness of the grove teem with swarming diversities. Departed benefactors, whose virtues have been revered, and whose goodness venerated, appear to be recognized as the invisible protectors of mankind. Hence the gorgeous fiction of Grecian mythology, a superstition which two thousand years ago lost its authority over the useful occupations of man, but which still preserves a real power over their elegant amusements. Its temples still survive, in mouldering magnificence, though their deities have long since departed. The coral grove still springs up in the depths of the ocean, though the sea-nymph no longer sports in its branches.

We should to no purpose attempt an enumeration of the modification which superstition receives from variations in national character. The far hunting grounds of the Indian, and the luxurious paradise of the Persian, are as dissimilar as might be supposed, from the difference in their modes of life. The indolent Hindoo finds his highest hopes in annihilation; while the war-like Goth believes that in the other world, in the halls of Odin, he shall sing the song of triumph over his slaughtered enemies.

The effects of superstition, however, under whatever form it may exist, are always the same—degrading to intellect—debasing to morals. A voice from the remotest antiquity echoes this truth, in deep reverberations. The dark ages of papal superstition—the black conspiracies of the prince and the priest—the ignorance and degradation of an enslaved people—these will forever speak a language of fearful import. The smoke of the widow's funeral pile still darkens the sky of Hindostan, and the waters of the Ganges ever and anon close over a new victim to a cruel delusion. From the burning sands of Africa comes a boding wail, and the spicy gales from the land of myrrh are the messengers of sad tidings.

Turn we from the darker colorings of the picture. The effects of superstition are visible in the literature and science of a nation. The dim light of tradition, and the deceitful glare of fable, reveal not the true colors of things. The treacherous tongue of fiction and the deceptive song of poetry, possess a dangerous power of fascination—often favoring the deception which reason would condemn, and enthralling error, instead of enlightening truth.

It is the tendency of superstition to conceal and distort nature, by fixing upon its casual instead of its constant relations. Thus in the movements of the heavenly bodies, the wandering astrologer beheld only the finger of Fate, tracing the destinies of men; hence to him, the celestial host of midnight performed their ceaseless revolutions with reference solely to the fortunes of an individual. Science has long struggled with innumerable obstacles; but when reason has pointed out her true and only legitimate province, her advancement has been triumphant and glorious.

Generally the effects of superstition are, to give the supremacy to passion, to contract the intellect and corrupt the heart—to engender prejudice, produce illiberality of mind, and exhibit erroneous conceptions of the character of God.

But light breaks in upon the gloom. Christianity has brought life and immortality to our view. Where its reign is established, superstition is abolished, reason ennobled, imagination purified, and man exists in the noble image of his Maker: while the nescient world, contemplated in the pages of revelation, is radiant with ineffable glory.

MARRIAGES.

At Richfield Springs, on the 24th ult., by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. ISAAC DELONG, of Warren, to Miss PAULINA PALMER, of the former place.

Long may the bands that gently bind
Their hearts and prospects, now, in one,
Prove of the pure and tender kind,
Until the scenes of life are gone.

In Auburn, July 20, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. THOMAS HAMILTON, of Huron, Ohio, to Miss SARAH STANDART, of Auburn.

DEATHS.

In Dansville, on the 31st July, LEWIS CANFIELD, aged 67 years. Br. C. was a native of Granville, Mass. From thence at the age of 22, he emigrated to Green county, N. Y. After a few years he removed to Rutland, Vt. From thence he removed to Washington county, N. Y., where eighteen years ago his wife died. Since which time he has resided with his children there and at this place. He has relatives in Massachusetts and Ohio. In early life Br. C. embraced the doctrine of Universalism. For several years before his death, I enjoyed with him a familiar acquaintance, a social friendship, and a heartfelt Christian fellowship and affection, which grew more and more strong with the lapse of time. For some years he suffered a tedious affliction—and for eight months past, he has been drawing perceptibly and rapidly to his end. He was very sensible of his approaching change—yet he was perfectly resigned to the will of Heaven; remarkably patient in his severe afflictions, and quite happy in his mind. He rejoiced with the most firm and unshaken confidence in the promises of universal and immortal life beyond this earthly state, contained in the sacred volume. As I was a frequent visitor, I several times had the peculiar satisfaction of hearing him, by my request, relate to a number of bystanders, the candid convictions of his mind, and the refined joys of his heart—always triumphant without a single exception. A year ago he joined the Universalist society in this place. His example was worthy of imitation—he lived the life, and died the "death of the righteous." By his request I preached at his funeral on the 1st inst.

A. U.

Will publishers of papers in Massachusetts and Ohio please notice the above?

In the town of LeRoy, in the month of June, the following four persons from the same family:—

On the 2d, CLEMENT D. THEVING, son of John and Calista Theving, aged 15 years.

On the 9th, Mrs. CALISTA THEVING, consort of John Theving, 2d, aged 36 years.

On the 10th, Dr. FRANKLIN BRAINARD, (a young man employed in the family.)

On the 12th, Mr. JOHN THEVING, 1st, in his 80th year.

A mystery hangs over the distressful circumstances leading to their deaths. Sometime in the month of May, the whole family, consisting of Mr. Theving and his lady, six children, his father and step-mother, and a hired man, were about the same time taken unwell. For a few days they kept about, but were soon confined with a distressing illness. The best medical aid was sought, several physicians were called and held in constant attendance. From the manifestation of the disease by its symptoms, it was unequivocally declared by the physicians, to be a case of poison by white lead. The Loue was closely examined, if possible to detect some circumstance, which should lead to a discovery of the way and manner in which the lead was administered. In the wood house chamber a room was set apart as a meal room, in which a box was found with a quantity of white lead, left in painting the house. Conjecture immediately said, that by some accident, by children or otherwise, a portion of the lead had become mixed with the flour. For weeks a scene of distress followed, rarely ever witnessed. Every member of the family sick and nigh unto death. Some lying in a sort of stupor, others, from a more acute inflammation in the bowels, racked with excruciating pain and spasms throughout the body and limbs. The four above named died of the disease.

Mrs. Theving was a daughter of Capt. Cash of that town. She was an amiable companion, a kind mother and a beloved neighbor. She was a firm believer, and well instructed in the doctrine of universal grace. She exercised unassuming submission in view of her family, bore her own illness with patience, and manifested throughout the consoling power of her faith, her strong and sustaining hope—looked on death with calmness, and met her faith with resignation.

Deacon John Theving was a soldier of the revolution. He had for fifty years been a member of the Presbyterian church. He at last sunk down to his grave like a shock of corn fully ripe.

Dr. F. Brainard had made no profession of faith—but he met his fate with the most manly and perfect calmness; and when told he must die, expressed his readiness, and yielded up his spirit in hope.

Mr. Theving and his family of five children, the oldest 13 years, and the youngest 3 years, are quite feeble, but are in a fair way to recover. A funeral in memory of wife, child and father, was attended in the new church in Stafford, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered by the writer of this article, from Job xiii: 15, first clause.

A. P.

In Clayton, Jefferson county, on the 18th ult., Mr. EMORY O. BARROWS, after an illness of about four weeks. For about one year previous to his death, he professed a belief in the final salvation of the world from sin and death, and was resigned to his departure. The funeral was attended by Elder Little, of the Baptist denomination.

L. B.

At Howlett Hill, Onondaga county, on the 4th of August, GRATIA, the only child and daughter of Rev. William Queal, aged 8 months. She was sick but a few days, when God saw fit to break the little bud from the parent stalk, and bid it bloom in heaven. Christ took little children in his arms and blessed them. May the Lord give consolation to the mourning parents, and bid them say in resignation, "Thy will be done."—Herald of Truth.

WHERE IS HE?

If there was a known cause why my son, STEPHEN MILES, Jr., should have left home and not inform me, or his friends where he was going, or where he now is, I should not have made this inquiry; but as it is not a little strange that he should disappear in the manner that he has, I am over anxious to hear from him. If some kind friend can inform me where he is, I hope they will have the goodness to write to me at Geneva, as soon as convenient.

THE PREACHER.

Funeral Sermon;

Delivered in Ogden, August 3d, 1836, at the funeral of Mr. SCHUYLER V. BROWN.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

[Published by request.]

"For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." 1 Cor. xv: 21.

The chapter from which the text is selected, seems to have been designed by its author, either to correct some false opinions on the subject of a resurrection, which had crept into the Corinthian church; or to fortify those brethren against such opinions, to which they were exposed. The most clear and explicit information on the subject of a resurrection, that can be gained from Scripture, is to be found in this chapter. And though it may not satisfy all the speculative queries of the inquisitive mind, yet it must be allowed to contain all the information necessary for our consolation in affliction, and support in death. After reasoning at considerable length on the subject, and showing that the evidence of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, which he adduces, is to be regarded as the foundation of the hope, that mankind at large are to be raised, he introduces the conclusion that Christ is "risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." This is followed by the language of the text, "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." The text naturally divides itself into two parts.

I. "By man came death." To ascertain by what man death came, we have only to look at the verse following the text, "For as in Adam all die," etc. It was by Adam that death came into the world. But it is well known that the Bible mentions more than one kind of death, and hence, though it is not certain that the apostle meant to include more than one kind (viz. natural death) in the language of the text, yet it may not be unprofitable for us, on the present occasion, to inquire whether one or more kinds of death came into the world by Adam.

This question may be satisfactorily answered, by consulting the account which we have of the first human pair. It is said that they were placed in the garden of Eden, with permission to partake freely of the fruit of every tree of the garden but one. To partake of this was strictly forbidden. "In the day thou eatest thereof," says the Deity, "thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii: 17. The death here alluded to, has been variously construed.—While some have supposed that natural death was referred to, others have maintained that, together with natural death, spiritual and eternal death are included. Others, not daring to put any other than the most obvious and natural construction upon the language of God; and not being able to discover how eternal death could be suffered in one day; or how the natural death of our first parents, which occurred several hundred years after the day of transgression, could have been intended, have supposed that the death alluded to was none other than a death to peace and happiness, immediately resulting from the transgression committed. This is obviously the correct construction of the language of God, "in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." The correctness of this construction is made obvious by several facts. The following will, we think, be deemed sufficient.

1. The death alluded to, is represented as the consequence of sin. The Scriptures contain the same representation in numerous instances, where none but moral death could have been intended. For example—"The soul that sinneth it shall die." Jer. xliii: 40. "To be carnally minded is death."

Rom. viii: 6. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi: 23. "He that liveth and believeth on me shall never die." John xi: 26. These passages, without comment, will be seen to relate to a death that is the consequence of sin, not natural nor eternal, but moral and limited. But in regard to the eternal duration of this death, we shall introduce some more remarks directly.

2. The language of God in relation to the natural death of our first parents, shows that that death was not the consequence of sin, but of the natural mortality of their physical constitutions. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground: for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii: 19. The reason assigned why Adam should return to the dust was, not that he had sinned, but that he was formed of earthly materials. The seeds of mortality were sown in his constitution; and for that reason, he must die. Man, thank God, was designed for a higher sphere than this earthly existence; and death is necessary for the accomplishment of this design.

In answering the question, therefore, what kinds of death came into the world by Adam, we state, as obvious from the scriptural quotations and remarks we have made, that the first death that came by Adam was moral death, occasioned by sin: and the second that came by him, was the natural death, resulting necessarily from the natural mortality of his constitution.

The usage of the term death to express the consequence of sin, is undoubtedly figurative: and the reason why it is thus used, instead of some other term, appears to me to be this—man was called into life or conscious existence, for the enjoyment of happiness—he that sins deprives himself of this enjoyment, and consequently, does not, while under the influence of sin, receive that happiness for which life was given him, any more than he would if he were involved in a state of natural death.

While speaking of the usage of the word death, as found in Scripture, it may be expected that some remarks should be made on the subject of the second death. This audience need not be informed, that different opinions are entertained respecting this phrase "second death." And the difficulty of deciding what it does mean, arises mostly from the circumstance, that it occurs in no book but the Apocalypse, which the most learned acknowledge themselves unable fully to understand; and that even in this book, it occurs but a very few times. Respecting this phrase, we may state what is equally true respecting the book in general, where it is found; that there are some things about it that are perfectly obvious; and others that are involved in much darkness. The "second death" is represented as being another name for the "lake of fire and brimstone," there mentioned. The lake of fire and brimstone is acknowledged to be a representation of punishment, inflicted as the consequence of sin. We have already seen that death is used in the same sense. This we call moral death. Hence the second death must be moral death. This I consider certain. But the reason why the numeral adjective "second" is attached to it, is not as obvious. But this is a point not at all important as far as the present subject, or the final state of mankind, is concerned. It is much more important to ascertain where this second death is, and how long it is to last. Some suppose that it is in the future world: but this opinion is refuted by the use of the word "second." The moral death of which we have spoken, and also natural death are represented in Scripture as being universal: and hence every man must suffer two deaths before he enters the future state of existence. If he suffer another death after that, it will be the third, and not the second. It follows then, that the second death must be natural death, or must precede natural death. That it is not natural, but moral death, we have already shown. It must, therefore, precede natural death. And here let me ask, may not moral death, in this world, be suffered a second time? Jude says, in relation to certain individuals, that they had been "twice dead, plucked up by the roots"—verse 19. These persons, not having yet died a natural death, had, nevertheless, experienced the second death. They had been once morally dead, and been raised from that state; and had died a second time.

Some preachers, in speaking of the deaths that came into the world by Adam, mention "eternal death;" but as this phrase does not occur in the Scriptures, we consider this fact as a sufficient reason for supposing, that no such death ever entered the world by Adam, or will ever be experienced. That moral death is not eternal or endless in its nature, is evident from the following facts. 1. Its cause is not adequate to produce such an effect. Man is a limited being: and as such, cannot commit a sin deserving an unlimited punishment. Besides, if he could, he would be equally capable of performing acts of virtue deserving endless reward. To suppose that man is naturally more capable, or more disposed to commit sin than to practice virtue, is to cast the vilest stigma upon the character of our adorable Creator. It is saying that the workmanship of His hand has more bad qualities than good. 2. Moral death is universal. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v: 12. If moral death be endless in its nature, all men must inevitably be involved in remediless woe. But that it is not endless, but limited, and experienced in this world, the language just quoted sufficiently proves. It had passed (not should, in the future world, pass) upon all men. 3. Moral death is to be succeeded by a resurrection. "As in Adam all die, even so, in Christ, shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. All the deaths that entered the world by Adam, will be removed by Christ. "As by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification, of life." Rom. v: 18. 4. That moral death is limited, the phrase "second death" abundantly proves. How can an endless death be succeeded by a second? To apply the numerical terms, first, second, etc., to a death that is endless, is extremely absurd. 5. The Scriptures point us to a time when there shall be no more death; which shows that both natural and moral death (including the second death) must come to an end. "The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed." 1 Cor. xv: 26. "He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces." Isa. xlv: 8. "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things" (death, hell and the lake of fire) "are passed away." Rev. xxi: 4. What a glorious period, my friends, is this! No more will pain, sorrow and death afflict mankind. We shall then meet our departed friends, to part no more forever. Happiness, perfect, universal and unending, shall constitute the inheritance of the intelligent universe!

The reasons I have adduced for believing that moral death is limited, might be enlarged upon: and we might add to their number, but this is unnecessary, especially as we consider either of the reasons stated, separately considered, and simply named, as sufficient to satisfy the rational mind.

II. The text informs us that, "by man came also the resurrection of the dead." That the man, here alluded to, is the Lord Jesus Christ; and that the resurrection effected by him, like the death that came by him, is universal, may be learned from the following verse. "For as in Adam all die; even so, in Christ, shall all be made alive."

In treating this part of our subject, I would state, 1. That as by the man, Adam, came moral death; by the man, Christ Jesus, came also a moral resurrection: and that the latter is equally as extensive as the former. That the Bible mentions two kinds of death is generally admitted; but that it recognizes two kinds of resurrection, is, I believe, very generally overlooked. That such is the case, is, nevertheless, a fact, as appears from several passages of Scripture.

Jesus Christ says, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." John xi: 25, 26. It is plain that a moral resurrection is here alluded to. The language of Paul, "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead," (Phil. iii: 11,) seems to me to allude to a moral resurrection. The language itself, as well as the preceding and following context, seems to favor this view of the subject. The words, "if by any means, I might attain," etc., show the resurrection alluded to to be conditional. This is the case with a moral resurrection, but not with a natural. I think the Scriptures are clear on this point. Hearing Christ's words, believing on him that sent him, doing lawfully and right, etc., are represented as the conditions of a moral resurrection; but respecting a natural resurrection, the language is, "the dead shall be raised."

Again; the language following the passage just introduced, is this. "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ. Brethren; I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." The words, "not as though I had already attained," would have been out of place if a natural resurrection had been referred to. For there was no necessity that Paul's readers should be informed that he had not yet attained to a resurrection from natural death. But it will be asked, had not Paul attained to a moral resurrection?

Paul seems to have anticipated this question, and hence, when he says, "not as though I had already attained," he adds, by way of explanation, "either were already perfect." Moral resurrection is a gradual process. Paul had advanced in it to a certain degree, but had not yet attained the height of moral purity and religious improvement, which he anticipated. He was not already "perfect," as he expected he should be, when he had attained a complete moral resurrection—a resurrection from ignorance to knowledge, from error to truth, from sin to holiness, and from misery to happiness. This was the mark towards which Paul pressed. This was the prize which he expected would crown his exertions.

It is unnecessary to introduce more quotations from Scripture, to illustrate the doctrine of a moral resurrection. All those passages which represent the resurrection as dependant on faith or good works—or as requiring the agency of the subject—or attended with suffering, refer to a resurrection of a moral nature. To prove that this resurrection is to be universal, let the chapter from which the text is taken, be particularly consulted.

The fifth chapter of Romans, also, contains the clearest evidence that can be desired on this subject. From these chapters, it will be seen that, "as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly," and that, "as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation: even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life;" and that as many as were made sinners by Adam, will be made righteous by Christ, that where sin abounded, grace might much more abound.

2. Since by man came natural death, by man came also a natural resurrection. You will observe that it was by man that this resurrection came. And here I may take the liberty to state, that a knowledge of a natural resurrection could have come to us by no other being but man. This knowledge is brought to us by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. This is evident from the whole of the apostle's reasoning on the subject, in the chapter from which the text is selected.

The evidence of Christ's resurrection, he urges, as proof that we shall rise from the dead also. Now the fact of the resurrection of Christ, however well attested, would contain no evidence of our resurrection, if he had not been man. To illustrate this subject—suppose, my hearers, that a being (in human, or any other form, it matters not) should make his appearance in your neighborhood, claiming to be a superhuman personage. Suppose that by his teachings, and wonderful works, he furnishes indubitable evidence of the superiority of his nature, to that of man. Suppose too, that, after spending a few years here, he dies, and after a few days, rises from the dead, and furnishes you undoubted evidence that he is the identical person that died. You consider the resurrection of this being as proof of the resurrection of all mankind. You go to those of your neighbors, who have been in the habit of denying the existence of a future state, and address them as follows: "My friends, you and ourselves have frequently discussed the subject of a resurrection from the dead. You have denied that such an event would ever occur. We have contended that it would; and now we are able to present before you the most conclusive evidence in favor of our position. We have an instance of the resurrection of one being—the fact is indisputable—and hence we must conclude that all mankind will be raised also. Is not this a reasonable conclusion?" The following is the reply. "We should acknowledge the force of your argument, if it were not for one thing. It is this. That person whose resurrection you allege as proof of our resurrection, claimed to be a divine being, possessing a divine nature, and such you acknowledged him to be. You say he was not man, but God. The fact, therefore, that there is in God a principle that can survive the grave, is no evidence that such a principle exists in man. If you could convince us of the resurrection of one being like ourselves, we would allow your argument to have all the force that you attach to it. But until this is done, we must be allowed to retain our present unbelief."

Now, my hearers, I ask whether the argument you have placed before these unbelievers, to prove the resurrection of the dead, is not fully answered? It certainly is; and hence you perceive that, to maintain that Christ was anything more than the author of our text declares him to be, viz. man, does away all the evidence in favor of our resurrection, derived from the fact that he was raised from the dead.

But if we take the apostle's word as true, that by man came the resurrection of the dead, the argument retains all its force. The foundation of our hope remains unshaken. "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." The ingathering of all those of whom he constitutes the first fruits, is certain. Of this, God has given us the pledge, by the resurrection and acceptance of Jesus Christ. Here we have a foundation on which to predicate our hope of future life and glory. It is a foundation that will stand amidst all the revolutions of time. The shafts of skepticism may be aimed against it. Erroneous opinions of Christ and Christianity may seek to undermine it. The storms of affliction and adversity may beat upon it: still it remains unmoved and unmoveable. Happy is he who shall fix his hope upon such a foundation! He will be sustained amidst the storms and tempests of human life. The eye of faith will enable him to see through the lowering cloud, and discover above, a clear sky, and a Father of everlasting mercy at the helm of the universe, who will finally bring mankind, in peace and safety, to the haven of eternal rest and unending joy.

Before we come to a conclusion of this discourse, we should make an application of the subject thus presented, to the circumstances that have called us together.

By a recent dispensation of God's providence, one of our fellow-mortals is removed to the future world: and we are now assembled to perform to him the last offices of humanity, and to tender to the surviving friends the consolations of the Gospel. A husband, a son, a brother and a friend, has gone to the spiritual world: and a wife, parents, brothers, sisters and friends, are still left in this world to mourn the loss of one who was near and dear to them.

To the surviving relatives and friends present we can only say—Go to that inexhaustible source of consolation which is found in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. From this fountain the oil and wine of consolation flow in ample abundance. In the Gospel you will find a sovereign balm for all the wounds which affliction has made. It points you to a future world of immortal bliss and glory, where pain, sickness and death can never come; but where kindred spirits, now separated, shall meet, and mingle their songs of praise to God forever and ever. May this hope sustain you under the present bereavement of God's providence; and in all the afflictions which you may be called to suffer, while travelling through this vale of tears. And in that trying period, when death shall come, and you be called to take your departure to the future world, may you be enabled to meet the king of terrors, with that calmness and resignation, that peace and joy, which characterized the last moments of him whose death you now mourn.

May this afflictive dispensation be sanctified and blessed to all concerned, whether present or absent. May the knowledge of the Gospel enlighten all our minds. The duties of the Gospel be illustrated in all our lives; and the hope of immortality, inspired by the Gospel, comfort all our hearts. And finally, when

"God's own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye,
And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death, itself, shall die,"

may a ransomed universe be permitted to surround the throne of Almighty God and sing his praises forever. AMEN.

EQUAL PROVIDENCE.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

It is thought that all things come so much alike to the righteous and the wicked, that we cannot know one from the other in the dispensations of Providence. Consequently, some have been led to reject the idea of an overruling Providence, or to call in question some of the divine perfections. By a careful attention to this subject, it may be seen that there is in providence a striking discrimination between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.

It should be remembered however, that although God's providential government of the world extends to every individual creature and event; yet he governs it by general laws. "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." The settled course of things must not be interrupted; the established laws of nature must not be counteracted; the blessings of Heaven must be scattered promiscuously among mankind, and calamities must be sent in the same indiscriminate manner. Otherwise there would be a perpetual series of supernatural interpositions, which would long ere this, have frustrated the design of miracles.

It has often seemed wonderful to the wise and good, that the wicked should be suffered to prosper in the world, while the righteous are visited with extreme adversity, as does sometimes appear to be the case. It was this view of things which caused the complaint of Asaph. "I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked, for there are no bands in their death; but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness; they have more than heart could wish. Behold these are the ungodly who prosper in the world; they increase in riches. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. For all the day long I have been plagued, and chastised every morning." The whole of this passage appears to have been penned under a misapprehension of the subject, for when he "went into the sanctuary of God, and understood that they were set in slippery places; that they were cast into desolation in a moment, and utterly consumed with terrors"—he confessed, "my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins. So foolish was I, and ignorant; I was as a beast before thee." By this passage then, we are not to understand that the wicked are more prosperous and happy than the righteous, except in appearance. And when the apostle Paul, says, "If in this life, only, we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable"—he was speaking of the preachers and professors of Christianity in those times of cruel persecution, and his meaning was, that if they were hypocrites, and actuated only by worldly motives, they were the most wretchedly disappointed of all men in the world. This is far from implying that sincere Christians, who are especially saved by hope, are unhappy in the present life.

We read that "the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever." From which it appears that righteousness has the promise of more happiness than unrighteousness. And the Psalmist says, "The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandments of the Lord are pure, enlightening the eyes.....more to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also are they than honey and the honey comb; and in keeping them there is great reward." To the new converts at Rome, the apostle Paul appeals: "When ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" The fifth commandment, which is, "honor thy father and mother," is thus enforced, "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." It is said in the 1st Psalm, "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the council of the ungodly, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful: but his delight is in the law of the Lord; and on his law doth he meditate day and night. He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of waters, that bringeth forth fruit in season; his leaf shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper. The ungodly are not so; but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away."

Thus we are furnished with great encouragement to a life of godliness and virtue, the natural tendency of which is to the enjoyment of peace and prosperity. Ordinarily, Providence is wont to smile upon those who fear the Lord and work righteousness. But then there are many ways in which good men are liable to suffer, and many ends which are to be answered by their sufferings; so that we cannot always know them by their singular prosperity, nor expect for them in every instance an uncommon exemption from temporal afflictions. When it is said by the wise man, that "all things come alike to all," it is only to be understood with respect to outward circumstances. It can have no reference to the inward comforts and vexations of man. There are many things which come alike to all mankind: such as riches and poverty; honor and dishonor; health and sickness; long life and early death. It must therefore be considered a general observation, which of course cannot hold true in all cases; for general maxims have many exceptions.

When we see any of our neighbors remarkably visited with afflictions, we should not thence conclude that they are uncommonly great sinners. Such a guide for our judgment would be uncertain and injurious. When Job had been despoiled of his substance and smitten with boils, his friends, though apparently wise and good, turned out to be miserable comforters, because they judged from external circumstances. And such a manner of judging is not uncommon among Christians at the present day, notwithstanding the manifold admonitions of our Saviour to the contrary. Let none judge and persecute their afflicted neighbors whom God hath smitten. Let none draw up dark conclusions against them, as though they could not be the objects of their heavenly Father's love; because they are called to suffer many grievous things.

It is wrong for us to look upon the afflictions which we suffer, as the frowns of Heaven or tokens of divine displeasure. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?" Both these questions must imply strong affirmations; first, that all the ways of God are just, wise and good; and last, that no calamity can befall us but what is of God's sending. Since these are indisputable truths, it becomes us to meet bereavements with patience and resignation. "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord."

Our grief may be moderated and our sinking in despondency prevented by the joyful consideration that our heavenly Father doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men. That whatever adversity or prosperity be sent upon us, it is done to effect some salutary purpose. Our sorest afflictions may be but the fruits of God's fatherly love; and certain it is that they are intended to work in us the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

The best of men, as far as we are able to judge, are sometimes visited with singular tribulations. They also undergo the painful sensation of a wounded spirit; but at the same time they enjoy inwardly the pleasant fruit of obedience which rejoices the heart and enlightens the eyes. The virtuous are happy while the vicious are miserable. And the experience of those who have tried both, will witness to the truth of the following assertions: "Wise men lay up knowledge, but the mouth of the foolish is near destruction." Thus by reason of the inward satisfaction found in obedience, and the sorrow and trouble in disobedience, virtue is its own rewarder, and vice its own punisher.

Besides this, there is great reason to believe that the virtuous, even in their external circumstances, are happier than the vicious. According to the natural course of things this is necessarily the case; and certain it is that they have the assurance of protection and help in times of trouble. In the book of Proverbs it is said, "When a man's ways please the Lord he will make even his enemies to be at peace with him." Also, "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it and are safe." And in Isaiah it is said, "Come my people enter into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be over-past. For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity."

Thus it is found, that providence discriminates between the servants of God and the servants of the devil; and notwithstanding all things seem to come so much alike to all, yet the balance of good preponderates in favor of the willing and the obedient. And since this is the case, the idea that virtue and vice are rewarded in the present life, is not irreconcilable with the righteous providence of God, neither with the express teachings of his inspired servants in the Scriptures.

DEPRAVITY AND DEPRAVABILITY.

BY EV. J. LEWIS.

In Rom. vi: 23, the apostle informs us that "the wages of sin is death." To understand this, it is necessary to observe that in the same chapter he tells of his brethren's having been "the servants of sin;" and that Jesus declares, John viii: 34, "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." We thus perceive that in these scriptures sin is personified, being represented as a master, whom the sinner serves, and from whom he receives the wages, death. But wages are not paid to those who (by law) are born servants, usually called slaves; therefore, we are not born the servants of sin, or in other words are not born sinners. Hence the doctrine of natural or innate depravity, is untrue.

That men are naturally *deprava*ble, that is, liable to become depraved, is no doubt a fact; and this appears to be the meaning of Paul when he tells us, Rom viii: 20, that "the creature was made subject to vanity." And every passage of Scripture which recognizes man as a sinner, is proof positive that men have become depraved, which depravity has, in particular instances, accumulated to a very great amount, although the individual possessed none at the time of his birth. We say, therefore, that mankind are naturally deprava

UNCHRISTIAN CONDUCT OF SOME PROFESSED UNIVERSALISTS.—No. 2.

INTEMPERANCE.

Another evil which is injuring the cause of impartial grace, is the intemperate use of intoxicating drinks, by some of its professors. There are a few (and, thank God, there are but a few) who profess to be Universalists, who practice this evil! The attention of this class of people is particularly requested to the following remarks. I shall not attempt to point out the numerous evils that are the fruits of intemperance, but shall content myself, at present, by attempting to show the inconsistency of a practice of this vice, with a profession of Universalism.

In the first place, we will inquire what Universalism is, or what it teaches? Does it teach us that the way of the transgressor is easy, and that the paths of vice are peace? Does it teach us that we can possibly escape the punishment due to our crimes? No. This is no part of Universalism. Such sentiments may have been imbibed by some who make a profession of it, and if they have supposed that they were in accordance with its principles, they have certainly mistaken Partialism for Universalism. What, then, does Universalism teach? It teaches us that no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God—that the way of the transgressor is hard—and that the yoke of Christ is easy and his burden light. Are these facts known to this class of professors? If not, they are professing what they do not understand. If they are, what are they less than hypocrites?

Is it possible for an intemperate man to believe that he is enjoying that rest, into which all believers in the Gospel have entered, and at the same time believe that no drunkard can enjoy the kingdom of God? To answer this question in the affirmative, would imply a plain contradiction.

Is it not proved, then, that all who make an intemperate use of intoxicating drinks, are destitute of all claims to Universalism? With as much consistency might the avowed atheist claim to be a believer in the Gospel.

There are two ways that this class of people can render important service to the cause of universal reconciliation. The first and best way is, to repent, and to manifest repentance by a speedy reformation. Should any refuse to comply with this method, I would propose another, which is, to profess the principles they practice, which are Partialism. W.

A CALL TO PREACH.

MR. EDITOR—I propose to give my views of the meaning of this phrase. It implies, I think, nothing more than a disposition to promulgate the Gospel. If my opinion be correct, a man is called to preach in the same sense in which he is called to plead law, or to do any thing else which he considers will subserve his own interests, and promote the public welfare. The idea that every skipjack, that “by hook or by crook,” finds his way into the ministry, is expressly called, by the Deity, to interpret the most ancient writings in existence, is too absurd to need refutation. The Scriptures relate to the various usages which obtained for nearly two thousand years. They were composed by different authors, each of whom adapted his style of writing to the taste and structure of society, as they existed in his “day and generation.”

Are the ignorant qualified to preach from such writings? Can it be possible that an infinitely wise Being calls men to assume stations, the duties of which they are incompetent to perform? As well might He require men to walk upon the clouds. It is to be regretted that any individuals should have a disposition to engage in pursuits, for which they are unfitted, both by nature and education, or rather want of education. Especially is it to be regretted that any one should attempt to address public assemblies without, at least, some of the requisite qualifications. Such ought not to undertake to speak in any public meeting. Let men in the first place, ascend the heights of knowledge. With such a companion, they can gracefully and successfully ascend into the pulpit. Without her, they “are physicians of no value.” Suppose a person who knows little or nothing about music, should attempt to sing even in the social circle, would he not be scouted at? Suppose, moreover, he should arrogate to himself the office of chorister, in a large assembly, ought he not to be hissed out of the house? I see no good reason why empiricism should be countenanced in public speaking, any more than in singing.

Will it be said, that preachers are a privileged class of speakers, and that it is our duty to hear them, however ignorant they may be? The primitive teachers of Christianity, were, it is true, generally unlettered men. But the day of miracles is gone by. The gift of tongues and of healing have been withdrawn. Perhaps, I ought to except the Mormons, who are valued only on account of their ignorance. But however correct a man's opinions may be, if he is destitute of intelligence; or if, although he may possess it, he cannot speak with any degree of fluency or effect, let him qualify himself to address his fellow-citizens; else let him remain “in the blessed retreats of private life.” Dr. Franklin said, that he would not sit under the petty preaching of every little upstart; and I am not disposed to censure his determination. Young men of genius, industry, and piety, should be encouraged to enter the ministry; but they should not be advised nor permitted to do so, without making education a previous step.

Some professedly pious souls say that their ministers are called to the work by the Lord, and that He will be “a mouth-piece to them.” In answer to them, I will only say, (if indeed, they are worthy of an answer,) that whatever may have been the case in ancient days, valuable knowledge, and the faculty of communicating it with ease and facility, is in this age and country, the reward of “patient labor, and patient labor only.”

“God towards us has done his part,” in bestowing on us the faculties of our nature, and unless we do ours, by improving them, we are mere “children of a larger growth,” through life. A preacher must have knowledge as well as piety, otherwise he is poorly qualified to “edify” his hearers. He should, ere he puts on the habiliments of a clergyman, or obtains a license to exhort or preach, richly store his mind with the treasures of learning, and become an animated and persuasive, if not a powerful speaker.

I hope, Mr. Editor, that the preposterous doctrine that God calls men to preach, irrespective of their qualifications, will be exploded; and that those eloquence-struck young fellows, who have no more talent for public speaking, than a pocket handkerchief would hold, will not drag it out of the “napkin,” in which it is, and forever ought to be, “hid.” B.

CONFERENCE.

The Quarterly Conference of the Western Reserve Association met in council, July 10, 1836. Rev. Edson Beals, President.

An Address was delivered from the Chair, on the subject of Quarterly Conferences.

An address was also delivered by Br. Harris, on morality, and religious duties, generally, and the best means for promoting them.

On motion of Br. Baldwin, of Austinburg, Resolved, That each society in this Association, appoint a person to confer with those appointed by the several societies, and ascertain the amount that can be obtained for the purpose of employing and supporting a circuit preacher in this Association, and report to the council at the next Quarterly Conference, which is to be held in Austinburg on the first Saturday and Sunday in October, next. Adjourned.

HORATIO H. BURR, Standing Clerk.

The meeting on the above occasion, was well attended, by a numerous auditory, eager to hear the “good tidings of great joy.”

The clergymen in attendance, were Brs. Beals, of Cherry Valley, Ohio; and Harris, of Spring township, Pa. Divine service performed on the morning of the 9th, by Br. Edson Beals. Evening service, by Br. Harris. On the following day it became necessary, on account of the numbers in attendance, to remove to a large barn; the school house being too small to accommodate the assembly; where an address was given by the Clerk, and sermons by Brs. Beals and Harris, and a charge and admonition by Br. Beals.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

Extracts from the proceedings of the Trustees and Executive Committee of the Liberal Institute, at their annual meeting, August 30, 1836.

1. Elected Elijah Wilson, Esq., of Vernon, and Col. Lester Barker, of Clinton, Trustees, in place of S. Bingham, deceased, and A. Stebbins, removed out of the State.

6. Whereas, the distinguished liberality of R. W. Haskins, Esq., of Buffalo, N. Y., in presenting a valuable lot of ground to the Liberal Institute, has been communicated to this Board by their Treasurer, Therefore,

Resolved, That the thanks of this Board be presented to Mr. Haskins for his valuable donation to said institution.

Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolution be published, for the encouragement of the friends of the Liberal Institute.

10. Resolved, That Mr. F. S. Ellas superintend the exercises of the students of the male department of the Institute, in composition and declamation.

From the annual report of the Principal, it appears that the number of students, and consequently the income of the Institute, has very considerably increased during the last literary year. The social and moral habits of the students—if not improved upon former years, have been very uniformly good, and highly creditable to themselves and the institution.

And the Board in acknowledging the faithfulness of the teachers in the respective male and female departments—the industry and good conduct of the pupils, and the growing patronage of the public, feel every reasonable assurance of the continued prosperity of the Liberal Institute.

☞ The former teachers, in both departments, have been re-engaged.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS—FOR 1836.

1. Met at Oxford village, Wednesday morning, August 31, 1836, and after uniting in prayer with Br. M. B. Smith, organized the Council by choosing Br. M. B. SMITH, Moderator; and Brs. C. S. Brown and J. Whitney, Clerks.

2. Adopted the amendment of the seventh article of the Constitution of this Association.

3. Appointed Brs. Doolittle, Cary and Balcolm, a committee to arrange the order of public services.

4. Appointed Brs. L. C. Browne, Messinger and Doolittle a committee on ordination and fellowship.

5. The Committee of Discipline, owing to a want of information on some cases of complaint, were not prepared to report. Whereupon Brs. J. S. Sherburne and G. Messinger, were re-appointed, and Br. N. Doolittle, was appointed to supply the place of Br. Bullard, who had removed out of the boundaries of the Association.

6. Received the second Universalist society of Norwich, and the society of Columbus, into fellowship.

7. Heard and accepted the report of the committee of fellowship to grant letters to Brs. James G. McAdams, Everett E. Guild, Oliver E. West, and Albert G. Clark.

8. The following resolution respecting the establishment of a theological seminary was introduced and laid on the table for future consideration.

Resolved, That while we deprecate the establishment of any institution, claiming authority to establish a specific test of ministerial qualifications, or to call men “Rabbi,” by conferring honorary titles, yet in the opinion of this Association, the present condition of our denomination requires some greater facilities of preparation for the ministry than now exist.

9. Resolved, That a Society be formed in this Association for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Universalist ministers, and that it adopt the Constitution of a like society formed in June last, in the Central Association.

10. Appointed as delegates to attend the State Convention, at Albany, Brs. Messinger and Sherburne, (ministers,) and Brs. Anson Cary, and S. Waters, (laymen,) with power to appoint their substitutes.

11. Appointed Br. Messinger to deliver the occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute.

12. Appointed Br. T. J. Smith to prepare the minutes, with a request that they be published in the Magazine and Advocate, Union, and Herald.

13. Adjourned to meet at Upper Lisle, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in August, 1837. M. B. SMITH, Moderator.

C. S. BROWN, }
J. WHITNEY, } Clerks.

ORDER OF PUBLIC SERVICES.

Wednesday morning.—Prayer by Br. L. C. Browne. Occasional sermon by Br. C. S. Brown, Heb. xii: 1, 2.

Afternoon.—Prayer by Br. T. J. Smith. First sermon, Br. Whiston, Matt. vi: 9. Second sermon, Br. M. B. Smith, Luke xi: 35.

Evening.—Prayer by Br. L. Hyatt. Sermon by Br. Bullard, 1 Cor. xiii: 13.

Thursday morning.—Prayer by Br. McAdams. Sermon by Br. Whitney, Luke xvi: 19-31. Second sermon, Br. Messinger, Matt. xv: 13. After sermon, the interesting and beautiful service of the dedication of a child was performed.

Afternoon.—Prayer by Br. Sherburne. Sermon by Br. L. C. Browne, Eph. iv: 1. Addresses by the same. Benediction by Br. Ames.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.—George Messinger, Jr., Bainbridge; L. C. Browne, Fort Plain; C. S. Brown, Upper Lisle; M. B. Smith, West Burlington; T. J. Smith, Bridgewater; O.

Whiston, Cooperstown; J. S. Sherburne, Sherburne; E. E. Guild, Walton; James G. McAdams, Delhi; A. G. Clark, Smithville; Lewis Hyatt, Otego; Oliver E. West, Sherburne; Wm. M. DeLong, New-Berlin; G. S. Ames, Sheshequin, Pa.; J. Whitney, Utica; W. Bullard, Cortland; T. S. Bartholomew, Brooklyn, Pa.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.—Walter Clark, Nathaniel Spurr, Columbus; T. Hyde, A. Chandler, Pharsalia; James Berry, Samuel Ellis, 3d., Walton; Anson Cary, Esq., Philip Bartle, Oxford; Waterman Field, Jr., Charles Rich, Esq., New-Berlin; Sylvanus Waters, Esq., Cuyler Per Lee, North Norwich; Jehial Clark, Jason Hawes, Upper Lisle; Eli Tarbell, R. Beadles, Smithville.

REMARKS.

For the information of distant brethren in the faith of a world's salvation, we would state that the meeting was not only well attended, but was crowded with numbers. Each society was fully represented—the singing was good, and the preached word in accordance with sound doctrine and practical piety. Our friends in that vicinity, acquitted themselves with much honor in their kind attention to the visiting brethren. Order and harmony reigned over all the proceedings, and we doubt not much good was done—that the impulse there given to the cause will continue to roll on the the Redeemer's kingdom—the truth run and be glorified, until thousands who have sat in darkness and the shadow of death, shall be brought into the light and liberty of the Gospel of truth. Heaven grant it! Per order, T. J. SMITH.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Most cordially and affectionately reciprocating every kind feeling Br. Smith has evinced in his reply to my former article, I will now notice its most important items. A few minor arguments will be unnoticed, not out of disrespect for them or him, but for the sake of brevity. I also refer the reader to his reply, rather than quote largely from it.

1. I objected to a theological seminary, on account of its "probable abuses." Br. Smith replies, "The abuses to which anything may be perverted, is no argument against its use." Admitted—but my argument rested not on what "may be," but on what most probably will be. The great probability, that a theological seminary will be abused by Universalists, as such institutions always have been by most others, is an argument, not against its use, but against its establishment. Two such abuses, out of many that might be named, will be noticed in the second and fifth sections of this article.

The cases of fanaticism, mysticism and division among Universalists, I named merely to prove that we are not yet free from the practical errors of other denominations, and were not, therefore, likely to manage a theological seminary better than others. Hence, even admitting that such an institution will not increase fanaticism or mysticism among us—yea, even though it should not (as I firmly believe it will) produce divisions and render hostilities more inveterate—yet if it tends to deprive any portion of our order of their just and equal rights, that is an amply sufficient reason why it should never be established.

2. I objected to a theological seminary, because it would tend to establish arbitrary literary, scientific and theological tests. Br. S. replies, that "if this means only, that persons about to enter the ministry, shall be required to possess a certain amount of literary and theological knowledge, there can be nothing very exceptionable in such test." By "a certain amount," I understand an arbitrary amount—if this is so great (however small) as to exclude only one candidate who would be useful and acceptable to the people, it would be very exceptionable. Br. Smith continues—"Can there exist.....any reason why a minister should not be required to understand something of his profession, as well as a physician, a cabinet-maker or a printer?" No—but let the employers make the requirement. Br. S. well knows that country congregations may be satisfied with less acquirements in their pastors, than city congregations, generally. And I apprehend that a theologically educated clergy will require "something" very different from what our laity would require. Yet for the laity the preacher is selected—by them he is supported—among them he lives—to them he preaches—and they, if any, best know his qualifications for their service—his conduct, his preaching talents, and his usefulness. Yet if we adopt even "the very moderate" arbitrary tests proposed at the Hudson River Association, a few years ago, (made moderate, no doubt, because we have no seminary; but even then, only required as preparatory to still higher and more numerous tests,) there are but few laymen able to examine a candidate. And there will be still fewer, when (after a seminary is established) a knowledge of Greek, probably Hebrew, biblical criticism, sacred antiquities, ancient geography, etc., etc., will be added to English grammar, logic, elocution, ecclesiastical history, and moral essays. And if it was contemplated in time to add to these latter tests, certainly after we have a theological seminary the denomination will be called on to establish yet greater tests, in order to compel candidates to resort to it, in order that it may be well supported. Consequently, the laity will be more and more deprived of all their share and power in fellowshiping preachers. Yet preachers are, ex officio, members of our ecclesiastical councils. Now, deriving their fellowship in part from the laity, they feel under obligation to represent them; but then, selected wholly by the clergy, they will represent the clergy, alone—they will, in fact, be a self-chosen aristocracy. Hence the more complete (in a very short time) will be the disfranchisement of the overruled laity, as in many other denominations. This end may not be contemplated now, by the advocates of a seminary; but power is corrupting as well as gold; and though Hazael asked in horror, "What is thy servant, a dog, that he should do this great thing?" yet he afterwards became capable of doing the very evils he abhorred! 2 Kings x: 10-16.

3. My enumeration of those opposed to a theological seminary, seems to be misunderstood. I did not mean that all such are now favorable to us; but most of them. The similarity of principles of government, and measures of action on this and like subjects, causes them to be more favorably inclined to us, than are those generally who are in favor of theological seminaries. By examining the list of converts to Universalism in the States named, it will be seen that not only a majority, but the very best of our converts have been obtained from the sources named; and that almost our only hopes of obtaining more, depend on the same quarter.

That the Tunkers, Quakers, etc., are opposed to theological seminaries, because "they maintain they are moved by the spirit to believe and to do all necessary things," is partly true—that is one reason—but do not those in favor of such seminaries, generally "maintain" the same thing? Even the "respectable" Episcopalian, when inducted into "the order of deacons, priests or bishops," declares that he is "inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon" him that office; and is supposed to "receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work," by the laying on of the bishop's hands!! Comment is unnecessary.

Neither did I mean that, when any of these classes were converted to Universalism, they should not also be converted from at least much of their bigotry, fanaticism, etc. And, in my opinion, to leave them where they now are, (as Br. S. recommends,) because they are bigots, etc.; or "until their feelings and professions are better regulated," etc.—would be as if Jesus had refused to come to "save his people from their sins," because they were sinners; or until they should become saints.

Br. S. says, "And why not add the Mormons, Br.," to those opposed to a theological seminary? Ah, my Br., I purposely avoided naming them, for fear I should hurt the feelings of its advocates! The Mormons are on your side of the question! A theological seminary is too apt a means to build up a theocracy, to be readily overlooked by Jo. Smith.*

4. My argument, that the erection of a theological seminary would drive from us many Associations, some Conventions, and various societies and brethren, and paralyze the energies and affections of many who would remain, has not been denied—and so far as their motives and my own personal course was noticed, Br. S. has already been replied to. Those who are for union, will do well to remember this point.

5. I objected to a theological seminary, because its professor, appointed by the denomination as their organ to teach candidates for the ministry, by teaching his peculiar views will give offence to those differing from him, and thus create disunion and divisions. Br. S. says, "this is shown to be incorrect, by the very admission of existing divisions," etc. Our Br. here confounds "differences of opinion," with "divisions." They are widely different. There are now many "differences of opinion" in our order; but there is but one "division," viz. in Massachusetts. And that division was at least increased, by giving one difference of opinion a special preference, and partially excluding its opposite from "an open field and fair play," so that its advocates got up a paper and a party of their own. The same sad and evil result, but often repeated, will result from a denominational theological seminary; unless like causes will not produce like effects. If they do not, then is my argument what Br. Smith calls it, "merely conjecture." But like causes will produce like effects. "Error of opinion may safely be left free, while reason is free to combat it." So of any difference of opinion, while other differences are allowed equal privileges. But enthrone one, in the person of the denomination's professor, and exclude all others—support that favored difference with funds, mainly taken from those donors and students who uphold the others—endorse it with the name of the denomination, and refuse this influence to the others—(and all this you must do, if you establish a theological seminary—) and if "greater unanimity" then reigns, it will be obtained like the "order" that "reigns in Warsaw," by the banishment of all friendly to freedom. I repeat a sentiment uttered some years ago—I solemnly believe that our differences in opinion are destined to preserve our religious freedom and equality; or, (these destroyed,) to sunder us into as many different sects as now divide and distract the Partialists.

6. I retract my assertion, that the Universalists in this State are unable to pay for the Clinton Liberal Institute. I did not mean what I said—for I believe "they can, if they will." So of a theological seminary. The denomination can build one, if they will. But there is an "if"! Will they? With this retraction and admission, I leave the reader to remodel and apply my former argument.

I objected to a theological seminary, because none but the wealthy could be benefited by it—that at least ninety out of every hundred that would now enter the ministry, must be excluded, or beg their way into it and through it. Br. S. seems to misunderstand my objection, when he asks, of literary institutions, "Does my Br. wish there were no such institutions, because.....the rich derive benefit from them?" By no means. Literary institutions are not intended for a special class or profession,

* "The Mormons residing in Kirtland, Ohio, have lately erected a stone temple, at an expense of $40,000. It is 60 by 80 feet broad, and 50 feet high. It has two rows of Gothic windows. The first floor is the place of worship, with four rows of pulpits at each end, having three pulpits in a row.....The second and attic stories are for a THEOLOGICAL AND LITERARY SEMINARY, which is expected to have the manual labor system attached to it."—Philadelphia "Saturday Chronicle" of July 30.

"On the front [of this same temple] is this inscription, 'The House of the Lord, built by the Latter-day Saints.' The lower story is the place of worship, the middle for 'the school of the prophets,' and the upper for an academic school. A distinguished Professor of Hebrew is their teacher. He is now giving his second course, with about one hundred in each class."—"Buffalo Spectator," of August 27.

but for all. Nor do I object to even a theological seminary, "because the rich derive benefit from" it; but because none but the rich can be benefited by it. If we must beg, let it be, at least in part, for the poor.

He thinks, however, that "the industrious and prudent candidate," "by his own honest exertions," in "a year or two, more or less," can enable himself to spend the requisite three years at the seminary. I respectfully invite all who think so—especially the poor, "industrious and prudent candidate"—to look at the following estimate—adding or subtracting what each may find necessary to make it correct.

Few young men can obtain situations at twenty dollars per month—yet we will say that sum. Few can get constant employment even if health should allow it—yet we will suppose no lost time.

Twelve months, at $20. per month,	$240.00
Board, washing and mending, for 52 weeks, at $1.75 per week,	91.00
Clothing for one year, say	60.00
Incidental expenses, medicine, etc., for 1 yr.,	12.00

Total of expenses for one year,	$163.00
Balance, or savings of one year,	$77.00

The expenses of attending a theological seminary, for three years, at similar rates, will be

Three year's boarding, etc., at $91. per yr.,	$273.00
Clothing for three years, at $60. "	180.00
Books and stationary, at $20. "	60.00
Tuition, say $20. "	60.00
Incidental expenses, at $12. "	36.00

Total of expenses for the three years,	$609.00
--	----------

This sum, divided by the poor candidate's annual savings, gives upwards of SEVEN YEARS AND TEN MONTHS (!) as the period during which he must toil, before he can enable himself to go through his studies in the seminary! During at least ten years of that time, (seven of toil and three of study,) some congregation must remain without the labors he could bestow on them, with profit to them and to himself. As to the six hundred dollars, if he laid it out in proper books, and studied them well during these ten years, he would know more, (and know it better) than he could learn in a seminary in three years; he would have a large and excellent library of his own, for his money, to which he could resort at any time in after life, as he could not do to the seminary library, or the theological professor! And this calculation is made for an unmarried man—how impossible, then, for a poor man with a wife and family, even to enter the seminary without a system of begging to aid him! Depend upon it, if we establish a theological seminary, and wish poor candidates for the ministry (and at present, we have VERY FEW others) to be benefited by it, we must, at the same time, send forth hordes of beggars to overrun our denomination, and establish systems of "holy fairs," to raise money to educate them. God save us from these curses!

7. In reply to my proposal to merely amend the present mode of educating candidates, by increasing facilities and removing defects; Br. Smith says, "the only way to do it," is to establish a theological seminary. I trust I have shown this to be a retrograde movement. And surely some mode can be devised less dangerous and more efficient—one that will unite all parties—one that will benefit preachers as well as candidates, rich and poor, laity as well as clergy; for certainly the laity need knowledge as well as we. But if I must choose between the seminary and the present imperfect mode, give me the present mode. I prefer our present self-educated clergy to a theological seminary educated one, as more practical—as embracing the numerous poor as well as the few rich—as most acceptable and most useful to the vast majority of our people—as being better read in men and things in real life, and as well read in books—ten years will enable them to read, and for six hundred dollars to buy, at least three hundred volumes of the best, valuable theological works—and how many of us have read, and own that number? True, the most of these will be standard Partialist works, for there are not many valuable theological works, beside.

This brings me to Br. Smith's comparison implying that Partialist writers no more impart a knowledge of the Scriptures, than brimstone nourishes the body, instead of bread. As this article may be "dry" to many, I will follow up his jest. If the knowledge derived from Partialist theologians is (mentally or spiritually) "brimstone," then I know no one who has eaten more, or fed more to others, than Br. Smith. Why, he is full of it! He deals it out in all his sermons—his library shelves bend under it—he expends more or less, yearly, to add to his stores of it—he causes his students to pore daily over it—he recommends them and ministering brethren to purchase certain volumes (not rolls) of it—and should we ever have denominational libraries, he will certainly be for cramming even them with it, perhaps to keep out "bookworms"! Yes, this very "brimstone," extracted into our books, sermons, and periodicals, has done much, very much to convince many opposers (who could not gainsay their own authorities!) that Universalism must be true; for even such "brimstone" very often agrees with and confirms "the bread which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world!" Only give us more such "brimstone"—more histories like Pridemore's, Mosheim's, etc.—more compilations like Horne's Introduction, Cahnet's Dictionary, Jahn's Archaeology, etc.—more translations and commentaries like Wakefield's, Clarke's, Campbell on the Gospels, Macknight and Locke on the Epistles, etc., and let them become abundant and cheap, and much less than six hundred dollars will buy as good a theological library as any ninety-nine out of every hundred of our preachers will want, and enable them to be useful and edifying to their congregations, and formidable to the Partialist clergy, without having to resort to a theological seminary to be taught.

8. I proposed that, as a denomination, our order should not take sides with either party; but allow each to pursue its own course. Pr. S. replies, "This is a most singular way of preventing a division—by recommending division," etc. He again confounds "difference of opinion" (in measures) with "division." But even if they are the same, I merely recommend our present condition—freedom of difference in opinions, and of competition in measures. But Br. S. says, "let the denomination act—let the majority decide, and the minority acquiesce." A decision by the actual majority is hard to be attained, and when made, the advocates of a seminary will, on every occasion, renew their efforts to make converts and gain their object. And should they succeed, I confess, we can place no "trust" in a theological seminary, nor be at "peace" with its dangers and evils. Hence, if we can not agree, it is best that one party build and support a seminary if they are able, and will have one; and the other party pursue any other measure they may prefer, if they are able, and will not have a seminary. But I had rather—much, much rather, both parties would unite on some general measure to directly instruct laity and clergy.

That we would gain more by the conversion "of the Unitarians of Massachusetts than by that of all the Tunkers, Freewill Baptists, Omish, [not the Mormons, Br.; they have a theological seminary.] and the whole race of mystics and enthusiasts in America,"* I very much doubt. For, firstly—If after conversion, both classes remain what they now are, may God in mercy give us the latter, rather than the classically cold and learnedly lifeless Unitarians—who, with all their refined manners, learned preachers and Cambridge University to boot, are dwindling to nought. Such a gain, would, in fact, be a loss—a few such conquests would ruin us! So far from controlling public opinion, as Br. S. intimates, the Unitarians are controlled by it—they dare not publicly and plainly declare whether mankind shall all be finally saved, or not. If we really want them, make Universalism popular, and, if they yet exist, the majority of them will readily profess it. But, secondly—If, when converted, both classes become truly Universalists, I should still prefer the Tunkers, Quakers, Freewill Baptists, etc. For the greatest good is, to save those in greatest need of present salvation, and the greatest number. The Unitarians have too little (if any) faith in endless misery, to be troubled by it; and therefore need present salvation less than the others. They are a mere handful, compared with the others. They are confined to one State, where Universalism is already well known; the others are spread over all the States, and where our faith most needs advocates. Let us, then, rather aim to confer the greater amount of happiness, than the lesser—to save the many than the few, and to gain those who will spread Universalism where unknown, rather than those who will only spread it where it is already known. This we can do without a theological seminary—this we can not do, with one.

Such being its evils—such its inutility—I can only pray on, more and more fervently, "God save us from a theological seminary! Amen." A. B. GROSH.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER—RESPECTED SIR,—

I should be much pleased if you would give an answer in the Magazine and Advocate to the following questions.

1. You of course believe that all mankind will be holy and happy, in the world to come. Do those that die in the very act of committing some horrid crime—as it will be admitted that many do—even those that have spent their whole life, in the most wicked manner possible, do you believe that those that die in such condition, enter immediately into a state of happiness?

2. The following passages of Scripture are often quoted by Universalists, to prove the doctrine of universal salvation: Gen. xlii: 18; Ps. lxxii: 17, lxxxvi: 9; Rom. xi: 26; Rev. vii: 9, xv: 4. But is not this speaking of nations in their national capacity only? Several of the present nations of the earth are acknowledged to be Christian nations; but no one will pretend that all the individuals of such nations are Christians; may it not with equal propriety be said that all nations may be blessed, as declared in the above named texts, even if one-third, or one-half of them are lost forever?

3. Do the following passages, Ps. xlv: 6, xciii: 2; Isa. ix: 6; Rom. ix: 5; Heb. i: 8, speak of Christ? If not, who do they speak of? If they do speak of Christ, do they not fully prove him to be God?

4. Is the passage in the first epistle of John v: 7, in the original? If not, why is it in our English Bible?

5. The following passages are quoted by Presbyterians to prove that man by nature is totally depraved, Gen. vi: 5; Ps. xiv: 3; Rom. viii: 7; Eph. ii: 1; Rom. iii: 10-18. How do you explain them?

Your answers to the above questions would probably be interesting to many of your readers, and highly gratifying to

Cazenovia, August 20, 1836.

ANSWER.

1. To the first question I give a negative answer. My reasons for that negative are found in my reply to Br. Fuller's letter published in No. 36 of this volume.

2. In answer to the second inquiry, we would remark, that it may be true of some of the passages referred to, that they relate to nations in their national capacity only; but we think this cannot be said of all of them. Besides, were we to allow that they all related to men in their national capacity only, it would by no means help our correspondent out of his difficulties, as a Partialist—for such we take him to be—in limiting the blessing to a part only of each and every nation. L. P. will not dispute, we presume, that the blessing promised in the passages referred to, were to be spiritual blessings, or blessings connected with the Gospel and salvation of Christ. This being admitted, we next observe, that many nations have existed in this world and become extinct, both before and since these promises were made, who never heard of Christ or the Gospel of man's salvation through him, and therefore, if the promises are ever verified in regard to them, either in their individual or national capacity, it must take place in a future state, as it has not in this: and if nations have departed this life without being blessed in

* I regret that these moral, peaceful and worthy people, (who are at present, no more "mystics and enthusiasts" than Presbyterians, Baptists or Episcopalians,) have been so contemptuously classed with the Mormons. A. B. G.

Christ, and are to be blessed in him beyond this state of being, then why may not individuals in like manner, (who have not in this life,) be blessed in him hereafter? Furthermore, let it be remarked, that though we might dispute and wrangle ever so long about the difference in meaning between these promises as explained to include some of all nations, or only some individuals of all nations, the question at issue, relative to the destiny of man, would remain still unsettled if we confined ourselves alone to these particular texts, but may be very easily settled by reference to other parallel passages. For we are not only assured that in the seed of Abraham, which is Christ, (see Gal. iii: 16,) all nations shall be blessed, (Gen. xxii: 18, xxvii: 4; Gal. iii: 8,) but we are also assured (Gen. xii: 3, xxviii: 14) that in him all the families of the earth shall be blessed—that the fullness of the Gentiles and all Israel shall be saved. And as if this were not enough to satisfy the most skeptical and most doubting, it is further added Acts iii: 25, that all the kindreds of the earth shall be blessed in Christ. If all the nations, all the families, and all the kindreds of the earth do not embrace the whole human family, we must confess that we should be at a loss to find terms that would embrace the whole. And then too, in regard to the final ingathering of all, the inspired writers have used language the most plain and obvious, and varied its phraseology, yet retaining the sense, so much as to put it seemingly beyond dispute. Thus the Psalmist, notwithstanding some might dispute and cavil about the extent of his meaning in the passages referred to by our correspondent, says without equivocation, Ps. xxii: 27, "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." Here is a repetition or reiteration of the sentiment by two synonymous sentences. All the ends of the world—and all the kindreds of the nations, are expressions implying unlimited universality so far as the human family are concerned. "Remember"—"turn unto the Lord"—and "worship before thee" are expressions denoting the voluntary and sincere homage of the soul. See also expressions of entire universality, Isa. xlv: 23, 24; 1 Cor. xv: 22-28; Eph. i: 9, 10, 11; 1 Tim. ii: 4, etc.

3. Of the passages referred to under this head, a part speak of Christ, a part are doubtful, and a part do not speak of Christ. Ps. xlv: 6, 7, and Heb. i: 8, 9, are parallel passages, and relate, no doubt, to Christ; and though they may prove him to be God in a subordinate sense, just as Moses was made "a God unto Pharaoh," Exod. vii: 1, and just as "they were called Gods to whom the word of God came," John x: 34, 35, yet these very passages prove that he was not the supreme God, but a subordinate and dependent being—that the very throne to which he was exalted and the anointing that he had received were from God the Father, and that he was dependent on the Father for them. Many have doubted whether Isa. ix: 6, relates to Christ or not, but we are not disposed to question it. This text, however, so far from proving, we think directly disproves the supreme deity of Christ. And we think L. P. will agree with us here, if he will ask and attempt to solve the questions, Who was the giver of this son? Were the gift and the giver the same? His being called by the names there mentioned no more proves him to be the supreme Jehovah than the naming of a child Lemuel, Elijah, Eliab, etc., would prove those children to be really, and to all intents and purposes, the strong God, God the Lord, God my Father, etc., the Hebrew meaning of those names. Psalm xliii: 2, has no relation whatever to Christ. Rom. ix: 5, expressly speaks of Christ; but we presume there would be no difference of views between our correspondent and us relative to the meaning of that phrase where Christ is spoken of; but the difference, if any, would be concerning the meaning of the last phrase of the verse, "God blessed for ever." This phrase we understand as an apostrophe, or an exclamation of praise and gratitude to God, the Father, for the unspeakable gift of his Son to the world, because God had made him (Christ) "the head of every man," given him to be "head over all things to the church." For this distinguished favor, because God had brought forth his Son, the promised seed of Abraham, and placed him over and above all others, God was to be "blessed forever." For any further explanation on this and other kindred subjects which our correspondent may desire, we beg leave to refer him to our Letters to Messrs. Aikin and Lansing, published a short time since.

4. The passage in the 1st epistle of John v: 7, according to the best authority and the most eminent critics we have consulted, is not in the original. The reason why it is in our English Bible now, we suppose is, that most publishers of the present day, having never seen the passage left out, suppose it belongs there, and accordingly insert it. The reason for considering it spurious, as also the account of the manner of its being introduced into the common Bible, will be found in the following note taken from the "Improved Version of the New Testament," published on the plan of Archbishop Newcome.

"1. This text concerning the heavenly witnesses, (1 John v: 7,) is not contained in any Greek manuscript which was written earlier than the fifteenth century. 2. Nor in any Latin manuscript earlier than the ninth century. 3. It is not found in any of the ancient versions. 4. It is not cited by any of the Greek ecclesiastical writers, though to prove the doctrine of the trinity they have cited the words both before and after this text. 5. It is not cited by any of the early Latin fathers, even when the subjects upon which they treat, would naturally have led them to appeal to its authority. 6. It is first cited by Virgilius Tapsensis, a Latin writer of no credit, in the latter end of the fifth century, and by him it is suspected to have been forged. 7. It has been omitted as spurious in many editions of the New Testament since the Reformation:—in the two first of Erasmus, in those of Aldus, Colinaeus, Zuinglius, and lately of Griesbach. 8. It was omitted by Luther, in his German version. In the old English Bibles of Henry VIII., Edward VI. and Elizabeth, it was printed in small types, or included in brackets: but between the years 1566 and 1580, it began to be printed as it now stands; by whose authority is not known. See 'Travis' Letters to Gibbon, and Forson's to Travis. Also, Griesbach's excellent dissertation on the text, at the end of the second volume. Archbishop Newcome omits the text, and the bishop of Lincoln expresses his conviction that it is spurious. Elem. of Theol. vol. ii, p. 90, note."

5. In relation to the doctrine of the natural total depravity of man, we must say that the passages referred to and supposed by Presbyterians to prove that doctrine, do not, in our opinion, prove nor in any manner give countenance to it, and that the doctrine, being opposed to reason and common observation, is false and untenable. Gen. vi: 5; Ps. xiv: 3, and Rom. iii: 10-18, we think describe, not the general and true character of all men in all ages of the world, but the accumulated wickedness, the acquired corruption, that prevailed in the world at the time of the flood and during the generations then and there spoken of. Such periods of general corruption have several times occurred, and especially have they happened with particular nations at particular times. See examples of national corruption and degeneracy described, Isa. i: Jer. v: 31; Mal. ii: 5-11; Matt. xxiii: 31-36, and numerous other parallels. Rom. viii: 7, merely declares that "the carnal mind is enmity against God: it is not subject to his law nor indeed can be." This we believe is unqualifiedly true. The carnal mind is the fleshly mind. This is now as it always has been, and always will be, enmity against God and spiritual things—it can never be converted, but must be destroyed and a spiritual mind implanted in its stead. We see nothing in Ephesians ii: 1, that requires any remarks to render its meaning obvious, nor anything countenancing in any manner the doctrine of total depravity. The context speaks of the Ephesians as well as other Gentiles being enlightened, quickened and gathered into the fold of Christ, from the darkness, alienation and degeneracy in which they were before sunk; but the apostle says nothing about their being totally depraved. This subject is treated more critically and at length in our Letters to Aikin, etc., before referred to. See Letters 7 and 8. D. S.

EQUAL PROVIDENCE.

I beg pardon for adding anything to Br. Whitney's excellent remarks, published in another column of this paper—but I believe it will add some information to his, for the reader's use.

Many point to the sicknesses, and the results of personal accidents, which befall many good men, in contrast with the good health, etc., of bad men, in proof that the good suffer innocently at least as much, as the wicked do deservedly in this life. Sickness is the result of the violation of some organic law—either by the person himself, or his ancestors. Suppose by his ancestors—it is to him no punishment, (unless he chooses to call it such, by imputation!) but suffering. But suppose, as is most probable, because most common, that "the saint" has exposed himself to marsh miasmata—is he to be preserved from fever, at the expense of God's law in nature, merely because he is pious? No—he must suffer the consequences of violating God's law in his physical constitution, in order that he may learn better and do better next time. Or the saint swallows laudanum—is he not to sleep under its influence, merely because he is a godly man? Certainly he is—for if his godliness rendered God's physical laws of none effect, how should he ever be benefited by an opiate, when he needed one to procure that sleep and ease which pain denied him? Or, suppose the saint should strike violently with a handspike, and, missing his object, hit his foot—shall it not be bruised, nor broken, because he prays often?

Certainly it shall—for if his frame were rendered so insensible by his many prayers, as not to feel such a blow, how could he be warmed by the sun, or refreshed by the breezes of heaven? Let the saint learn and obey God's physical laws, as well as he has learned and obeyed his moral laws, and he will as seldom be burnt by fever, or shaken by ague, or gripped by cholera, as he now is torn by remorse, or harassed with the unavailing agonies of repentance for evil deeds without remedy.

On the other hand, "the sinner," as he is termed, having turned his attention to the "things of the world," has observed causes and their effects—noticed what affected his health and what promoted it—what agreed with his stomach and what did not—how carelessness led to broken limbs and bruised flesh, and how carefulness preserved from it—and regulates his conduct accordingly. But he has not regarded the moral laws of God, as he has God's physical laws. Hence, if he injures a wife he loves, shall he not feel vexed at himself, and sorry for her, merely because he is free from chill and fever? Certainly he shall—for by being made to suffer himself in the sufferings he inflicts on others, he may be made to seek their happiness, and thus become virtuous. If in a passion he murder a friend, shall he not feel the guilt of bloodshedding, and startle at the rustling of every leaf in a solitary place, as if the avenger of blood was at his heels, merely because he never eats poison? Certainly must he, or how should he learn to subdue his wrath and withhold his hand; and how should others learn by him, the awful consequences of allowing their passions to rule over their reason and actions?

The truth is, both these men violate the laws of God; and both are punished. Ignorance of those laws, and all their consequences, is the cause of their several violations. And that they keep one set of laws, is no reason that they shall not be punished for breaking the other set. But as the moral is greater than, and superior to the physical, so the moral punishments and rewards are higher, purer, greater and better than the merely physical—and hence the saint suffers less, and is rewarded more than the sinner.

THE PASSING BELL.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

"Passing bells were introduced that their sound might pass far and wide, and that every one within hearing should kneel down and offer up a prayer for the departed. This was in the seventh century."

Hark! hark! 'tis the sound of the passing bell
Rolling solemn and deep through the distant dell—
Again—and again—with redoubled peal,
Its tones on the ear with distinctness steal.
Near, and more near swells the hollow toll,
O, pray for the dead—the departed soul.

The woodsman foregoes the intended stroke,
And bows him beneath the inclining oak;
The armorer's hand falls with nerveless blow,
And beside the forge his form bends low;
The boatman forgets his course to steer,
And leans on the oar in a fervent prayer.

The ploughman hears the approaching sound,
And his limbs descend to the furrowed ground—
Unsubmissive none to the mandate high,
The peasant and prince both alike comply—
The one, by the gilded couch, in awe,
The other kneels by his bed of straw.

Bright beauty resigns the unwoven wreath;
Revenge the fierce blade returns to its sheath;
The merry notes cease in the festive hall;
The gay and light hearted in suppliance fall—
Even love releases the tender scroll,
And whispers a prayer for th' departed soul.

The mother, in tears o'er her dying son,
A blessing invokes for the spirit gone;
Old age, faintly tottering upon the brink
Of the gaping tomb, feels his moments shrink—
The summons awows, and with feeble groan
Craves a boon for the soul so linked with his own.

IMPORTANT ADVICE TO CLERGYMEN.

Take heed to yourselves that your graces may be maintained in life and action.

For this end, preach to yourselves the sermons you study, before you preach them to others. If you were to do this for your own sakes it would be no lost labor. But I principally recommend it on the public account and for the sake of the church. When your minds are in an holy frame, your people are likely to partake of it. Your prayers, and praises, and doctrine will be sweet and heavenly to them. They are likely to feel it when you have been much with God. That which is in your hearts most, will be most in their ears. I confess, I must speak it by lamentable experience, that I publish to my flock the distempers of my soul. When I let my heart grow cold, my preaching is cold, and when it is confused, my preaching is confused also. And I have often observed in the best of my hearers, that when I have grown cold in preaching they have grown cold accordingly. The next prayers I have heard from them, have been too much like my sermons. You cannot decline and neglect your duty, but others will be losers by it as well as yourselves. If we let our love decrease, and if we abate our holy care and watchfulness, it will soon appear in our doctrine. If the matter show it not, the manner will; and our hearers are likely to fare the worse for it.—Whereas, if we could abound in faith, and love, and zeal, how would they overflow to the refreshing of our congregation! Watch, therefore, brethren, over your own hearts. Keep out lusts and worldly inclinations; and keep up the life of faith and love. Be much at home, and be much with God. If it be not your daily, serious business to study your own hearts, to subdue corruptions, and to "walk with God," all will go amiss with you and you will starve your audience. Or if you have an affected fervency, you cannot expect any great blessing to attend it. Above all, be much in secret prayer and meditation. There you must fetch the heavenly fire that must kindle your sacrifices.

LUTHER.—The belief that devils were always in his presence, ready to seduce his head or his heart, to espy every tendency to sinful thought, was evidently too much for the serenity of Luther's mind. One or two, he said, never left his side, and tempted him in every possible way. "If he had a knife in his hand, they suggested desperate thoughts; if he wished to pray, they often forced him out of the apartment." His devils were learned; they were great doctors in divinity; and if they had not passed through their academical degrees, they were profound enough, for they had exercised their calling near six thousand years. Deeply does he bemoan their ability in controversy—their boundless knowledge in Scripture, their skill in dialectics, their legal acuteness. Sometimes, he says, they pressed him so closely within the horns of a dilemma, that the perspiration issued abundantly from him.

THE PREACHER OF CLIMAXES.—The late Rev. Robert Hall, was remarkably happy and apt in hitting off in conversation, by a few bold strokes, dashed occasionally with sarcasm, the peculiarities of his acquaintance, whether they happened to lie in their style, their manners or their character. We have not seen the following instance in print. It was told us by the gentleman to whom it was addressed. When talking of the Rev. — of —, one of the most popular preachers of the day among the Dissenters, in whose sermons there is a striking contrast between the plainness with which they begin, and the flights of metaphor in which they end, our friend asked Mr. Hall how he liked this style of eloquence? He replied "Not at all, Sir; not at all. Why, Sir, every sentence is a climax, every paragraph is a climax, every head is a climax, and the whole sermon is a climax. And then, at the end of every head and division of his sermon, he shouts out, though scarcely audible at first, in a shrill voice, that makes one's ears tingle, some text of Scripture in the shape of an exclamation. Why, Sir, he puts me in mind of a little sweep boy, running up a succession of parallel chimneys, and at the top of each, crying—sweep! sweep!"

A PREACHER IN DIFFICULTY.—A celebrated preacher, well known as an eccentric character, stopped short in the pulpit: it was in vain that he scratched his head; nothing would come out. "My friends," said he, as he walked quietly down the pulpit stairs, "my friends, I pity you, for you have lost a fine discourse."

MARRIAGES.

In Hamilton, on the 10th of July, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. S. L. EMERY, to Miss JANE PHILLIS.

At Palermo, on the 1st inst., by David Jennings, Esq., Rev. C. B. BROWN, of Mexico, to Mrs. MARY HOWARD, formerly of Winfield, Herkimer county.

In this city, on the 5th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. NOAH HEAD, to Miss MARY MORETON.

On the 6th, by the same, Mr. HENRY H. BRAZIE, to Mrs. MARENA SILLIMAN, both of Schenectada.

In Fairfield on the 8th inst., by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. MERRICK JONES, to Miss ANN PETRIE.

DEATHS.

At Grand Blanc, Michigan, July 17, in hope of a glorious immortality for the whole world, ISENA IRISH, consort of Thomas Irish, in the 25th year of her age. She was amiable in life and lamented in death. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered at her funeral by the writer.

Also, at the same place, August 3d, ANDREW JACKSON, infant son of Thomas Irish.

Also, at the same place, August 9th, of a lingering illness, Dr. NATHANIEL EWER, preacher of the Abrahamic Gospel, in the 38th year of his age.

Br. Ewer was formerly a Freewill Baptist preacher, but became a Universalist about four years ago. He removed to this country, from St. Albans, Vt., about a year ago, and the declining state of his health forbidding his return, his family followed him. To a question, "whether his faith would abide the test of death," he replied, "Oh, yes! it will abide it—there is nothing like it—I have not the shadow of a doubt."

Br. Ewer was a systematic preacher, a reasoner—he went deeply into the subject, and was "a workman that needed not to be ashamed." He adorned the doctrine he professed to believe and preach, both as a minister and a Christian. He has left a wife in deep affliction, with four small children.

The consolations of Truth were administered at his funeral, by the writer. ALBU BORDMAN.

Will the New-Hampshire and Vermont papers please copy this?

In Ogden, Monroe county, on the 2d inst., of consumption, Mr. SCHUYLER V. BROWN, aged 28 years.

Mr. Brown had been residing in Grand Blanc, Monroe county, Michigan, from which place, he and his wife recently came to Ogden; partly for his health, and partly to visit their friends in that place. He survived his journey but a few weeks. He has left a wife and a large circle of other relatives and friends, to mourn their loss. May they recollect that what is their loss, is his unspeakable gain.

The fear of death had no place in the mind of Mr. Brown, for his faith in the salvation of all men was rather strengthened than otherwise by the approach of his dissolution. He hailed with joy, and the expression of "glory to God," every indication of his approaching departure to the world of spirits. He requested that the sermon which should be preached on the occasion of his funeral, be published in the Magazine and Advocate; and that a copy be sent to each of the members of his father's family, as they could not be present. It seems, too, that they are all believers in the doctrine of endless misery. It is hoped that the instance now before them, will convince them that Universalism will not only do to live by, but to die by. The sermon is forwarded for publication by the writer. W. E. MANLEY.

In Nelson, August 12, Miss SALLY, daughter of Jacob Smith, Esq., aged 28. Miss Smith sustained an excellent moral and religious character. She was a firm believer in the doctrine of God's untounded love, and was considered, even by the opposers of that doctrine, to be an experimental Christian, at least, in the last part of her life, though her sentiments remained the same that they had ever been. In the death of this individual, we have indubitable evidence, that the sentiment of universal benevolence is adequate to support the mind, in the hour of death; for she died rejoicing in that goodness that extends to the vast family of man. A. D.

In Morrisville, on the 24th ult., Mrs. HALL, wife of Mr. Palmer Hall, aged about 25 years. Mrs. H. was much respected for her amiable disposition and many virtues. She was a kind mother, dutiful wife, and faithful friend—her husband and children have sustained an irreparable loss by her death, but we trust that Br. H. is consoled by the reflection, that his loss is her gain.

The consolation of the Abrahamic Gospel, was presented to the mourners and a large concourse of people on the 27th ult., by the writer, from Rom. 10: 8.

E. M. W.

In Hamilton, on the 25th ult., Miss EMMA GOODRICH, aged about 23 years. She was a member of our choir, and our young friends with whom she has sung the songs of Zion in the sanctuary, will long remember her virtues and respect her memory. Indeed, their tearful eyes while they were singing her funeral dirge, gave honorable testimony in favor of their respect for the deceased. The truth of God according to the restitution of all things, was exhibited in a discourse from 1 Peter i: 3, 4, 5, by E. M. W.

In Lebanon, on the 28th ult., the youngest daughter, of Col. STERNS, aged about 18 months. E. M. W.

Of croup, August 27, M. V. B. ROGERS, aged 4 years 8 months, son of Simeon and Betsey Rogers, of Whites-town. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners in a discourse from 2 Cor. iv: 16. S. R. S.

At Palermo, August 10, of dysentery, RALPH WHIPPLE MERRILL, youngest child of Br. Villars Merrill, aged 14 months.

The consolations of the "Gospel of our salvation" were tendered to the bereaved mourners, and a numerous circle of friends and neighbors, on the 12th, by the writer.

"Tender cherub, infant mild,
Perfect, sweetest, brightest child;
Transcend luster, beauteous clay,
Smiling wonder of a day"—
Gone thou art to realms of bliss—
Gone to dwell where Jesus is. C. E. B.

In Ellisburg, August 21, WILLARD BEMAS, aged 37 years. He has left a wife and four children to mourn their loss. May they be sustained and comforted by Him who has promised to be a father of the fatherless, and the widow's God. The funeral was attended by the writer, on the 23d. W. H. W.

In Watertown, August 25th, JOHN HALL, aged 42 years. His funeral was attended by the writer on the 27th, and the widow, relatives and friends directed to the fountain of consolation opened in the Gospel of life and immortality. W. H. W.

Extract from a Sermon.

BY REV. J. A. ASPINWALL.

"By this I know that thou favorest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me." Ps. xli: 11.

In application of this subject, we use the text in reference to those who have ventured upon the profession of what your speaker has no doubt is the truth of God. We have had, and still have enemies. They are numerous and powerful. They have long controlled public opinion, are secure in the prejudices and established habits of a whole people. Yet under the immense disadvantages in which these things have placed us, "our enemy doth not triumph over us."

Although their exertions, for many years, have been very great, yet in what particular have they triumphed over us? They formerly advocated the total depravity of the whole family of man. They formerly contended that man, by nature, was incapable of "speaking a good word, thinking a good thought, or doing a good deed." We have earnestly contended with them on this subject—we have used arguments from reason and revelation to show the inconsistency of such an idea. And I ask, have they triumphed over us in this respect? Far from it; so far that they have fled and left the field; yea, there is not a single straggler left upon the ground that dares contend a moment for this doctrine, in its original absurdity. Where is the parent that can look upon his innocent offspring, before it shall have been defiled by the touch of withering guilt, and say, that child is "wholly inclined to evil"? Mother, look upon the unoffending, guileless babe of your bosom, and do you behold any marks of guilt upon its sweet countenance? Do you see the impress of Adam's transgression upon the face of the smiling infant which God has given you? Do you discover upon the countenance, or in the heart of that fond one, any stains of sin? O! tell me not—tell me not that our heavenly Maker has thus dealt with us! No, we are the workmanship of His hands who "hath done all things well."

Again—consequent upon the belief of total depravity was that of infant damnation. O! it is enough to make the heart bleed, to think upon the inhuman expressions which have been made in relation to the future existence of infants. Shall I repeat that old, and oft echoed sentiment and sentence, which was the belief of many of our fellow-creatures, but a few years ago? Who can think of the reiterated expression, that the "pavements of hell are lined with the skulls of infants not a span long," and not feel to thank Heaven that, by his blessing, such sentiments are gone, forever gone, or buried in the polluted hearts of those who still hold them? This, then, is another instance which we advert to, as evidence that "our enemy hath not triumphed over us." They contended for the truth of this doctrine; we for the falsity of it—they contended that it was a Scripture doctrine; we, that it was one of the cruel creeds of men. And, as in the other instances, they have abandoned the field; and are even ashamed to admit that they ever contested for so horrid a doctrine. Thus, "our enemy doth not triumph over us;" but rather, we—no, we boast not.

Again—the doctrine of the trinity has been, and still is believed by a great part of the Christian community. Our enemy has contended that it is a Scripture doctrine, plainly revealed in the Bible. But we have opposed them, and said, and shown, that it is not only in disagreement with the Scriptures, but contradicts reason and common sense. They admit that it is opposed to reason—that it is a profound mystery, and cannot be understood by mortals. We say, then, if it be a mystery to man, it has never been revealed to him, and consequently cannot be a subject of revelation. Besides, if it will not admit of reasoning, and is opposed to reason, then it cannot be a doctrine of God, for he has given us nothing unreasonable; but, on the contrary, the whole divine system is addressed to the reason and judgment of those for whom it was intended; and we are called upon to reason—to "bring forth our strong reasons." And we have done so, and presented them before the public, addressed our arguments to the judgment and intelligence of man, and supported our position by the word of unerring truth—by the declaration of Gospel revelation. And again, I ask, has our enemy triumphed over us in this respect? Have they gained a single point in the question? Have they not frequently been discomfited, and obliged to rally their flying forces? Have they not often been put to flight by the weapons of eternal truth, and been forced to take new ground, shift their position, and occupy what they supposed to be a more feasible situation? Where, then, is their victory? To be sure, we have not entirely vanquished our enemy in this contest; neither have they triumphed over us. But we have sowed the seed of truth in their ranks, and it has taken deep root, and is springing up in their hearts; and one after another is continually leaving the standard of our enemy and coming over to the Lord's side, and testifying to the weakness of the system of those who have long tried, and are still trying, but cannot triumph over us.

Again—Our enemy has long contended, and does still contend for the truth of endless misery for a part of the human family. This, also, we have opposed, do still oppose, and with the help of God, shall oppose so long as Heaven blesses us with life and strength. But the question again arises, have our enemies triumphed over us in the warfare upon this subject? We say not. Have not their ranks been deserted, and ours filled? Have they not frequently been obliged to change the position of their attack? And have not we maintained every inch of ground for which we have contended? Certainly. They once contended that man was to be damned for the sin of Adam. This, in connexion with total depravity, is now abandoned as untenable ground. They once held that endless misery was the penalty of sins committed in this life, and most of them still believe so; but some of them have made an advance step, and say, that the sins of this life are not sufficient to condemn a person eternally, but that "endless misery treads upon the heels of endless transgression"—that is, that man will be punished endlessly because he will sin endlessly. But in all their extraordinary movements, their rallyings, their shiftings, have they, in a single instance, triumphed over us? Have we not proved beyond all reasonable contradiction, that the goodness, and justice, and mercy of God all conspire to accomplish that for which we contend? Repeatedly have we done it. Have we not the prayers of our enemy for the success of the holy cause which we advocate? We have. Does not every benevolent soul respond the hearty amen to all such prayers? It does. And does not each kind and merciful heart in the world, aid us with its soul-felt wishes for its ultimate triumph? Even so. Thus, then, we are steadily and rapidly gaining the contest. And another evidence is this, that although our enemy is numerous, powerful, talented and warlike, yet, thank Heaven, they have not triumphed over us.

Again—Our enemy has claimed, and does still claim the triumph, on the ground of superior righteousness. They contend that their sentiments are best calculated to produce obedience to the law of God. We do not deny that they are calculated to produce a punctilious adherence to certain ceremonies which they say are the laws of God; neither do we deny that the doctrine of the Scribes and Pharisees had the same effect. But we do deny, that their system is better calculated to inspire obedience to God by fulfilling his requirements. This subject, however, has so frequently been discussed, and so familiarly explained and proved, that I need not here repeat the evidence, that the love of God, rather than the fear of him, inspires the best obedience to his law. But let experience speak on this subject, and we fear not the issue. Let a comparison be made between the conduct of those who believe in the universal goodness of God, and those who do not, and we fear not that our enemy will triumph over us.

Once more—Our enemies contend, that their system is the only one which gives consolation in the dying hour. My friends, is this so? Does your experience teach you thus? Go with me one moment, to the bed of the dying—there behold an emaciated mortal, writhing in the agonies of death—his spirit upon the very point of taking its flight to worlds unseen! Hear him exclaim in all the bitterness of despair—"I have sinned away the day of grace—it is now everlastingly too late—I am lost, forever lost—my soul must go down to the regions of unending woe!" This, my friends, is no fancied sketch of the imagination. It is reality—living truth, of which many of you can bear witness.

Go with me now to the house of the mourning—there witness the family group assembled around the last remains of a dearly beloved one, who has been cut down in the spring time of his years, and hurried to the abodes of death before he had experienced that change which our enemy think indispensable to the future well-being of the soul. See the father gaze upon the clay cold form of his child, and exclaim, "my son had not been born again—I fear that he is lost forever—that I must forever be parted from my child; and not only so, but I must be a witness of his wailings through the never-ending ages of eternity!" Hark! what are those low murmurings—that sighing—that sorrowing—those heart-breaking sobs—whence do they come? O! 'tis the mother's wail! She who had cradled the youth upon her bosom—she who loved the child with an affection stronger than death, and "which many waters could not quench nor floods drown." "Alas!" she cries, "he is gone—O, my soul! I fear he has gone where mercy never comes, but misery—unceasing woe will torment him forever! O, that I could suffer for him! willingly would I lay down my head in the pit of anguish, could I but save my child—my loved, my lost one!" But, no—she is not permitted to do it. She must resign her child to the cruel sports of demons, world without end! Is this the consolation in death, of which our enemy boasts? Is it thus that they triumph over us?

Go with me again to the bed of the dying man. See him languishing under severe pain—attenuated to a mere skeleton—hear, from the overflowings of a full heart, expressions of calm resignation to the will of Heaven—see him taking an affectionate farewell of his friends who are assembled around his bedside—bidding them not to weep for him; for he is going home to the abode of his heavenly Friend, where he shall soon meet them all, and all mankind, to part no more forever. And as his eyes grow dim, and his spirit, on soaring pinions takes its flight, he goes with the song of triumph in his mouth—"I come—Lord Jesus receive my spirit."

Attend with me again the house of mourning. Witness the family circle again around the last remains of a beloved object who has been cut down like a flower in Summer, before its full and opening beauties had been displayed—mark the tear trickling down those care-worn cheeks—hear the father, with eyes raised to heaven, say, "my child is gone—his spirit is fled, but the Lord hath done it. He gave him to us for a season, but as it seemed good in his sight, he has taken him home, where sin and sorrow are unknown." Hark! Do you hear those accents of resignation and piety? those outpourings of the full spirit? It is the mother. She says, "the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Like the good Shunamite woman, she says, "'it is well.' It is well with my child. Although he was dearer to me than my own life, yet 'thy will, O God, be done.' I shall soon follow my son to that heavenly home, where I shall meet him, and all the beloved ones of earth, and the whole family of man, there to enjoy peace, and rest, and bliss unknown before." With these feelings they deposit their hearts best treasure in the bosom of the earth, receiving that consolation from the holy truths of the restitution of all things, which this world can neither give nor take away.

And now, my hearers, has our enemy triumphed over us in this respect? Have we not reason, rather, to say—"By this we know that the Lord favoreth us, because our enemy doth not triumph over us."

SUMMER'S DEPARTURE.

BY MRS. A. F. STEPHENS.

The glory of Summer has departed. Its verdure and variegated blossoms have been changed and scattered, even by its own gentle breezes—and the garden is strewn with their sad, though still beautiful ruins. The last rose of Summer may linger yet a little while upon its parent stem—the sun may continue for a time to warm and invigorate the earth, but the desolate and lonely state of the one, and the pale, faint beams of the other, tell us, in language too plain to be misunderstood, that Summer has gone—that Autumn has come again; and that all nature will soon be clad in his sober liveliness.

Time has added another year to the list of by-gone ages, and borne us onward upon its tireless wing, a long space towards the tomb. Thus swiftly pass our years; they follow each other like the waves of the ocean, and we forget, amid the pleasures and the cares of earth, that they are speeding us onward to eternity—and that, however they may be spent, they can never be recalled.

Yes, the music and the beauty of Summer have departed. The gay-plumed warblers of the Spring have ceased their lays, and flown to brighter bowers, and more genial climes. The flowers have faded and died—the leaves have lost their freshness of green, and are already falling and withering around us. And oh, how many of the lovely and beloved of earth have, with the Summer's bloom, departed, and like the fallen leaves been laid low in the dust! They passed away with the flowers, but will they, also, like them return? The songsters of the grove will return, and again make vocal their woodland homes—the trees shall renew their verdure—the flowers put forth again in the Spring, and all nature be restored to life and beauty; but our departed friends, who "made spring-time in our hearts," will return no more to gladden their earthly homes—the places which once knew them, will know them no more forever.

Are we, then, of all our Creator's works, made most in vain? Is man, who alone can appreciate the bliss of being destined to float a brief moment upon its wave, and then to sink forever into darkness and unconsciousness?

"Shall we be left forgotten in the dust,

When fate, releasing, bids the flowers revive?

Shall nature's voice, to man alone unjust,

Bid him, though doomed to perish, hope to live?"

It cannot be! we are surely born for a better—a far more glorious destiny. Else, "why this inward horror, this secret dread of falling into nought?" Why these lofty aspirations—these eternal yearnings of the soul after wisdom and happiness, that earth can never give? That almighty Being who placed us here—whose paternal care is over all the works of his hands—who cherishes and protects the "least wing that flits along the sky," will surely continue to preserve and bless his moral offspring, the peculiar children of his love. And although "we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; yet doth God devise means, that his banished be not expelled from him." Although the "dust must return to dust," yet the spirit, like the bird of passage, will wing its flight to a purer and happier clime; where a boundless Summer smiles, and where, like the expanded rose, it will glow in full bloom and beauty, wearing all the hues of divine wisdom and love, and grow fairer and brighter throughout heaven's eternal year.

A CHAPTER OF DETACHED THOUGHTS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

1. Does a preacher or a writer ever refresh others—ever imbue others with a Christ-like spirit—a spirit of peace and joy, unless when he himself is refreshed—is under the influence of such a benign and "Holy Spirit"?

2. "We need not only to be reminded of our duties, but to be reminded in such a manner that we shall see and feel them, and be assisted in doing them." Unless reminded of our duties in a spirit of kindness—in a truly paternal or fraternal spirit, do we feel any assisted in the discharge of them? Does not the opposite spirit beget ill-will and repugnance?

3. "The first duty which parents owe to their children is self-examination. Are you what you wish your children to be? Have you that evenness of temper, that government over your own heart, thoughts, and actions which you would like to see in your children? Have you that justice, industry, and frugality which you desire your children to possess? Do you consider yourself at all times a proper example to your family?" If our heart condemn us when we put such questions to ourselves, our experience enables us to predict what must be the state of our feelings if we be too indolent to amend the deficiencies in our fitness for parents. We will have no peace, no joy, no self-satisfaction, no self-respect, but ever and anon, "compunctious visiting" and stinging regrets.

4. "As far as I see men walk in the spirit of love to God and one another, I feel an union with them, whether their particular sentiments are mine, or not." Thus hath spoken the venerable Hosea Ballou; thus may speak, for thus feels every man of strong, good sense, every man in whom the spirit of Christ is. Unity of spirit is felt; and O! for strenuous endeavors to "keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace."

5. "I have, be sure, great consolation in believing that my Redeemer has many faithful servants and loving disciples in the world, who do not believe in the extensiveness of salvation as I do, and often take great satisfaction in feasts of charity with such brethren. St. Peter was undoubtedly a lover of Christ and his Gospel, before he was taught by the sea of Joppa to call no man common or unclean. The rest of the disciples who were dissatisfied with his preaching the Gospel to the uncircumcised were doubtless possessed of the spirit of Christ, which caused them to glorify God when they had more extensive views of the Gospel through Peter's communications."—H. Ballou.

6. "The mother has the whole education of her children till they are three or four years old. During this time she may stamp a character, which will remain through life." How seldom is this undeniable fact pondered upon, or taken advantage of! If it were, how much might be done to improve the character of the rising generation by moderating the passions, restricting the appetites, and correcting the desires of the young in those families alone among whom these words may come. In Prov. xxii: 6, we read, Imitate a young man into the opening (literally mouth,) of his course; for, even when old, he shall not have departed from it. Mothers who wish to know how much it is in their power to accomplish in early childhood and youth, may learn the almost illimitable extent of their influence, for good or for evil, in Abbot's "Mother at Home"—an interesting and excellent work. Who could look with a peace-giving and proud satisfaction on the path of Washington, "shining more and more"? His mother. Yes, to her good sense and good discipline was he with the world indebted for the germs of those good principles which fortuitous circumstances developed and expanded.

7. Knowledge which we discover ourselves, is more acceptable and useful than that which others tell us. What an encouragement to think!

8. Food and clothing are not the whole of our wants. Wealth, neither in the pursuit nor the possession, is capable of communicating satisfactory happiness. Neither can prosperity, elevation, honours. Real enjoyment, soul-satisfying happiness depends upon, not our circumstances, but our mind. It must be elaborated within. "It is not sensual gratification that makes man happy, it is thought and love." This is one of the most prolific and practical thoughts on which we can ponder. "Let a man examine himself"; few will find it otherwise, we may say none. If true, let us take advantage of this lesson which our own experience teaches us. Let us endeavor to find interesting materials of thought, and to think with increasing vigor and energy. Let us endeavor to be found increasing in manifestations of the spirit of love to our Father and our brethren. In every such exertion we shall "taste and see that God is good," and that he hath provided for such small services "a great reward."

9. "The certainty that we shall enjoy the fruits of our own labors, is the first cause which operates as the civilizer of man; and he, who like the robber, would appropriate to himself the property of others, is doing all that his hand and heart can do in sending man back to the condition, the life, and sufferings of the savage."—District School.

10. "To take away a man's character or reputation is to take away his life: it is the foulest, blackest kind of murder. Man possesses no treasure so pure, so dear, so valuable as a spotless reputation; and he who would trifle with this is man's greatest foe. Evil speaking is very natural and very easy to the wicked heart."—Ibid.

11. "We are all very unwilling to make strong exertions for that of which we cannot see the use or value; and we are very dilatory in acquiring that which does not give immediate enjoyment, or by which we are not in some way immediately benefited."—Ibid.

12. HOW TO PRESERVE MENTAL VIGOR.—An old gentleman at the age of threescore and ten, still preserved his mental powers undimmed. Being one day congratulated upon this by a friend, who expressed his surprise at the fact, he replied, "My mind is like a sword: if left unused in its sheath it would become rusty. To prevent this, I continually burnish it with the sciences, and what it up every morning on two chapters of the Greek Testament."

13. There is no grief so dreadful as that which we dare not communicate; in which we can neither ask nor desire sympathy.

14. Good sense and gratitude, or a grateful spirit, are almost inseparable.

15. Milton has said that, "That education only can be considered complete and generous, which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices both private and public, of peace and of war."

16. The vulgar admire most what they are not familiar with, and what they are permitted to contemplate only at a distance.

17. Those whose qualifications are merely showy and superficial appear often to the greatest advantage.

18. We will often find a weak understanding and violent passions in the same individual.

19. It is almost impossible to form any conjecture concerning the motives which influence a capricious and irregular mind.

20. That which seems desirable at a distance, often affects us very differently when it meets our grasp.

21. Leisure, like other treasures, is best husbanded when least abundant.

22. Young people generally turn out well who have had a peaceful, happy home; who were nursed in the bosom of a family of love.

23. Of Sir William Jones it has been said, that truth and knowledge were the object of all his studies; his ambition, to be useful to mankind.

24. Habits of cleanliness, neatness, activity, attention, early rising, etc., etc., are more connected with our temper, disposition and happiness than is generally imagined.

25. Children are naturally active; and it is the duty of guardians of youth to direct this natural activity into proper channels; for if not so directed, it will find some channel for itself.

26. As long as people rest their claim to respect upon the grounds of upright conduct and unblemished virtue they will not fail to meet with the attention they deserve: The vain ambition of being esteemed richer or greater than we really are is a contemptible meanness, and will not fail to expose us to many mortifications.

27. Our reading ought to be well remembered, well digested, and ready for application.

28. Socrates loved the young, and all his hope of human improvement in the guilty age in which he lived, was from them, and by means of enlightening their eyes daily. Milton, who great as he was, "the lowliest duties on himself did lay," trusted to instruction adapted to youth to penetrate them with all good influences, and to advance the intellectual character of the age. Locke advises instructors to furnish the youthful understanding according to its wants and its relish.

UNCHRISTIAN CONDUCT OF SOME PROFESSED UNIVERSALISTS.—NO. 3.

INFIDELITY.

Universalism is said, by its opponents, to be nothing more nor less than infidelity in disguise! To prove this assertion, they appeal not to the publications of its advocates, or the preaching of its ministers, (for but few of them have ever listened to a preacher of "good tidings," and a still less number have ever read a Universalist publication,) but they point us to an advocate of infidelity, who, when asked his religious sentiments, calls himself a Universalist! Did this individual identify skepticism with Partialism, they would not hesitate to pronounce all who favor him with the least credit, destitute of charity, or even honesty. There may be a very few of the uninformed, and extremely ignorant, knowing just enough to credit all the misrepresentations of Partialist preachers, who do believe that Universalism is nothing but a disbelief in the Christian religion!

Let us ascertain the difference between Universalism, Partialism, and Infidelity. We will then be able to decide which of the two are most in accordance with each other. According to infidelity, Christ has not the power of redeeming an individual of the human family from sin and death. Partialism declares that he will only accomplish the salvation of a part of the human race, the rest of whom, he is either unable or unwilling to save. Universalism gives us the glorious assurance, that all things are given into his hands, even power over all flesh, and that he is both able and willing to bring all that are given him, unto him, in a way that they will not be cast out. St. John iii: 35, xvii: 2, and vi: 37.

Reader, which doctrine harmonizes the best with infidelity? Universalism, or Partialism? No greater difference can be shown between light and darkness, than exists between the principles of Universalism and infidelity. No person of ordinary understanding, can mistake one for the other.

That there are some who cloak infidelity under a profession of Universalism, evidence compels us to acknowledge. If any doubt this, let them visit the dwellings of certain individuals who call themselves Universalists, and the evidence of their skepticism may be discovered in the character of their books, pamphlets, or papers, which are filled with misrepresentations of the Christian religion. And these heralds of nonentity, are dignified with the title of "liberal publications"! They are also recommended to their families as worthy of perusal, and the glorious hopes which their contents afford, are represented as pearls of great price! Ask one of these individuals, what the religious sentiments are, of a person whom you know to be a deist, or an athiest, and you will probably be told that he is a Universalist.

How many such professors of Universalism would it take to convert the world to the pure principles of Christianity? As many as it would mountains of ice to convert an ocean into steam.

There may be, not only infidels, but also others, possessing immoral characters, who wish to be recognized as Universalists, with a motive to benefit the denomination by increasing its numbers. These people are mistaken in the means to be used, to facilitate the prosperity of Universalism. If they really desire its prosperity, unless they can believe and practice it, they will do well to retire from its service. Universalism can prosper only where its professors manifest their belief in it, and their attachment to it, by faithfully practising its principles. W.

LETTER FROM BR. SADLER.

Pike, N. Y. August 28, 1836.

Brs. SKINNER AND GROSH—After having travelled over the western country, and witnessed the moral wants of the people in that part of God's moral vineyard—the limited supplies possessed, and the prospective usefulness of an individual who may devote his attention and labors to the cause of Zion in that region, I have concluded it to be my duty to go thence, for the purpose of contributing my mite in aid of the holy religion we profess, and attempting to co-operate with others in advancing the Redeemer's reign in that part of the heritage of God. It is with extreme reluctance that I leave Western New-York, and bid farewell to the numerous friends whose friendship I have long enjoyed. Here I have spent my youthful days—here I entered the ministry of reconciliation—here I have devoted the best part of my life in the promulgation of the glorious Gospel of a world's salvation—here are many coadjutors who have been with me from the beginning; and many fellow-laborers that have since laid hold on the boughs of our flourishing palm tree to whom I am strongly attached by many endearing ties—here I have contracted lasting friendships and formed numerous acquaintances—here is a country I may properly call "home, sweet home," with which is connected many recollections and associations that serve to render it the land of enchantments agreeable and inviting. To exile myself from it, and all its endearments, is no small sacrifice—no very agreeable circumstance in the history of my life.

When I entered the ministry of Jesus, I gave myself and all that I had, to the cause of truth and righteousness; and pledged myself to the great Head of the Church, as a servant who would devote his life, his interests, and all things earthly, to the advancement of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. It is therefore my duty to devote my labors in the service of my Lord and Master, where they may prove the most beneficial. You are probably aware that I was designed to be a planter, to act as a pioneer to go before and prepare the way, leaving it to him who is mightier than I, that cometh after, to water the plants which our heavenly Father through my instrumentality shall have planted; and to build on the foundation that I shall have laid. There being many wise master builders in this region of country at present, it seems proper in the fitness of things, that I should leave affairs in the hands of my contemporaries, in order to commence operations in a more uncultivated clime.

Wishing all, grace, mercy and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, I bid them an affectionate farewell! intending to make the focus of my operations for a short time to come, at the city of Columbus, Ohio, to which place I wish all communications designed for me directed, till otherwise notified. Being something of a rambler, I expect to have no continuing city—during my earthly pilgrimage. But wherever situated under the providence of God, I hope and trust it will be my happy privilege, to be set for the defence of the Gospel.

Yours in the bonds of the Christian religion, and fellowship of the Gospel. L. L. SADLER.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Some two years ago, a Baptist preacher by the name of Clark came and settled in this vicinity, to the manifest gratification of the church. He being a spirited and eloquent speaker, multitudes ran to hear him. And being also apparently liberal in his views and manners, he succeeded in gaining the applause of many. It was supposed by some that he was, in sentiment, more Universalist than any thing else. But the charm has worn off, and the evil is now discovered in its dread deformity. He is no longer the dispenser of peace and good will—his sentiments are shrouded in mysticism—his language harsh and forbidding to all but those who "love to have it so." One circumstance may be worth noticing.

Mr. Gates, father of Br. Alvin Gates, late of Harford, N. Y., came to this place on a visit, was taken sick, and died July 22. He was a member of the Baptist church, but no doubt cherished sentiments which do not altogether agree with Partialism. Though he never made a profession of Universalism, yet he often expressed a satisfaction, when recounting the triumph of his son Alvin over his religious opposers.

Some days before his death, being confident he could not recover, he selected a passage of Scripture, and requested Elder Clark to preach from it at his funeral—1 Cor. xv: 51-57. But, horrible to relate! he avoided the main body of the text, and consequently much of the beauty and excellence of the subject. He dwelt principally upon the fifty-sixth verse. "Sin," "death," and the penalty appended to God's "law," were attended to with great earnestness—endless misery ran through the whole discourse. His address to the mourners was of a piece with the rest. "The impenitent, if there are any, must believe in the Gospel, (by which he no doubt meant Partialism,) or be driven down to an endless hell—and at the day of judgment they would be prised up with iron bars, and brought to the bar of God to be judged." The above is the meaning, if the phrase was not expressed in just so many words. Who would have been blamed, had he replied as did the foreigner, who, on hearing something very incredible, answered, "Fath, and I'm not sure o' that."?

CHRISTIANITY AND HUMAN IMPROVEMENT.

The Christian religion I conceive to be most intimately connected with the improvement of mankind, as well in mental attainments, and the social and political condition of our race, as in things of a moral and spiritual nature. It is a plant of heavenly origin, introduced into our world, by the especial agency of Him who framed man's nature, and designed his perpetual advancement in knowledge and virtue. Accordingly, it is a fact which any one may learn from observation, that though Christianity will live in any climate, it flourishes most in those regions where the common people are the best informed—though it will grow in any soil that is not wholly pre-occupied, it thrives best in the garden of intellectual refinement, cultivated by the hand of science—though it will bear fruit in almost any situation, it ripens the same in the greatest perfection, under the influence of the mild, and genial, and impartial beams of the sun of civil and religious liberty. JASON.

[The following very excellent essay by our venerable friend, Senex, may by many be deemed too political, and politically wrong, inasmuch as his views of tariff, patent and penal laws are in opposition to the common practice of all nations. But I am persuaded this will not lessen the pleasure to be derived from the other portions of his essay; and that even his views on these subjects are entitled to consideration and respect. He is not alone in them. Miss Martineau, celebrated no less for her philanthropy, than she is for her mature mind and literary excellence, is an advocate of the same general view of tariff laws, etc. As this paper is not designed for political matters, as such, these prefatory remarks are deemed necessary.]

UNIVERSALISM,

AS A SYSTEM OF PRACTICAL MORALITY.

Morals, either public or private, may be justly compared to rivulets, or streams of water, which are more or less pure, as the fountain they proceed from is pure. No turbid stream impregnated by noxious vapors, more surely makes deleterious every streamlet which issues from it, than do false ideas of moral excellence, contaminate the morals of communities or individuals of the human family.

Honor, a word of equivocal meaning, often guides the opinions, and influences the practices of the multitude; and hence the streams partake of the impurity of the fountain. Example, too often is assumed as a guide, and like an ignis fatuus misleads those who trust to its deceitful appearance. Example is a dangerous guide, and never fails to mislead those who implicitly follow it. It is with example as with advice; we can reap no benefit from it, unless we are qualified to judge of its value. Bad examples are pernicious by leading to the practice of vice; but the good are also sometimes hurtful, by limiting us in the practice of virtue. For unless the examples we propose to ourselves, are every way perfect, (and where shall we find such,) while we imitate them, nay, though we should in some respects excel them, our attainments must be low and defective.

For this reason, doubtless, the author of Christianity did not direct his disciples to imitate such an apostle, anchorite, king, or father of a family; but his command is "be ye perfect even as your heavenly Father is perfect." No one can attain what is truly great and excellent by imitation, unless the pattern itself be perfect and unlimited. Hence we may fearlessly assert, that the great standard of morality is the immutable will of God. Those who have the happiness to live under the light of revelation, are expected to make this their pattern for imitation.

The state of morals in all nations, partakes of, and is strongly tinged with the system of theology which is popular among them; and it is expected so to be, as the principles which govern the conduct of their deities, always, more or less become the pattern of their conduct in public or private life. Polytheism naturally tended to a confusion of ideas respecting this criterion; as amongst the multitude of deities, they were supposed to have different passions, and different motives; and expected of their votaries, different conduct and sacrifices.

Christianity, by laying the unity of the Deity, as a basis or first principle of theology, at once elected a perfect model, and a fixed standard of morals. For, by declaring him to be one being of peerless excellency, and requiring his creatures to imitate him, a standard of moral excellence was at once fixed, as the ultimatum of all which is great or good. But (as if destined to sink, that it might rise with superior splendor, to enlighten future generations, as the march of mind progressed) the standard of purity became debased; the unity of the Deity was changed into a plurality of persons, each having his office assigned to it in the destinies of men; the benevolence of the great Father was clouded with a settled malignity; his worship became a routine of forms, and observances, little calculated to warm the affections, or improve the dispositions. Morals, public and private, lost their purity, and became degraded, in exact proportion as the great standard of all truth became veiled in error, or obscured by human rites; and hence, may be easily accounted for, that laxity of morals which generally existed in the middle ages of Christianity.

Under the feudal system, plunder and murder were accounted heroism, if committed on the vassals, the person, or the castle of a neighboring baron with whom the plunder chanced to be at enmity. The hatred of these chieftains for each other, nothing ever appeased, but the silly homage of the vanquished, or the blending of common interests by intermarriages. The extermination of all infidels, was thus made the cause of the Crusades, or holy wars; Christians thinking the Deity had fixed his mark of malevolence on unbelievers, and suspended his laws of murder, so far as regarded their devoted heads. The belief in the partial benevolence of the Deity was the cause; massacres, plunder, and every act of demoralization was the effect. Their perpetration was begun with prayers, and finished with praises. Under Alexander the sixth, the eucharist preceded, and confession followed, murder. These false views of God weakened the charities of man for man, and hence persecutions for religion closely followed.

This corrupt theology caused despots and ecclesiastics to build prisons, and sink dungeons beyond the reach of the solar influence; it filled them with living beings, the victims of their caprice, or the impugners of their creeds; and incarcerated between walls of stone, and amid the damps of cells, they pined out their existence, without any more philanthropy extended towards them, than a vindictive deity was supposed to extend to his prisoners in a future state. They fed them—they kept them alive—but it was merely to prolong their sufferings.

Its effects on communities were a selfish monopoly of all the benefits to be derived from trade, or commerce; a jealousy lest any neighboring nation should enjoy any part of the advantages, except by paying for the boon; and hence the idea that all mankind are brethren, all entitled by nature to the same advantages, became lost; and laws called tariffs were made, and enforced by the sword. Narrow friths, and ridges of mountains, rivers, and oceans, became the boundaries of love and good will; and tyranny in the rulers, and a mean grovelling submission in subjects, became fixed. The same corrupted views of the plan of the great Governor of the universe, in all its ramifications—and streams of administration, were visible, were tangible in their effects on the penal laws; they were the cause of racks, tortures, and deaths of the most miserable description. None ever thought of punishment as a vehicle of reform, or hoped to excite virtuous feelings in a murderer or a thief. Why all these (now deplored) facts, which swell the page of history? The great principle and standard of the morality of nations was lost sight of, viz. the universal benevolence of the Deity, or what is at this era called Universalism; and a system of partial benevolence was adopted in its stead.

Let the Universalism of Christianity, as a system become popular in all communities of men—wars would exist no more; patriotism would be no longer bounded by rivers, or mountains, or seas; the prisoner would no longer languish in hopeless confinement, but would endure his period of imprisonment and labor on a more benevolent plan of punishment—one that would improve his morals—and the years of confinement would be limited by the visible signs of his amendment. The advantages and improvements of navigation, commerce, and the arts, would then be diffused abroad with as much care, and much more pleasure, than is now taken to procure patent rights, make tariff laws, or protect our commerce.

The mental improvement of the species, by the diffusion of literature through the medium of the press, has already brought the fate of the old, long practiced system to a crisis. Proofs of the universal benevolence of the common Father, multiply; proselytes to the heart-cheering, soul-expanding theory, are yearly brought in, in countless multitudes; and the fate of the old, and an establishment of a new order of principles, is clearly to be seen, as the natural development of the moral nature of man: and all the tyranny of the Russian autocrat, or the more mild plans of tyranny practiced by half renovated southern Europe; or the struggles of the clergy of the old school, in this land or elsewhere, cannot arrest its progress; their tenacity for the old system only accelerates their downfall, by provoking discussion, and consequently letting in new light on the public mind.

No less are the delightful effects of universal benevolence, visible in families. Where it is cherished by the heads of families, it descends like rivulets of the purest water to the different departments of the establishment, refreshing the weary, and cheering the else disconsolate lower members of the happy circle. It teaches the master to be kind and tender-hearted to his menials; teaches him to give ample compensation for services rendered: not to exact severe labor, or useless toils on any; but in humble imitation of Him who sends his rain and sunshine on the evil and the good, his benevolence is seen and felt by every inmate, however humble his station, or degrading his office. Its effects on the different members of such a happy family, are visible, and pleasing to contemplate. It teaches children obedience, by the law of love; the servants and laborers, faithfulness and attachment to their master, as individuals, whose integral services augment the sum of enjoyment and happiness of the whole family, being actuated by the great, the pure desire, to become fellow-workers with a benevolent Being, in the diffusion of peace, comfort, and happiness.

Its effects on the individual mind, are no less visible. It causes him to behold a brother in a foe; changes resentment for real or supposed injuries, into a solicitude to render good for evil, and thus subdues the spirit of revenge, or prevent the repetition of injuries. He makes the morality of the Deity his rule of conduct; he lights up his torch of philanthropy at the great Sun of universal benevolence; he acquires a greatness of soul, which the old system of Partialism in vain attempted to inspire in mortal bosoms; his morals are consequently pure, in proportion as he resembles the infinite Source of all excellence.

And neither, indeed, is this mere speculation, or theoretic declamation; for the mists left behind, and the heights already gained, are sure presages of meridian splendor. They give demonstrative evidence, that the present light is not the aurora of improvement, but that the sun of pure morality has actually risen above the horizon, illuminating every dark speck which the error in former theories had left, and is holding on his course to farther triumphs. It is not too much to hope, (at least the greatness of the hope is no proof of its impossibility,) that our beloved country, whose means are so ample, whose government has no sinecure places, no pensioners, no public debt to drain her almost exhaustless treasury, and consequently so little cause to exact duties or lay restrictions on commerce—that she may set a grand example of pure national morality, on the broadest principle; and establish that worthy of imitation, unknown, untried, but long desired system of pure, unrestricted commerce, and thus become an example yet to the world.

Thus will genuine republicanism in religion and government, cause pure benevolence to descend like a gushing fountain of the water of life, to the State governments; to the public institutions; to useful inventions; to penal enactments, and to public charities; until it reaches families, and individuals, in its unassuming but unimpeded progress; correcting whatever is wrong, purifying whatever is base.

MINUTES OF THE MURRAY ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS ON THE WESTERN RESERVE (O.) FOR 1836.

The delegates from the several societies and churches within the counties of Cuyahoga, Lorain and Medina, met at Olmsted, Cuyahoga county, (agreeably to previous notice of the committee appointed for the purpose of forming a new Association for said counties,) and organized the Council by appointing Br. D. TENNY, Moderator, and Br. N. Rice, Clerk.

Voted, That all the members present, residing within the limits of the proposed Association, take part in the deliberations of the Council.

Voted, That Brs. E. Leidy and J. Braman, visiting brethren be admitted as members of the Council.

Voted, That the committee of arrangement draft and report a Constitution for the future regulation and government of the Association. Whereupon a Constitution was reported, which with some amendment was received and adopted. (Owing to its length we dispense with its publication in the Magazine and Advocate, except so far as respects the name of the Association. It is to be known by the name of the Murray Association in the Western Reserve, in the State of Ohio.)

Voted to appoint Brs. E. Mallory, A. M. Coe, and C. Curtis to arrange the order of the services.

Sunday morning, August 28.—Resolved, That the Council appoint an agent to travel through the limits of this Association, to ascertain as far as may be, what amount of funds can be raised in each town, society or neighborhood, and report to the next adjourned meeting, in order that they may be supplied with preaching in proportion to their ability to sustain it.

Voted, That Br. H. P. Sage be said agent.

Voted, That Brs. D. Tenny, B. Hickox, and I. Tillison be a committee on fellowship and ordination.

The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Jesse Braman, of New-London. Accepted said report.

Voted. That Brs. B. Hickox, D. Tenny, and J. Braman, (clergy,) and E. Mallory, J. Dodge, T. Goodard, ——— Forbs, A. M. Coe, and N. Rice, (laymen,) be appointed to attend the Western States Convention at Belpre, Ohio, on Saturday preceding the third Sunday in October next, and request the fellowship of the Convention.

Received the First Universalist society in New-London, Huron county, into fellowship.

Voted, That Br. Nathan Rice, of Olmsted, be the Standing Clerk for the year ensuing.

Voted, That Br. J. Braman preach the occasional discourse at the next annual session.—B. Hickox, substitute.

Voted, That Br. D. Tenny prepare the minutes, accompanied with a circular for publication in the Sentinel and Star in the West.

Adjourned to meet at Brooklyn, Cuyahoga co., on the last Saturday and Sunday of November next.

D. TENNY, Moderator.

N. Rice, Clerk.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Leidy, of Palmyra; Sage, of Huntingdon; Tenny, of Carlisle; and Hickox, of Cleveland. The circular is omitted for want of room; it merely enumerates what may be known from the minutes.

UTICA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1836.

MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA;

Or the Ecclesiastical History of New-England, from its first planting in the year 1620, unto the year of our Lord 1698, in seven books. By the Rev. and learned COTTON MATHER, D. D., F. R. S., and pastor of the North Church in Boston, New-England. In two volumes. First American from the London edition of 1702. Hartford, 1820.

A few years since, the two renowned volumes above designated fell into our hands. Not having leisure at the time to examine them, we laid them by as a relic of bygone times that might, at some leisure hour, amuse as well as instruct the reader with the tales of New-England Puritanism, witchcraft, Indian wars, and divers marvelous events that happened to our pious ancestors in their early settlement of this country.

We were, a few days since, reminded of these old volumes by the perusal of an article in a late number of the Knickerbocker, on the renowned Cotton Mather: and taking up the second volume, we read with no small amusement and interest the author's very serious account of Thaumtographia pneumatica, in which he very circumstantially narrates the wenders of witchcraft witnessed by the New-Englanders, describes the manner in which the devil took possession of his victims, engaged them to enter into league with him, to sign a covenant with blood drawn from their own veins, rode them on poles through the air, administered the rites of baptism and the supper to them when assembled at their witch meetings, etc., etc. He is particularly careful to throw into his descriptions all "the pomp of circumstance" connected with these infernal revels, and with the most indomitable gravity maintains their solemn and lamentable reality. He says in one place—as though it were a crime of no ordinary magnitude to question the being and pranks of his satanic majesty—"Come hither, ye profane Saducees, that will not believe the being of a devil, for fear lest you must thence infer the being of a God. We will relate some things well known to prudent and honest witnesses: and when you have read this, mock on!" Well does the writer in the Knickerbocker remark, that "The public mind grew weary of persecution, (for witchcraft,) and those who had been foremost in the chase, finding that their weapons might be turned against themselves, retreated from the field; thus the people had a breathing time, to contemplate what was done; and never was there a change more thorough, from wrath and exultation, to remorse and shame. Not so with Cotton Mather. He persevered in his delusion, and lamented that the public feeling should go down. Moreover, he had the happiness to see that the visitation of darkness, though it had subsided elsewhere, still continued to follow him."

In the following extract our author gives a learned and biblical criticism on the Hebrew word translated devil, particularly describes the propensities of devils to dwell in the wilderness, and gravely assigns the reason why they came into the colony of New-England, viz. because they "felt a more than ordinary vexation from the arrival of those Christians with their sacred exercises of Christianity in this wilderness." But he laments that "the neighbors have not been careful enough to record and attest the prodigious occurrences (of witchcraft) of this importance which have been among us. Many true and strange occurrences from the invisible world, in these parts of the world, are faultily buried in oblivion." A most culpable and lamentable neglect, which no doubt abbreviated Cotton Mather's History full fifty per cent, and thus deprived the world of some most diabolical statistics. But to the critical extract in question.

CHAP. VII. Thaumtographia Pneumatica.

Relating the wonders of the invisible world in preternatural occurrences.

Miranda cano, sed sunt credenda.—

When two goats were offered unto the Lord (and only unto the Lord) on the day of expiation, among the ancient Israelites, we read that one of them was to fall by lot unto Azazel. Azazel cannot without some hardship on the sense, be taken for the name of the scape-goat itself: But it is no other than the name of the Devil himself, as might easily be proved from the monuments of the greatest both Jewish and christian antiquities.

In the signification of the word Azazel, there is indeed a notable declaration of those two properties that have signalized the devil; his being first a powerful, and then an apostate spirit. Fortis, Abiens, fugiens. The scape-goat, presented as a sacrifice unto the holy God, was order'd by him to be deliver'd up unto Azazel upon these two intentions. One design hereof might be to intimate unto the people what would be the miserable condition of them, who did not by faith in the Messiah get the guilt of their sins removed. They that have their sins lying upon them, and are led forth with the workers of iniquity, must become a prey to Azazel, even to Satan, unto whose temptation they did in their sinning yield obedience. And indeed our Lord has expressly told us (perhaps not without some illusion to this levitical goat) that he will send the goats which have their sins upon them, to be with the Devil and his angels.

But another and a greater design of it, might be to represent a main article in the dreadful sufferings which were to befall our Lord Messiah when he should come to suffer for our sins. When our Lord Jesus Christ underwent his humiliation for us, this point was very considerable in it; he was carried into the wilderness, and there he was exposed unto the buffetings and outrages of Azazel. The assaults that Satan then and afterwards made on our Lord Jesus Christ, producing a most horrible anguish in his mind, made such a figure in his conflicts for us, that they were well worthy of a most particular prefiguration. And one thing in the prefiguration must be, that the goat for Azazel must be sent into the desert. In the days of Moses it seems deserts were counted very much an habitation of devils: Yea, they really were what they were counted; and for that cause the names of Shedim and Zijim were put upon them; and when the scriptures foretel desolations to such and such places, they still make the Devils to be their inhabitants.

Who can tell whether the envy of the Devils at the favour of God unto men, may not provoke them to effect retirement from the sight of populous and prosperous regions, except so far as they reckon their work of tempting mankind necessary to be carry'd on? Or, perhaps, it is not every country, before which the Devils prefer the deserts. Regions in which the Devils are much serv'd by those usages, either in worship or manners, which are pleasing to them, are by those doleful creatures enough resorted unto. Yea, if sin much abound any where, some Devils entreat that they may not be sent from thence into the wilderness. But regions like the land of Israel, where the true God is continually pray'd unto, and where the word of God is continually sounding, are filled with such things as are very uneasie unto the devils: the devils often recede much from thence into the wilderness, as the devil of Mascon would say to Mr. Perreaud, the minister that liv'd in the haunted house, while you go to prayer, I'll take a turn in the street.

Thus to omit what Alexander Hales reports of one retiring ad loca destituta omni Habitatore, where spirits taught him the things which he wrote in his book de Magicis; we know that in Lucian the famous Magician Mithrobarzanes, with his companions betook themselves ex li chorian eremon kai ulodes, kai anelion, into a desert, woody, shady region, for a conversation with spirits.

Whatever becomes of the observation which we have hitherto been making, there has been too much cause to observe, that the christians who were driven into the American desert, which is now call'd New-england, have to their sorrow seen Azazel dwelling and raging there in very tragical instances. The devils have doubtless felt a more than ordinary vexation, from the arrival of those christians with their sacred exercises of christianity in this wilderness: But the sovereignty of heaven has permitted them still to remain in the wilderness, for our vexation, as well as their own.

Molestations from evil spirits, in more sensible and surprising operations, than those finer methods, wherein they commonly work upon the minds of all men, but especially of ill men, have so abounded in this country, that I question whether any one town has been free from sad examples of them. The neighbours have not been careful enough to record and attest the prodigious occurrences of this importance, which have been among us. Many true and strange occurrences from the invisible world, in these parts of the world, are faultily buried in oblivion. But some of these very stupendous things, have had their memory preserv'd in the written memorials of honest, prudent, and faithful men; whose veracity in the relations cannot without great injury be question'd.

Of these I will now offer the publick some remarkable histories; for every one which we have had such a sufficient evidence, that no reasonable man in this whole country ever did question them; and it will be unreasonable to do it in any other. For my own part, I would be as exceedingly afraid of writing a false thing, as of doing an ill thing; but have my pen always move in the fear of God.

After this solemn and formal exordium to the subject, our reverend author proceeds to a particular narration of a large number of cases of persons bewitched, or possessed of and in league with devils. We have not room here to present them, but perhaps may give our readers a treat, one of these days, by copying a few of them for their special edification. D. S.

THE RECORD.

It is perhaps well that the long neglect of furnishing this occasional feast of news, occurred at a season when there is not an ordinary supply for it; or in the present prospering state of our denomination, the reader would find nearly a whole paper filled with accounts of new societies, meeting-houses, preachers, etc., etc. "No news," it is said, "is good news"—and truly we have had but little bad news to communicate. What we have on hand, will be found so mixed up with the good as scarcely to be perceived.

CONVENTIONS.—The Maine Convention of Universalists met in Hope, Waldo county, Me., June 28. Br. Stetson, Moderator; Mrs. Averill and Forbes, Clerks. Br. D. Forbes was chosen Standing Clerk; Brs. G. Smith, D. T. Stevens and W. A. Drew, standing committee of fellowship and discipline; Brs. D. D. Smith, Thompson, Bates, Gardner, (ministers,) W. K. Weston, Gen. Wellington, Hon. J. Farrar, A. Lyon, Hon. C. Holland and Hon. J. C. Churchill, (laymen,) delegates to the United States Convention. A report from the Kennebeck Association was read, stating the cause to be, in Bath, not prosperous; society of thirty-six members, but no preacher and no meeting-house—in Greene, a society of twenty members, have a house, and an annual fund and subscription of about one hundred and forty dollars, and want a preacher—in Farmington, a society of twenty-nine members, have preaching one-fourth of the time by Br. Beede—in New-Sharon, a society of thirty-one members, are erecting a Union house, have preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Beede—in Madison, the society enjoys the occasional labors of Br. Forbes—in Mercer, society of twenty-one members, own one-eighth of a meeting-house, and have occasional preaching—in Fairfield, Universalists generally scattered, are building a Union house at Kendall's Mills, and have occasional preaching—in Strong, Philips, Chesterville and Winthrop, nearly the same—in Waterville, own a meeting-house and have preaching the whole time—in Augusta, the same—in West Waterville, own one half of a meeting-house, but no preaching—in Readfield (a large society,) Richmond (twenty-five members,) Bowdoin (thirty-five members,) Bowdoinham (fifty members,) and Wilton, the societies each own portions in meeting-houses and have preaching part of the time—in Belgrade, the same, but only occasional preaching—in Gardiner and in Lewiston the societies have preaching part of the time and are prospering—and in Brunswick the society owns a meeting-house and has preaching part of the time. The information is said to be very deficient. Brs. L. P. Rand, C. C. Burr, E. B. Averill and D. J. Mandell, were ordained; and Brs. R. M. Byram, G. W. Farr, G. W. Quinby, Abel Chandler and F. W. Baxter, were licensed; and the licenses of Brs. G. B. Thoms and M. L. Chase were renewed. It was resolved that the withdrawal from fellowship by Br. B. B. Murray be approved—(i. e., reciprocated?) A strong preamble and resolution against slavery was indefinitely postponed, and the following adopted in its stead, "Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, it is inexpedient to discuss the subject of slavery in our religious bodies." The committee on a theological seminary reported, "That, believing such an institution, though it might be a convenience in enabling candidates for the ministry to pursue their studies, yet regarding the dangers to the simplicity, purity and republicanism of the denomination, which they fear would result from such an establishment; they recommend that this Convention disapprove of a theological seminary, and that no further order be taken upon the subject." The subject was therefore referred to the consideration of the next Convention, and of the members of the denomination. Much other business was done, not important to our readers generally. Adjourned to meet in Turner, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1837. Sermons were preached by Brs. Stetson, Folsom, Thompson and D. D. Smith. Twenty-four preachers were present.

The Vermont Convention of Universalists met at Bernard, Vt., August 22. Br. Warren Skinner, Moderator; Br. Joseph Baker, Clerk. Appointed Brs. W. Skinner, H. F. Ballou, W. S. Ballou, H. Gifford, (ministers,) D. Rich, A. B. Child, J. H. Rice and S. Walbridge, (laymen,) delegates to the United States Convention—Brs. Baker, Gifford and E. Garfield, a committee of discipline—Brs. Haven, Bugbee and Loveland, a standing committee on ordination—Br. Haven to preach the last sermon, and deliver the addresses at the next session—Resolved, That each Association adopt measures to establish a high school or academy within its bounds, which shall be free from sectarian influence—and to recommend total abstinence from the use of all intoxicating drinks as a beverage. Adjourned to meet at Saxon's village, Rockingham, Vt., on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday of August, 1837. Sermons were preached by Brs. E. Ballou, H. F. Ballou, J. Moore, A. L. Balch, W. Skinner, K. Haven and J. E. Palmer. Twenty-three preachers were present.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Miami Association of Universalists convened at Milton, (or Amelia,) Clermont county, Ohio, August 20. Brs. B. Baldwin, Moderator, and John McKinney, Clerk. Six societies (Cincinnati, Palmyra, Amelia, Montgomery, Goshen and Todd's Fork,) were received into fellowship. Measures were adopted to form a State Convention, which would embrace societies in Pennsylvania and Virginia that might wish to join. Brs. B. Baldwin, P. J. Labertew and D. Snyder were appointed a standing committee for the ensuing year; the Chairman to be Corresponding Secretary. Six sermons were preached. Adjourned to meet in Edwardsville, Clinton county, on the third Sunday in August, 1837.

The Rockingham Association, met at Fpping, N. H., on August 21. Brs. Moses Ballou, Moderator; H. Jewel, Clerk. About twelve hundred persons were present, among them thirty-three preachers. The meeting-house was dedicated; sermon by Br. T. Whittemore. Sermons were preached by Brs. Paige, Cobb, J. Moore, M. Ballou, O. A. Skinner and M. H. Smith. A resolution on temperance was passed, and concerts of praise held, as usual. Adjourned to meet in Salem, N. H., on the last Wednesday and Thursday in August, 1837.

CONFERENCES.—A Quarterly Conference of the Grafton Association was held at Warren, N. H., August 3. It is said to have been a pleasant season. Sermons were preached by Brs. Sanford, P. Brownson and Adams. The Penobscot Conference met at Hampden, Me., August 10. Also a pleasant meeting. Sermons by Brs. Tasker, G. Smith, Baxter, Pingree and Stetson. Another, which we have not noticed before, was held at Elliotville, Cattaraugus county, this State, July 9 and 10. A church of twenty-eight members was formed, and the eucharist administered. The occasion was a pleasant and interesting one. Sermons were delivered by Brs. J. Todd, Fowler, Paine and Abell.

NEW SOCIETIES.—It is much to be regretted that our Editors, or their correspondents do not give dates in recording the formation of new societies. This by the way. New societies have been recently formed in Weymouth, South Adams and Winchendon, Mass.; Belfast, Calais, (of one hundred and sixty members,) Pittsfield, (in June,) Madison, (also in June,) Maine; North Norwich, N. Y., (in July;) Grave Creek, Virginia; Springfield, Ohio. Each of the last named are about to erect a meeting-house. A new congregation has been formed in Lowell, Mass., and supports preaching the whole time.

CHURCHES.—A church was recognized at Sterling, Mass., July 13th, and another at Ellicottville, in this State, same month.

AN INSTITUTE was recently formed in Malden, Mass.

NEW PREACHERS.—Conversions in the ministry come first. Rev. Philo Brownson, Methodist, of Bristol, N. H. Rev. James McKelvey, Baptist, of Palmyra, Ohio. Rev. Theodore Clapp, formerly a Presbyterian, now Independent, of the city of New-Orleans, has lately avowed his belief in Universalism, but it is likely he will not formally connect himself with our denomination. A German clergyman, name and denomination unknown, of the city of Philadelphia, has lately commenced preaching the restitution of all things to large audiences, in that city. He is said to be well acquainted, and to hold the same views with the celebrated Professor Tholuck, of Halle, Germany. H. H. Van Amringe, formerly a lawyer, and lately a Presbyterian theological student, of Westchester, Pa., has resolved to devote himself to the ministry of universal reconciliation. [By-the-by, some of our editorial corps have managed this name wonderfully; some putting it Ameringe, and another Arwinage! several as bad blunders, are committed weekly, "down East!"] The new preachers, beside those named in the proceedings of our Conventions and Associations, are Br. Hubbard, of Harris county, Georgia; Br. William S. Cilley, Dover, N. H.; and Br. Solomon Laws, who was lately pursuing his literary studies in Dartmouth College, now of Lebanon, N. H.

ORDINATIONS.—Br. Henry Jewel was ordained at Salem, N. H., August 24; sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner. In the afternoon of same day, two sermons were preached by Brs. F. A. Hodsdon and S. Streeter. Br. J. L. Watson, was ordained at Sheffield, Lower Canada, August 10; sermon by Br. J. E. Palmer. Br. E. Ballou preached in the afternoon of same day. For other ordinations see proceedings of Conventions, etc.

REMOVALS.—Br. Asher Moore, from New-London to Hartford, Conn. Br. E. Gage, from Northville, N. Y., to Bloomfield, Mich. Br. George Hastings, from Norwich, Vt., to Hyanis, Mass. Br. J. P. Atkinson, from Dover to Meredith Bridge, N. H. Br. P. Brownson, from Bristol to Wentworth, N. H. Br. O. Warren, from Pomfret to Newfane, Vt. (The Postoffice is Williamsville.) Br. J. W. Talbot has engaged to labor in Holliston, Mass. Br. F. A. Hodsdon, to Amoskeag, N. H. S. A. Sneethan, to Brunswick, and Br. George Thomes, to Naples, Me. Br. Sadler, to Columbus, O. (See his letter.) Br. M. B. Newell has accepted an invitation to settle with the society at Amsterdam, in this State, and will remove there in October.

MEETING-HOUSES.—One is being erected at Ellicottville, N. Y., and two in Hopkinton, N. H., one of them to accommodate the friends in Wear and Henniker. The Universalists in Sangerville, Me., have purchased one-fourth of the Baptist meeting-house.

DEDICATIONS.—Meeting-houses have been dedicated in the following places. August 3, in North Bennington, Vt.; sermon by Br. Williamson. In Epping, Vt. August 14, in Pittsburg, Pa.; sermon by Br. Davis. July 21, Methuen, Mass.; sermon by Br. T. Whittemore; and, same day, by Brs. O. A. Skinner and T. F. King. The house is fifty-five by forty feet, and contains sixty slips. It is all paid for. July 13, in Bedford, N. H.; sermon by Br. F. A. Hodsdon. The house is of brick and stone, forty by fifty feet, and contains forty-eight slips. A. B. G.

Will Mr. James L. Gage, of McConnellsville, Ohio, please act as agent for this paper?

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

In offering my views to the public respecting a theological seminary, the design was to draw attention to that interesting subject; and, at the same time, to furnish such reasons for the establishment of such an institution, as influenced my own mind. These reasons appeared in the first article published in the Magazine and Advocate on the subject. The article by Br. G. was such as to induce a review, all of which have successively appeared.

Another article was of course anticipated; but as there was little prospect of much new matter, no further discussion was intended at present. For we have not now to learn, that protracted controversies in religious newspapers on whatever subject, and however well or kindly conducted, are far from being very acceptable to the majority of readers. Let our readers then be assured, that whatever becomes of the theological seminary, those who discussed its merits in the Magazine and Advocate, have lost no friendship for each other.

But in taking leave of this subject for the present, it is but courtesy perhaps to notice the "personal matters," etc., which appeared in this paper of August 27th. In that, no less than a column and a half is devoted to a consideration of personalities, when probably no man, save the author of the article in question, had once thought of an existing personality on either side of the question. And as it cannot be interesting to others to read another article equally long on personalities—my best bow is made for the epithets of aged, experienced, talented, learned, etc., bestowed on me without mercy—while I express my admiration of the courage and intrepidity which could encounter such fearful odds.

As the last article from Br. G. on the subject of a theological seminary—is in reply to one from the undersigned—any examination of it would only induce the necessity of a continuance of the discussion, which is not demanded at the present time. S. R. S.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

Ill health and its attendant derangement in business, is our excuse for the delay in the notice of this deservedly popular work. The September number is now before us, and presents its usual variety of instructing, interesting and amusing matter—indeed, so far as the department of light reading is concerned, we think it excels in chasteness and purity of style some of its predecessors.

Of the articles which we have found time to peruse, we have been much pleased with one on Education—the first of a series entitled the "Portico," well written, and abounding in sentiments well worthy an American periodical—and the "Victims of Consumption," by the author of "American Society"—"Ollapod" is as interesting as usual in his sketches of travel westward—the author of "Life in Florida" must have the organ of mirthfulness largely developed; yet he is not confined to that style of writing, as will be seen by the following description of an Indian murderer, which shows that even the savage cannot escape from the gnawings of a guilty conscience. He says:—

"But the mark of Cain was then on him. He doubled and turned in the swamp, and for a time escaped. He travelled night and day to a white man's house, with the owner of which he exchanged his rifle for a shot-gun, and bought buckshot, as being a more certain defence for one against several opponents. But no man was ever more miserable than this guilty murderer. He knew the law, and that he must certainly die, if ever he returned to his tribe. In every rustling leaf he looked for his executioner; and truly he died a thousand deaths in fearing one. He became nervous, and his eyes glaring and restless: he left the territory, and wandered North among the white men; but no rest could he find. After being thus an exile for a year or two, he came back, delivered himself up, and was executed."

If any of our readers who have not seen this work wish to obtain a better idea of it than this notice affords, let them subscribe for it forthwith. They will get the worth of their five dollars.

PRIZE TALES AND ESSAYS.

PREMIUMS OFFERED AMOUNTING TO $66.

Still anxious to merit the patronage hitherto bestowed on them, and, if possible, an increase of patronage for the future, and by further improving this paper, render it more useful in the cause of God and humanity, the subscribers offer the above named sum of SIXTY-SIX DOLLARS,

(all they feel able to offer,) in premiums for essays and tales, on the following subjects and conditions.

1. For the best essay, on the best practicable means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism—Twenty dollars.

2. For the second best essay on the same subject—Ten dollars.

3. For the third best essay on the same subject—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one year—or one, for two years.

[It is designed that the essay shall embrace the best means for teaching the principles of the Gospel not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent.]

1. For the best religious tale, embracing an illustration of the principles of Universalism—Twenty dollars.

2. For the second best tale, of the same character—Ten dollars.

3. For the third best tale of the same character—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one, or one for two years.

[The especial object or aim of each tale is left to the writer—but there must be one stated, worthy the principles embraced in it.]

Each essay and each tale to exceed three columns of this paper, in the largest type now used for matter in it; and not to exceed fifteen columns of the same.

The articles to be sent to the undersigned, free of postage, on or before the 10th day of December next, for submission to the decision of an impartial committee, and the after disposal of the proprietors of this paper. To do this properly, each essay or tale should be designated by one or more marks or mottos, and those marks or mottos should be enclosed in a separate paper, sealed, with the author's name within—this enclosure will not be opened until after the decision of the committee has been made.

In deciding on the claims of the various articles that may be submitted for premiums, the committee will be instructed to proceed in the following order with each.

1. Its adaptation to the object for which it is written. 2. The Christian feeling and spirit it breathes. 3. Its literary merit and finish. 4. Its grammatical accuracy and plain expression. 5. Its preparation for the press. 6. Its legibility in the manuscript. The article having the greatest number of these requisites, in the highest perfection, and in the order here named, (if coming under the conditions previously laid down,) will be preferred to all others. Those greatly deficient in them will be rejected altogether, even if they are the only articles of the kind that are offered.

The awards of the committee will be published in number one, volume eight, of this paper, with the names of the authors of the several preferred articles, and one of the articles pronounced the first best of their respective classes.

POETRY.

THE CHILD AT PRAYER.

'Twas Summer's eve—the rosy light
Had faded from the sky,
And stars came twinkling, pure and bright,
Through the blue arch on high;
The western breezes softly stole,
To kiss the sleeping flower,
And nature wore her sweetest smile,
To bless the twilight hour.

There sat within a curtained room,
A mother young and fair—
What voice comes softly through the gloom?
'Tis childhood's voice in prayer;
A cherub boy is kneeling now,
Beside that mother's knee,
She who had taught him when to bow
Before the Deity.

A father on the distant deep,
A sister slumbering near,
A babe upon his mother's breast,
And that kind mother dear:
For every living thing he loves,
His prayer ascends to heaven,
And for himself he humbly asks,
Each sin may be forgiven.

And oft, in after years, when grief
Shall bow his spirits down,
And the world, the cold and bitter world,
Shall meet him with a frown;
Or when allured from virtue's path,
He treads a dangerous way,
Oh! he will turn to this blest hour,
When first he knelt to pray.

And the kind hand which then was laid
Upon his silken hair;
And the soft voice which taught him first
His simple words of prayer;
Will come again with thrilling power
To still his pulses wild,
And lure him back in that dark hour,
As silent as a child.

The prayer is o'er, the last fond kiss
By that kind mother given;
But rises not from scene like this,
That childish prayer to heaven?
It does, it does, an angel's wing
Has borne its tone with joy,
And th' earnest blessing which is sought
Comes on the sleeping boy.

THE CHANGES OF LIFE. DEATH—IMMORTALITY.

When at eventide we pause to take a retrospective view of that portion of our lives over which we have already traversed—to look from the commonness of present existence away to the far and beautiful lingering places of by-gone hours—over which no shadow has gone—but which meet us from the past like a bright vision, which we scarcely believe to have been real—so ethereal—so unblended with aught that is earthly do they appear in the mellowing purple, which memory sheds round them from her enchanted vase—how thrillingly does that passage of the poet come home to our hearts, that "Time o'er all below has written change."

Every day—every hour—every moment of our lives overflows with incidents bearing irrefragable evidence of its truth. Experience of the past has traced the dark lesson upon our hearts, that the treasure which we today deem as requisite to our existence as its life blood, may to-morrow be torn away from us forever. Recollection calls up from its fading diary, those whom we have loved—whose very names once thrilled our hearts like a melody—and who lingered in all our thoughts like "bright particular stars," and we question ourselves "where are they?" Alas the answer! many a kind heart rests in the cold shroud of earth's final resting place! with some we have exchanged an eternal farewell! others we meet with an unquicken pulse, which tells us that every spark of the pure flame which once burned on the altar of our hearts, has been forever quenched by the dark waters of treachery and unkindness. We look around us, we see those to whom we are yielding up our dearest affections—whose forms our eyes ever follow with prayers and blessings—whom we feel we could clasp closer and closer to our hearts, as the whirlwinds of life waxed stronger and stronger, to tear them from us, and even while we linger by their side—while their voices murmur in our ear, and we feel their warm breath upon our brow—the thought that death will ere long raise its gloomy impregnable barrier between them and us, never to be removed in time, comes to our hearts like a winged and keenly pointed barb! "Death is always terrible!" Neither change of time nor place can divest it of its terrors. The sailor who pillows his dying head upon his rude hammock breathes up a fervent aspiration to the Father of his spirit, that he may once more gaze upon the green and unshadowed haunts of his childhood ere he closes his eyes in the slumber that is never broken! The drooping and delicate flower that fades away from the earth with the unobscured melody of the silver rills where she has lingered from infancy, ringing in her ear, would exclaim

"I am content to die, but oh! not now."

The youthful warrior who at sunset makes his dying couch among the torn banners and trampled armory of battle, looks up to the pale still stars that are streaming their holy light upon the marble faces of the dead by which he is surrounded with a deep and burning prayer, that life may yet realize the dreams of glory, that have that day swept over his fevered brain. The matured conqueror, who during a whole lifetime, has been diligently toiling up the wearying cliff of fame, until he has gathered the green laurels at its pinnacle, to enwreath a brow that the shadows of death are already darkening, would earnestly crave the boon of a few years in which to enjoy his hardly earned honors. Search where we may—look where we will upon death—we ever find men shrinking from entering its dark portals. In spite of the gloomy philosophy of the misanthropist we all find enough of blessings—enough that is beautiful and desirable in life, to induce us to cling to it with the strongest tenacity. Each season has its own peculiar charm to interest—nay to delight. How melancholy is the thought of death in Summer—when every thing around us is joyous in life! when the sky bends o'er so softly, so thrillingly blue—when the far hills fling their green wreaths over the crystal fountain—when the waters at evening sleep in star-gathered beauty—and when wave, and flower, and cloud seem to have won a haleness and charm around them from some high region of loveliness—the thought that we alone are changing—we alone are fading—that earth will wear no sable token when we are gone—but array herself in the same glittering coronal, and flower enameled drapery, when our hearts have mouldered to renovate its loveliness—is a dark, unwelcome truth! In Winter and Autumn—although the glad and living dreams of Summer are withered—yet there is many a fountain left to swell sweet waters over the heart! The bright pictures of joy that during the past season were diffused over every thing around us, are then concentrated into the heart's little world of affection—the radiant fire side girdled by the beautiful forms and unshadowed brows of loved ones—

"They that with smiles light up the hail,
And cheer with song the hearth."

During hours like these, what moment might we find in which to school the heart for death, were it not for the unfading hope of another and fairer world, where death may not enter. Praise be to the Father of our spirits, we can look through the storm of death to the unshadowed rainbow of immortality which brightens the darkness of the grave from the holy pages of inspiration! The spirit of the Redeemer in rising has dropped a star from his diadem to pour light over the tomb forever!—Sun.

MARRIAGES.

In Farmington, on the 4th of July last, by Rev. K. Townsend, Mr. JACOB BOWERS, to Miss SOPHIA SAYLES, daughter of Peter Sayles, all of Victor, Ontario county.

In Victor, on the 16th of August last, by the same, Mr. LATHROP B. REED, of Cleveland, Ohio, to Miss ALICE WOODEN, of Gates, Monroe county, N. Y.

At Erieville, on the 13th inst., by Rev. O. Beckworth, Mr. HORATIO D. WHITNALL, to Miss HARRIET HERRON, daughter of Dr. John Herron, both of that place. The happy pair did not forget the printers' palate.

In Ellicottville, August 21st, by B. P. Mason, Esq., Rev. PHILIP P. FOWLER, to Miss MARY B. MASON, all of that place.

DEATHS.

In Victor, on the 24th of July last, WALLACE, son of Silas and Mary Borghton, aged 9 months.

"Happy infant, early blest, Rest, in peaceful slumber, rest."

The funeral was attended on the 15th, by the writer, and a number of friends and relatives attended to sympathize with the sorrowing parents. May God bless them, and grant that they may largely participate in the consolations of the Gospel.

In Victor, on the 15th of August last, LAURA BROOKINS, wife of Calvin Brookins, aged 42 years. In her death her friends, the community at large, and above all her children and husband, have sustained an irreparable loss. Mrs. Brookins was formerly an Arminian in faith, but by searching the Scriptures, her hope and her confidence were enlarged until they finally embraced the whole human family. Through the influence of that faith, she lived the life of a devoted, humble Christian; contemplated her departure without a doubt or a fear, and peacefully resigned her spirit to the God who gave it. The writer saw and conversed with her but a short time previous to her departure—she spoke of her confidence in God, her resignation to his will, her anxious desires for the spread of the knowledge of the truth. Her funeral was attended on the 16th at the Universalist church, and a large number of sympathizing friends listened to the consolations of the Gospel. To the kind care of an overruling, superintending Providence, we would commend them all, especially our bereaved brother and his sorrowing children. K. TOWNSEND.

In North Perry, Ohio, on August 31st, of liver complaint, JOHN RICHMOND, Esq., in the 60th year of his age.

In Brooklyn, Pa., on August 25, Mr. LODONICK T. BAILEY, son of Col. Frederick Bailey, aged 25 years. He had been absent five years, and but recently returned to the land of his nativity. A few days before his death, he was attacked with fever, but was not considered in danger. The immediate cause of his death was the rupture of a blood vessel. Beloved and respected in life, he is deeply lamented in his death, which was a peaceful passage to a better world. The consolation of the Gospel was tendered by the writer to the mourners and a large congregation of sympathizing neighbors, from 2 Cor. v: 1. T. A. BARTHOLOMEW.

In Atlas, Pike county, Ills., on the 6th ult., Dr. HENRY I. ROSS, in the 47th year of his age. With the deceased, most of the inhabitants of this and the adjoining counties had become in a greater or less degree acquainted—he having been a permanent resident of this place for more than fifteen years; and I feel justified in presuming, that during all this time he never had a personal enemy, unless, indeed, it was in consequence of his well known moral virtue, firmness and unwavering integrity. His house was always a home for the stranger and the tempest-beaten son and daughter of misfortune, and his fireside was ever rendered the more delightful by his happy presence, very instructive conversation, and useful advice. It may with propriety be said, that he was one of the main pillars of the society in this place. It is a source of great consolation to his very amiable companion in life—to his relatives and all who knew him, to know that he died as he had lived, full of the hope of a glorious immortality, not for a few, but for all mankind.

His funeral sermon was delivered by Rev. Mr. Wolfe, on the 14th, to a large concourse of sympathizing friends, from 2 Tim. i: 9. G. K. W.

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC, FOR 1837.

Will be ready for delivery at this Office, next Monday; at the Office of the Magazine and Advocate, Utica, by the last of next week; and early in the week after, at Cooperstown, at the house of Br. O. Whiston. A quantity will be forwarded to Br. Price, New-York, in time if possible for the United States Convention. The packages for Brs. Thomas, L. S. Everett, and S. A. Davis will be forwarded immediately.

The nature of the work renders it necessary that those, who wish to circulate it should supply themselves immediately. Will they have the goodness to address themselves to either of the above persons? The following are the contents of the work:—Introduction—Plan of Government—Universalist Profession of Faith—"Search the Scriptures"—Universalism no new doctrine—Strange things—Beginning and end—Astronomical Calculations, (the calendar filled with Scripture pertaining to Universalism.)—Object and End of Man's Existence—The Alternative, embracing three propositions and showing conclusively the salvation of all men—Belief and Unbelief—Names of all the preachers in the United States and British Provinces and their locations, alphabetically arranged in their respective States—Names of New Societies and Meeting-Houses since our last publication—Names of all the Conventions and Associations with their time of meeting and organization, arranged in their respective States—Recapitulation, stating the number of New Preachers, Societies, Associations and Meeting-Houses in the United States since our last publication—Universalist Periodicals, their terms, etc.—The Best Side—Hope—Notices, etc.

Though less in size, being thirty-six pages, the work contains more matter than our last for 1836, and is better calculated for distribution among our opposers.

Price—$4 per hundred, 63 cents per dozen, 6 cents single.—Herald of Truth.

Universalism, as a system of Morality.

BY REV. O. ROBERTS.

That man who properly estimates truth and godliness cannot desire to embrace and defend an error; nor will he retain an error which he may have embraced, when he is convinced that he has embraced one, but will unhesitatingly renounce it, and thereby give conclusive evidence of his Christian candor and moral honesty, and set an example which every Christian will ardently desire to imitate. And may those into whose hands this essay may fall, follow the dictates of religion, in respect to the plain and universally admitted truth in the above statement. It is for those, and those only, this essay is written, and whom alone it will benefit.

In the sincere desire of having the reader take a mental walk with me in the delightful path of honest inquiry after truth, and of bringing him to embrace and ardently defend the same, I proceed to show

1. That man is an imitative being—he copies examples rather than precepts. We see manifested in the first smiles of the helpless infant, in the gayety and mirth of youth, and through all the stages of man's earthly existence, a natural propensity to imitate. This being admitted, it appears

2. That man must have something to imitate. And it is the duty of every professing Christian to set before man, in word and deed, an example, the imitation of which will assimilate us to God, the pattern of all perfection. For man will imitate something, either a good or bad example; and it would be no marvel if he should imitate both. The Author of our existence gave us such a constitution as his wisdom saw would be best. He created us with this propensity to imitate, and has not failed to reveal such a character, by himself possessed, as is worthy our strictest imitation.

Now, if the doctrines of men have represented his character as being what we cannot imitate, without violating what our own judgment and the examples of Christ teach us is just and right, we are required not to imitate it, nor receive it in faith as the character of our Creator.

What, then, does the doctrine of Universalism teach? It teaches that God is our Father; that he possesses every possible perfection without increase or diminution. It represents him as exercising a father's kindness, love, benevolence and compassion, and providing for the spiritual wants of his children with a father's care, never leaving them without a witness that he designs, provides for, and is all powerful to effect their and the world's universal good. Yet he exercises these adorable principles in an infinitely higher state of perfection, than an earthly parent does or can do.

Now, which will have the best influence in preparing the heart for moral obedience and religious homage, to teach the irreligious that "all have one Father," possessed of that perfect parental character just described; or to teach him that God is not his Father? Can this teaching, that God is his Father, induce immoral action or create irreverence of Deity? How it can, I am unable to conceive. This is the teaching of Universalism. And such a sentiment is adapted to the wants, circumstances, and moral condition of mankind. And instead of preventing our imitating that best of all patterns, the character of an all-wise Parent, it will persuasively lead us to imitate him as dear children; inspire us with filial affection, and constrain each of us to say with pious David, "My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord." This parental character, this holiest, most perfect, most inviting of all exemplars, Universalism presents for our imitation.

What can be more kind and endearing than the character of a parent? In it is included all that the benevolent heart can wish. In it we may discover a love, fadeless as the bliss of angels, and enduring as immortality; a benignity which cannot be cruel; a faithfulness which can never tire; a wisdom which cannot err; a provident care which cannot be inconstant; a munificence which cannot be partial, covetous or illiberal; for God, who is our Father, "giveth to all men liberally," and "openeth his hand and satisfieth the desire of every living thing."

What other character shall we present, the imitation of which will be a more plenary fulfilment of every moral duty enjoined upon man? Shall we tell the sinful of every description, that God is not their Father? Of what avail would such instruction be, in our attempts to reform them? It will have a natural tendency to harden them in their sins, or prevent the exercise of that cherished gratitude and affection which every one will be induced to exercise, who believes that God is his Father. Shall we attempt by our descriptions, to orphanize the world, that we may make it wiser and happier? Look to the effect of atheism, and you will find an answer written in the negative, and over which the heart of sensibility will bleed. The atheist believes he has no spiritual Father; and does this belief make him wiser and happier? Heaven knows it does not, and our reason teaches us it cannot. Shall we, then, believing in the existence of God, tell the sinner that he has no heavenly Father, and thus prevent his imitating God's parental character, by which he would become wiser and happier?

Turn to the Scriptures, and ask the inspired servants of the Lord, if they gave us this example for our imitation. Ask Christ, and he will teach you to say as he did other fallible beings, "Our Father." Ask the prophet Malachi, and he will interrogatively reply, "Have we not all one Father?" And if you wish to know his unchangeability as a Father, ask Isaiah, who inquires if the compassion and tender affection of God were restrained, and then confidently replies to the inquiry himself, by saying, "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not." And to know the unflinching strength of his paternal character, ask the same prophet, and he will tell you that, Though a woman may forget her infant child, so that she will not have compassion on it, yet God, our heavenly Father, will not forget. And to the same truth will David add, "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." And what can I say more, to add to the excellency of his paternal character, or to show the superiority of the belief to an unbelief of it?

Believing in God as possessing this character, we must believe that all he does and requires is just, and that we are under obligation to imitate his character. But a question of importance will arise, "What is just?" Here I shall present a question which may appear childish, but our after considerations demand it, notwithstanding. Can that be just which is opposed to justice, or in opposition to the demands thereof? No man possessed of a common share of sense will answer, yes. Now deserved punishment being just, an exemption from deserved punishment is not just; for it is in opposition to what justice demands. I put the question then, and every virtuous principle demands of you an answer, Is that exemption just, which prevents justice being done, or, which is directly in opposition to the requirement of justice? There is, there can be but one answer, and that is, No. For it is as plain that what is the opposite of justice, is injustice, as it is, that what is the reverse of virtue, is vice.

The above answer being so obviously true, that it requires no further labor at my hand to prove it so; and it being here at once so plainly discovered that the doctrine which teaches an exemption from a just and deserved punishment, is unjust and false; I will now proceed to show the effect of that doctrine and its opposite.

I shall here state, without the fear of contradiction, that a doctrine which is unjust and false, cannot produce a good effect. And the doctrine here in question cannot be proved just, unless it can be proved, that what is opposed to justice is just: a work which no man will attempt to perform.

A man who defrauds his neighbor, or steals his property, wishes to escape the deserved punishment which he thereby incurs. And this doctrine teaches him that he can have his wishes, in this respect, gratified. When there is little fear or dread of consequences, there is but little exertions made to prevent deserving them, or to refrain from committing acts which will produce them. So a man will be encouraged in his sinful practices, by expecting an escape from punishment deserved therefor; and the greatness of his encouragement will be proportioned to the strength of this expectation. For I imagine I can hear him whispering to himself, If God will act contrary to the requirement of justice, by delivering me from a just punishment, I am willing to be God-like by acting contrary to the requirement of justice in theft, fraud, and other sinful acts. Thus instead of being restrained, he is actually encouraged in his sinfulness, by the example which this doctrine teaches him God sets before men.

Universalism teaches him, and would earnestly teach every transgressor, that the Scriptures unequivocally declare God will punish the wicked, and "render to every man according to his deed." That is, he will render to every transgressor a justly deserved punishment, as well as reward the virtuous with happiness. They also testify that, "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished;" and that "God will by no means clear the guilty"; neither by means of repentance, confession, nor promise of obedience will he clear the guilty from deserved punishment, or the demands of justice—though by reformation he may be saved from the punishment which he would deserve, were he to persist in his wickedness. Now nearly if not quite every transgressor expects, by some means, to escape deserved punishment; and as though God had designed to show man that this expectation was a delusion, by which thousands have been gulphed in woe, he says he will by no means clear the guilty. This exercise of his justice, which consists in his not, by any means, clearing the guilty, is consistent with the rectitude of his moral government. And I know of no man who has ever had or ever will have the wickedness and folly to assert, that God would be unjust, by rendering to transgressors a just punishment. Hence Universalism is true in respect to the idea, that every transgressor shall receive an adequate punishment. And this doctrine teaches that, since God is just in acting upon the principle of rendering to all their dues, without respect to persons, individuals, families and nations, are bound by the strictest moral obligation to imitate him, or "go, and do likewise." And as he never, in any instance, swerves from this principle, so should none of his creatures; but they should, in every instance, render to all their dues, or that which they conceive to be for individual and general good collectively; and not, in any instance, act contrary to the demand of justice. They will then be practicing Universalism, imitating God, and following what "he hath shown man" to be "good," and what he hath required of him, "to do justly."

Hence, acting upon this principle, and urging its strict observance, is adapted to the wants of men; to the moral requirements of God; to the best interest and welfare of individuals, families and nations. It is the best, nay the only principle which can effectually promote peace, order and happiness among men. For were not this principle of rendering to all their dues, and thereby not acting contrary to the demand of justice, strictly adhered to and acted upon in the enactment of laws, and in the government of families, communities and nations; injustice, anarchy and misrule would drive peace from the domestic circle, order from nations, and deluge the world in tears of woe.

But, it may be said, will not the sinner be as likely to be restrained, by being taught, that some of the wicked will be punished endlessly, and that he may be among the number; as he will to be taught, that all shall, without fail, be fully and adequately punished for every transgression, and that that punishment is not endless? In reply to this inquiry, I shall present the saying of the Marquis Beccaria, a Milanese General. He says, "crimes are more effectually prevented by the CERTAINTY than the SEVERITY of punishment. The CERTAINTY of a SMALL punishment will make a stronger impression, than the fear of one more severe, if attended with hopes of escaping." To prove this assertion true, I shall appeal to the experience of the reader. Have you not oftener been prevented from violating the command of your parents, by the certainly of being punished for violating, than by the severity of the punishment threatened? I feel the fullest assurance that you will answer, yes. Look to that family wherein the severest punishment is threatened for disobedience, and where threatenings are seldom executed, and you will there find full proof upon this point. Those children who are often threatened, and threatened with the most excruciating chastisement, and who seldom have those threatenings executed upon them, are among the most disobedient; and the reason is, the uncertainty of the threatened chastisement. We should not think that parent wise, or just, who should institute means by which his children might escape in every instance of transgression, a just punishment. There is no parent in the world who has done it, or ever will do it; for every parent knows that it would not be consistent with the best interest and welfare of his children; since they will always calculate to use those means, to escape punishment. Here punishment is uncertain, and its uncertainty furnishes encouragement to disobedience, as well as in the before-mentioned case. All those means which lead men to expect an uncertainty of receiving threatened or deserved punishment, are unjust; since they will, instead of restraining, encourage disobedience. The school-master, if he often threatened his pupils, and even threatened them with severity, and did but seldom execute those threatenings, would not be likely to succeed well in the government of his pupils. They would even laugh at his measures, and refuse obedience.

Hence, it is obvious, that "crimes are more effectually prevented by the CERTAINTY, than the SEVERITY of punishment."

Not only is the severity of endless punishment, itself, abstractly considered, less restraining than the certainty of an adequate punishment designed for good; but also the nature of endless punishment. Punishment which is not designed for, and does not produce some good, is an evil. And since endless punishment does not reform, and cannot therefore produce any good on those who suffer it, it is an endless evil; yea, it is revenge and cruelty! This expression may sound very unpleasantly in the ears of some. But, reader, are you not willing to have it made appear true, since you cannot love the idea of endless misery? Do not, then, be offended at this expression, and I will show you that it is true, even from your own admission. Has not the world been taught that God will punish the sinner without mercy? Or, in other words, have we not been taught that justice is opposed to mercy? that the one consists in punishing the sinner endlessly, and the other in exempting him from that punishment? Yes. What is opposed to mercy must be cruelty, and if cruelty, revenge. Hence it appears that what I stated is true.

It is not easy for the sinner to conceive how any good can result to him from being endlessly punished; and he is even taught by those who believe in endless punishment, that there can be none. If, then, he can see no good in it; if he sees that God has no higher and purer regard for his children, than to exercise cruelty and revenge upon them; it will take away all respect for the divine character, and have a hardening influence upon the sinner's mind. And the belief that God will be cruel and revengeful towards him, will naturally tend to excite in him, cruel and revengeful feelings. For like produces like.

But let the sinner believe, that God is unchangeably "kind to the unthankful and to the evil"; that he loves all men, and "whom he loveth he correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth"; and that the chastisement which he will inflict, will "yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness," and consequently is designed to produce some good; and is not this belief consistent with reason and revelation; and will it not tend to create respect for the ways of the Lord? The sinner is here led to view a character worthy of imitation; a benevolence and kindness which will command his praise, and one unvarying principle of parental regard which will lead him to love and adore. What view of the divine Being can more effectually win his heart, and melt him into contrition and humility? A contrary view cannot. The more kindness, love and impartiality we view in Him, the more we shall be constrained to love him. This is a plain and undeniable truth. And from this it appears equally plain and true, that the nature of that punishment which is described as endless, cannot so effectually hold a restraint over the moral actions of man, as the nature of that punishment which is limited, and inflicted in kindness, by our heavenly Father, for the good of his creatures.

Hear the apostle Paul saying, "overcome evil with good.....render to no man evil for evil." God never acted upon any contrary principle in his dealings with the children of men, and never will. His design is to overcome evil with good. There is no other principle by which he can overcome evil. How, then, can God become angry with his creatures, or exercise the principle of hatred towards them, because they do not love him? He cannot for his nature is unchangeable. He loves all, and we are required to imitate him by loving all, even our enemies. We shall then follow the exhortation, "render to no man, evil for evil." And when this exhortation was penned, together with others of like import, such as, "Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you, bless them that curse you, bless and curse not," were they not intended to point us to an example of this in God, and a character there, like this required of us? With what semblance of propriety could these exhortations have been given, if God does not possess this character? He does possess it, as all must admit. It is by his goodness, then, that he must overcome evil. And by his kindness, love, mercy and benevolence, that he is to overcome their opposites. With this idea, the words of John accord. "We love him," says he, for the best and most important of all reasons, "because he first loved us." And in this principle of love, is included every possible excellence, every praise-worthy and desirable principle, even "the goodness of God, which leadeth to repentance," and by which he overcometh evil.

Go, then, thou herald of truth—go, proclaim to the sinner Heaven's unchanging and immeasurable love! Tell him that God, who rules the world, is "altogether lovely"; and such is his love, that "nothing can separate us from it." Reawaken his attention—let him feel your earnestness—and say to him, though you may be a hardened and rebellious sinner, and as such an enemy to God, yet I say to you, and I say it in tears of unspeakable gratitude, that God loves you still; for he loves his enemies, and does good to those who hate him, and therefore this goodness calls for reformation:—and oh, what heart realizing this, will not feel its rebellion giving way! And will not such, above all other views of the divine character, throw off sin's galling chain, wrest dominion from this cruel foe, and lay him vanquished and powerless at our feet? Thus enabling the once wretched and miserable captive of sin, to "walk in newness of life," being born into the liberty and kingdom of God's dear Son! Oh may it be my happy lot ever to have this view of the divine character, and see it melting many a hard heart into submission to the divine will. I joy in the God of my salvation, and I cannot refrain from presenting this character to sinners for their imitation, knowing from experience, that it has a morally redeeming, as well as a happy influence. I say then, "Oh taste and see that the Lord is good." For as the prophet Zephaniah says, "He shall rest in his love," for it is his nature; and in this boundless and fathomless ocean of love, shall his polluted children be washed, and be at rest. He has sent his Son to effect this work, and the work is glorious, and when he shall have finished it, "His rest," as saith the prophet, "shall be glorious." Isa. xi: 10. And Universalism teaches that this best and most important work of cleansing the world from all unrighteousness, of finishing transgression, and making an effectual end of sin, will be completed in the fulness of time. And here this doctrine presents another example for our imitation, than which there can be none superior, viz: the engaging in, and completing a good work. Is there a duty among us to perform, a work which sin and suffering make it necessary should be done? If there is, should we be justified in not completing it, or in leaving it unfinished, when we have ability to finish it? No. Christ has engaged in a good work—a work which his Father sent him, possessed of ability, to do—and he will not leave it unfinished. For he says, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." Here is an example which we are required to follow. If God has enjoined upon us a duty, we have ability to perform it, and should not leave it unfinished.

We are often exhorted to do all the good we can; this is our duty, it is true, and the exhortation itself is good; but how it can be given with any degree of propriety by those who believe God will not do all the good he has ability to do, I cannot tell. Is it not believed that God has ability to save all? and is it not believed that the act of saving all is a good one? God sent his Son to save all; hence the object for which he sent him, is good; for he could not have sent him to accomplish an object which is not good. Now no man possessed of a right frame of mind, will deny that God has ability to accomplish this good object. But shall we imitate God in the supposed act of his not accomplishing this object, which he has ability to do? May Heaven forbid. We are not required to practice a doctrine which our own good sense and the Scriptures teach us is false, and which God does not approve. We are required to do all the good we can, and thereby to be imitators of our heavenly Father. Universalism represents no character in Deity but what it would be consistent with every moral virtue for us to imitate. And hence it is a doctrine we can and ought to practice—a doctrine which agrees with the moral precepts of Christ, and which is calculated to promote the welfare and happiness of man. It teaches, as shown before, that God, whom we are required to imitate, is a father to us; that he looks down upon his children with an eye of pity; that he is worthy of man's highest confidence, and therefore we should trust in him at all times, and pour out our hearts before him. It represents him as being a universal Friend and Benefactor, acting unchangeably upon the principle of universal benevolence, to produce universal joy: thus setting an example for his children to become universally good, and that they might be constrained to say fervently, "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" To which "Let all the people say, Amen." PRAISE YE THE LORD!"

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the General Convention of Universalists in the United States, at its session held in the city of New-York, September, 1836.

Tuesday evening, September 20.—Br. Calvin Gardner, the Clerk of the former session, called the Convention to order, whereupon it adjourned to meet in the Orchard-street church to-morrow morning, at half past 8 o'clock.

Wednesday morning, September 21.—Met according to adjournment, and opened the Council with prayer by Br. H. Ballou, 2d.

1. Proceeded to the choice of officers for the present session, which resulted in the choice of the following: Elijah Dallett, of Philadelphia, Moderator, Asher Moore and I. D. Williamson, Clerks.

2. Appointed Brs. W. Skinner, A. S. Balch and G. W. Bazin, a committee to examine the credentials of delegates, and report upon the same; whereupon it appeared that the following had been duly elected, viz.

Maine.—Calvin Gardner, D. D. Smith and G. W. Quinby, clergymen; and W. K. Weston, Alpheus Lyon and C. J. Barbour, laymen.

New-Hampshire.—A. L. Balch, M. Ballou and F. A. Hodsdon, clergymen; and David Fisher and J. Cheever, laymen.

Vermont.—W. Skinner and C. Woodhouse, clergymen; and S. Wallbridge, layman.

Massachusetts.—S. Streeter, A. A. Folsom, C. Spear and H. Ballou, 2d, clergymen; and A. Johnson, A. Tillinghast, G. W. Bazin and J. R. Jacobs, laymen.

Connecticut.—Asher Moore, J. H. Willis, R. O. Williams and W. A. Stickney, clergymen; and Jesse Whiting and Aaron Dean, laymen.

New-York.—I. D. Williamson, O. Whiston, P. Morse and A. B. Grosh, clergymen; and E. Murdock and H. Scott, laymen.

Pennsylvania.—A. C. Thomas, S. W. Fuller, John Perry and William West, clergymen; and E. Dallett, J. M. Brown, G. H. McCully, O. P. Waldron and J. L. Gihon, laymen.

3. Voted, To appoint a committee of three to act in conjunction with the committee of the Universalist societies of this place, to arrange the order of public services. H. Ballou, 2d, A. C. Thomas and C. Spear were appointed said committee.

4. Appointed A. C. Thomas, H. Ballou, 2d, and I. D. Williamson a committee to designate a place for the adjournment of this body.

5. The following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, The obtaining of statistical information relative to the state and standing of our cause throughout the United States was an important object contemplated in the organization of this body; and whereas, such information can be obtained only through the exertions of State Conventions, therefore,

Resolved, That this body earnestly recommend to all the State Conventions in its fellowship, the adoption of such measures as shall be best adapted to the collection, arrangement and transmission to this body, of all such information as can be obtained on all subjects connected with the interests of our denomination within their limits.

Adjourned to half past 2 o'clock, P. M.

Met according to adjournment; and the Moderator being absent, Br. W. Skinner was chosen pro tem.

6. Appointed S. W. Fuller, C. Spear and J. H. Willis a committee to designate a person to deliver the annual sermon before this Convention at its next session.

7. A communication was presented to the Council by Br. A. B. Grosh, and ordered to be laid on the table.

8. Voted, That a committee of three be appointed to take into consideration the aforesaid communication, and report thereon to the Convention at its present session; whereupon the following persons were chosen said committee, viz. S. W. Fuller, Pitt Morse and Calvin Gardner.

Adjourned to meet in the Bleeker-street church to-morrow morning at half past 8 o'clock.

Thursday morning, September 22.—Met according to adjournment and opened the Council with prayer by Br. L. F. W. Andrews.

9. The committee on adjournment reported in favor of adjourning to meet in the city of Philadelphia. Report accepted.

10. The committee to whom was referred the complaint from Robert Smith, [through Br. Grosh,] Report, That they have duly considered the subject, and do not believe the case comes under the legitimate jurisdiction of this body; and that therefore Mr. Smith have leave to withdraw his communication. Report accepted.

11. The committee appointed to select a person to deliver the next occasional sermon before this Convention, reported in favor Br. T. Whittemore. Report accepted.

12. Resolved, That in case of inability to discharge the aforesaid duty, Br. Whittemore be authorized to appoint a substitute.

13. The following preamble and resolutions were adopted:—

Whereas, It is highly desirable that the denomination of Universalists should enjoy the benefits of a publication devoted to the more labored expositions of its doctrines, therefore,

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the revival of that excellent publication, the "Expositor and Universalist Review."

14. Resolved, That the sixth article of the Constitution of this Convention be inserted in the minutes of this session—said article being the predicate of the report of the committee on the case of Mr. Robert Smith. Said article reads as follows:

"This Convention disclaims all authority over or right of interference with the regulations of any State Convention or minor Association, and will only exercise the privilege of advising the adoption of such measures and regulations as in their opinion shall be best adapted to the promotion of the general good of the cause."

15. Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be presented to Br. W. A. Drew for his excellent occasional sermon before this body, and that a copy be requested for publication.

16. Resolved, That Capital punishment is the relic of a barbarous age, and decidedly anti-christian; that it engenders a spirit of cruelty, and is highly dangerous; and that therefore, although we deem an interference with the legislation of our State or of the United States, by ecclesiastical bodies, improper, yet we recommend to Universalists throughout the United States, to use their exertions for its abolition, by the adoption of such measures as, in their deliberate judgment may appear proper for forming and directing public opinion on this subject.

17. Resolved, That the Standing Clerks of the several State Conventions be requested to forward to the Standing Clerk of the United States Convention, a certified list of their respective delegates elect, as soon as may be after said elections may be made.

18. Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Standing Clerk of the United States Convention to prepare a list of delegates thus appointed, and present the same to this body, which, when certified by the Clerk, shall be the roll of this Convention.

19. The following preamble and resolution were adopted:—

Whereas, The propriety and expediency of establishing a Theological Seminary has received some attention from the Universalist denomination, therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend a continued consideration of the subject, with a request that the brethren may continue to act, either for or against the measure, as to them respectively may seem good.

20. Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to report the ways and means best adapted to supplying destitute societies and places with the preached word of life, and that the report be presented at our next session; whereupon, Brs. Abel C. Thomas, of Pennsylvania, Thomas J. Sawyer, of New-York and L. R. Paige, of Massachusetts, were appointed said committee.

21. Resolved, That the Clerk be appointed to prepare the minutes of this session for publication in our periodicals, accompanied with the occasional sermon, and a circular letter.

22. Voted, That this Convention adjourn to meet in the city of Philadelphia on the third Wednesday in September, 1837, at 8 o'clock in the morning, and continue in session two days.

Prayer by Br. Streeter.

ELIJAH DALLETT, Moderator.

Asher Moore, Clerk.

I. D. Williamson, Assistant Clerk.

Brs. GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.—Looking over an old volume of Eastern papers the other day, the following dialogue particularly attracted my attention; should it agree with your feelings to give it an insertion in the Magazine and Advocate, it will perhaps be acceptable to some of your western readers, and you will thereby confer a favor upon

From the Christian Intelligencer.

A DIALOGUE.

It is represented as being between a shaking Quaker and a new created Deacon who happened to put up at a public house.

Enter Landlord. Friend, there is a traveller who has put up with me who does not wish to be with the multitude in the bar-room or sitting-room, and as my house is now full, I cannot accommodate him unless you will obligingly permit him to sit in your room until he retires.

Sha. Yea, if he be a sober man, I have no objection.

Land. I thank you, I will introduce him. (Exit.)

(Enter Landlord and Deacon.)

L. This is the gentleman, Sir, for whose introduction you gave consent. (Retires.)

S. Be seated friend before the fire. (The deacon sits down.)

D. It is a cold night.

S. Yea.

D. I abominate a tavern. (No answer.)

D. I sometimes think a tavern a meeting-house for the ungodly. (No answer.)

D. The church to which I belong, and in which I hold the office of deacon, condemn dancing as the worst of sins. (No answer.)

D. You belong to the shaking Quaker society, I take it?

S. (After a pause.) Yea, I am a member of that people.

D. Do you hold any office among them?

S. Yea, that of Brother.

D. I suspected that you belonged to the C—n—ry society, and that you was the man they called deacon Ed—ly.

S. I belong to that society.

D. Your people, I understand, dance on the Sabbath day.

S. We labor before the Lord on the first day of the week.

D. In either sense it is a prodigious abomination, and our missionaries ought to be sent to enlighten you.

S. Friend, dost thou confide in thy faith.

D. Yes.

S. So do I in mine.

D. But you are in a state of moral devastation, of sin, and of rebellion against God and his revelation.

S. Friend, I have not a gift to converse with thee, at this time. I will not condemn thy faith, permit me and mine to remain in peace.

D. I feel it my solemn duty to warn you to beware of dancing as you would the wrath to come. (No answer.)

D. You are in a state of sin and moral darkness; will you shut your eyes against the light of revelation?

S. Nay, friend.

D. Then how can you dance, or labor as you call it, without Scripture authority, and against the light which our churches send forth.

S. Art thou a deacon, and hast thou a Bible, friend?

D. Yes, I am a deacon duly "set apart" according to the ordinance of the church of God, and have a Bible, which I understand from Genesis to Revelation.

S. Then I cannot give any additional information to thee, who understandeth the whole of the law of God; and we will cease to speak further thereof.

D. If you can produce one text in the whole book, to countenance dancing, I will cease to speak further.

S. Friend, thou art kinder than I expected: I will answer thy request threefold upon thine own condition; and first for the dancing of A PROPHETESS. "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and dances." Ex. xv: 20. Dost thou think, friend, if dancing was not acceptable to Israel's God, that Moses and Aaron would have suffered the sister, to have danced before the Lord, the moment they had escaped the Egyptians, and miraculously passed through the Red sea?

D. I have no recollection of that text; I will take it down, and after reading it show it to our minister; but you will proceed with the rest.

S. "And Jephthah came to Mizpah unto his house, and behold his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances, and she was his only child, beside her he had neither son nor daughter." Judges xi: 34. Jephthah was a judge in Israel, and favored of the Lord; canst thou believe he allowed his only child to dance if it was wicked? and would she go forth to meet her father in a manner not truly acceptable to him?

D. I have noted it down with the other. I have heard that the Shakers had a Bible for themselves. Proceed.

S. "And it came to pass, as they came where David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistines, that the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet king Saul with tabrets, with joy and with instruments of music." 1 Sam. xviii: 6. Now, friend, Israel was a favored people of the Lord, and would the women "have come out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing," before Saul and David, for the great victory, unless it was approved by their God? Nay, friend, they would not have sinned against God for the victory and deliverance which he had given.

D. Admit your texts are from our true Christian Bible, they do not prove that men or boys were allowed to dance; it was only the women, and they are allowed to do almost any thing; and if I find these passages in my Bible, I shall think they always have been a prodigious abomination, from old mother Eve down to the fag-end of them.

S. Dost thou believe, with thy Bible, that David was holy, and a man after God's own heart, friend?

D. Yes I do, to be sure, most solemnly.

S. Take care, friend, for verily thou wilt make thy God a dancer if David was after his heart, for "David danced before the Lord with all his might, and David was girded with a linen ephod." 2 Sam. v: 4. Now canst thou believe, friend, that holy David would have danced before the Lord, if the Lord was not fond of dancing?

D. This is an abomination of abominations; worse and worse! oh; I can smell sulphur already in this room!

S. Not unless thou hast it about thee, friend; for my people neither make it, nor have occasion to use it.

D. Your Scriptures, I now flatly deny. I can't recollect a word of it; if to be found any where, it must be in Ann Lee's Revelation.

S. Nay, friend be not offended that I repeat thy own Bible to thee; thou wilt find all therein. I fear thy memory does not quite reach from Genesis to Revelation.

D. Well, if such passages are to be found in the Bible, like the old dispensation, they are out-lawed and not binding, nor never will be again.

S. Verily, I would fain ask thee, one question; dost thou believe that Israel will be gathered together?

D. Yes, for it is the promise of God.

S. Yea, verily, and hast thou faith that thou art one of the ransomed of Israel?

D. Yes, I have the evidence in the church.

S. Then, friend, if thy Bible deceive not, thou thyself wilt yet have a merry, long time of dancing.

D. This is worst of all! you may make all the women of Israel dance, and king David to boot; but mind, you have now got a deacon of an orthodox church to deal with; it is not you nor any other power can make me consent to dance; take that, for answer.

S. Then thou already deniest thy faith in being one of the ransomed of Israel, for God hath said, "Again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel; thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and thou shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry." Jer. xxxi: 4.

D. Well, I tell you again, I will not dance with them.

S. Verily, friend, I may say, "according to thy faith be it unto thee."

D. I now believe every word in Mary Dyer's book concerning you.

S. Yea, friend, it seemeth strange unto me, that thou shouldest follow the counsels of Mary concerning us, and denounce the examples of Miriam, the prophetess of God.

D. I hold it my duty not to say one word more to you.

S. Thou hast my thanks, friend, if steadfastly thou keepest thy promise; thou wilt find silence more useful to thee than thy accusations, and more conformable to the character of a deacon who should be, at least, decent in his deportment, and an honest seeker after truth.

D. I'll leave this accursed room as soon as I can get my hat and coat!

S. Friend, thou hast spoken again, and swore too.

D. I don't thank the landlord for putting me into this room! [Runs out in a rage.]

S. Thou wilt dance soon, I fear, thou deacon of this world.

HUMILITY.

It will not be denied, by any reflecting person, that very erroneous impressions have prevailed, respecting the nature of humility. Perhaps the reader may have oftentimes heard good men, but unfortunately under the influence of wrong opinions, declaiming against themselves, and telling those around them, with apparent sincerity, that they were sinful, depraved, unworthy creatures—suffered only to live because they were unfit to die. And this confession has been regarded as an evidence of their humility. But it seems to us that it evinces neither genuine humility, nor hardly, in some cases, a proper self-respect. It is no mark of humility, as we believe, for a person to place his character, in the estimation of the world, below what it really is. It is right and proper that every person should feel the influence of the station to which his virtuous and vigorous exertions have elevated him, and to claim the reputation which justly belongs to his character. We have no desire, we freely confess, to hear a person speak against his own acquirements, moral or religious; especially when existing circumstances do not require it. And when we find one thus deluded—where daily conduct contradicts his profession—we cannot but execrate the system of error which has produced the deception. We do not wish it to prevail. It is a plain case, that the world would be better without it than with it.

We would not, however, dissuade a person from evincing a modest diffidence of his own acquirements and virtues. By no means. It is a trait of character which is highly commendable, and gives him an influence which he could not otherwise obtain. But we cannot believe it to be humility—such as the religion of Jesus requires—to be incessantly declaiming against one's self, when a consciousness is felt that it is not deserved. And we must consider it, after all, in too many cases, let others think of it as they may, but an indirect way of saying to others, "stand by, come not near to me, for I am holier than thou." Or, "O God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican."

Let us not, however, in our remarks upon this prevailing error, be regarded as unreasonable or uncharitable; nor let us indulge feelings of unkindness in relation to those who are so unfortunate as to have embraced it. But it is true—the good of the Christian cause clearly demands it—that such errors should be noticed and exposed. It is the fervent and unabating desire of our souls, that the nature of humility may be understood—understood as it truly is—not as an unqualified denunciation of ourselves, and telling the world how vile and sinful we are—but as being a sincere and heartfelt, as well as modest expression, of our sins and unworthiness, a just and reasonable abatement of our pride, and an unreserved and entire conviction of our dependence upon God. This, and this only, is humility—real, unassuming, unexceptionable humility.

The Christian religion does not, and never can, require of us concessions which are not in their nature true; nor does it require us to assume a degree of sanctity which is not felt; nor does it require us to sacrifice present enjoyment as a means of obtaining future blessedness. Religion, of any name or description, is valuable only in proportion as it has a salutary influence upon society. To call that religion which destroys every social blessing, and renders man an enemy to his fellow-man, is evidently inconsistent and absurd. If religion is of a celestial origin, and, by the author of our existence, designed to advance our happiness, and improve our minds in moral virtue, it must be of a social nature; for we are social beings. That system, therefore, which is calculated to disunite society, and alienate the affections of one from another, is not only deleterious in its consequences, but discovers its terrestrial origin. But there is nothing in the religion of Jesus, or in the sacred teachings of Christianity, which can possibly produce a result like this. Humble in its origin, the Gospel constantly inculcates lessons of humility, and requires its professors to practice upon the pacific principles of forbearance and forgiveness.

The salutary influence of humility upon the human mind is very apparent. The humble believer is prepared at all times, with calmness and resignation, to meet the reverses, the trials, the disappointments, of the present life. He is ready to meet the dispensations of Providence, come upon him when they may, and whether they are prosperous or adverse. He is never unreasonably elated by prosperity, nor dejected by adversity. He never indulges in unbecoming levity, nor rigid reservedness. He never practices a monkish austerity in his deportment in life, nor denies himself the reasonable recreations of the world. He lives, in short, as he ought to live, in the constant practice of the essential duties of Christianity, and enjoys a reasonable hope of future life and immortality beyond the confines of the grave.

Reader, hast thou this virtue? Dost thou place a humble reliance upon the Father of spirits? Hast thou prepared thyself for the adverse scenes of life by considering what thou art, and where thy strength lies, and in whom thou shouldst constantly trust? Hast thou reflected upon thy frailty, and thy imperfections, and discovered thy dependence? If not, let the energies of thy mind be directed to the attainment of this virtue, and the acquisition of this knowledge. Fix thy thoughts upon this subject, and remember constantly, that “he that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.”—Banner.

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

INTRODUCTION.

Not only have I often called the attention of our readers to this invaluable work, which is emphatically a book “for the people;” but our excellent and learned correspondent, the author of “Notes on Sacred Subjects,” has also warmly recommended it, giving also an extract from the work. Those who have carefully perused the work—especially the last full and excellent edition, lately published by Marsh, Capen and Lyon, of Boston*—will not only excuse my again calling attention to it, and giving a few extracts from it; but will applaud these exertions to induce every person, male and female, able to purchase and read it, to get the work. The extracts shall be brief, but perfect in themselves. They are by no means intended to supersede the necessity of reading the entire work, but only to induce our readers to get the work—the whole work—when they will, with greater pleasure, again peruse these very extracts. I shall soon have a large supply on hand; but distant readers had better induce booksellers in their vicinities to get and keep the work for sale. It is not sectarian—but phrenological, and highly philosophical—of that philosophy which is most useful, easily understood, and corroborated by every man's experience.

As to its tendency—as some of our religious opposers seem to fear that, from the fact, that Universalists so much admire and warmly recommend the work—I will only say, if the book is true, and Universalism false, it will not lead to Universalism. Or, if the book is false, and Universalism true, it cannot teach the latter. But if both are false, it may—and if both are true, it must confirm the principles involved in the doctrine of universal salvation. Then, read the book—and if it does not agree with your own experience and with nature—if it does not increase your veneration and love for God—(matters in which you cannot fail judging for yourselves—) lay it aside as false and useless—send me your condemnation of it, and I will publish it as a warning to all of your faith, not to believe in the work. It has been read by several Partialists of my acquaintance—one a clergyman—and all alike join in praising the work.

The following explanation of phrenological terms is copied from the first part of the work, for the information of the reader who has not acquired that knowledge. It may be dry to many, but will be found useful. For after these are understood, the reader will be better prepared to understand and relish the extracts I shall give. Though numerous, it will be seen that the terms are very simple, and in themselves denote their meaning. So much for an introduction necessarily long.

A. B. G.

One great advantage presented by Phrenology, is the light which it throws on the natural constitution of the mind. Philosophers and divines have long disputed about the number and functions of the human faculties; and while each assumed his own consciousness as the standard of nature, and occupied himself chiefly with observations on its phenomena, as his means of study, there could be no end to their discussions. But the organs of the mind can be seen and felt, and their size estimated, —and the mental manifestations also that accompany them can be observed, in an unlimited number of instances,—so that, assuming the existence of organs, it is clear that a far higher degree of certainty in regard to the natural endowments of the mind may be attained by these means, than by any other previously applied. It is disputed also whether man be now in possession of the same qualities as those with which he was created: but the fact of the organs having been bestowed by the Creator is not open to contradiction, if they exist at all; and if we discover their functions and their uses, and distinguish these from their abuses, we shall obviously obtain clearer views of what God has instituted, and of the extent to which man himself is chargeable with error and perversion, than could be arrived at by the means hitherto employed. Such conclusions, if correctly drawn, will possess an irresistible authority—that of the record of creation itself. If, therefore, any reader be disposed to question the existence of such qualities in man as I am about to describe, he must, to do so consistently, be prepared to deny, on reasonable grounds, that mental organs exist,—or, if he allows their existence, he must establish that the observations of phrenologists in regard to them are incorrect, or their inferences regarding their functions erroneously deduced. According to phrenology, then, the human faculties are the following. The organs are double, each faculty having two, lying in corresponding situations of the hemispheres of the brain. [For their situations see engravings in Phrenological works.]

Order I. FEELINGS.

Genus I. Propensities—Common to man with the lower animals.

THE LOVE OF LIFE.

APPETITE FOR FOOD.—Uses: Nutrition.—Abuses: Gluttony and drunkenness. The organ is marked with a cross on bust.

1. AMATIVENESS.—Produces sexual love.

2. PHILOPROGENITIVENESS.—Uses: Affection for young and tender beings.—Abuses: Pampering and spoiling children.

3. CONCENTRATIVENESS.—Uses: It gives the desire of permanence in place, and renders permanent, emotions and ideas in the mind.—Abuses: Aversion to move abroad; morbid dwelling on internal emotions and ideas, to the neglect of external impressions.

4. ADHESIVENESS.—Uses: Attachment; friendship and society result from it.—Abuses: Clanship for improper objects, attachment to worthless individuals. It is generally strong in women.

5. COMBATIVENESS.—Uses: Courage to meet danger and overcome difficulties, tendency to oppose and attack whatever requires opposition, and to resist unjust encroachments.—Abuses: Love of contention, and tendency to provoke and assault. This feeling obviously adapts man to a world in which danger and difficulty abound.

6. DESTRUCTIVENESS.—Uses: Desire to destroy noxious objects, and to kill for food. It is very discernible in carnivorous animals.—Abuses: Cruelty, murder, desire to torment, tendency to passion, rage, and harshness and severity in speech and writing. This feeling places man in harmony with death and destruction, which are woven into the system of sublunary creation.

7. SECRETIVENESS.—Uses: Tendency to restrain within the mind the various emotions and ideas that involuntarily present themselves, until the judgment has approved of giving them utterance; it is simply the propensity to conceal, and is an ingredient in prudence.—Abuses: Cunning, deceit, duplicity, and lying.

8. ACQUISITIVENESS.—Uses: Desire to possess, and tendency to accumulate articles of utility, to provide against want.—Abuses: Inordinate desire of property, selfishness, avarice, theft.

9. CONSTRUCTIVENESS.—Uses: Desire to build and construct works of art.—Abuses: Construction of engines to injure or destroy, and fabrication of objects to deceive mankind.

Genus II. Sentiments.

I. Sentiments common to man with the lower animals.

10. SELF-ESTEEM.—Uses: Self-respect, self-interest, love of independence, personal dignity.—Abuses: Pride, disdain, overweening conceit, excessive selfishness, love of dominion.

11. LOVE OF APPROBATION.—Uses: Desire of the esteem of others, love of praise, desire of fame or glory.—Abuses: Vanity, ambition, thirst for praise independently of praiseworthiness.

12. CAUTIOUSNESS.—Uses: It gives origin to the sentiment of fear, the desire to shun danger, and circumspection; and it is an ingredient in prudence.—Abuses: Excessive timidity, poltroonery, unfounded apprehensions, despondency, melancholy.

13. BENEVOLENCE.—Uses: Desire of the happiness of others, universal charity, mildness of disposition, and a lively sympathy with the enjoyment of all animated beings.—Abuses: Profusion, injurious indulgence of the appetites and fancies of others, prodigality, facility of temper.

II. Sentiments proper to man.

14. VENERATION.—Uses: Tendency to venerate or respect whatever is great and good; gives origin to religious adoration.—Abuses: Senseless respect for unworthy objects consecrated by time or situation, love of antiquated customs, abject subservience to persons in authority, superstitious awe.

15. FIRMNESS.—Uses: Determination, perseverance, steadiness of purpose.—Abuses: Stubbornness, infatuation, tenacity in evil,

* There are some spurious editions afloat, in which the text is altered, or notes and additional chapters are added, for base sectarian purposes—but even one of these is better than none—though far inferior to the above edition, A. B. G.

16. CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.—Uses: It gives origin to the sentiment of justice, or respect for the rights of others, openness to conviction, the love of truth. Abuses: Scrupulous adherence to noxious principles when ignorantly embraced, excessive refinement in the views of duty and obligation, excess in remorse or self-condemnation.

17. HOPE.—Uses: Tendency to expect future good; it cherishes faith.—Abuses: Credulity with respect to the attainment of what is desired, absurd expectations of felicity not founded on reason.

18. WONDER.—Uses: The desire of novelty; admiration of the new, the unexpected, the grand, the wonderful, and extraordinary.—Abuses: Love of the marvellous, and occult, senseless astonishment; belief in false miracles, in prodigies, magic, ghosts, and other supernatural absurdities.—Note. Veneration, Hope, and Wonder, combined, give the tendency to religion; their abuses produce superstition.

19. IDEALITY.—Uses: Love of the beautiful and splendid, desire of excellence, poetic feeling. Abuses: Extravagance and absurd enthusiasm, preference of the showy and glaring to the solid and useful, a tendency to dwell in the regions of fancy and to neglect the duties of life.

20. WIT.—Gives the feeling of the ludicrous, and disposes to mirth.

21. IMITATION.—Copies the manners, gestures, and actions of others, and appearances in nature generally.

Order II: INTELLECTUAL FACULTIES.

Genus I. External senses.

FEELING OF TOUCH. TASTE. SMELL. HEARING. SIGHT.—Uses: To bring man into communication with external objects, and to enable him to enjoy them.—Abuses: Excessive indulgence in the pleasures arising from the senses, to the extent of impairing bodily health, and debilitating or deteriorating the mind.

Genus II. Knowing faculties which perceive the existence and qualities of external objects.

22. INDIVIDUALITY.—Takes cognizance of existence and simple facts.

23. FORM.—Renders man observant of form.

24. SIZE.—Gives the idea of space, and enables us to appreciate dimension and distance.

25. WEIGHT.—Communicates the perception of momentum, weight, and resistance; and gives equilibrium.

26. COLORING.—Gives perception of colors and their harmonies.

Genus III. Knowing faculties which perceive the relations of external objects.

27. LOCALITY.—Gives the idea of relative position.

28. NUMBER.—Gives the talent for calculation.

29. ORDER.—Communicates the love of physical arrangement.

30. EVENTUALITY.—Takes cognizance of occurrences or events.

31. TIME.—Gives rise to the perception of duration.

32. TUNE.—The sense of Melody and Harmony arises from it.

33. LANGUAGE.—Gives facility in acquiring a knowledge of arbitrary signs to express thoughts, readiness in the use of them, and the power of inventing and recollecting them.

Genus IV. Reflecting faculties, which compare, judge, and discriminate.

34. COMPARISON.—Gives the power of discovering analogies, resemblances, and differences.

35. CAUSALITY.—Traces the dependence of phenomena, and the relation of cause and effect.

Observation proves that each of these faculties is connected with a particular portion of the brain, and that the power of manifesting each bears a relation to the size and activity of its organ. The organs differ in relative size in different individuals, and hence their differences of talents and dispositions. This fact is of the greatest importance in the philosophy of man; and the circumstance of its having been unknown until Dr. Gall's discovery of the functions of the brain, is sufficient to explain the past barrenness of mental science, and to render probable the assertion, that a great flood of light on this subject is now pouring forth on the world. These faculties are not all equal in excellence and authority; some are common to man with the lower animals, and others are peculiar to man. Before comparing the human mind, therefore, with its external condition, it becomes an object of primary importance to discover the relative rank and authority of these different powers. If the animal faculties are naturally or necessarily supreme—in other words, if man is by nature only an animal of superior intelligence—then external creation, if it be wisely constituted, may be expected to bear direct reference, in its arrangements, to this supremacy; and to be calculated to render him most happy when acting in conformity with his animal feelings. If the moral and intellectual faculties hold the ascendancy, then the constitution of external nature may be expected to be in harmony with them—in other words, to confer the highest degree of enjoyment on man, when he acts under the guidance of his moral and intellectual powers. I am not here teaching Phrenology, or developing its principles and evidences, but merely explaining it so far as indispensable for the purposes of this work. I refer to the Treatises on Phrenology for details.

PRIZE ESSAY.

The very excellent essay which we publish to-day, received the second premium (ten dollars) on the subject, the morality of Universalism. Let it be read carefully. It will be found cool and logical in the first part, but its author is warmed by his subject, the deeper he enters into it, and the firmer he establishes his position—hence the conclusion is fervid and earnest in its devotional spirit and grateful piety. Let it be read by all our readers, and as many of our opposers as can be induced to do so.

A. B. G.

THE UTILITARIAN.

THEISM.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good?" Ps. iv: 6.

Having shown that religion in some form or other is necessary to the natural wants, and therefore to the happiness of man, I will next proceed to endeavor ascertaining which form of religion is best adapted to our nature, and therefore best calculated to render us happy. Beginning at the lowest scale of the various religions in the world, and proceeding upward, as I believe, we first meet the question, between polytheism, or the belief in many gods, and theism, or the belief in one only God.

"There may be many that say, Who will show us any good" in believing in pure theism in preference to tritheism, polytheism, or any other system of religious faith and worship? At least to my mind such is the question implied in the conduct of the indifferentist, the popularity-seeker and the any-thing-arian religionists.

The first considers all religions alike, at all times and in all companies. The second attaches himself only to what is decidedly popular, whether true as heaven, or false as the perjuries of devils; and advocates it frequently with a zeal in inverse proportion to his faith in its correctness. The latter is a kind, complaisant soul, who, chameleon like, takes his religious complexion from the company he is in!

"Every thing by turns, and nothing long."

The two latter, especially seem to acknowledge that religion of some kind is good for man—better than none—at least while atheism is unpopular, and skeptics are not near at hand; but as to the kind, they are willing to let others decide for them. It becomes necessary, therefore—or at least it may be interesting and useful to us—to reply briefly to the question implied in their conduct—Who will show us any good in believing in one, only, supreme Intelligence, rather than in three, or in many?

It might be sufficient to state the undeniable argument, that if the one, be infinite in wisdom, goodness and power, one is amply sufficient for all the purposes of creation and providence. But if that one is not thus infinite, then thirty millions of such gods would not be sufficient—could not be infinite nor self-existent—and consequently could not be supreme first causes.

Even admitting that there could be a number of infinite deities, yet if they were all united and harmonious in design, counsel and works, they would be useless—one would be all-sufficient. But if not harmonious and united, then would their works counteract each other, and require as many universes as there are gods, for them to act, create and provide in.

As to a worship of the universe, or pantheism—into which many of our skeptics are rapidly running, as did the atheists of France before them—it is sufficient to say that, as a whole, the universe is an unintelligent thing; and to pray to it, commune with it, or offer it reverence, is as senseless and absurd as any other idolatry, from the worship of dagon down to that of juggernaut. If the intelligent part of the "great eternal matter," is all that is worshipped in pantheism, then as man is considered the only truly rational being in it, the worship is that of human reason offered to itself—or of man bowing down in adoration to his own understanding—in other words, talking praise and uttering prayer to himself! The worship of a blind, unintelligent spirit of nature, is no better—it is but the worship of a senseless idol, which is impelled by a necessity itself cannot control, and cannot therefore, either do good, or prevent evil, designedly.

It follows then, that we have but two choices—pure theism, or polytheism—for pantheism is but idolatry, or it is atheism. And in choosing between theism and polytheism, it is only necessary to remember, that the greater and purer joys of religion belong to the former in preference to the latter—that though polytheism may be better than atheism, just as some religion is better than none, yet pure theism is as much elevated above every system of idolatry—as much more purifying and happy in its nature—as the object is more rational, powerful, harmonious, and therefore deserving of our veneration and love.

And how is devotion distracted and divided when offered to more than one being at a time! I appeal even to our trinitarian brethren, who profess to recognize three distinct persons in the one, only, true God, whether this can confine their devotional thoughts, so as to worship these three persons at one and the same time, as but one being. Do not their thoughts wander around from the Father to the Son, from the Son to the Spirit, and from the Spirit again to the Father. And when their minds dwell on the one, do they not forget the other two? And when they grasp all three, is it not rather as three gods, than as one single God? And if so, is not their worship rather that of tritheism than of a single Deity?

And when they look abroad on the works of nature, providence and grace, do they not divide them among the whole three persons alternately—or confine them to one, to the exclusion of the other two? If so, and so I am certain it must be, then are all the works of the one infinite God, parcelled out and divided—creation made a riddle, and all providence, confusion. And how much more injurious and perplexing still must be the worship of many gods than of three only, judge ye.

Now all the benefits of worship, devotion, comfort and consolation are not only retained in theism, but are purified, elevated, enlarged and increased, above all that polytheism can furnish—so that pure theism is as much better than polytheism, as that is better than no religion at all—or as much enjoyment and happiness is better than a little. Hence there is good in theism over polytheism, because it is more rational—more consistent, with nature—more in accordance with the wants and desires of man—more simple and harmonious with the devotions of the affections and understanding, and therefore more salutary and purifying—and more ennobling and happyfying to the worshipper. Therefore are we religious—and therefore is our religion confined to the worship of one only God.

PREPOSITION vs. CONJUNCTION.

We frequently read, in some papers of late, hymenial notices, in which we are informed that some half a dozen gentlemen and as many ladies have been married; but which of them were married to each other we are not informed. For example, we read, Married on the —inst., Mr. A— and Miss B— and Mr. C— and Mrs. D—. But who can tell by such a notice, whether Mr. A— is married to Miss B— or Mrs. D—, or to some other person? Or whether Miss B— is married to the first, or to the second gentleman named? or to some person not named? True, we are informed they were all married, but how they were paired we gather not from the hymenial notice. Had the notice run thus: Married on the —inst., Mr. A—to Mrs. D—, and Mr. C—to Miss B—, the couples would be matched so that the reader would know “which belonged to which.” It appears to us that this new method of publishing marriage notices has been adopted rather from a love of novelty, or from the propensity which some have of speaking in such a manner as not to be understood—perhaps painters would call it admiration of the claire obscure—and that, like certain kinds of dress, sometimes in vogue, which are designed not to benefit the wearer but to dazzle or deceive the beholder, it must “perish with the using,” or give way to another and better “fashion.” As for us, we shall stick to the preposition, let others copulate as many new phrases or names together as they please.—When we attempt to give a piece of information, we like to come to the thing signified.

BENEVOLENCE—JUSTICE.

Br. George Rogers, of the Sentinel and Star, in one of his ably written tours, says of a certain place, that he found Partialism in sole possession. Some of the people not only told him that Universalism was false, but they swore it was. One person said that he had heard some lecturer on phrenology say that he found Universalists generally to possess a large development of the organ of benevolence, and pretty roundly intimated that it was owing, mainly to that circumstance that Universalists embraced their doctrine. Br. Rogers pertinently inquires whether the case may not be reversed—viz., that their organ of benevolence is more prominently developed by their belief of such a benevolent theory?

Reading these remarks led me to reflect—1st. Have these Universalists more benevolence than the Deity? 2d. If the aforesaid lecturer had taken the trouble to inquire further into the matter, would he not, also, have made the discovery, that the aforesaid Universalists were also endowed with a large development of the organ of justice, or as some phrenologists term it, conscientiousness; the sense of right and wrong? And if so, would it not prove that universal salvation was in accordance with justice as well as mercy; while the doctrine of endless misery is repugnant to both? And, to recur to Br. Rogers' question, as every organ is increased in size and strength (or in development, activity and power) by exercise, had he further pursued his inquiries would he not have discovered that Universalism, which presents so rational and creditable a theory respecting both God and his children—which represents the former as so worthy of our reverence and imitation, and the latter, of our affection and exertions to benefit him—which renders the benevolence and justice of our heavenly Father, so accordant with, and so capable of being practiced by our justice and mercy—which, in all its doctrines and precepts, is so well calculated to regulate, direct, govern the animal instincts and propensities in accordance with our religious and moral powers, when received through the medium of our intellectual faculties—would he not,

I say, have discovered that a theory so worthy of God and so perfectly adapted to the nature and wants of man must be the only true religion; and consequently was effectual in properly cultivating and increasing in harmonious development, not only the organ of benevolence, but of all the moral and religious sentiments? This is a long question but an important one; and I am firmly persuaded that the true answer to it must be in the affirmative.

As to the science of phrenology, every step I take in it, (and I yet have taken but very few—for it is a universal field,) confirms me in the belief that it is true—that it discloses the true nature of man—that that nature proves man to be the child of God in his moral and intellectual image—and that Universalism being the only system of religion that discloses the same truths in their fulness—the only religion worthy of such a Parent and perfectly adapted to the whole nature of his offspring man, must also be true. Thus, the better I understand Universalism, the more it confirms the leading truths disclosed by phrenology—the more I learn of phrenology, the more confirmed I grow in my convictions of the divine origin and truth of Universalism.

REMOVAL.

Br. Jacob Whitney, of this city, is about to remove with his family to the West. He now expects to start in about two weeks, and will most probably locate in Portage county, Ohio, either at Hudson, whither he has repeatedly been invited, or at Akron, in the same county, where a laborer in the vineyard of the Gospel is much needed. Br. W. will leave many warmly attached friends behind him, who will long cherish his name and memory with affection; and many societies in this region will sincerely regret his removal so far to the West as to deprive most of them, in all probability, of the pleasure of ever again listening to the joyful sound of the Gospel from his lips. Their best wishes and most fervent prayers will accompany him wherever his lot may be cast—and certainly ours cannot stay behind but will always go with him through every change and vicissitude of life. Though we regret to lose the society and labors of Br. W. in this region, we doubt not that an overruling and benignant Providence directs all things for the best, and that he will be extensively useful and blest in his new location and instrumental of doing if possible more good in the end, than he would be able to do in this section of our Master's vineyard. We cordially commend him to the confidence, kindness and liberality of the friends of God's impartial grace, whither he goes to preach the Gospel, and also on his way thitherward with his family, by whose removal he will necessarily incur considerable expense.

Br. Whitney is authorised to receive subscriptions for this paper, and payments, either for the former volumes or the present—so also is Br. L. L. Sadler, who has lately removed to Columbus, Ohio.

D. S.

Br. William Andrews, in consequence of ill health, is about to leave Gaines for the South-west. If any wish to address him between this and the time he locates, they will please direct to Columbus, Ohio, care of Rev. L. L. Sadler. He expects to attend the Association at Belpre, Ohio, this month.

BRADFORD'S COMPREHENSIVE ATLAS.

We have been looking over a specimen of this new and beautiful Atlas. It contains about one hundred Maps, charts and plans, besides a vast amount of geographical, historical, statistical and commercial information, and is altogether the most splendid work of the kind we have ever seen. The American Institute at their late fair awarded to it a diploma. It has received the commendation of many of our most distinguished countrymen and the periodical press generally throughout the union. The New York Knickerbocker Magazine thus speaks of it:

“Whether regarded in reference to the great amount of geographical, historical, commercial and statistical information which it contains—perspicuous arrangement and convenience of reference—or excellence of execution, pictorial, illustrative and typographical—this Atlas excels any and all others that have come under our observation. Its contents have been drawn from the best sources and the entire work may be relied upon as strictly correct in all respects.”

Our citizens will we presume be called upon by a gentleman interested in the work. FREEMAN HUNT, and Co. 141 Nassau Street, New York, are agents for the work. The price to subscribers is $10.

POETRY.

From the Knickerbocker.
WOMAN

AT THE CROSS AND TOMB OF THE SAVIOUR.

"Last at his cross, and earliest at his grave."

She wept beneath his cross, when all beside Forsook him—when a trembling seized the earth,
When terror shook the nations far and wide,
And from their graves the buried dead came forth.
She wept beneath his cross when fear was rife,
Like flowers that bowed, but broke not with the strife.

She followed to the tomb, and saw him laid,
Even as mortal, in the darkening dust;
With streaming eyes his resting place surveyed,
But never failed a moment in her trust
That he would burst his bonds again, and rise,
Amidst rejoicing angels, to the skies.

She stood beside his grave, ere the first light
Of morning shone upon the dew-charged flowers;
The seal was gone, the guards were put to flight:
And death, the tyrant that the earth devours,
O'ercome—her Saviour could his sting destroy—
And now she wept! aye, wept again, for joy!

Oh, woman! ever thus forsake him not,
And he shall not forsake thee—he shall be Thy constant friend, whatever be thy lot,
And in thy parting hour the stay for thee:
Thy faith shall strengthen—from despair shall save,
And at thy rising, call thee from thy grave. M.

INFLUENCE OF THE NATURAL LAWS ON THE HAPPINESS OF INDIVIDUALS.

Under this head, Mr. Combe in his last American edition, (published by Marsh, Capen and Lyon, Boston,) gives several beautiful fables, a few of which we shall copy—believing that even those who have read them, or may hereafter read them, will not have any objection to read them a second time. Certainly the feelings of gratitude and resignation to the laws of God in nature, excited by their perusal—or of admiration of God's wisdom and goodness illustrated by them, cannot be too often excited, nor too long kept alive within us.

A. B. G.

A formidable objection has often been stated against my views of the natural laws—namely, that although, when considered abstractly, they appear beneficent and just, yet, when applied to individuals, they are undeniably the causes of extensive, severe and unavoidable suffering; so that while, theoretically, the moral horizon appears to be cleared up, nevertheless, practically and substantially, the obscurity and intricacy remain undiminished. In answer, I have to observe, that, as the whole is but an aggregate of all the parts—if any natural institution, when viewed in its operation in regard to the race, is found to be just and beneficent, it cannot well be cruel and unjust to individuals, who are the component parts of that whole; and this accordingly, I humbly conceive to admit of something approaching to demonstration. The form of a dialogue is perhaps the best adapted for illustrating the subject; and if in imitation of some of the classic fabulists, we suppose the suffering individuals to make an appeal to Jupiter, the law of gravitation may be exemplified as follows.

It happened in a remote period, that a slater slipped from the roof of a high building, in consequence of a stone of the ridge having given way as he walked upright along it; he fell to the ground, had a leg broken, and was otherwise severely bruised. As he lay in bed suffering severe pain from his misfortune, he addressed Jupiter in these words: "O Jupiter, thou art a cruel god; for thou hast made me so frail and imperfect a being, that I had not faculties to perceive my danger, nor power to arrest my fall when its occurrence showed how horrible an evil awaited me. It were better for me that I had never been." Jupiter graciously bending his ear, heard the address, and answered: "Of what law of mine dost thou complain?" "Of the law of gravitation," replied the slater; "by its operation, the slip which my foot made upon the stone, which, unknown to me, was loose, precipitated me to the earth, and crushed my body, never calculated to resist such violence." "I restore thee to thy station on the roof," said Jupiter; "I heal all thy bruises; and to convince thee of my benevolence, I suspend the law of gravitation as to thy body and all that is related to it: art thou content?"

The slater, in deep emotion, offered up gratitude and thanks, and professed the profoundest reverence for so just and beneficent a deity. In the very act of doing so, he found himself in perfect health, erect upon the ridge of the roof; and, rejoicing, gazed around. His wonder at so strange an event having at last abated, he endeavored to walk along the ridge to arrive at the spot which he intended to repair. But the law of gravitation was suspended, and his body did not press upon the roof. There being no pressure, there was no resistance, and his legs moved backwards and forwards in the air without any progress being made by his body. Alarmed at this occurrence, he stopped, seized his trowel, lifted it full of mortar, made the motion of throwing it on the slates; but the mortar freed from the trowel hung in mid air—the law of gravitation was suspended as to it also.—Nearly frantic with terror at such unexpected novelties, he endeavored to descend in order to seek relief; but the law of gravitation was suspended as to his body, and it hung poised at the level of the ridge, like a balloon in the air. He tried to fling himself down to get rid of the uneasy sensation, but his body floated erect, and would not move downwards.

In agony of consternation, he called once more upon Jupiter. The god, ever kind and compassionate, heard his cry and pitied his distress; and asked, "What evil hath befallen thee now, that thou art not yet content? have I not suspended, at thy request, the law which made thee fall? Now thou art safe from bruises and from broken limbs; why then, dost thou still complain?"

The slater answered: "In deep humiliation, I acknowledge my ignorance and presumption; restore me to my couch of pain, but give me back the benefits of thy law of gravitation."

"Thy wish is granted," said Jupiter in reply. The slater in a moment was on his bed of sickness, endured the castigation of the organic law, was restored to health, and again mounted to the roof that caused his recent pain. He thanked Jupiter anew, from the depths of his soul, for the law of gravitation with its numberless benefits; and applied his faculties to study and obey it during the remainder of his life. The study opened up to him new and delightful perceptions of the Creator's beneficence and wisdom, of which he had never even dreamed before; and these views so excited his moral and intellectual powers, that he seemed to himself to have entered on a new existence. Ever afterwards he observed the law of gravitation; and in a good old age, when his organic frame was fairly worn out by natural decay, he transmitted his trade, his house, and much experience and wisdom, to his son, and died thanking and blessing Jupiter for having opened his eyes to the true theory of his scheme of creation.

 What can be more gratifying to the liberal and patriotic mind, than the opening prospects of our own country, and the whole civilized world at this period! The nations of Europe are undergoing a great moral renovation; the many are awakening to a just comprehension of their rights, and liberal principles are dissolving before them the maxims of tyranny, the institutions of oppression, and the powers of bigotry and persecution. In our own country, our rights and liberties are secured by the impregnable strong holds of constitutional law and municipal regulations; man walks abroad in his native dignity and majesty, lord of the soil upon which he treads. The germs of genius are allowed to shoot forth in wildest luxuriance, unchecked by artificial distinctions, and unrepressed by odious restraints. The elements of useful knowledge are universally diffused; the sciences, elegant letters, and the arts, are freely cultivated, and the human mind, released from the shackles of prejudice and error in which it has been bound for ages, is allowed to expand all its faculties and pursue its inquiries into the dominion of truth and nature, unawed by that despotism which hitherto made it afraid, and unrestrained by that fiat of bigotry and intolerance which proclaimed, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther, and here shall thy proud steps be stayed." Did the world, then, ever before open a scene of such rational enjoyment to mankind, extend to them a harvest of so rich blessings in possession, or enliven them with the prospect of so good things to come? The mind of the genuine lover of his race, is invigorated and enlarged by the contemplation of that scene now exhibited to view, and enlivened through all its faculties, by the opening prospects both of the old and new world.—Knickerbocker.

PRIDE.—It has been said, that the thing most likely to make the angels wonder, is to see a proud man. But pride of birth is the most ridiculous of all vanities—it is like boasting of the root of the tree, instead of the fruit it bears.

DEATHS.

On the 6th ult., at the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, in New-York, DE WITT CLINTON, son of Capt. Samuel Eaton, of Concord, Erie county, N. Y., aged 18 years, 11 months and 18 days.

The deceased was one of that unfortunate class of the human family whom Providence had seen proper to deprive of the sensations of hearing and speech, and had been placed at the Institution above mentioned for the purpose of acquiring an education which is there provided by the patronage of the State for the benefit of mutes. The disease of which he died, (an all plox,) he was seized with about four weeks previous to his dissolution, and which proved to be of that malignant form which baffled human aid or medical skill.

In justice to the memory of the deceased, it can be affirmed with safety and pleasure, that his disposition, natural habits of manly industry, and probity of character—and in short all the endowments of nature which he possessed, constituted him one of the most accomplished personages in society.

It is matter of consolation to the friends of this amiable young man, during the season of mourning and bereavement, to be assured that he was the subject of the kindest care and attention, not only of profound and untiring medical skill—but also of all other necessary and ample provisions which are within the reach of human means, to render him comfortable during his illness, and if possible to restore him to health, and which reflect great honor and commendation on this truly liberal and generous institution. S. W. D. E.

In Springfield, on the 12th inst., after a short illness, Mr. BENJAMIN GIBBS, aged 64 years. Believing in the Gospel of universal love through life, its promises sustained him in the hour of death. A large family are left to mourn their loss; but they mourn not as those without hope. A discourse, founded on St. John xiv: 1, was delivered to the surviving friends and relatives by the writer. T. J. S.

P. S. For the information of relatives at the East, will the Union please copy the above?

In this city, August 28, MARY ANN, second daughter of Elijah and Sally Spencer, aged 18 years. Having been confined about eight days by the painful disease of inflammation on the brain, she quietly resigned her life to Him who gave it, in hopes of a blessed state of immortality beyond the grave.

In New-Hartford, September 9th, from the kick of a horse, JOHN D. PORTER, son of Mr. Rufus Porter, aged 16 years. Few families have oftener drank of the cup of sorrow, than that of Mr. P., and in few instances has the sustaining power of the Gospel, been more manifest. S. R. S.

In the village of Lodi, on Sunday morning, September 11th, Hon. ALBERT G. BURKE, in the 32d year of his age.

Early in the Spring he was taken with bleeding at the lungs, and the protracted decline which it induced resulted in the termination of his earthly career, and hurried him to his long and last repose.

A whole community must feel sensibly this afflictive dispensation of Providence, in the death of this talented and highly useful man, and an interesting family mourn deeply the loss they have sustained. May the ineffable consolation of the everlasting Gospel, sustain their sorrowing minds, under this, and every allotment of Providence in life, and cast a radiance of calm and holy resignation around them, through the whole current of their mournful history. A numerous concourse of people assembled, on the 12th, and a discourse by the writer was listened to, from 1 Cor. xv: 54. P. P. F.

MARRIAGES.

In this city on Sunday evening last, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. ADDISON Z. MAYNARD, to Miss MARY ELIZABETH CLIZBE.

By Rev. J. S. Flagler, July 4, 1836, AMORY THOMAS, Esq., attorney at law, to Miss FLORENCE BUTLER, daughter of Dr. Butler, both of Alexander.

By the same, on the 15th ult., Mr. JOHN SUMNER, to Miss EMELINE HUGHS, both of Danen.

THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

By the late WILLIAM HARRISON HOYT.

"I tell you nay, but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii: 5.

This passage has long been considered by a great share of the Christian world, to teach the doctrine, that a portion of the human family will be endlessly miserable: so much so, that it has been quoted, time after time, as though it were an incontrovertible evidence of the truth of that sentiment. Consequently, it is often quoted to prove the falsity of that doctrine which teaches that the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. We believe, however, that this is far from being the true application of the text. We will therefore give our reasons for dissenting from the commonly received opinion concerning this passage, endeavor to give it its true application, and as far as we are capable, restore to these oft-perverted words of our Saviour, their primitive meaning.

Had the doctrine of endless misery been the sentiment which Jesus intended to teach by these words, it would not only make him teach precepts directly opposed to that which he has declared to be the truth of God at other times, but would make him teach a doctrine totally opposed to the whole design of his mission into the world. For, saith he, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day."

Here permit me to ask, how many were given to Christ? For all that were given him, "Shall remember and turn unto the Lord," who will have mercy, and abundantly pardon, and Christ will raise them up again at the last day.

Saith the Calvinist—"The elect, and the elect alone, were given to Christ; and the rest of men and angels, were predestinated for the glory or God, unto everlasting death."

Saith the Arminian—"Those alone were given to Christ who believe on his word and obey his commands, while in this probationary state."

But saith the Redeemer of the world—"The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands." And again, "These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee. As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life, to as many as thou hast given him—and this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent—I have glorified thee on earth, I have finished the work thou gavest me to do." Whose testimony will you receive? I beseech you to receive the testimony of him who spake as never man spake. For he hath received of the Father universal dominion, that by one sacrifice of himself, he might through the blood of the cross, reconcile all things to God.

But to return to the text, "I tell you nay, but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Those who apply this text to a future state of existence, take for granted the very point which remains to be proved—namely, that "perish" means endless misery. For it will be observed that there is nothing more, either in the text or context, from which to draw such a conclusion. But to show such a conclusion false, and that perish, does not mean endless misery, we will examine a few passages where this word occurs, to ascertain the sense in which it is used in Scripture.

1. We find this word signifies to be drowned. For when Jonah was on his way to Tarshish, in a ship bound for that place, there arose a violent tempest; and inasmuch as they were like to be shipwrecked, and consigned to a watery grave, the shipmaster came unto Jonah, while he was sleeping, and said—"What meanest thou, oh sleeper, arise and call upon thy God, if so be, he will think on us, that we perish not." And again, when Christ and his disciples had entered into a ship as they sailed, Christ fell asleep. And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was filled with water, and his disciples were in jeopardy. And they came to him, and awoke him, saying, "Master, Master, we perish. Then he arose, and rebuked the wind and the raging of the water; and they ceased and there was a calm."

2. We find it used to designate a state of starvation. After the prodigal son had wasted his substance, and spent his portion in riotous living, he applied to a citizen of that country, who sent him forth into his fields to feed swine. Here being reduced as he was, to such a state of poverty and distress, after a sober reflection upon his past misconduct, he exclaimed, "How many servants of my father have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger. I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, father I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight." An example worthy of imitation by many at the present day.

3. We find this word used to designate the natural death of mankind. For it is written, "All flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust."

4. We read that "the righteous perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart," and that "there is a just man who perisheth in his righteousness."

Thus we see that perish does not imply endless misery; for none will contend that a righteous or just man will be consigned to the torments of an endless hell.

"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." On the phrase, "likewise perish," Dr. A. Clarke says, "Ye shall perish in like way, or the same manner." Parkhurst is to the same import, for, saith he, "the word here rendered likewise, signifies in the same way or like manner." But here the question arises, in what way, or in the like manner of what, were they to perish, should they not repent? Had the Saviour been describing the situation of those beings who had been cast down to the regions of despair, there to spend a never-ending eternity in pain and anguish—I say had he been conversing upon this subject, and to the question, "Suppose ye that these were sinners above all others?" had answered, "I tell you nay but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish," there would have been good ground for the inference that is generally drawn from the text. But such was not the case; for we are informed, in the context, that there were some present, who informed Christ, of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. Jesus answered and said, "Suppose ye, that these Galileans, were sinners above all the Galileans because they suffered such things? Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower of Siloam fell, and slew them; think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwell in Jerusalem? I tell you nay, but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise (or in like manner) perish." Bishop Pearce, paraphrases the passage thus, "Except ye (the nation of the Jews) repent, your state shall be destroyed," which was literally fulfilled at the close of the legal dispensation. The evident meaning of the phrase is, then, that if the Jews did not repent of their sins, and turn unto righteousness, break off their evil and abominable practices, and serve the one living and true God, they should be destroyed, and that without remedy. And that there should be a similarity between their destruction, and that of the Galileans, and also of those upon whom the tower of Siloam fell.

Such was, literally, the fate of this unhappy people. For after they had rejected the Messiah, and killed the Prince of life, agreeably to the prediction of the Saviour, they were subdued by the Romans—their city laid waste—their temple burned, and they themselves destroyed by the edge of the sword, famine and pestilence, so that the number slain in Jerusalem and its neighboring cities, according to Josephus, was about one million three hundred and fifty seven thousand; besides those who were carried away captives into all nations. Thus were this people destroyed, or dispersed to the four quarters of the earth, to become a by-word among all nations.

And there was, likewise, a great similarity between their destruction and that of the Galileans, and of those upon whom the tower in Siloam fell. For, saith Dr. Adam Clarke, when Jerusalem was taken by the Romans, multitudes of the priests, etc., who were going on with the sacrifices, were slain, and their blood was mingled with the blood of their victims; and multitudes were buried under the ruins of walls, houses and temples. Thus instead of teaching the doctrine of endless misery, the text refers to the destruction of the Jewish nation, and had its fulfilment nearly eighteen hundred years ago. Consequently the phrase, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise (or in like manner) perish," is not, and cannot be, rightly applied to mankind in general.

I would not be understood to say, that all men shall not receive punishment for their sins, or that repentance is not necessary. For no doctrine is more plainly taught in the Scriptures, than that God "will by no means clear the guilty." "For, unto him belongeth mercy, for he rendereth to every man according to his works." "Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile—but glory, honor and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile. For there is no respect of persons with God."

But it is taught in the Scriptures equally as plain that punishment is limited and designed to reform. "For the Lord will not cast off forever, but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies, for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." "For I (the Lord) will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth, for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him: I hid me, and was wroth, and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart. I have seen his ways and will heal him, I will lead him also, and restore comforts unto him and to his mourners." "I create the fruit of the lips; peace, peace, to him that is far off, and to him that is near, saith the Lord, and I will heal him." "But the wicked are like the troubled sea when its waters cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." "For whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye, endure chastening, God dealth with you, as with sons, for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons. Furthermore, we have had fathers after the flesh, who corrected us, and we gave them reverence; shall we not, much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and live? For they, verily, for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure, but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterwards, it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby."

Repentance is necessary, for all stand in need of it. Not that repentance which characterises too many professors of religion at the present day—which is caused by fear of the endless wrath of an offended God—but that repentance, or reformation, which is caused by the love of God shed abroad in the heart. For without this repentance or reformation, none can become holy; and without holiness no man can see [enjoy] the Lord.

Thus have I endeavored, as far as I am capable, to give the text its true signification; and to show that when rightly understood, it is in perfect harmony with other portions of Scripture. And notwithstanding the degraded state of Israel, and the long period of time which has elapsed since they were cast off; yet when the text is correctly interpreted, it does not militate against their final restoration. For when the compassionate Redeemer wept over Jerusalem, and beheld the approaching ruin which awaited the city, he lamented the fate to which they were doomed. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets and stonest them who are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered your children together, as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, but ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate." Dark, indeed, would have been their prospects had not the Saviour cast a ray of light around the future. "Verily I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, until the time come when ye shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

However miserable the condition, or degraded the situation to which they are reduced, yet so sure as revelation can be credited, the time of their redemption shall surely come. "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits) that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, there shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the Gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen." Thus, after the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in, (which includes all other nations besides the Jews,) is Israel's salvation declared in language that it would seem none could misunderstand.

Well then might Peter say, that the Lord had spoken by the mouths of his holy prophets, the times of the restitution of all things. If the time will come, when "all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord"—when "the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come unto Zion"—when "the Lord, shall wipe away tears from off all faces"—when "every knee shall bow" unto the Lord, and "every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength"—when "all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God"—when "all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest"—I say, if these times will come, how can any person say, that millions of the human family will wait out a ceaseless eternity, under the wrath and curse of a revengeful God? This I must leave for those to answer, who teach that doctrine. But let us, my friends, imitate the example of Abraham of old, stagger not at the promises of God through unbelief, but be fully persuaded, that what he has promised, he is also able to perform. For he will, "in the dispensation, of the fulness of times," "gather together in one, all things, in Christ; both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him"—and "he that is in Christ is a new creature; old things are passed away; and behold all things are become new."

Therefore, brethren, "let us be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." "Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us; and let us run with patience the race that is set before us; looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

WHO OF THIS GENERATION, WILL BE THE HONORED, THE REVERED BY THE NEXT?

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

I have lately met with some passages in the course of my reading, which led me to ask myself the above question. They were records of the past; and by logical and guarded deductions from the past, may we learn something useful concerning the future. I will present a few of these historical facts, and then, with a very few suggestions, leave them to the reflections of the thoughtful. I shall commence with the passage which first suggested the above inquiry. It is from the work whose title is quoted below,* by Dr. Smith, the author of "Divine Government."

Dr. Smith after some observations upon the immortal discoverer of the circulation of the blood, remarks, "Before the time of Harvey, a vague and indistinct conception, that the blood was not without motion in the body, had been formed by several anatomists. It is analogous to the ordinary mode in which the human mind arrives at discovery, that men's minds should have an imperfect conception of an unknown truth, before some one mind sees it in its completeness and fully discloses it. Having, about the year 1620, succeeded in completely tracing the circle in which the blood moves, and having at that time collected all the evidence of the fact, with a rare degree of philosophical forbearance, Harvey still spent no less than eight years in re-examining the subject, and in maturing the proof of every point, before he ventured to speak of it in public. The brief tract, which at length he published, was written with extreme simplicity, clearness and perspicuity, and has been justly characterised as one of the most admirable examples of a series of arguments deduced from observation and experiment, that ever appeared on any subject.

"Contemporaries are seldom grateful to discoverers. More than one instance is on record in which a man has injured his fortune, and lost his happiness through the elucidation and establishment of a truth which has given him immortality. It may be that there are physical truths yet to be brought to light, to say nothing of new applications of old truths, which, if they could be announced and demonstrated to-day, would be the ruin of the discoverer. It is certain that there are more truths to be discovered, expounded, and enforced, which, if any man had now penetration enough to see them, and courage enough to express them, would cause him to be regarded by the present generation with horror and detestation. (Had not Dr. S. here in his eye, the doctrines of the sect which is every where spoken against?) Perhaps during those eight years of re-examination, the discoverer of the circulation sometimes endeavored in imagination to trace the effect which the stupendous fact, at the knowledge of which he had arrived, would have on the progress of his favorite science; and it may be, the hope and the expectation occasionally arose that the inestimable benefit he was about to confer on his fellow-men would secure to him some portion of their esteem and confidence. What must have been his disappointment when he found, after the publication of his tract, that the little practice he had as a physician by degrees fell off. He was too speculative, too theoretical, not practical. Such was the view taken even by his friends. His enemies saw in his tract nothing but indications of a presumptuous mind that dared to call in question the revered authority of the ancients; and some of them saw, moreover, indications of a malignant mind, that conceived and defended doctrines, which, if not checked, would undermine the very foundations of morality and religion. When the evidence of the truth became irresistible, then these persons suddenly turned round and said, that it was all known before, and that the sole merit of this vaunted discoverer consisted in having circulated the circulation. The pun was not fatal to the future fame of this truly great man, nor even to the gradual though slow return of the public confidence even during his own time, for he lived to attain the summit of reputation."

* "The Philosophy of Health; or an Exposition of the Physical and Mental Constitution of Man, with a view to the promotion of Human Longevity and Happiness. By T. Southwood Smith, Physician to the London Fever Hospital, to the Eastern Dispensary, and to the Jews Hospital." Vol. 1. p. 408. 12mo. London, 1835. This work is intended for the general reader, not the professional exclusively, being intended to give a brief and plain account of the structure and functions of the body, chiefly with reference to health and disease, and this is intended to be introductory to an account of the constitution of the mind, chiefly with reference to the development and direction of its powers. The present volume is confined to anatomy and physiology. It is written in a masterly and interesting manner, and illustrated by upwards of a hundred wood engravings. It is well deserving of republication in this country, to which the Messrs. Harper's or Carey will doubtless attend.

After reading and reflecting upon this morceau of history, it occurred to me to refer to the pages of the philosophic historian of England to learn his account of this great discovery and the discoverer. He says, "it was remarked, that no physician in Europe, who had reached forty years of age, ever, to the end of his life, adopted Harvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and that his practice in London diminished extremely, from the reproach drawn upon him by that great and signal discovery. So slow is the progress of truth in every science, even when not opposed by factious or superstitious prejudices!" We have had occasion to make a similar remark as to the admission or adoption of new truths by persons "who had reached forty years of age." What physician above that age ever adopted or approved of the stethoscope—one of the greatest improvements in medicine? who above that age, ever did otherwise than scoff at the truths of Phrenology? what farmer above that age, ever adopted the late improvements in agriculture or agricultural implements? The discoverers or expounders of new views may learn from such historical facts, or from occurrences within their own observation, with whom they are most likely to succeed. Let such reflect and take advantage of the lessons thus taught them. From the junior portion of their own generation or from the next generation, may some, who think out of the usual routine, presume to expect the application due to their motives, talents, and character. It is remarked by some, that Cowley, the poet, though extremely corrupted in taste and manners, "was much more praised and admired during his life time, and celebrated after his death, than the great Milton." What, then, have some of this generation to expect?

The following anecdote seems so apropos to the purpose, that, though perhaps more in its proper place in a newspaper, it may not be misplaced here. A gentleman who had tested and recommended gypsum as a manure, told his servant to spread a small quantity of it secretly upon an adjoining piece of sanfoin, belonging to an old farmer, who vehemently decried it. The crop proved surprisingly abundant on that spot to which the gypsum had been applied, but upon discovering its occasion, the old man, instead of profiting by the circumstance, grew peevish, and wondered why his neighbor should have taken the liberty of spreading his new-fangled manure over his sanfoin, which, for aught he knew, might do more harm than good. The laugh, however, going against him, he determined to get rid of it by breaking up the sanfoin and sowing peas, when, behold! they also rose in judgment against him, so evidently on the gypsomed part, that he was constrained, though reluctantly, to acknowledge that "it seemed good stuff"; yet he was never known afterwards to lay a bushel of it on his land!

The men of this generation whose character will be revered and remembered by those of the next, will be, 1. Those who eagerly, ardently pursue after truth—those who love her more than father, mother, or other friends—who resolutely search for her as for her hid treasures—men who like Calvin, inquire not what was the opinion of Jerome, but what is truth? 2. Those who make great exertions, and great sacrifices in the prosecution or defence of the truth. To pursue and establish truth frequently requires vigorous efforts of the intellect, and heroic courage to despise the pains and penalties which bigotry inflicts on those who disturb her leaden reign. Almost all the discoverers and disciples of new views and new truths, have been sufferers in consequence. 3. Those who devote their time and talents to the advancement and amelioration of the human family. Such may be misrepresented by their contemporaries, but posterity will be just to their motives and deserts. Let us all strive for the approval of God, conscience and posterity.

EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

"Yet Michael, the archangel, when he contended with the devil, (he disputed about the body of Moses) durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, the Lord rebuke thee." Jude 9.

The apparent obscurity of this passage, and the difficulty of obtaining the correct meaning of the author, will readily be acknowledged by all who take the trouble of an investigation. Nor am I positively certain of the correctness of my exposition, though it appears to me the only one worthy of a rational and candid belief. Therefore, it is not my expectation to be able to remove every objection, or silence every argument against the opinion I entertain of this text. If I succeed in throwing any light upon this subject, and advance those ideas which will enable others to complete the triumph of truth over error, my object will be accomplished. What then should be understood by the archangel, who contended with the devil about the body of Moses? May we not understand the character named in Daniel x: 13, 21, and xii: 1? If so, what messenger, or angel is there intended? By an examination of the Scriptures, we are taught that the word angel has various significations. This induced Calmet to observe, that "the word angel is taken rather as a name of office than of nature; a messenger, an agent, an envoy, a deputy; first, personally taken, he who performs the will of a superior; second, impersonally taken, that which performs the will of a superior."

1. Personally taken, the word angel denotes a human messenger; for instance, 2 Samuel ii: 5, "And David sent messengers (Heb. angels) to Jabesh-gilead." "A wicked messenger (angel) falleth into evil." Prov. xiii: 17. "I send my messenger (my angel) before thy face." Matt. xi: 10. "And when the messengers (angels) of John were departed." Luke vii: 24. "Ye received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus, the prime messenger from God to man." "It seems, however, certain, from the Scriptures quoted, and from many others, that, personally taken, the sense of a messenger, or one deputed to act for him, is the genuine idea of the word angel, both in the Old and in the New Testament. Hence, therefore, Christ Jesus may well be called 'the angel of God,' he being eminently the deputy from God to man; the great angel of the covenant, Mal. iii: 1, the agent of God." If, then, Christ Jesus be the angel of God in an eminent degree, why may he not be the Michael spoken of in Daniel, and our text? When we consider the character and mission of our Saviour, and the important consequences of his embassy, there can be no impropriety in calling him the chief of messengers from God to man. The office of Jesus Christ is acknowledged to be superior, in every respect, to any other ever conferred by God upon any created being.

Having suggested that the Lord Jesus Christ may be the archangel who contended with the devil about the body of Moses, let us inquire, secondly, what are we to understand by the word devil? This word, like that of angel, has several significations; the most common of which is an adversary.—When taken personally, it may signify an opposer, an enemy; impersonally, that which opposes, the principle of evil. Most of the Jews were opposers of our Lord, and even some of his disciples he called adversaries, when they denied his name to obtain favor of the Jews. If we take the word devil in Jude personally, may it not apply to the Jews, or more particularly to the Jewish high priest, who was an adversary, an opposer, and a calumniator of our Lord and his Gospel; but if we take it impersonally, may it not apply to the spirit of evil, which worked in these children of disobedience. For myself, I consider the high priest of the Jews to be the devil, or adversary with whom our Saviour, the archangel, contended about the body of Moses.

We will inquire, thirdly, about the body of Moses, which was the subject of contention. That either Michael, or the devil, would consider the literal body of Moses an object worthy of contention, appears not only improbable, but altogether incredible. Nor are we under the necessity of believing such an idea. Allowing that our former suggestions are correct, as to the parties concerned in the contention, we may conclude, that, by the body of Moses was intended that in which Moses was most deeply concerned—the ceremonies and institutions of the Jewish lawgiver. This interpretation, is certainly consistent with the instruction of our Lord; for, on more than one occasion, did he reprove them (the chief priests and scribes) because of their rigid adherence to certain traditional customs, while they omitted the weightier matters of the moral law; such as justice, mercy, and faith. Upon the introduction of the Gospel, and the establishment of our Lord's reign, all those types and shadows of the ceremonial dispensation were useless; the object for which they were instituted being fulfilled in the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Hence, it being known to the Jews, that, as success attended the cause of Christ, so the destruction of their institutions became the more certain. It was, therefore, that the chief priests and such as held the reins of the Jewish church, felt the necessity of opposing our Lord and his doctrine. And it will be recollected, that the persecutions and afflictions, which our Lord suffered, originated principally from this quarter. Why, then, may we not suppose that our Saviour contended with the Jewish high priest, who was an adversary to him and his instructions, about the body, or ceremonial institutions, of Moses.

Lastly. According to the foregoing illustration, it may be asked, why durst not our Lord bring against the high priest a railing accusation? To which it may be replied, that his religion forbade it. On no occasion do we find him rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing. His practice was a complete exemplification of his doctrine. Nor did he ever desire to inculcate the principles he came to establish, by railing against the personal character of any individual. Secondly: had our Lord brought a railing accusation against the high priest, and, at the same time, been unable to confirm the same by the testimony of substantial witnesses, he would have been adjudged a transgressor, and considered deserving of the same punishment, which the proof of the accusation would have inflicted upon the accused. Such were the provisions of the law of his country. And, when we take all the circumstances into consideration, when we reflect upon the many difficulties with which our Lord was surrounded—the eagerness of the Jews to destroy his life and his doctrine—and, moreover, the evidence which he intended to leave for the confirmation of his Gospel, as well as the principles of his kingdom and government; we may easily perceive, why he durst not bring a railing accusation against those in power.

LICENTIOUS TENDENCY OF UNIVERSALISM.

"The doctrine of universal salvation is productive of immorality, and leads its believers into all manner of abominations, licentiousness and crime; and this, were there no other, would be a sufficient reason for my opposition to it." These were the words of a blustering opposer to the doctrine of God's unlimited grace, when requested to give some reason for his opposition. And thus we are told by almost every opposer; from the long-visaged D. D., down to the most humble devotee that officiates about the tabernacle: and they tell us too, with a dignified appearance of candor and honesty, which might lead an observer to suppose, that facts warranted the assertion. But let us examine for a moment. Our blessed Redeemer while on earth, gave us the following rule to judge concerning the good or bad qualities of a tree; "Ye shall know them by their fruits. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit; neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Wherefore, by their fruits ye shall know them." Matt. vii: 16, 17, 18 and 20. Let us apply this rule to the subject under consideration. That "immorality, licentiousness, crime and all manner of abominations"—are "evil fruits," no one will question: and if they are certainly known to be the true and legitimate fruit of the tree Universalism, then according to our Saviour's rule, we must admit that the tree is a corrupt one. In order to come to a correct conclusion on this point, let us refer to the history of past times for information. Did those who propagated their religion in days that are past in Asia by means of fire and sword, believe that God will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth? Were those who crucified the "Lord of glory" believers in the doctrine of universal holiness? Who instituted and practiced the hellish cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition, imbruing their guilty hands, in the innocent blood of thousands of the unfortunate and helpless victims of their infernal rage? Did they believe that "God is good unto all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works"? Who dragged to prison and to death, the primitive believers of Christianity?—were they Universalists? No.—No.—Not one of these interrogations can be answered in the affirmative. This "evil fruit," therefore, cannot be ascribed to the tree of Universalism; for all these were believers in the doctrine of endless misery!

If this examination is not enough, let us come down to our own day: let us examine the penitentiaries and prisons of our land;—let us peruse a catalogue of the names of those who have been guilty of crimes, at the bare thought of which, humanity shudders, and see if a majority, or even a small minority of them were Universalists. Why then do our opposers continue to assert, with so much vain confidence, that Universalism has a licentious tendency? When they see from plain facts, that its fruit is not evil, why continue to assert that the tree is corrupt? If, upon a fair and candid examination into the state of things as they even have been, and still are; we find that a very great majority of those whose crimes and wickedness have rendered them a curse and a scourge to our land, were believers in, and advocates of that most horrid and inconsistent dogma of endless misery, why not "render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's"—and conclude that, as the fruit of the tree of endless misery is altogether evil; the tree must according to our Saviour's rule, be a corrupt tree. "I speak as unto wise men: judge ye what I say."

"THEY SHALL BE FILLED."

The light and glory of the Gospel consist in the blessings which it confers upon mankind, by teaching them how to enjoy peace on earth, and by giving them the evidence of future life and glory.

We are informed in the Gospel that those are blessed who thirst after righteousness. Why? "For they shall be filled." How filled? With doubt, with fear? Does the Gospel promise that those who thirst after righteousness shall be filled with mourning and despair? Does it not rather promise that they shall be filled with rest, with peace and happiness?—with joy and rejoicing in hope of the glory of God? Yea, surely—this is what the Gospel of our Redeemer promises those who with right motives seek his kingdom.

But unfortunately for the well-being of humanity, this glory of the Gospel has been hid—this light of the Saviour's teachings has been darkened by the rude hand of superstition and bigotry. The veil of obscurity—of doubt—of ignorance has been thrown over this glorious light for ages; and man has been left to grope his way along in worse than Egyptian darkness. Not a ray of light has blessed him in his wanderings and gropings, save a few faint gleams which have at intervals shone through the crevices of patched-up, remodeled and ever-varying creeds.

Man has sought to fill his soul with that which giveth peace; but instead thereof, the corroding worm of discontent has preyed upon his vitals! Has some poor mistaken soul wandered from the path of rectitude, and found that there is nought but misery and distress in the practice of evil?—and does he wish to turn from his wickedness to a refuge where peace and joy shall be his comfort? He is directed to seek what he desires in the popular doctrine of the day. He does so. But alas! he cries, I am plunged into a worse situation than I was in before. I am now told that happiness is not to be found in religion—that I need not go there expecting to enjoy peace; for he who takes the yoke of Christ upon him is heavily burdened! O, it is a thorny road! briars spring up on every hand and goad every step of a Christian's life! But the wicked sail along through life with pleasure for their wafting breeze—prosperity attends them—they enjoy themselves in this world, and have nothing to trouble them! And here I am. I have tried the ways of wickedness, but there was no peace—I have bathed in the alluring and deceitful pleasures of the world, but they were vanity—I have floated on the tide of pollutions, but it was not smooth—I sunk in its depths—it rolled its foaming billows over my soul—I arose from its bosom, and sought refuge in religion. But here I am mistaken. They say there is no joy—no rest—no peace there! I have rolled sin under my tongue, oftentimes, but it was not a sweet morsel: and I fled to religion to satisfy the longing desire of my soul—but O, how mistaken! They tell me that sin's paths are those of peace! So that, turn which way I will, it is all the same—no peace—no rest—no happiness!

Poor deluded man! It was not religion to which thou fledst; for that gives comfort to the desponding mind. The refuge which thou didst seek, was not the Gospel; for that gives joy in believing—renovates—purifies—raises the sinking from the deep waves of pollution. The Gospel of our Redeemer calms the troubled waters of anguish—stills the commotion of the turbid streams of sin—it says, "peace, be still," to the wrangling spirits of earth. Thy guide, poor mortal, was false, blind, ignorant. He pointed thee to the creeds formed by creatures like himself; weak, finite and erring; instead of that God who is a strong refuge and a resting place. Hadst thou turned to the revelation of Jesus, thou wouldst have found rest to thy weary spirit—there may be found strong consolation for those who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before them.

Another individual, who has been the sport of chance through life—tossed in the whirlpool of skepticism, and whirled in the giddy heights and mazy labyrinths of a fancied philosophy, is called to mourn. The cold touch of death has laid low his bosom companion—the destroyer came, and she followed him to the shades of the dead. What is her condition? Utter nothingness! says his dreary system of philosophy—the abyss of nonentity! echoes from the same source. But this does not satisfy his desire. There is something in his bosom which revolts at the thought. The irrepressible wish that she may live—live on, till they shall again meet, whispers its accents in such soothing strains—in a pleasing melody which harmonizes so well with the secret longing of his soul for immortality beyond the grave, that he begins to believe that it will be so. Hope rises in his soul—he almost fancies that he can see the spirit of his lost companion soaring to worlds above—winging its way to habitations in eternity. His joy is too great to remain confined in his bosom, and he turns to a Christian friend, and says, taking him by the hand; "I can begin to realize the hopes of your religion. I can almost persuade myself that it is true. O! would that I could believe that existence ends not at death! would that I could be assured of reuniting with the dear friend whom the cold clods have covered from my sight on earth forever! Will you, my friend, give me the evidence I need? My soul aspires to the skies! help me to believe the truths of religion."

His friend commences. He proceeds to establish the Gospel history—advances the great improbability of Christ being an imposter; and if not a deceiver, then we may rest assured of the resurrection. For he not only taught it, but actually died, and rose from the dead as the first fruits of them that shall sleep.

The mourning man is filled with joy, "This is indeed, good tidings," he exclaims, "well may the Christian rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory, in view of the rich inheritance of man." But alas! His joy is to be dampened. For the friend continues by representing that although we shall be raised to life in a future world, yet some are raised to misery only, so long as God shall exist; while the others are to enjoy our Father's presence and peace forever. But the mourner anxiously wishes to know how he may ascertain whether a person is to be happy or miserable. He is informed that it is all uncertain—that if the deceased had been converted—born again—born of God, then there is some hope of a favorable reception in the habitation of heaven.

Plunged in a deeper gulf of despair than before, the mourner cries out—"vain is your religion! false are your pretensions! comfortless are your hopes! dreary are your consolations! Better is my philosophy! more consoling is it to think that the departed one is to remain a tenant of the grave forever—that she waste away and moulder into her native dust to be blown abroad by the winds of heaven, like the vilest reptile that crawls beneath our feet, than the belief that there is even a possibility of being raised from the silence of the tomb, to dwell in unspeakable anguish unending! O, vanity of vanities! it is all a farce! from nothing we came, to nothing we shall return!"

"Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted." But something besides interminable misery is necessary to give the comfort.—Something also, besides the chilling thought that annihilation broods over our race—that the gulf of oblivion shuts the scene of our existence in one eternal night! In all this, comfort is not to be found. How then is the mourner comforted? By the blessings of the Gospel—by the truth of the revelation of brighter scenes—a more serene existence in the mansions of our God.

It is not merely the fact of a resurrection, which is calculated to fill the soul with comfort; but that its subject shall be happy. It is not that we ourselves shall be happy; but that our families and friends will be so too. And all that ever did, or ever can assure us of this, is that it will be the portion of all mankind. All that can assure us that ourselves, our friends, or a single individual will be happy in eternity, also assures us that every intelligent creature will ultimately stand renovated in the presence of its God. This great truth alone constitutes the glory, the blessing and the light of the Gospel.

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

SECOND EXTRACT.

I have been repeatedly requested to publish an article or articles on capital punishments. But they are so interwoven with the principles of our criminal legislation generally, as well as opposed to the principles of the Christian religion in its purity, that I have felt too deeply my incompetency to do ample justice to the subject, and have, besides, an aversion as a clergyman to interfere with what may be deemed the sole business of the legislator. The following, however, is so pertinent, and so ably exposes the defects of our present system of punishing, that I give it with pleasure. True, in many cases, as Mr. Combe elsewhere observes, this country has made punishments more what they ought to be, than they are in Europe; but too generally, we yet punish on animal, instead of human or divine principles.

A. B. G.

Man possesses the same animal propensities as those of the lower creatures, and under their instigation, he inflicts punishment on principles precisely analogous to those under which they chastise. Indeed, it is curious to remark, that hitherto the criminal laws, even of the most civilized nations, have been framed on the principles of animal punishment exclusively. A thief, for example, breaks into a dwelling-house and steals. The reflecting faculties are employed to discover the offender, and find evidence of the offence. Judges and juries assemble to determine whether the evidence is sufficient; and if they find it to be so, the offender is ordered to be banished, imprisoned, or hanged. We are apt to imagine that there is something moral in the trial. But the sole object of it is to ascertain that a crime has been committed, and that the accused is the real offender. The dog and cock make equally certain of both points; because they never punish except when the individual is caught in the offence. Guilt being ascertained, and the offender identified, the dog shakes and worries him, and then lets him go; while man scourges his back, or makes him mount the steps of a tread-mill, and then turns him adrift. If the offender has been very presumptuous and pertinacious in his aggression, the dog sometimes, although rarely, throttles him outright; and man, in similar circumstances, very generally strangles him with a rope, or cuts off his head. The dog, in his proceeding, makes no inquiry into the causes which led to the crime, or into the consequences, upon the offender, of the punishment which he inflicts. In this also he is imitated by the human race. Man inflicts his vengeance with as little inquiry into the causes which led to the offence,—and, except when he puts him to death, he turns the culprit adrift upon the world after he has undergone his punishment, with as little concern about what shall next befall him as is shown by his canine prototype. The dog acts in this manner, because he is inspired by animal propensities, and higher faculties have been denied him. Man imitates him, because he too has received animal faculties—and because, although he possesses, in addition to them, moral sentiments and reflecting intellect, he has not yet discovered the practical application of these to the subject of criminal legislation.

The animal punishment is not without advantage even in the case of man, although it is far short, in this respect, of what he might obtain by following the guidance of his moral sentiments and enlightened intellect. Man as a mere animal could not exist in society, unless some check were instituted against abuses of the propensities; and hence it is quite obvious, that animal vengeance, rude as it is, carries with it results beneficial even to the offender, except where it puts him to death—a degree of punishment which, as we have seen, the lower animals rarely inflict on each other of the same species. Unless the outrages of Destructiveness, Acquisitiveness, Self-Esteem, and the other animal faculties were checked, human society would be dissolved, and by that result the offenders themselves would suffer more grievous calamities than under any moderate form of animal castigation.

The world is arranged, in so far as regards the lower creatures, with a wise relation to the faculties bestowed on them. Accordingly, animal resentment is really effective in their case. In consequence of their not possessing reflecting faculties, they are incapable of forming deep or extensive schemes for mutual aggression, and are not led to speculate on the chances of escaping detection in their misdeeds. Their offences are limited to casual overflows of their propensities when excited by momentary temptation; which are checked by counter overflows of other propensities, momentarily excited in the animals aggrieved.

HUDSON RIVER ASSOCIATION.

The Hudson River Association of Universalists met in Schenectady, N. Y., on Wednesday, the 14th ult., and after prayer by Br. J. Britton, appointed Br. M. Rayner, Moderator, and Br. I. D. Williamson, Clerk.

1. Appointed Brs. T. J. Whitcomb, D. M. Moore and G. Conant, a committee to arrange the order of public services.

2. Appointed Brs. T. J. Whitcomb, S. Van Schaack and Artemas Childs, a committee on fellowship and ordination.

3. The committee of discipline reported that no cause of complaint had come before them during the past year.

4. Appointed Brs. W. Bell, I. D. Williamson and M. Rayner, a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

5. Resolved, That this Association will hold three Quarterly Conferences between this and the time of its next session, at such times and places as the Standing Clerk may appoint.

6. Appointed Brs. W. Bell, M. Rayner, M. J. Bovee and S. W. Britton, delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes.

7. The following resolution was introduced, and after discussion was negatived by a vote of 11 to 7:—"Whereas, the United States Convention at its last session, passed a resolution recommending the subject of a theological seminary to the consideration of the Universalist public; and whereas, the Convention of this State has united in the said recommendation; therefore,

Resolved, That this Association approve the establishment of a theological seminary for the education of young men for the Universalist ministry."

8. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Br. Zenas Cook of Hudson. Report accepted.

9. Appointed Br. M. Rayner to preach the next occasional sermon. Br. W. Bell substitute.

10. Appointed Br. I. D. Williamson to prepare the minutes for publication in the "Universalist Union," accompanied with a circular.

11. Adjourned to meet at Duanesburgh, Schenectady county, on the second Wednesday in September, 1837. Prayer by Br. M. Rayner.

MINUTES OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE STEUBEN ASSOCIATION, FOR 1836.

Met according to last year's adjournment, at Howard Flats, on September 7, 1836, and after uniting in prayer with Br. Miles, organized the Council by appointing Br. G. Sanderson, Moderator, and Br. T. P. Abell, Clerk.

1. Appointed Brs. Wisner, Graves and Baker a committee for the arrangement of public services.

2. Received and read letters and credentials from societies and delegates.

3. Committee on fellowship and ordination reported that no business had been brought before them for transaction.

4. Committee of discipline reported—"no cause of complaint."

5. Voted, That Brs. J. Chase, jr., M. L. Wisner and Dr. A. Baker be the committee on fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year.

6. Voted, That Brs. W. Goff and C. Graves, of Howard, and James Bentley, of Pultney, be the committee of discipline for the same period of time.

7. Appointed Brs. Upson and Van Alstine, clerical delegates to the New-York State Convention for 1837.

8. Voted, That Brs. James Alley, of Howard, and N. T. Murdock, of Dundee, be the lay delegates to said Convention, with power to elect their substitutes, if necessary.

9. Voted, That a committee of three be chosen for the purpose of appointing Quarterly Conferences within the limits of this Association, during the interim of its session.

10. Appointed Brs. W. Goff, C. Graves and Z. Bradley said committee.

11. Voted, That a clergyman be appointed to deliver an occasional sermon at the next session of this Association.

12. Voted, That Br. S. Miles be appointed to preach said occasional sermon, with power to select a substitute.

13. Voted, That the resolution heretofore published by the Genesee Association, in regard to one Ira Spencer, be incorporated with, and republished in these minutes.

"Whereas this Council is informed that Mr. Ira Spencer has for some time past been preaching in the name, and under the pretended sanction of Universalists; therefore,

Resolved, To notify the public, that the said Spencer has not said sanction; that he is not, nor ever has been, in fellowship with this nor any other Association of Universalists."

14. Inasmuch as the cause of temperance is inseparably connected with the prosperity of Universalism—and inasmuch as it is the imperative duty of every professed follower of the Lord Jesus to be "temperate in all things," therefore,

Resolved, That we do earnestly recommend to every member composing this body, and to every Universalist in the world, a strict observance of the principles of temperance; especially would we urge them to forego the use of ardent spirits as a common beverage.

15. Voted, That all persons present, both ladies and gentlemen, be allowed to vote on the [following] resolution, disapprobating the establishment of a theological seminary.

16. Whereas the General Convention of the State of New-York, at its last session, called upon the several Associations, of which it is composed, for an expression of their feelings in relation to the establishment of a theological seminary—and whereas we feel no hesitancy in complying with the request of the Convention, therefore,

Resolved, That we, as lovers of equal rights and supporters of primitive Christianity, cannot, in conscience, approve the establishment of such an institution in our hitherto prosperous denomination.

17. Voted, That Br. T. P. Abell prepare these minutes for publication, and accompany them with such remarks as he shall please.

18. Adjourned to meet at Kennedyville, Steuben county, N. Y., on the first Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1837.

G. SANDERSON, Moderator.

T. P. Abell, Clerk.

[Ten preachers present. Sermons were delivered by the following brethren:—S. Miles, M. L. Wisner, T. D. Cook, L. Paine, G. Sanderson and J. Chase, jr.]

REMARKS.—The weather was very pleasant, the congregations quite large, and the singing good. Deep attention was paid to the public ministrations. More than once we saw the tear of gratitude and filial affection gracing the eye of the child of God, and we deemed that the heart was made glad.

Our friends received us with much good feeling and hospitality. We shared freely of their bounty. Long will they be cherished in our grateful remembrance.—Heaven grant that the seed sown may fall upon good ground, and bring forth an hundred fold. T. P. ABELL.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE ONTARIO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS—FOR 1836.

This Association met according to previous adjournment, at Geneva, N. Y., on September 14, 1836, and after uniting in prayer with Br. W. E. Manley, organized the Council by choosing Br. J. Chase, jr., Moderator, and Br. O. Roberts, Clerk.

1. Voted. That Br. George Smith, of Livonia, and Br. John Robb, of Penfield, be admitted members of this Council.

2. Received and read the letters of delegates from the different societies.

3. Heard and accepted the report of the committee of discipline, which was that there was no complaint.

4. Voted, That we append an exception to the eleventh Article in the minutes of the proceedings of this body for 1834, that the Article shall read as follows:

Resolved, That the Ontario Association appoint annually a standing committee on fellowship and ordination, to whom all candidates for letters of fellowship and ordination shall make application at least three months before the session of this body: Except in cases where all necessary information respecting the candidate can be obtained at the time of the session of the Association.

5. Voted, That this Council adjourn till 4 o'clock, P. M.

After convening according to adjournment, Voted,

6. That, whereas, facts within the observation of every one, prove that Universalist ministers are particularly liable to leave their families when they themselves shall be taken from this world, in want of the conveniences and necessities of life, therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Council, it is advisable to form a society, for the acquisition of a fund, the avails of which shall be appropriated to the assistance of widows and orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen who are left in indigent circumstances.

7. Voted, That a committee be appointed to draft a Constitution for the adoption of said society, and that Brs. A. Goodell, W. E. Manley and Charles Graves be that committee.

8. Voted, That this Council adjourn to meet again at this place, to-morrow morning, at 8 o'clock.

9. Met according to adjournment, and after uniting in prayer with Br. S. Barnes, proceeded to business.

10. Voted, That we recommend that there be as many religious Conferences within the bounds of this Association during the ensuing year as there are fifth Sundays in the year, and that a committee of three be appointed to decide where those Conferences shall be held.

11. Whereas the State Convention of Universalists, at its last session, called upon the several Associations of which it is composed, for the expression of their feelings relative to the establishment of a theological seminary—and whereas we feel no hesitancy in complying therewith, therefore,

Resolved, That we cannot in conscience approve the establishment of such an institution in our hitherto prosperous denomination.

12. Voted, That Brs. G. Sanderson, O. Ackley and W. E. Manley, be a committee to receive requests for letters of fellowship and ordination.

13. Voted, That Brs. O. Roberts, T. D. Cook and G. Sanderson be a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

14. Appointed Brs. Chase and Ackley clerical delegates to attend the State Convention in May next—and Brs. A. Goodell, of Fairport, and Benjamin Underhill, of Wolcott, lay delegates, with the privilege of appointing substitutes.

15. The committee appointed to draft a Constitution for the adoption of the before mentioned society, presented a Constitution on the plan of that adopted by the Central Association, which was adopted.

16. Voted, That Br. O. Roberts prepare the minutes of the proceedings of this body and cause them to be published, together with such remarks as he may deem proper.

17. Adjourned to meet at Victor, on the second Wednesday and Thursday of September, 1837.

O. Roberts, Clerk. J. Chase, jr., Moderator.

[Seventeen preachers present. Sermons were delivered by Brs. W. E. Manley, O. Roberts, D. R. Biddlecom, T. C. Eaton, M. L. Wisner and A. Peck.]

REMARKS.—The information received relative to the condition of the cause within the limits of this Association was cheering. There appears to be nothing wanting but a zeal proportioned to the greatness of the cause, to secure a complete triumph of the truth in this section. Indifference and apathy are more inconsistent in a Universalist, than in the believer of any other religious sentiment. Let this remark be seriously considered, and let the truth of it be manifested by us all, if we would wish to honor the cause of our Master.

The deliberations of our Council were in accordance with the spirit of our religion. The subject of establishing a theological seminary was faithfully canvassed, and a resolution passed disapprobating it: there were however a few dissenting voices. Let our brethren act decidedly on this subject, and either at once decide on establishing the proposed seminary, or reject the idea of it, so that it may be at rest; for we foresee no good resulting from a protracted and spirited discussion of it. A venerable servant of God once said, "Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." "Who-so readeth let him understand."

The establishment of a society in this and other Association for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Universalist ministers, left in destitute circumstances, has an interesting and important bearing upon the future condition of our denomination. Relieve our ministers from the chilling prospect that they must leave their wives and little ones to feed on the cold charity of the world, and what a weight of care, anxiety and gloom do you cast off of their minds. So forbidding is the future to many of our ministering brethren, and so seriously have some of them laid it to heart, that we have trembled for the safety of our denomination; but we rejoice that something is likely to be done to remove this difficulty in the way of our progress.

One brother was ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry. [Query.—Who?] May he be a faithful minister of the Lord Jesus. The services of the sanctuary were interesting and instructive, the congregations large, and we hope much good was done. On the whole, the season was one of rejoicing. May God smile on all the laudable efforts of his children to build up and extend from shore to shore the kingdom of the blessed Redeemer.

THE UTILITARIAN.

DEISM.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good?" Ps. lv. 6.

The term, deism, is commonly applied to mean those who believe in a supreme Being, but reject Christianity. As the only system of theism which is especially worthy of notice; and next in purity and correctness, perhaps, to the faith of the enlightened Christian theist; deism claims our present notice. Nor are its advocates few in numbers. Many of the so-called Heathen, the Mahomedans, and the deists of Christian lands, all may properly be classed under this general head. But confining ourselves to those who reject revelation, the question arises—Which shall we receive, God as revealed in nature alone, or God as revealed in nature and revelation combined? For "there be many that say, Who will show us any good" in believing in Christianity?

And here let it be remembered that Christians have all the beauty, and life, and light that nature can yield to our deistical brethren, in addition to what revelation yields. We give up nothing good in nature's lessons, more than they. And in addition to all they can derive from nature, we derive much that is invaluable from revelation. The religion taught by nature has been compared to the natural eye—that taught by the Bible to the telescope. The unaided sight reveals to us the moon and planets, it is true, but it is only by aid of the telescope we perceive their full glory, extent, magnitude, and probable capability of being inhabited. So by nature and human reason we may perceive and understand that there is a supreme Intelligence of wonderful wisdom, power and goodness, but it is only by revelation that we can learn that he is an infinitely glorious moral being—whose name and nature are love—whose mode of existence is universally spiritual—whose designs embrace the happiness of his creatures for the promotion of his glory—that he is the Father of our spirits, and designs making us universally holy and happy in a state of existence which is pure, spiritual and lasting as his own.

True; after revelation teaches us these facts, every circumstance in nature and providence confirms them, and renders assurance doubly sure—but before these things were revealed, what was the knowledge man had of God? Go to the highly enlightened and civilized nations of Greece and Rome—see their thirty thousand gods worshipped with drunken, lascivious debaucheries and cruelly murderous rites—faint imitations of the characters worshipped in temples, that, as specimens of art, are yet the wonder of the world. Go to Egypt, the store-house of ancient learning and the mother of mysteries, where, as some skeptics will tell you, Moses stole the system he taught as a revelation from God, and you will find all people bowing the knee to the crocodile and the lizard—the beasts of the field and the plants of the earth. Or go to the Jew, but partially taught in the counsel of Jehovah and the destiny of man—at the coming of Jesus he confined God to the land of Judea, and him the governor of the Jew, but the tyrant of the Gentile—while all he knew of the future world, was a few dreamy fables borrowed from his Heathen conquerors. Or go to the deist of Christendom, and what is his faith, but the doctrines he has pilfered from Christianity—what his precepts, but those of Christ—or what his hopes after death, but the extinction of conscious existence?

On this twilight gloom and chaos, the light of Heaven's revelation beams with rays of joyous tidings. It confirms all that nature teaches of God's goodness—explains all that nature shows of his wrath and anger—extends its blessings—expands its hopes—enlightens its darkness, and gilds with golden expectation all it taught us to wish for hereafter. More perfect, and excellent, and conclusive in its teachings than the volume of nature, its proofs of universal and everlasting goodness of God are stronger and clearer. Establishing the fact that God is the common Father of all, it teaches men that they are brethren, and should conduct toward each other as such. Teaching that happiness is dependent on the performance of duty, and an assimilation to God, it gives the strongest motive to be virtuous. And revelation alone, gives us full and certain proof that man shall live again, in a state where his joys will be purer and higher—where his faculties may expand forever and reach no termination, and where his knowledge shall never fail nor disappoint him. And operating thus by hope, and love, and joy, it has ameliorated present suffering, and purified from present evil, till it has become a dispute whether Christianity civilizes, or whether civilization Christianizes man—a question answered, however, by the voice of antiquity, and the history of womankind.

Rome was civilized—but Christianity was persecuted, until its glory departed from it, and barbarism again brooded over it. Rome and Greece were civilized, but Christianity it was that taught them woman was the equal, not the slave of man—his companion and helpmate, not his mere toy and plaything. And ever since then, the rights of women, Christianity, and the highest state of civilization, have gone hand in hand together among the nations of the earth. And the freedom of woman, and the excellence of civilization have been in exact proportion to the purity and simplicity of that system of religion, their cause. Hence we can safely point to every civilized nation ever known, in proof that there is some good in believing in Christianity. And though in all ages, its professors have been guilty of the grossest vices and barbarities, yet these crimes have been excelled in degree and number by those of the advocates of other systems, and of atheism—with this difference, however, that Christians cannot do evil without violating the spirit and precepts of their faith—precepts both negative and positive—whereas the former have no better standard than experience.

It is true, as our deistical brethren urge, that the Bible speaks of God as angry, revengeful, changeable, etc.—but does not nature do the same? Whence the storms and earthquakes, the floods and tornadoes, that desolate the earth, swallow up cities, and lay whole countries waste in desolation? Whence the alternate famine and plenty, the alternate prosperity and adversity, that so frequently visit the nations? Do they not come from the God of nature equally as from the God of revelation—do they not show equally the changing dealings of his providence—and do they not as equally visit the child and the adult, the innocent and the guilty, as did God's judgments of old upon the Jewish and Heathen nations?

There is, however, this difference in these teachings of wrath—in nature, they are the final, closing exhibition of God; in revelation, they are represented but as slight temporary evils, which are by no means the end of God's government. How differently then, to the eye of the deist and the eye of the Christian, appear the tokens of God's wrath exhibited alike in nature and in revelation! The earthquake rolls its terrors across the inner caverns of the earth, mingling sea, and land, and air in confusion, overwhelming cities and villages, desolating provinces, and destroying its hundreds and thousands and millions of lives. The young and old—the infant and its mother—the sage and the idiot—the vicious and the virtuous are alike overwhelmed with ruin, crushed, bruised, mangled and their cries and groans hushed in one common death, and they buried in one common grave. To the deist, that is the end of their existence—to the enlightened Christian, these are but the pangs of a birth into a better, more glorious and endless life. Is there no good in believing in Christianity?

Or, take a single case. The air grows dark—the heavens muster their legions of clouds, and charge their artillery with fire—the winds beat, the thunder rolls, and the ruins descend. As if in wrath, the God of nature sends his winged darts of fire abroad, here venting his rage against a tree, there against the cattle of the field, or the husbandman's winter stores. Suddenly, as if demanding a nobler victim, a beauteous, virtuous youth is singled out by a vengeful bolt, and sinks down, trembling and quivering, into the arms of death. That is all the deist sees—that is the closing scene of life! If he hopes for another life, what reason has he to believe that his wrath will not abide on the object it has so furiously and ruthlessly destroyed? To the Christian, it is not the closing scene of the victim's whole existence. We are taught a more cheering hope beyond.

Will the deist say that nature but teaches seeming wrath? How will he prove it, when pain and suffering are the close, and terror and gloom accompany? But the Christian knows, that not only the wrath taught in nature, but also that disclosed in revelation, are but the seeming appearances of God's providence—for in the first, they not only see a partial evil inflicted on one being, to procure a greater good to other beings, but they are taught that that evil is also merely temporary, and will terminate in universal, endless good. And in revelation, they are assured that these passions do not really, but only seemingly, dwell in the Deity; a lesson confirmed by the glorious result taught in the Gospel of his Son. Where can the deist find such lessons as these, except in Christianity?

Let our deistical brethren reflect upon these things with candor, and I am persuaded they will scoff no longer at these representations of seeming truth. And when they find the purpose of God in these things, declared to be the instruction and amendment of the nations, and that they are consistent with infinite and immutable love, I trust they will admit that there is great good in believing in God as he is represented in nature and revelation combined. "AN EVIL AND ITS CAUSE."

BROKEN APPOINTMENTS.

"It is a good rule that works both ways."

Br. GROSH—By a late number of your paper, we discover that some of your lay correspondents complain, that some of our brethren have not fulfilled their appointments, and wish you would not publish any more appointments for that vicinity, unless they can be fulfilled. We do not know but these brethren have sufficient reason to complain—and it is very possible they have always so performed their engagements, that what we have to offer will not at all apply to them. But we wish to take occasion, from their complaints, to offer some remarks which will apply to persons who have complained without cause, and who have not always been guiltless of the very things whereof they complain of us. Of such, only, would we now remark, that they must suppose we are made of sterner stuff than they are, and therefore can withstand the most violent pelting storms of rain or snow that Providence is pleased, now and then, to send us. Also, that neither we nor any of our families can ever be sick. Now be it known to all such, that we are but flesh and blood, and as long as they expect to be excused for not attending our meetings, because there happens a small shower that merely lays the dust, or by reason of a slight headache, we shall think that a storm which lasts all day, or a fever that confines us to the house for a week, is a reasonable excuse for our absence. We therefore, dear brother, claim the privilege of making a request, also, and hope you will publish it for the benefit of those whom it may concern.

We have frequently seen in your and other papers, notices of the formation of societies in certain places, or the erection of meeting-houses, owned wholly or in part by Universalists, many of them influential and wealthy men. They ask, very anxiously, if you cannot come, or send some one to dispense to them the word of life, and feed them with knowledge and understanding; assuring you that he will be cordially welcomed, hospitably treated, and kindly remembered. Well—in accordance with such a request, and on the strength of such promises, we once rode about thirty miles to preach to a destitute society, where we were kindly received and entertained, and our preaching, apparently, devoutly listened to. But when we took our leave of them, their remembrance consisted more in words than in deeds. A few shillings were handed us, accompanied with that old, threadbare excuse, "we are unprepared this time"—or else, (for I forget) which,) "our friends are opposed to taking up collections." Lately we made another appointment; but when the time came we could not leave our room, and consequently it was a "broken appointment."

But being desirous to atone for any disappointment we might have caused, as soon as we were well enough to attend to it, we made another appointment, and after riding between thirty and forty miles, and performing services on Sunday, we received, by the kindness of one person, one dollar, to cheer us on our homeward way, and sustain our family.

Now we do hope you will not publish any more requests of the above named purport, unless we can be assured they will fulfil their promises, and deal justly by us—for no reason can be given for their neglect of duty (see 1 Cor. ix: 11) and violation of moral justice and obligation. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

CLERICUS.

REMARKS.

I must also "take occasion from the complaints of" Clericus, to relate a rather provoking, but ludicrous instance of similar treatment, received by a friend who walked a considerable distance to preach to a destitute society. They gave him a miserable pittance, but excused themselves by saying, that as his horse wore out no shoes, and ate no provender, his expenses were but trifling! and let him "plod his weary way," back again.

But to another subject, to which this opportunity leads me—THE CAUSE of this evil. Br. R. O. Williams, in a late number of the Union, and an article headed "An evil and its cause," says that the reason why such cases occur, as Clericus complains of, is, "As a denomination we have frequently said hard things against 'the clergy'; and though we have referred to the Limitarian clergy, yet we have created a strong feeling against the clergy of every denomination, our own included. We have said much against 'priestcraft,' and 'priest-ridden people'; and not the least among the charges has been, that 'the clergy' are desirous of getting 'the loaves and fishes,' 'fat salaries' and good living. These things, it is true, have been said against the self-styled Orthodox clergy; but at the same time a feeling of distrust has been expressed by Universalist clergymen against clergymen of their own order. We seem to manifest but little confidence in the integrity of one another. The idea is conveyed, that if Universalists get the power, they will do just as Limitarians do. They will scramble for 'the loaves and fishes,' be hypocrites, engage in 'priestcraft,' and 'priest ride the people. If these things have not been said, they have been inferred from the language of Universalist clergymen."

After a few other similar remarks, he draws the conclusion, that "this continual cry about 'priestcraft' and 'fat salaries'.....has had no little influence in producing the evil complained of."

Now this is all true, as far as it goes—but it stops short of the primary cause, and rests only at the secondary or immediate one. Br. W. would not have us cease exposing "priestcraft," and all its abominations, merely that we might gain the confidence and money of the people. This, I am certain, is not the object of his article. He only thinks we may have accused innocent persons among our opposers, in crying them down en masse—and he is probably correct. He also thinks that our want of confidence in, and accusations of each other, is wrong. Perhaps it is—but what is its cause? Find this out, and you find out the primary and main cause of the evil complained of.

In my humble opinion, then, the want of confidence in one portion of our clergy, by the others, is this: Some of our ministering brethren have, for several years, manifested a strong disposition to introduce such "new measures" into our order as must necessarily overturn the present equal, easy and republican government thereof, (whether they know it or not,) and eventually take many of the equal rights and privileges of the laity from them, and vest the same in the clergy exclusively. These results may not be intended by them, but will inevitably follow the establishment of the "new measures." They urge these measures, without their being asked for by the laity—yea, in opposition to the wishes of the great lay majority, and to the remonstrances of many of the clergy. Consequently, a distrust of their "measures," at least, and a want of confidence in at least their judgments, must exist, not only in the minds of "many Universalist clergymen," but also in the minds of many of our laymen. Let Br. Williams trace this distrust to its source, and he will find it begin where I have placed it. And if it has the evil effect he speaks of—and that it has in part, I do not doubt—who is to blame? They who continue, as from the first, to oppose measures which always were full of evil consequences in other denominations; or they who, after crying them down as oppressive and unjust in other denominations, are now striving to establish them in our own, in order (as some of them urge) that we may be respected by, and on terms of equality with, those other popular sects?

I again repeat, I have much—very much confidence in the motives of these "new measure" brethren. I cannot and will not believe many of them mean any thing but good; for I know some of them to eschew what they believe to be evil. But I cannot see how what is "fish" among other denominations, can be "flesh" among Universalists. Human nature is human nature, and while we live in the flesh, let us pray, "lead us not into temptation."

"UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1837: containing statistics of the denomination of Universalists in the United States and the British Provinces; together with various articles illustrative of Universalism. Astronomical calculations by G. R. Perkins. O. Whiston and G. Sanderson, Publishers. Geneva: Printed at the Office of the Herald of Truth."

The above named annual publication has just made its appearance from the press. It contains 36 duodecimo pages—one quarter less than last year's Register, but with finer type and more condensed matter, and one-half the price of that for the last year. It contains, besides the Almanac and Astronomical calculations for 1837, the Plan of Ecclesiastical Government; Profession of Faith; List of Preachers in the United States and British Provinces; New Societies organized since the publication of the Register for 1836; Meeting-houses erected during the past year; an account of the different Conventions and Associations in the United States and the times of holding their annual meetings; a catalogue of all the Universalist periodicals and papers, the places where and persons by whom published, names of Editors, terms of publication, etc., etc., together with a number of well written articles illustrative of the doctrine of universal salvation. Some statistical errors of last year are corrected in this, some new information added; and, on the whole, though it is not as perfect as we could wish, owing to the impracticability of obtaining correct statistics of the denomination from all parts of the country, and the remissness of many in communicating to the publishers, such intelligence as is within their reach, yet it is a valuable and useful publication, and will be very convenient as a matter of reference from year to year. We hope the publishers will be rewarded for their labors, and continue to make some new improvements in the work every year, till it comes to be what our denomination both need and desire, a perfect Register.

Price of the Register $4 per hundred, 63 cents per dozen, 6 cents single.

D. S.

N. B. We expect a supply of the Register for this region will soon be sent on for sale to this office.

One of our subscribers at Hartwick complains that our paper does not arrive at that office regularly. The fault is not ours. We mail the Hartwick package regularly every Friday, the day before the date of publication.

Br. C. S. Brown has a variety of books, illustrating the views of Universalists, for sale at the Utica retail prices.

The Editor of the Universalist and Ladies Repository will please send current volume, from commencement, to Mrs. Phebe Smith, Williamsville, Erie county, N. Y.

THE SERMON

Published in to-day's paper, was written by our young brother, a short time previous to his death, while preparing himself to enter the ministry of universal reconciliation. It has been somewhat corrected—rather abridged—but not more than was deemed necessary for its appearance in print. A notice of the author's decease may be found in the Magazine and Advocate, vol. v, last page of No. 39. His aged and excellent mother is yet living in Batavia.

SELECT SCHOOL.

Mr. Nelson C. Powers has lately opened a school in the basement story of the Universalist church, in this city, for the instruction of young ladies and gentlemen in the English and higher branches of education. We are highly gratified to learn that Mr. Powers, as a teacher, gives perfect satisfaction, and hope our friends will give him the encouragement that his qualifications deserve.

REMOVAL.—Br. C. S. Brown has removed to Hastings, Oswego county, and desires all communications directed to him at that place.

LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—Mr. Joseph Ames, 2d, of Canton, St. Lawrence county, is authorized to collect and forward contributions in aid of the funds of the Liberal Institute.

AGENTS.—Rev. F. Hitchcock, Newtown, Ct., Rev. S. C. Bulkeley, Danbury, Ct., Ira Baker, West Almond, and Stephen Wilson, jr., Belfast, will act as our agents.

Br. A. C. Barry has accepted an invitation to settle with the society at Gaines, Orleans county. He will act as agent for the Magazine and Advocate.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. D. SKINNER will preach at Newville, on the third Sunday inst., during the day, and in the evening lecture on the subject of temperance; and on Monday, the 17th, preach two discourses at the Union church in Oppenheim—the first to commence at one o'clock, P. M.

A Universalist Conference will be held in the Baptist church at Beach's Corners, (Dansville,) Stenben county, on the 19th and 20th of October inst. Services to commence each day at half past 10, A. M. Br. A. Upson will be ordained during the meeting. Sermon by Br. J. Chase. The eucharist or "Lord's supper" will also be celebrated at the close of the meeting.

The friends of the place would earnestly invite all the Universalist preachers who can make it convenient to attend.

There will be a Conference of Universalist ministers at Sheshequin, Pa., on Wednesday and Thursday, the 19th and 20th of October, at which time it is expected that Br. G. S. Ames will be ordained. Ministering brethren that can possibly make it convenient, are earnestly invited to attend.

A Conference of Universalists will be held at Scipio Centre, on the last Wednesday and Thursday of October inst., at which time and place Br. H. Boughton will be ordained. Ministering brethren generally are invited to attend. Those ministers and friends coming from a distance will please call on Mrs. Jacob Morgan and Worden Babcock, by whom they will be directed to places of entertainment.

POETRY.

GOOD NIGHT.

BY THEODORE KORNER.

Good night
To the weary slumbers light,
Day draws softly to its close,
Busy hands now seek repose,
Till awakes the morning bright.
Good night!
Seek, repose,
Weary eyelids gently close,
Still, more still the lonely street,
The watchman's horn sounds far and sweet,
And the night bids friends and foes
"Seek repose!"

Slumber sweet!
Dreams of heaven around thee meet;
Him whom love torments by day
Shall the dreams of night repay;
Him, the loved one's voice shall greet
"Slumber sweet."

Good night,
Slumber till the day dawns bright,
Slumber till another morrow
Comes with all its care and sorrow—
Our father watches—fear takes flight,
Good night!—Good night!

DREAMS.

I believe that dreams are uniformly the resuscitation or re-embodiment of thoughts which have formerly, in some shape or other occupied the mind. They are old ideas revived either in an entire state, or heterogeneously mingled together. I doubt if it be possible for a person to have, in a dream, any idea whose elements did not in some form strike him at a previous period. If these break loose from their connecting chain, and become jumbled together incoherently, as is often the case, they give rise to absurd combinations; but the elements still subsist, and only manifest themselves in a new and unconnected shape. As this is an important point, and one which has never been properly insisted upon, I shall illustrate it by an example. I lately dreamed that I walked upon the banks of the great canal in the neighborhood of Glasgow. On the side opposite to that on which I was, and within a few feet of the water, stood the splendid portico of the Royal Exchange. A gentleman whom I knew, was standing upon one of the steps, and we spoke to each other. I then lifted a large stone, and poised it in my hand, when he said that he was certain I could not throw it to a certain spot which he pointed out. I made the attempt, and fell short of the mark. At this moment a well known friend came up whom I knew to excel at putting the stone; but, strange to say, he had lost both his legs, and walked upon wooden substitutes. This struck me as exceedingly curious; for my impression was that he had lost only one leg and had but a single wooden one. At my desire he took up the stone, and, without difficulty threw it beyond the point indicated by the gentleman upon the opposite side of the canal. The absurdity of this dream is extremely glaring; and yet on strictly analyzing it, I find it to be wholly composed of ideas which passed through my mind on the previous day, assuming a new and ridiculous arrangement. I can compare it to nothing but to cross readings in the newspapers, or to that well known amusement which consists in putting a number of sentences, each written on a separate piece of paper, into a hat, shaking the whole, then taking them out one by one, as they come, and seeing what kind of medley the heterogeneous compound will make, when thus fortuitously put together. For instance, I had, on the above day, taken a walk to the canal, along with a friend. On returning from it, I pointed out to him a spot where a new road was forming, and where a few days before, one of the workmen had been overwhelmed by a quantity of rubbish falling upon him, which fairly chopped off one of his legs, and so much damaged the other that it was feared amputation was necessary. Near this very spot there is a park in which, about a month previously, I practiced throwing the stone. On passing the Exchange on my way home, I expressed regret at the lowness of its situation, and remarked what a fine effect it would have were it placed upon more elevated ground. Such were the previous circumstances, and let us see how they bear upon the dream. In the first place, the canal appeared before me. 2. Its situation is an elevated one. 3. The portico of the Exchange, occurring to my mind as being placed too low, became associated with the elevation of the canal, and I placed it close by on a similar altitude. 4. The gentleman I had been walking upon, was the same whom, in the dream, I saw standing upon the steps of the portico. 5. Having related to him the story of the man who lost one limb, and had a chance of losing another, this idea brings before me a friend with a brace of wooden legs, who, moreover, appears in connexion with putting the stone, as I know him to excel at that exercise. There is only one other element in the dream which the preceding events will not account for, and that is, the surprise at the individual referred to having more than one wooden leg. But why should he have even one, seeing that in reality he is limbed like other people? This also, I can account for. Some years ago he slightly injured his knee while leaping a ditch, and I remember of jocularly advising him to get it cut off. I am particular in illustrating this point with regard to dreams, for I hold that if it were possible to analyze them all, they would invariably be found to stand in the same relation to the waking state as the above specimen. The more diversified and incongruous the character of a dream, and the more remote from the period of its occurrence the circumstances which suggest it, the more difficult does its analysis become; and, in point of fact, this process may be impossible, so totally are the elements of the dream often dis severed from their original source, and so ludicrously huddled together.—Philosophy of Sleep.

DO YOU ADMIRE NATURE?

Such is the shallow question which many are shallow or impious enough to ask, and as many foolish enough to answer. The traveller into the country, whether a pedestrian, equestrian or carriager, must make up his mind to hear the question asked at the hotel, or friendly mansion, by friend or stranger, "How do you admire the nature you are seeing or going to see?" The traveller to the city has the same daring query put to him—"How do you admire the nature you have seen?" Do you ask me whether I admire nature? Why not ask me, do I admire heaven—Jesus—God?

But do I admire nature? Yes—adore, revere, love it—not in itself—oh, no—but as the building of the infinite Architect, as the theatre of the great probation, as one bright link of the golden universe. Do I admire nature? Yes; I admire the artless melody of birds, sprinkled like the tinklings of silver bells over every hill and valley of the round globe. Yes; I admire the springing of the green turf, the flower dotted landscape, the perfumed breezes as from "Araby the blest." I admire the majestic march of the cloud giants, as they walk abroad on the wings of the wind—now merging from the hills, bending round the earth's huge convexity, as if to enfold her in their vast limbs. I admire the solid earth, speeding on its orbit with inconceivable swiftness, yet still as the cradle of a sleeping infant, bearing with it as on downy wings every least and tenderest creature without agitation or harm—beast, bird, fish and insect, man and his dwellings; the quiet valleys, the purling rivulets, the awful mountains. I admire the revolution of the rolling, mighty earth. How grand, how lovely, how solemn is it! Stand where you will, what wonders, beauties, revelations! In the forest what antediluvian hoariness! By the streams, what sprightly music of leaping waters! On the hill top, what gentle swaying and billowy motion of the air sea! At the ocean's side what solemn sounds eddying over the waters, what tired waves rolling into their haven, from some storm away, what folding of the pinions of the tempest!

I love the aged, the young, the stern, the beautiful, the full sea. I am awed by the great sky above, the great sky beneath me, the seen heavens above, the mighty unseen heavens below—no measure to the height, no measure to the depth! Let the imagination go forth. Let her glancing wing dart from star to star, from system to system, from universe to universe. She ever leaves the infinite behind her, she ever springs on to the infinite before her. Could she attain creation's outmost bounds what were there then beyond? What but God? And if God, then surely these worlds in which he exhibits his wisdom his power and his love,

Do you ask me then, whether I admire nature? Do not ask me, for to ask is to doubt. Admire with me in sympathising silence, the beautiful, stupendous, living universe, and remember that, glorious, as it is, it is but the faint and dimly discerned emblem of Him who made it.

A HINT TO PARENTS.

Were fathers and mothers apprised of the fact, that their offspring are correct informants at the bar of the public, of what they daily see, and hear, and experience at home, a sense of reputation alone, in the absence of higher motives, would induce them to amend their domestic discipline. Such at least, ought to be its effect. Children trained to obedience and attention in their own dwellings, will not, when they enter seats of instruction, leave those valuable qualities behind them. But, if they are neglected by their parents, they can scarcely fail to be strangers, as well to a sense of duty and decorum, as to a practice of them. In fine, when children are irregular, vicious or even sickly, the fault and misfortune are, in a much higher degree than is usually in agined, attributable to the neglect or mismanagement of those who have had the superintendence of them.—Calverell on Physical Education.

Those who have said that a blind fatality has produced all the effects which we see in this world, have uttered a monstrous absurdity; for what greater absurdity is there than a blind fatality which could have produced intelligent beings?—Montesquieu.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 29th of September, by John Parsons, Esq., Mr. GEORGE BARNARD, of Whitestown, to Miss JANE R. CALHOUN, of Oriskany.

In Wapensna, Tioga county, August 20, by Rev. G. S. Ames, Mr. C. V. S. BLIVEN, to Miss CAROLINE GAGE, both of that place.

In Royalton, July 17, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. JOSHUA SLAYTON, Jr., to Miss HANNAH RUSSEL, both of that place.

In Ridgeway, September 7th, by the same, Mr. E. W. SMITH, Merchant, to Miss HANNAH COCHRANE.

In Royalton, September 8th, by the same, Mr. AMOS BRATTON, to Miss BETSEY BROWNING.

In Shelby, September 15th, by the same, Mr. DANIEL BOWEN, to Miss DELANCY M. COX.

In Royalton, September 15th, by the same, Mr. HIRSH RICHARDSON, to Miss PHEBE COLE.

In Royalton, September 22d, by the same, Mr. NELSON NETHAWAY, to Miss PALICE HOVEY, both of Alabama, Genesee county.

In New-York, on the 15th ult., by Rev. J. Kennedy, Mr. PHILANDER SWEEDEN GRANT, printer, to Miss CAROLINE R. GREENE. J. H. A.

Also, in New-York, on the 19th, by Rev. Mr. White, Mr. NORWOOD BOWNE, printer, to Miss PRISCILLA C. BARRY. J. H. A.

DEATHS.

In Scriba, September 18, ANDREW L., son of Martin and Leonora Bacon, aged 7 months and 18 days. The consolations of the Gospel were imparted to the mourning relatives, on the 19th, by the writer. T. G. E.

In Oswego, on the 21st ult., AMY, daughter of Samuel and Mary Ann Lewis, aged 3 years, 11 months and 3 days.

She excited the admiration of all who knew her, by her pleasant and amiable disposition; and seemed to possess the understanding of persons of maturer years. She expressed her love for her school mates, and a little while before her death, called to her bed her mother and father and little sisters, and embraced each in turn in the arms of affection and bade them farewell, and then yielded her pure spirit to the hands of Him who gave it.

But the afflicted parents mourn not as those without hope. On the 23d, neighbors and friends came to mingle their heartfelt sympathies with the deeply afflicted mourners, who seemed to listen with interest to a discourse delivered by the writer. T. G. E.

In Hannibal, on the 23d ult., ASA E., only son of Mason and Almira Pierce, aged 10 days. The funeral ceremonies were performed by the writer, on the 25th, and a discourse was delivered from Luke iv: 22.

The Baptists refused the use of their church on the occasion. Their Christian kindness and boasted charity will be duly appreciated by a discerning community and a knowledge of it should be handed down to posterity. T. C. E.

In Elmira, N. Y., on the 12th ult., Mr. SIMON WYLIE, of Great Bend, Pa., a soldier of the revolution and a decided Universalist.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXVII. SPECIMENS OF A NEW TRANSLATION, ETC., ETC.—EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.—(Continued from §§ 18, 19, pp. 218, 220.) SEC. I. Paul introduces his letter with an appropriate salutation to the professor of Christianity at Rome, in the course of which he hints at the argument for Christianity from the accomplishment of prophecy, and from the resurrection of Christ, asserts his apostolical authority, and assures them of his cordial affection for them and his ardent desire to see them. Rom. i: 1-16.

Translation.—1. Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated to the Gospel of God. 2. (Which he had previously promised, by his prophets, in the holy Scriptures.) 3. Relating to his Son, who, by natural descent was of the seed of David. 4. But, with respect to the spirit of holiness, was declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead; even, Jesus Christ our Lord: 5. From whom we have received grace and apostleship, in order to the obedience of faith among all the Gentiles, on account of his name; 6. Among whom are ye, also, the called of Jesus Christ: 7. To all who are in Rome, to the beloved of God, to the called, to the holy; grace be to you, and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

8. And first, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world. 9. For God, whom with my spirit I serve in the Gospel of his Son, is my witness, how continually I make mention of you. 10. Always in my prayers requesting that by some means now at length, I may have a prosperous journey to come to you, by the will of God. 11. For I greatly desire to see you, that I may impart to you some spiritual gift, that ye may be established. 12. And this is my wish that I may be comforted together with you, through the mutual faith of both you and me. 13. Indeed, brethren, I am unwilling that ye should be ignorant, that I have frequently purposed to come to you, (though I have hitherto been hindered,) that I might have fruit among you also, even as among the other Gentiles. 14. I am a debtor both to the Greeks and the barbarians, both to the learned and the ignorant. 15. Therefore am I willing, according to my ability, to preach the Gospel even to you who are at Rome. 16. For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God for salvation to every one who believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

Commentary or Paraphrase.—Dear brethren, you receive this from Paul, a devoted servant or laborer in the cause of Jesus Christ, and an apostle called and appointed as were the other apostles, separated and commissioned to preach the good news from God, (which good news were foretold and promised by his prophets in the sacred books of his ancient people,) relative to the coming of his Son to save and bless the world, who, as was foretold, was born of a woman descended from David. This was his natural descent or lineage according to the flesh, agreeably to the predictions of the Jewish Scriptures; but with respect to his inspiration and prophetic character, he was accurately and incontrovertibly marked out and distinguished and demonstrated to be the Son of God, or the promised Messiah, by the wonderful and miraculous exertion of the divine power in raising him from the dead. This distinguishes him from all preceding prophets, and confirms him, my Jewish brethren, to be our long-expected Messiah, and the highest of the sons of God. From him, since his resurrection, have I received the distinguished favor of an apostleship, in order that, through my preaching him as the Son of God, the obedience arising from that belief may be produced among all the nations, this obedience to his precepts and conformity to his character being the natural consequence of a belief in his being the Son, and very image and manifestation of the invisible God. Among the number of which Gentiles or nations are ye also, illustrious Romans, having been and still being invited to believe in the mission and character of Jesus Christ: to you, with the rest, my apostolical mission extends. Being thus commissioned, and agreeably to the purport of my office, do I inscribe this epistle to all who are in Rome; and especially to those who are beloved of God—who enjoy those blessings which he has made the consequences of virtue and communion with his spirit,—to those who have been invited to become professors of Christianity, and to those who are already saints by profession: may the favor and peace of God be multiplied to you—may ye enjoy all prosperity and great peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, who is exalted at his right hand to rule over and control every event for good, until the times of the restitution of all things.

And, in the first place, I declare to you that I am grateful to my God through Jesus Christ, and praise him for all of you who have embraced the belief of the Gospel, that your faith in the divine commission of Jesus is so decided and conspicuous that it is spoken of throughout the whole Roman empire. In saying that I feel grateful for this state of your belief, I speak the truth; for I call God to witness my sincerity, who alone can judge of the fact—yea, with confidence can I call upon that God, whom I make it the business of my life to serve, with the utmost earnestness, in the propagation and enforcement of the goodness of his Son, to witness, how constantly I make mention of you, always in my prayers entreating for permission and opportunity that, by some means, now at length and after much waiting, I may have a prosperous journey to Jerusalem, by the will of God, and then to come to you. For I do assure you, my brethren, that I greatly, I may say, vehemently, desire to see you; chiefly that I may impart to you some spiritual or miraculous gift by the laying on of my hands, so that by this you may be established in the belief you have embraced, and fortified against recantation from the persuasion or ridicule of either Heathen or Jews. And this I propose, that I may be comforted together with you, by the mutual increase of our faith which these spiritual gifts will produce. Brethren, doubt not my sincerity, but give me credit when I again assure you that I have not only prayed but often purposed to come to you, though I have been hindered hitherto, for I long to have some fruit of my ministry among you Romans, as well as among other people and nations: for being the apostle of the Gentiles, I consider myself bound to preach the good news to the Greeks, however refined, and to the barbarians, however uncultivated—to the philosophic as well as to the more ignorant classes. Therefore, notwithstanding your great proficiency in learning and the sciences, I feel willing, according to my abilities, to preach the Gospel, and proclaim the glad tidings even to you who are in the metropolis of the universe, as is Rome at this day. For although the learned and the literary among you do pronounce Christianity to be foolishness, I am none ashamed of these glad tidings of the promised Prince. I am not ashamed, I say, of this new revelation, for I consider it the powerful means which God makes use of for working liberty, emancipation, progress to every one that believes and is fully influenced by it—to the Jew first, and likewise to the Gentile.

Notes.—Verse 1. It seems very natural, in reading this verse, that the question should occur, In what sense did Paul understand himself to be a servant of Jesus Christ, and for what purpose did he introduce the mention of it in this inscription of his epistle? Some, I have found, have thought he meant to indicate the great change in his character, viz: from being a persecutor to a propagator of Christianity, and that he mentioned it here to make those who may have heard of him in the former capacity, aware of the change. If we turn to commentators we will be told that the word doulos, translated servant, means literally a slave, and that Paul meant to say that he felt as if not his own, that his life and powers belonged to his heavenly owner, and in the employment of them he was his willing slave. Or that in the East the prime ministers and managers for kings, were called douloi, and that this honorable name denotes the high authority which Paul possessed in the kingdom of Christ, as one of his chief ministers. To us it has appeared that, if he had expressed the current of his thought at the time, he might have said, Once ye heard of me as the bitter enemy of Christ, whom I deemed no better than a deceiver and impostor; now, thank God, ye hear from myself if ye have not otherwise heard the news, that I have been miraculously convinced of my mistake, and that in consequence I have become no less decidedly a friend, a servant, a slave to him whose cause I once opposed. His character is so amiable and so excellent, I see in it so much that surpasses human and approaches divine excellence, how can I be otherwise than attached to such a leader? His cause is so sublime, so high, being no less than the redemption—the emancipation of man from the influence, the domination of error, ignorance, imperfection and every form of EVIL, and his transformation from present imbecility, guilt and infelicity, to a grandeur, a purity, and a happiness approaching to the Divine, that my soul is enraptured, captivated and enslaved in such ennobling service, and I am devoted, ready to suffer and to die, to help forward so glorious a cause.

A called Apostle.—It is generally understood that many of the Jewish teachers, that is, those of them who are inclined to mix up Christianity with Judaism, and who are on that account called Judaizing Christians, were inclined to deny the claim of Paul to the office and authority of an apostle. And as in this epistle the writer controverts several of the dogmas of these teachers, it is looked upon as very appropriate in him to assert his authority at the commencement. Jesus originally chose twelve persons to be with him to hear his sayings and be witnesses of his miracles and other deeds. These he made apostles, or persons sent forth to propagate the new revelation. They were endowed with supernatural powers to fit them for their office. They were all commissioned by Jesus himself. Before his ascension, Jesus did not supply the place of Judas. But after the ascension, the eleven judged it proper to supply his place; and for that purpose they chose Matthias by lot. But to ordain an apostle belonged to Christ alone; accordingly, some time after this election of Matthias, he seems to have superseded it by selecting and appointing another to be his apostle and witness in the place of Judas. This was Saul of Tarsus, who seems to have been selected on account of his fitness to combat with and overcome the obstacles and difficulties in the way of the conversion of the Gentiles.

For the purpose of making this persecuting unbeliever his apostle, Jesus appeared to him on his way to Damascus, and having thus, by his personal appearance, convinced him of the truth of his resurrection; he gave him his commission, (Acts, xxvi: 16; etc.), and endowed him with supernatural powers. On account of this appointment he was entitled to rank with the twelve. He was, therefore, called or constituted an apostle, as were the other apostles—in the same way and with equal power and authority. All this he meant should be present to the minds of those whom he addressed, when he called himself a called apostle. Separated, etc. See Gal. i: 15.

Ver. 3. Relating to his Son—"The Gospel is good news from God concerning the coming of his Son to save the world. Wherefore the Son of God is the subject of the Gospel as well as its author." How many thoughts crowd upon the writer's mind! He would fain insist upon the argument that Jesus is the Christ, or expected King of the Jews, because of his descent from the family of David; but in an inscription he can barely allude to it.

Ver. 4. Another brief allusion to an important subject. According his natural descent, Jesus was the Son of David; but in respect of his holy spiritual nature, he was the Son of God. Paul seems to have considered his resurrection from the dead as the most powerful evidence of this relationship of Jesus. To this proof of his moral and official character—of his being the son of the Blessed, Jesus had frequently appealed (John ii: 19); for asserting this relationship, did the Jews put him to death as a blasphemer; had he been an impostor therefore, God would not have performed this miracle to confirm all his pretensions. Let any one read the last five verses of the 27th chapter of Matthew, and the first fifteen verses of the 28th chapter, and he will perceive the great power of evidence with which Jesus was marked out and confirmed to be the Son of God,—and every thing else which he pretended to be, in consequence of his resurrection from the dead.

Ver. 5. Grace and apostleship we consider a pleonasm or Hebrew mode of expression for the office of an apostle. Charis, the word translated grace, frequently implies of itself the apostolic office, as in Rom. xii: 3; xv: 15. Gal. ii: 9. Eph. iii: 2 and 8. For what purpose was Paul appointed an apostle? To produce the obedience of faith; either in the sense adopted in the paraphrase, obedience from the principle of faith; or faith itself called obedience, Acts, vi: 7. Rom. xvi: 19, 26. Another mode of expressing the purpose for which Paul was endowed with the apostolic office is adopted, Acts, ix: 15, with which this may be compared. Dr. Macknight remarks that the rendering of this verse in the authorized or common version, besides being inelegant, is faulty in two particulars. For, first, Paul did not receive his apostleship by Christ—that is from God by the intervention of Christ—but from Christ himself, as holding the right originally of making an apostle. Secondly, upostasin tes pisters does not signify obedience to the faith but the obedience of faith.—The apostle received his office from Christ himself, that by preaching him every where as the Son of God and Saviour of the world, he might produce the obedience of faith among all the Gentiles, on account of his dignity and authority as the Son of God.

Ver. 7. We have given what appears to us to have been the apostle's meaning in the foregoing paraphrase. To all that are in Rome, he addressed his epistle, to the Heathens as well as the Jews and Christians, because it was intended to convince all them that Jesus was truly a teacher sent from God, and that the obedience arising from this belief would greatly exalt and improve the character and condition of every one who was influenced by it.

Saints: By this term Paul did not probably, mean those whose life was pure and holy, but only such as had separated themselves from the rest of their brethren around, by professing belief in Jesus as the Christ, and adherence to his doctrines and precepts.

Peace.—Commentators ascribe to this word meanings so various, that one is apt to rise from a consultation of them with more confusion than clearness of ideas. Every reader of Travels in Eastern countries, or of Novels, the scene of which is in the East, is familiar with the invariable salutation of these countries, Salam aleikum, Peace be with you. The disciples of Jesus when they went forth among the lost sheep of the house of Israel, adopted this universally employed mode of salutation, Matt. x: 12, 13, and Luke, x: 5. Paul in writing his letters did the same. "Great is Peace," said the Jewish Rabbins, "for all other blessings are comprehended in it." And this is undoubtedly the meaning of it here, as it is of the common salutation. And notwithstanding upwards of ten meanings are ascribed to the word by learned rather than wise men, a knowledge of its being the common salutation in the East, is to us more full of explanation than the whole of them. We think that it can scarcely fail of being remarked by a thoughtful reader, how much more full of indications of a reference of every good to God as its author, is the phraseology of Paul, than is the current phraseology of our times. Which state of feeling best becomes us towards Him, "who giveth us all things richly to enjoy"? We feel as if Paul was a more grateful and worthy recipient of favors than the great majority of moderns.—Throughout all his epistles this characteristic state of feeling towards the Author of all good may be readily observed.

Ver. 8. Not unusual with Paul to begin his letters with some conciliatory language.

World; the same that was to be taxed, Luke, ii: 1, viz. the Roman Empire.

Ver. 9. Without ceasing, making mention of you always in my prayers, is a tautology, as Dr. Macknight remarks, which in the above translation is avoided by joining the clause, always in my prayers, with the word requesting in the beginning of verse 10, with which it stands connected in the Greek.

Ver. 11. Extraordinary or miraculous powers could only be conferred by the apostles themselves, by laying on of hands.

Ver. 12. "As often as the apostles communicated spiritual gifts to their disciples, it was a new proof to themselves of the divine presence with them, and an additional confirmation of their mission from God in the eyes of others, both of which no doubt gave them great joy."—Macknight.

Ver. 14. All other nations except themselves were called barbarians by the Greeks. Barbarian meant no more at first than one whose language is unintelligible. But because the Greeks were a more cultivated people, and the Greek language was known to all the learned of other nations; the name Greek came to be nearly equivalent to learned, and barbarian to unlearned. Accordingly in conformity with the style of Hebrew writers, we have the second clause of this verse explicative or synonymous with the first. We prefer our translation of the second clause to that in the common version—wise and unwise—because the Greek words frequently have such a meaning, and because here it seems scarcely possible they were meant to convey any other. It is probable Paul meant, in this and the succeeding verse, to answer and remove the prejudices and objections of those who were of opinion that he avoided preaching at Rome, because he knew that he could not defend his doctrines before the audiences of learned and cultivated minds which he might expect there. He tells them, that notwithstanding their boasted genius and learning, he would boldly preach the Gospel to them as he did to those who were less learned—though perhaps not less wise. To the Greeks the Gospel appeared foolishness, and many in Rome seem to have thought that although Paul might be very ready to preach to barbarians and silly people, yet before such men as might assemble to hear him in the refined and learned city of Rome, he would be ashamed of such foolishness. But he tells them in—

Ver. 16. That they were mistaken—that neither before the learned nor the unlearned was he ashamed of the good news—of the Gospel of Christ. The reason why Paul was not ashamed of the good news which he was employed in proclaiming, we have endeavored to indicate in our paraphrase. We will have occasion in our paraphrase and notes on verses 17 and 18, to give fuller and more explicit views of this reason.

OCCASIONAL PREACHING—REPLY TO MINOR.

The reader will find in No. 37, certain objections preferred against the constitutional provisions of our Associations, regulating the duties of ministers, to which an allusion was made by me some time since in this paper. At that time I merely stated the circumstances under which the candidate receives his letter of fellowship, what these letters certify him to be, and then ask the question, "will one or two sermons in a year answer the object for which these letters were given, and to which they bear witness? Our anonymous friend has advanced two objections to the affirmative of this question, whether they are real or fictitious, I am left in as positive ignorance not only of the truth or falsehood of the two cases, but of the means to determine this question, as I am of the hundred reported renunciations of Universalists on their death beds that appear in tracts without name, place, time, etc. The first objection against requiring a preacher to devote any portion of his time to the duties of his profession is, that it may grieve a preacher of our order living in the writer's neighborhood, who has preached "to the satisfaction of the society in which he resides," and who has received "little or no support for preaching." Minor further informs us that he cannot collect more than eight or ten at a time to meeting, thinks he can write a tolerable old-fashioned hand, and do his little home business. I could almost wish that he had entered his own complaints against Br. Grosh and myself, rather than by proxy admitting these qualifications, in which case we would be willing to allow him some special privilege in the constitution. Our friend immediately adds, "that the time has been when" this preacher "surrounded by various discouragements has not preached more than one or two sermons in the year." Well then I am right glad to hear that our zealous brother has overcome those discouragements. He can now preach steadily to some eight or ten hearers, without the least expense to them. This is a happy state of things. Wonder whom these obnoxious constitutions and resolutions grieve the most, the preacher or the hearer? For one I avow my determination never to advocate any resolution that would disfellowship any preacher, possessing the fortitude, piety, and zeal of this man. It is my misfortune, however, that I labor under different circumstances, such an ungrateful society as the one in which Minor resides would soon starve me out of house and home. And were every other society of Universalists like them, it would be no small honor or favor to have them dissolve the fellowship formally subsisting between us.—Minor advises amendments to our constitution. Agreed. The first amendment I would propose, would be one calculated to wake up dead societies, where not more than ten turn out to worship God, and where even that number are so destitute of justice as to withhold from the laborer his hire. But Minor asks what should this preacher do to suit me. I answer, that if the preacher considers it his duty to preach at all to such a society, let him preach repentance toward God, till he can witness something like the Christian religion among them.

The second objection is the case of some preacher living within a thousand miles of Rochester, who once became discouraged, concluded to preach no more, resigned his letter of fellowship, and before a year came round received his letter again from the Association. This case if true, is just as it should be. The Association sustained its credit for veracity, by not certifying that the person was a preacher when he did not preach—and the preacher his honor, in surrendering that which required duties he was unwilling to discharge.—Therefore, all I regret in this case, is, that our friend had not continued this history down to the present time, that the public might become acquainted with the success and usefulness of his hero. To conclude, I only observe for the satisfaction of all, that I am not in favor of any measure or resolution that requires of a preacher to surrender his letter of fellowship, because some temporary circumstance may forbid his preaching, such as sickness of himself or family, old age, etc. If a man intends to make preaching his business, I am satisfied, but if some other employment to the entire neglect of his ministerial duties, I would object to it.

A CHAPTER ON SUNSETS.

There is no more lovely or instructive object in nature, than the setting sun. I may as well observe however, that I do not insist upon being the original discoverer of this fact. For "sunset" has been, from time immemorial, a fruitful subject of contemplation to the grave and the gay, the feeling, the enthusiastic, the speculative and even the indifferent, and also a prominent theme for the ready pens of all the poets and doggerel-chaunters that ever lived. Yet, like Malsherbes' roses, its freshness and beauty are undiminished, and it is as likely ever to remain an object of supreme interest to the eye of the contemplative as is "Sweet Home" to the ear of the sentimental. Their lives are synonymous.

The sun is acknowledged by all to be not only an object of great splendor, but also of great utility—useful in his rising up in dispersing the cold dews which have gathered upon the bosom of the earth—in brightening melancholy faces, and dejected flowers, and calling forth the melody of nature's "select choir"—useful in his noon-day radiance in maturing the offerings which nature lavishly prepares for ungrateful man—and beautiful in his going down. Alas, few have spoken of the use of the setting sun! Yet if his withdrawing rays have not appeared to the eye of the "outward man" as strikingly, or immediately beneficial to the visible things of life, we know that they are so notwithstanding; at least we that are philosophically given; and I think it may easily be proved that the impression of the sun's dying loveliness upon hearts that are not entirely adamant, has scattered many seeds of good through the moral world. I have known, for instance, those to whom nature had furnished but a moderate share of sympathy for their kind, and who entirely regardless of the injunction "weep with those who weep," have been affected to "unwilling tears" by the view of a pathetic sunset, and consequently with softened hearts were prepared to act a better part in life's drama. And I myself, (the reader will pardon a little of the egotism of the times,) when annoyed by my own follies and the weaknesses of those around me—for who can be always perfect or avoid discovering occasionally the weaknesses of others? even I have found, at these times, my mind so wonderfully composed and softened by a sunset stroll, that I might easily have been persuaded to give—as the old hymn hath it "all my goods to feed the poor," (by which I do not mean that my possessions are very extensive,) reserving only to myself a volume of Mrs. Hemans' Poems.

"Your sunsets are not so pretty as ours," exclaimed an eastern friend to me one day. I acknowledge the truth of his remark, for what can surpass the sun's parting glance from "the far-away hills of New-England?" But I told him of a spot where the prospect would appear to better advantage. Now every body knows that the rivers of Connecticut are with one exception, such as we of the Susquehanna State would almost blush to dignify with the name of creeks. The point to which I conducted my friend was within a few rods of the broad stream of which we are so justly proud. The noble King of Day had just "merged" from a dark pile of clouds and was seeking his hilly bed below the pines, where huge limbs were thrown over him like the arms of protecting giants. Far away 'mid the willow-finged islands were streaming long bright rays of "powdered gold," and deep down 'mid the fire-sprinkled waters it seemed as if a mammoth Vesuvius were struggling to rise above the earth with its destructive element. It was altogether a scene with which description has nothing to do, and so felt my enthusiastic and, I may as well add, skeptical friend. "Transporting!" he exclaimed in an ecstasy of admiration, "transporting! Oh, I feel in view of this what I never felt before—that there must be a God." Thus did a single sun-set achieve what many intelligent minds had long been endeavoring to do logically—viz: the salvation of an atheist from the error of his way.

Burns is said to have written some of his sweetest poems, 'mid highland sunsets. A still greater bard has since immortalized himself by similar inspiration, and one of still later date has written himself great in his own estimation, which is equivalent. And though he could get no farther than—

"The sun sunk to slumber in purple and silver,"

yet the exquisite coloring and poetic harmony of "purple and silver" (those royal favorites) convinced him that his talent was of too pearl-like a quality to minister to vulgar palates, and with this knowledge he became content, much, probably, to the disadvantage of all true lovers of the Heliconian fount. I have often thought if the sun were a living, feeling, thinking and withal vain being like some of the creatures for whose follies he might daily blush, he would have reason to be greatly flattered by the attention paid him at divers times and places. Temples have been built, and thousands of animals, insects and even human beings sacrificed thereon to his glory. He has had worshippers in many lands, and been praised by all, from the mightiest monarch to the lowliest flower. He has been honored by the titles of the gods of olden times, and to his broad bright valleys have many assigned the spirits of the departed. He has been called "The glory of the skies, The God of day, The King of heaven," and in more modern days he has received, and not inaptly, the appellation, "Old Universalist." With the latter title I should suppose he would be most likely to feel flattered; and after asking pardon for bringing this somewhat light essay to so grave a close, I would compare the sun in his retiring moments, to the dying Universalist. And what more striking representation of the death scene of a good and zealous professor of the "liberal faith," can there be than the setting sun? The clouds of earthly anxiety disappear, and the departing soul sends forth its intense and joyful light, till every object becomes beautiful in the heavenly reflection. The mourner's tears become pearls of rainbow brilliance, and the full heart sighs only that it cannot follow. The scene closes—the melancholy twilight comes on, but the moon of faith arises, gilded by the triumphant assurances of the departed, and the sweet stars of hope crowd thickly down the mind's rejoicing firmament.

THE PULPIT.

I find myself placed in a world, every where surrounded by creatures like myself—all possessing a similarity of feelings and interests—all alike subject to the control of circumstances—having similar passions, and beset with similar temptations, by which I am led to think the real difference between one human being and another must be far less than infinite.

Yet from the pulpit we are accustomed to hear proclaimed from day to day, that there are two classes in society—the righteous and the wicked. The one so pure and free from sin, that they merit a state of eternal happiness in another state of existence as a reward for their self-denial and godliness in this, while the other class merit, in every act, word and deed, a state of suffering infinite in magnitude and endless in duration.

Though this picture may seem more to apply to angels of light and the most wicked fiends real diaboloi, than to creatures having a sense of moral obligation, yet it is not more highly colored than the original from which it was taken, viz: Limitarian preaching.

There is moral evil enough in community, and men are far enough estranged from the true God; yet no beings in the universe, bearing the impress of the Divine Maker's hand, approach any thing near the dark description given of human nature by this class of preachers.

The Deity, when he had created all things, pronounced what he had made, good; but soon the serpent beguiled man from his state of primitive innocence, by causing him to believe that sin was sweet to the taste, and that he might (perhaps by repentance) escape all punishment. And will not the same or similar preaching produce the same effects that it did six thousand years ago?

Even if man were brought back to the original happy state in which he was created, let those thousands go forth proclaiming that it is possible to escape deserved correction for crimes, however great, and that sin, as it is now considered, is a "sweet morsel," yielding the greater amount of temporal enjoyment, how soon should we see the effect of error on the human mind?

But there is a redeeming principle in the land—it is mighty and will prevail. The best feelings and highest aspirations of our nature but second its march, and it being truth, and the will of the immutable Supreme, we believe that it will spread far and wide. As the small stone cut from the mountain, which shall break in pieces all the kingdoms of silver, brass, iron and clay, so truth shall overturn those theological cisterns which can hold none other than the waters of interminable woe; bring all the wandering sheep back into the fold of our Lord and his Christ: deprive the Devil of his ill-gotten power, and destroy spiritual death, the last enemy of man.

Then we may look abroad with admiration, and understand that all the works of the Deity fulfil the original design of him who is over, and in all things, to whom be rendered ceaseless praises now and forever.

THE OPPOSITION.

Let us for a moment look at the force arrayed against us, then may we in astonishment exclaim, "It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." 1. We have opposed to us the aristocracy of our country. Those around whom ten thousand others will fawn like sycophants, and consequently sacrifice mental freedom, and the right of judgment. They will believe any thing that is popular, and oppose any thing that is right, if it is unpopular. 2. The current of prejudice sets in strongly against us. Deeply rooted from long cherished opinions. 3. The untold millions of dollars actively employed in publishing tracts on the doctrine of endless misery, and several thousands of men, girls, and youths of both sexes constantly employed in their circulation. 4. As many millions also employed for supporting an army of missionaries to compassionately inform the Heathen, that God made them to be miserable forever. 5. Not least are the many sectarian colleges, academies, etc., all exerting their influence against us; yet, Universalism, (oh glorious name!) is onward, and ever will be, "for the battle is the Lord's."

Herald of Truth.

THREATENINGS.—Why not believe the threatenings of the Scriptures, as well as the promises? So says the opposer to the Universalist. Why not believe the promises as well as the threatenings? So says the Universalist in reply. The truth is, our Limitarian brethren are for making the threatenings contradict the promises. This is wrong. God has made promise of immortal felicity to his children, and he can never make any threatening that will contradict it. Let us remember this,

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

THIRD EXTRACT.

Having shown the nature and effects of merely animal punishments, and their few and partial advantages, Mr. Combe next proceeds to show the more numerous, greater and more extensive advantages of human punishment—or punishment inflicted in accordance with the reasoning, moral and religious faculties of man. These are also free from the great and abundant evils produced by the former, as he ably shows, and as the experience of our readers will readily enable them to perceive. I will only add, that the plan of making all our prisons and penitentiaries great moral hospitals for the reformation of criminals, is in perfect accordance with those portions of Scripture which represent sin as a disease of the soul—and certainly would be for the benefit of mankind, as more would be reformed—less vitiated, and the incurable be prevented from doing further injury to others and to themselves. Nor would the criminal—the wilful and deliberate criminal, be chastised one whit the less than he now is, in the proper sense of the term; while many a poor being, who should be sent to a house of refuge or an insane asylum, but who at present, by the ignorance of judges and jurors respecting what are called diseases of the mind, is sent to the treadmill or the penitentiary, would not be irreparably injured by wrong treatment. Much more might be said, but I must leave the reader to the extract, and to his own reflections upon it. A. B. G.

In regard to man, however, the world has been arranged on the principle of supremacy of the moral sentiments and intellect; and, in consequence, animal retribution is not equally effectual in his case. For example, a human offender employs his intellect in devising means to enable him to escape detection, or to defend himself against punishment; and hence, although he sees punishment staring him in the face, his hope deludes him into the belief that he may escape it. Farther, if the real cause of human offences be excessive size and activity of the organs of the animal propensities, it follows that mere punishment cannot put a stop to crime; because it overlooks the cause and, leaves it to operate with unabated energy after the infliction has been endured. The history of the world, accordingly, presents us with regular succession of crimes and punishments, and at present the series appears to be as far removed from a termination as at any previous period of the annals of the race.

If the world, in regard to man, has been arranged on the principle of supremacy of the moral sentiments and intellect, we might expect better success were moral retribution, of which I now proceed to treat, resorted to.

The motive which prompts the dog to worry, and the cock to peck and spur his assailant, is, as we have seen, mere animal resentment. His propensities are disagreeably affected, and Combativeness and Destructiveness instinctively start into activity to repel the aggression. The animal resentment of man is precisely analogous. A thief is odious to Acquisitiveness, because he robs it of its treasures; a murderer is offensive to our feelings, because he extinguishes life. And, these faculties being offended, Combativeness and Destructiveness rush to their aid in man while under the animal dominion, as instinctively as in the dog,—and punish the offender on principles, and in a way, exactly similar.

The case is different with the proper human faculties. Benevolence, contemplating outrage and murder, disapproves of them because they are hostile to its inherent constitution, and because they occasion calamities to those who are their objects, and misery to the perpetrators themselves. Conscientiousness is pained by the perception of theft, because its very nature revolts at every infringement of right, and because justice is essential to the welfare of all intelligent beings. Veneration is offended at reckless insult and indignity, because its desire is to respect the intelligent creatures of the God whom it adores, believing that they are all the objects of his love. When crime is presented to the moral sentiments, therefore, they all ardently and instinctively desire that it should be stopped, and its recurrence prevented, just because it is in direct opposition to their very nature; and this impression on their part is not dependant on the power of the criminal to offend or to forbear. Benevolence grieves at death inflicted by a madman, and calls aloud that it should be averted; Conscientiousness disavows all theft, although committed by an idiot, and requires that he should be restrained; while Veneration recoils at the irreverences even of the frenzied. The circumstance of the offenders being involuntary agents, quite incapable of restraining their propensities, does not alter the aversion of the moral faculties to their actions; and the reasons of this are obvious: first, these faculties hate evil because it is contrary to their nature, from whatever source it springs; and, secondly, the circumstance of the aggressor being a necessary agent, does not diminish the calamity inflicted on the sufferer. It is as painful to be killed by a madman as by a deliberate assassin; and it is as destructive to property to be robbed by a cunning idiot, as by an acute and practised thief.

We perceive, therefore, as the first feature of the moral and intellectual law, that the higher sentiments, absolutely and in all circumstances, declare against offences, and demand imperatively that they shall be brought to an end.

There is a great difference, however, between the means which they suggest for accomplishing this object, and those prompted by the propensities. The latter, as I have said, blindly inflict animal resentment without the slightest regard to the causes which led to the crime, or the consequences of the punishment. They seize the aggressor, and worry, bite or strangle him; and there they begin and terminate their operations.

The moral and intellectual faculties, on the other hand, embrace even the criminal himself within the range of their sympathies. Benevolence desires to render him virtuous, and thereafter happy, as well as to rescue his victim. Veneration desires that he should be treated as a man; and Conscientiousness declares that it cannot with satisfaction acquiesce in any administration towards him that does not tend to remove the motives of his misconduct, and to prevent their recurrence. The first step, then, which the moral and intellectual faculties combine in demanding, is a full exposition of the causes of the offence, and the consequences of the mode of treatment proposed.

Let us, then, pursue this investigation; and here it may be observed, that we are now in condition to do so with something like a chance of success; for, by the aid of Phrenology, we have obtained a tolerably clear view of the elementary faculties of the mind, and the effects of organization on their activity and vigor.

The leading fact, then, which arrests our attention in this inquiry, is, that every crime proceeds from an abuse of some faculty or other; and the question immediately arises, whence originates the tendency to abuse? Phrenology enables us to answer, from three sources, first from particular organs being too large and spontaneously active; secondly, from great excitement produced by external causes; or, thirdly, from ignorance of what are uses and what are abuses of the faculties.

The moral and intellectual powers next demand, what is the cause of particular organs being too large and active in individuals? Phrenology, for answer, points to the law of hereditary descent, by which the organs most energetic in the parents determine those which shall predominate in the child. Intellect, then infers, that, according to this view, certain individuals are unfortunate at birth, in having received organs from their parents so ill-proportioned, that abuse of some of them is almost an inevitable consequence if they are left to the sole guidance of their own suggestions. Phrenology replies, that the fact appears to be exactly so. In the Museum of the Phrenological Society is exhibited a large assemblage of skulls and casts of the heads of criminals, collected from Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; and an undeniable feature in them all, is a great preponderance of the organs of the animal faculties over those of the moral sentiments and intellect.

In the next place, great excitement from external causes may arise from the individual being pressed by animal want, stimulated by intoxicating liquors, or seduced by evil example, and from a variety of similar influences.

And, thirdly, abuses may arise from sheer want of information concerning the constitution of the mind and its relations to external objects. Persecution for opinion, for example, is a crime obviously referrible to this source.

I have examined the cerebral development of a considerable number of criminals, and inquired into the external circumstances in which they had been placed, and have no hesitation in saying, that if, in the case of every offender, the three sources of crime here enumerated were investigated, reported on, and published, the conviction would become irresistible that the individual was the victim of his nature and external condition, and penitentiaries would be resorted to as the only means of at once abating crime and satisfying the moral feelings of the community. The public err through ignorance, and knowledge only is needed, to ensure their going into the right path.—pp. 292-296.

From the Gospel Sun.

THE ANALOGY BETWEEN NATURE AND REVELATION.

It is perfectly rational to suppose that there should be an agreement between the works and word of God; for there must be one leading design in all the plans of God; therefore, the same wisdom and goodness must characterize both. It would be very irrational to suppose, that God would work on different principles in revelation from what he does in nature. Nature is from God, it bears the impress of its author; now if the word agrees with nature, it will also bear the impress of God. In speaking on this analogy, let me observe

1. It is seen in the mediatorship of Jesus Christ. We are aware, that infidels have denied any analogy here; and have maintained that God's sending his Son, was one of the strongest arguments against the Gospel. But they reason superficially. Mankind may be represented by a disobedient son, who wanders from home, into the paths of sin and folly, and becomes alienated from his father. If no one is sent to bring him back, to act as a mediator, it is doubtful whether he would ever return. So with mankind—they have wandered and become alienated—they need a mediator to bring them back. There is the more need of this, because they know not the way back—they are ignorant and need instruction—they are blind and need a guide—they are sick and need a physician. They are like sheep strayed from the fold, which run in every direction, rather than the right one.

The same analogy is seen in the appointed way of training up children. When born they are feeble and helpless, and parents are God's appointed agents to guard and protect, to nourish and support them; and without their agency, not a child could be raised. This agrees, too, with the appointment of the husbandman to till the earth. Without his labor and care, his pruning and improving hand, the earth would run wild with briars and thorns, and man would famish for the common sustenance of life. God, therefore, works by second causes; and in this sense every law and property of nature is an agent in his hand. The vital air and cooling spring, the falling rain and the distilling dew, the genial sun and the unseen wind, the scented flower and the bounteous harvest are all agents in his hand. Every thing which ministers to our comfort, convenience, improvement and happiness, from the highest sources of instruction down to the smallest things that minister to our wants, are agents in God's hands. We in our turn minister to the wants and improvement of those around us, and thus we become agents in the hand of God.

Why, then, I ask, should it be thought a thing incredible, that Jesus should be appointed a mediator between God and man? Do we not need his instructions—his aid—his guidance—his encouragement! Without these, should we ever find our way back to God, from whom we have strayed?

Yes, but says the reader, there is this wide difference between nature and the mediation of Christ. In nature, every thing tends to carry forward the divine purpose and is a minister to manifest his kindness, to convey his goodness, to reveal his wisdom, to develop his power; but in the mediation of Christ, the object is different. He stands, as it were, between us and God, shields us from his wrath, averts his anger, and suffers his vengeance; and thus acts upon God, instead of upon men, which destroys all analogy in the case.

Now, were it true, that such is the object of Christ's mediation, that he came to act upon God instead of manifesting his love, doing his will, accomplishing his purpose, and displaying his grace, we should be constrained to admit that there is no analogy in the case. But we are not trinitarians—we do not believe in vicarious atonement, but on the contrary, that Christ came to reveal God's love, and do his pleasure. Our friends, who believe in the trinity, must answer for themselves on this matter. We are not accountable for their errors. In contending with infidels, we must take the Bible as we understand it, and not as it is perverted in the various erroneous systems of the day.

There is then, a perfect analogy throughout, between nature and the mediation of Jesus Christ. Well, so far, the Bible bears the same impress of God that nature does; and those who believe in nature, as teaching the existence of God, should believe in the word of his grace also, to be consistent.

2. Another analogy between the word and works of God, will be seen by looking at the impartiality of the two.

In nature there are innumerable evidences of divine impartiality; and not a single law, or property, or production of nature teaches, that God is partial, or that he has designed to make some happy and some miserable. "The sun, in the brightness of his glory, diffuses light and joy through all the nations of the earth. He has no favorites to bless. He regards not in his course the little distinctions which prevail among mankind. He shines not on the lands of the great, forgetting to pour his beams on the lowly spot of the peasant. He lights up the Indies with a burning glow; he smiles upon the nations of Europe with a milder beam; and he shines on the hoary path of the Laplander, amid his mountains of eternal snow. The cloud, bearing in its bosom riches and fertility, pours its blessings upon every field without regarding the name or rank of its owner." Indeed, nature has no traces of a partial God.

All nations possess the same organic nature.—Light is pleasant to all eyes, harmony to all ears, and food is nourishing to all bodies. In no human system, whether of Greek or Jew, can you find an organ, given to be the minister of pain, the agent of evil. All nations possess the same intellectual nature. Some may be higher in the scale of beings than others; but all have the power of thinking, reasoning and remembering, and of course improving. All nations have the same moral nature. They have love, pity, kindness, hope, fear. There are none to whom the exercise of these powers is painful. On the contrary, they are sources of joy, they are ministers of comfort, to all people. This proof of divine impartiality is irresistible, for if God had been partial, he would have made the sun shine, and the rain fall, upon one and not another; and he would have given one organic, intellectual and moral powers, that would have been ministers of evil, while to another, he would have given those which would have been ministers of good. The Lord, therefore, is good to all.

Now how is it with the doctrine of Christ? Does this exhibit God as impartial? Look at its provisions—they are made for all people. Look at its invitations—they are unto all nations and tongues. Look at its laws—they are adapted to every capacity, suited to every rank, and productive of good to all people. Look at its precepts—they enjoin no duty, but what is for the good of man, and congenial to his interests. Look at its threatenings—they are designed to deter men from sin, and reform them when wicked. Look at its purposes—they embrace all the nations of the earth. Look at its promises—they extend to the children of every clime and color, the Heathen, and the uttermost parts of the earth. Look at its means of salvation—Jesus died for all—by the grace of God, tasted death for every man. Look at its effects—they are the same on Jew and Gentile. Not a soul can say, I have lived by the Gospel, been under its influence, and it does not suit me. On the contrary—all say it is a source of the highest joy, to which flesh is heir—it is suited to all hearts in all conditions of life.

Such then is the analogy between nature and the doctrine of Christ. They both alike bear the impress of God—are stamped with divine impartiality—are clothed with infinite goodness.

But says the reader, some deny this impartiality of God and his word. They tell us, that God has his favorites—that he only purposed to save a few—that Christ died only for a few—that God effectually calls only a few—that the Holy Spirit operates only on a few—that grace is sufficient only for a few. And therefore there is no analogy between nature and the doctrine of Christ. Now of this we must say, as we said of vicarious atonement—it is an error—an error which has given infidelity success—which has given the infidel the advantage in contending against what has been called religion. But we reject this error—and in contending with me, the infidel must take religion as explained by our denomination. He must oppose and disprove a religion, that is impartial—that knows no favorites, that makes God alike good unto all mankind. And if he is successful, he must refute nature, and show that she is a preacher of partial doctrines; for there is a perfect analogy between nature and revelation.

3. Another analogy between the word and works of God, will be evident by considering that they both make the divine glory consist in the greatest good of mankind.

David says, "The heavens declare the glory of God." According to this, the divine glory consists in the wise and perfect arrangement of all things for human happiness. The heavens are stretched out over the empty space, for man's comfort and happiness. They are lit up by undying lamps, for the same purpose. For this the sun shines, and the rains fall, and the dews distil. For this the earth is loaded with bounty, and clothed with beauty. For this its cooling springs flow with unfailing water, and the streams run with meandering beauty to the boundless ocean.

Every arrangement in nature, every provision, every law, every property, and every principle in the universe seems for man's advantage, his comfort and convenience. Here then is the divine glory. It is in providing for our welfare, in doing every thing with reference to our good. His glory is the glory of goodness, of a Father who loves his children, and who delights in communicating happiness.

Now in the doctrine of Christ, there is the same glory of God. There he is represented as a King, ruling in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of earth,—but ruling for the good of all, making justice and judgment the habitation of his throne. There he is represented as a Benefactor, opening the treasures of his kingdom and satisfying the wants of all. There he is represented as the Sustainer of all things, as the one in whom we live, move, and have our being. There he is represented as the Saviour of all, as sending his Son to give his life a ransom for all, to gather all things together in one, and to bring all the wandering varieties of the children of men, under one Shepherd, and into one fold. And in such acts of perfect love, such deeds of perfect benevolence, his glory is said to consist. Hence, referring to his death, Christ says, "Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee: And as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given." Now how has Christ to glorify the Father? The text just quoted gives the answer: by giving life eternal to all. Of the same import is David's language. "When the Lord shall build up Zion, then shall he appear in his glory." He shall appear in his glory, because the building up of Zion, reveals that knowledge and those views of God by which his goodness is manifested, his grace displayed, and his great purposes of love are revealed.

Here, then, is a perfect analogy between nature and revelation. Both make the divine glory consist in doing what a father should do—what a friend should do—what a merciful, kind and gracious being should do. It is not the glory of partiality, of cruelty, of wrath, of vengeance, of arbitrary power, but of unmixed, boundless, perfect, everlasting love. It is not a blood-stained glory—such a glory as dazzled and charmed the world in the dark ages; but it is the glory of these latter and better times, when men are estimated according to their goodness and mercy.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

When the aged patriarch Jacob was deprived of his three sons—Simeon, Joseph, and Benjamin—the deprivation overwhelmed him with excessive anguish of soul, and he expected to wear out the rest of his life in sorrow; and at last, to sink into the grave, the victim of unassuaged grief. He gave utterance to his agonized heart, by exclaiming—"Simeon is not, Joseph is not, and ye will take away Benjamin also. All these things are against me." Gentle reader, how do you think this good, affectionate father could have sustained the idea of the endless misery of his sons? Supposing some one had said to him—"Simeon is in endless misery, Joseph is in endless misery, and Benjamin must go there also!" how would the venerable Jacob have sustained such a message, if he had believed it true? He could not have sustained it! His heart would have been broken! He would have immediately sunk into all the horrors of black despair! But fortunately for him, the doctrine of perpetual woe was unknown, in his day. He could not have lived in modern times, a believer in Partialism. A temporal separation from his beloved children was more than he could endure. How fortunate it was for him, that he lived in an age when there were no very comforting, professed Christians around, to whisper in his ear—"It is very probable that you and your sons are separated forever, and that the gate of interminable misery has inclosed them in its dark pit, where deliverance can never come!" But this story was reserved for the cruel tongues of more recent times, and for harder hearts than good old Jacob's to believe. If this doctrine of an endless state of suffering be true, why did not God declare it to the ancient fathers? And why did not they weep over its horrors?

When the tidings of Absalom's untimely death were carried to his father David, although he had been an extremely undutiful and cruel son, yet the grief of his father was uncontrollable, and he exclaimed—"O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son." Had the tidings been:—Absalom is in endless misery;—what would have been their effect on the heart of David? Would he have said—O, well, is that all! then I can endure it! I am satisfied! I am at peace! I can praise God, for his mercy endureth forever? No. The heart that feared not the fierce lion, that quailed not before the vaunting Goliath, would have instantly been crushed, had he heard and believed in the tidings of the unending misery of his son. I will not attempt to describe the agonizing language which would have fallen from his lips, while his heart was breaking! David says, in Ps. lxxxv: 8,—"I will hear what God the Lord will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people, and his saints." David could not have believed that God spake the doctrine of perpetual misery to his people and his saints, for, surely, that would not have been speaking peace to them. There were those in David's day, who did not speak peace; but David knew better than to listen to their testimony. He went to God for instruction. He listened to the words of peace, which came from heaven, in the breathings of infinite love. This we should do.

How is it, careful reader, that the ancient fathers, who were under the legal covenant, which was called the ministration of condemnation, should never have expressed any concern about a state of endless suffering. They had wicked children, and a world laying in wickedness around them, who were, certainly, victims of endless misery, if there be any such thing. Yet we have no account, that any of those fathers, ever realized one moment's infelicity, arising from a belief in such misery. But people in the present day, who live under the New Testament dispensation, and what is called a more excellent ministry, are horribly concerned about a state of future, endless torment. Such people must have erred from the truth, "not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God," nor the mission of his Son, nor his purpose to deliver the whole creation from the bondage of corruption, and translate them into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. RETURN.

"Welcome back again," seemed to say every seared forest leaf on the Mohawk, and every known face in Utica, as I arrived here after an absence of three weeks; and this morning as I look out of the office window at our snow clad streets and roofs, and watch the rapidly descending flakes, it appears as if I had taken a nap something like Rip Van Winkle's long sleep, and woke up in the middle of a northern winter. However, I am at home with my family, (and rejoice heartily that I am,) and trust our readers have not missed me. Health is again ours, and neglected business will soon be settled. Br. Skinner is still cruising around the country, but I presume will not wish to wander long in such weather—is, in fact, expected home this week. Of matters and things in general pertaining to my journey, I will speak in another article, and thus conclude the annunciation of my return. A. B. G.

THE UTILITARIAN.

PAPACY.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good?" Ps. iv: 6.

Having shown the good there is in believing in every form and system of religion, respectively, above that which is inferior to it, from atheism up to Christianity, which is superior to all, I might rest from my labors. But there are two classes of Christians—the Roman and Grecian Papal, and the Protestant—and "there be many that say, Who will show us any good" in believing Protestant Christianity?

If religion be natural to man—the desire and relish for it placed within his heart and mind—and if the impulses of this desire are dependent only on the evidence presented and the convictions it produces—all of which positions are susceptible of the clearest proof—then is religion a personal thing between each man and his Maker, to whom, only, he is accountable for his faith. If in an error, yourself must bear the consequences of such error. Neither popes nor councils—presbyteries nor synods—conferences nor assemblies—churches nor priests can or will answer and bear the consequences for you. Why, then, should they read or understand the Bible for you? If you receive the faith they declare, it is you who must answer to your God and your conscience for doing so. But you will say you are fallible. So is each one of them. Every man is fallible—hence the necessity of going to God, and not to man, for your faith. But you say you go to, not a single man, but a body of men. And, pray, how many fallible men does it take to make up an infallible presbytery, assembly, conference or church? Believe me, it will require as many as the number of improbabilities that are required to make a probability. An infinity of them will not make an infallible body. But will you say that the church is guided by God's spirit, and is therefore inspired? Is it more inspired than the Bible? Can it give as good evidence of its inspiration, as God's revelation furnishes? And if God constantly inspires a church to teach his truth, why has he given the Bible unto men—especially when that church dares to contradict and set aside many things that God has declared in the Bible? Is it replied that Jesus told his apostles that they should go forth preaching and he would be always with them, even unto the end of the world? Admitted—but the church is not the apostles—and the phrase, "end of the world," should be rendered "end of this age or dispensation," as the best critics and commentators acknowledge, and as propriety requires—for the apostles did not survive the total dissolution of the Jewish age or dispensation, and consequently did not require the presence of Jesus to aid their teachings longer than until that period.

No, rely upon it, that as God has made us accountable creatures—each one accountable for himself—so he has made us accountable to Him only. For this end he has given to every individual of his offspring a peculiar temperament and organization, and made the operations of the mind dependent upon it. He has placed every one in a peculiar sphere of action, and circumscribed his agency (or power of acting) with it, and made his volitions dependent on the circumstances occurring in it. Having given to them reason, and ability to use it, God presents them with the evidences of his truth in the works of creation and providence around them, and in the works of grace within them. He gives them a directory of faith and practice—the record of his will—in his written revelation in the Bible; or stamps the spirit thereof—his unwritten revelation—on their hearts. Having done this in wisdom and goodness he wisely leaves them to the exercise of their will and understandings, accountable only to him for the result. What God leaves free and responsible, man has no right to enslave or deprive of its personal responsibility. Religion, therefore is a personal thing—made natural to each man by a desire and relish for it, in some form, placed within his mind—and dependent only on the evidences presented, and the convictions they produce.

Actions are cognizable by men—for men are affected by actions. But opinions and feelings can only affect him who entertains them. My faith cannot benefit an unbeliever of it—nor his unbelief destroy the benefit I receive from my faith. Hence no one can have a right to sentence and punish any one for his opinions and feelings. To God only can we be accountable for them—and that because he has given us the faculties and powers by which we believe or disbelieve. Every man, therefore, should read, reflect, judge and believe for himself, and for himself must he answer. I say every man should do this—for can it be believed that God has given us talents to be employed—to be buried in the earth of indolence and neglect? Wo to him who uses not the powers God has given him, in obeying his command to "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

Again. As all men are fallible—and as God has given to each an equal right and an equal directory to judge what is true—it is evident that no one is qualified and authorized to decide what is true, for all else. The responsibility of every one is great enough when he decides for himself, alone. Neither can many be more infallible than one. Hence, neither councils, churches nor other ecclesiastical bodies can be authorized to usurp dominion over the understandings, dictate to the consciences, or lord it over the souls of men. Destroy these principles of the reformation—lay aside these doctrines of universal freedom and equality in matters of faith—and you must avow what, if carried out into practice, would wash the nations of the earth in the blood of martyrs! And as their principles are recognized only in Protestantism, and denied in papal Christianity, I must embrace the former in preference to the latter.

It comes nearest the standard of nature—agrees best with reason—comes up to the standard of revelation. It leaves the mind all the freedom God gave it, and the judgment untrammelled as God wills it to be.

God requires no force-made converts—no slave-bound servants—no fear-paralyzed worshippers. Nothing external must force his children to him—they must come from the convictions of their own minds, and the impulses of their own hearts, or not come at all. However, they may draw nigh to him with their lips, if the heart be far from him, they are not accepted of him. He requires to be loved, not with the tongue and body only, but with the whole understanding, affections, and life. He asks his children to love him as he loves them, in spirit and in truth—not by proxy, nor yet in the person of another, or through the medium of another—but personally, and in himself.

Now as the religions termed papal, do not require such form and manner of worship, so must I be a Protestant Christian. If you would see the effects resulting from these different systems of Christianity, you must go to the nations where each is practised. The worshipper dependent on the priest, the priest on the bishop, the bishop on the archbishop or cardinal—and this latter on the pope or the council, makes too long and irresponsible a chain of proxies, substitutes, or mediums, before the poor sinner's confessions and prayers can reach the ear of his Father in heaven. His sense of responsibility to God is too often lost, before he begins properly to feel it. He worships so much by proxy, that he leaves to the priest the acts of devotion he had better perform himself. I am serious in declaring, that I believe nearly all the vice, and personal religious irresponsibility to every being but the priest, so very common in Catholic countries, is a necessary consequence of the papal religion. And the more the principles of papacy are practised upon, the more must these vices prevail—the more irresponsible to God will the people feel. I care not whether papacy be preached by the Catholic or the Protestant (falsely so called)—the effects will be the same. I care not also, whether the layman depend on a pope, through his priest—or on the assembly, or synod, or conference of his church, through his minister—it is all papacy—rank rebellion to the principles of the reformation. And depend upon it, my friends, that there is more lording it over the mind and conscience—more dependence on confessions of faith, synods, conferences, churches and priests—more rank papacy among professed Protestants, than many are aware of—more than these poor victims of papacy in the Protestant mask, are willing to own to their own hearts! Only let these principles of papacy in Protestant churches be carried out to consistency of practice, and the inquisition and persecutions of the Roman Catholic church will blush to see themselves outdone by the children, who are now so ungracious as to bellow most loudly against their parent as a "mother of harlots"! And harlots such children certainly are.

But I have said enough to show, not only the good there is in belief and practice of Protestantism, but the evils attendant on papacy. If any of you would see more of the latter, read any candid work of travels in a Catholic country—a sojourn even in the city of Rome itself, the very residence of the pope. A. B. G.

TOUR.

Be not afraid—I shall not write a diary of journeyings and daily events, but merely give a brief statement of the most interesting events I witnessed on my late journey, to the scenes of my childhood.

And firstly—the Convention. It was very gratifying, indeed, to meet so many brethren from the East and from the West—from the North and from the South—gathered together to consult and hear of the affairs of our Zion. And still more gratifying to form acquaintance with those often heard from but never seen, and to find them to be all that heart could wish. And yet more gratifying to meet old acquaintances and friends long tried and tried them unchanged in heart or head, save for the better—like old wine, the better for the keeping.

The news from every quarter was cheering indeed. Partialism is evidently relaxing its rigor and losing its hold on the public mind. Its doctrines are becoming more and more mild, and soon its revolting absurdities will seldom be named. It must eventually be changed into Universalism, even if it still refuses to take to itself that much despised name. On the other hand Universalism is beginning to exert its benign influence more and more on the hearts of its believers. Preachers dwell more on the love of God and man—and their hearers long for a greater social intercourse and Christian affection among each other.

Secondly—Concerts of Praise. I attended three meetings of religious conversation, singing and prayer in New-York, during, and the evening preceding the Convention, and was gratified with their proceedings. They were simply social religious meetings—no extravagance or undue excitement was visible in others or felt in my own mind. Of course, one of two things is certain—either their advocates have exaggerated in describing the extacies and fervors of such meetings held at the East; or, those Concerts of Praise were utterly different from these I have here named. I am inclined to "split the difference" in my opinion of these alternatives. I will add, since on this subject, that I am credibly informed that the meetings of this kind, held every week in Philadelphia, under the superintendence of Br. Thomas, are the same in character as those I attended in New-York. Consequently, they are a means of doing much good, and are not only unobjectionable but much to be recommended to every congregation of believers desiring social intercourse and a free influence of Universalism on their understandings and affections. But as to meetings coming up to the description given of such meetings at the East, may God save us from them.

Thirdly—the cause in New-York. The Orchard and Bleeker-street churches are in a prosperous condition—wealthy and influential—both owning large, elegant and well located houses for worship, and having for pastors, men who feed them with knowledge and understanding, and to whom they are much attached. The society in Duane-street is not quite as numerous nor as wealthy as a religious body, nor is their house as commodious, excellent and well located—but in Br. Pickering they are blessed with as able and excellent a pastor. Frequent ministerial exchanges between these three excellent brethren in the ministry, and an increasing social intercourse and Christian affection and fellowship among the respective societies, are uniting all our brethren in New-York into a compact phalanx whose united energies and influence must shortly produce great and favorable results. The Duane-street society are about to sell their meeting-house, and erect a better one in a better location, in which latter measure they will undoubtedly be much assisted by the other two societies. I cannot close my remarks on this subject without saying, that I witnessed nothing in all my journey that gave me more pleasure than the state of our cause in that city, and the prospective advantages therefrom arising.

Fourthly—the cause in Philadelphia. The two societies are large and prosperous, a state of things undoubtedly kept up by the active and untiring exertions of their excellent pastors, S. W. Fuller and A. C. Thomas. The Callowhill-street house has decidedly the best location to procure a large congregation, and I am informed it has the largest—but the quiet position of the Lombard-street house, and the antiquity thereof, give it the preference in my mind. I think, also, that though it numbers less, it does most. The external and internal repairs of their house, now in progress, are very great and expensive, and when completed the society will have expended about five thousand dollars, in seven years, besides supporting the preached word, for not one cent of which will they be in debt more than they were at the beginning. The German preacher named some weeks ago in our Record, still continues his services to crowded congregations, and will undoubtedly do much to liberalize those who speak his language and attend on his ministry.

In Lancaster county, where I visited, I found not much change in religious matters, except a waning of bigotry and prejudice. Br. Myers still labors as usual in all the region round about, and is doing much good by his occasional journeyings into Berks, Cumberland, Adams and York counties. But he is not supported—scarcely receiving enough to pay his travelling expenses—and being poor in this world's goods, he cannot visit them as often as his heart desires. Our friends there, few though they are, must learn that preachers cannot feed on air, and that if they would have the Gospel preached by any individual, they must aid him to do it. May they learn it soon, and practice it.

To conclude. I had a pleasant journey—a happy visit—found and left all my friends well—and returned with my wife and child in good health to find all well at home—for all which mercies and blessings may God be praised. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR.

By the following Circular it will be seen that the publication of this excellent and necessary work is to be resumed under the editorial care of one of the ablest scholars in our order. The United States Convention at its late session in New-York, recommended this measure by a unanimous vote, and from the general interest manifested on the subject, it is believed the work will be sustained. Let all our readers, who are able, subscribe immediately—they cannot expend two dollars a year better. Subscriptions received at this office. A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST EXPOSITOR.

The undersigned being a committee appointed by the "Rockingham Association of Universalists," at its last session, on the subject of reviving the publication of the Universalist "EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW," have attended to the inquiries prescribed by the resolution of said Association, and are able to announce, to the Universalist public the following result, viz: That Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d, can be engaged as Editor of the work, and its publication can be revived on condition that one thousand copies shall be subscribed for, at the former price, two dollars per year. The work cannot be published to make it what it should be, for a smaller patronage. The ministering brethren of our order throughout the United States, and others who may take an interest in the work, are requested to make an effort to obtain subscribers in their respective neighborhoods or circuits, and to send them as soon as may be to G. W. Bazin, Boston, or send him a statement of the number of copies for which they will severally become responsible. It is believed that the interest and credit of our denomination requires such a work, and that there are many who, for the sake of securing to themselves and the community the advantages of it, will subscribe for several copies, to be disposed of by them as they shall find opportunities. If it be published, it will be as heretofore, once in two months, payment to be made on the delivery of the first number. S. COBB,

OTIS A. SKINNER,
MOSES BALLOU.

The Universalist periodicals in the United States are requested to publish this Circular.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

The concluding card by Br. Smith was received and published during my absence at the South. As I trust I am not behind him in affection, I desire thus publicly to attest, on my part, the truth of his assertion, that we "have lost no friendship for each other." Justice to myself, also requires me to say, that in calling my second article "a column and a half" of "personalities," he has used a misnomer—it was not composed of personalities, but of personal matters, and of the motives he attributed to others as well as myself. He asked questions on these matters, and I answered them as courtesy required, and noticed his remark merely to correct his error in regard to those motives.

For his best bow for my compliments, I return him mine for his yet greater compliments to me in reply to my first article—and would appease his admiration of my courage in engaging him with such fearful odds in his favor, by remarking, that a good cause, in my mind, will give courage even to a coward, and strength to the weak. A. B. GROSCH.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

Just returned from abroad, the Knickerbocker, so often put by for a leisure moment to be then read and noticed, claims our attention. To say we have read it, would be claiming an industry we do not possess, but we have hastily looked it over, and find it, so far as we can judge, equal and even in its well known merits. It is gratifying to our pride as Americans to find such a work every month before us—and pleasing to our literary taste to find it unpolluted with the sectarian, nearly worn-out and dying dogmas of total depravity, Adam's immortality in Eden, vicarious atonement, vindictive justice, imputed righteousness, and some others with which the New-York Mirror frequently disgraces its columns. Let our literary journals attend to their own department—when their readers want religious instruction they will subscribe for a religious journal—and until they ask Editors of literary papers to cater for their Sunday evening readings, it is but an imposition to fill literary journals with the dogmas of dark monkish ages. Such at least is our opinion of the matter. The Mirror in every other respect is an excellent paper—the Knickerbocker in all respects has always been the same; and from what we have seen of the number for the present month, we do not fear a change of our opinion respecting its delicacy and prudence on the subject of religion, nor of its claims to the patronage and support of lovers of literature of all denominations. A. B. G.

COME AND BUY.

We have just received for sale at this office, The Register and Almanac for 1837—An Argument for Christianity, by Br. I. D. Williamson, of Albany, at 50 cents single—a most excellent work, and a new supply of the admirable Discussion between Br. Thomas and Fly, at $6. (not $5. as published in a former paper) per dozen, or 63 cents single. More new books expected, soon. A. B. G.

ERRATA.—In the first obituary notice in No. 37, an error occurred in the name—it looked as if spelled Thewing in the manuscript, but was really written Thwing, which is the proper name. The name being unusual, led us into the mistake. A. B. G.

The publishers of the Sentinel and Star in the West will please discontinue my paper for the present as I am about removing to Ohio. J. WHITNEY.

LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—The Treasurer of the Clinton Liberal Institute acknowledges a subscription of one hundred and thirty-eight dollars from Russia and Newport, Herkimer county—and the receipt of five dollars and fifty cents from Leyden, by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. W. Sias at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening—Br. C. S. Brown at Sylvan Springs—Br. WAGGONER at Cedarville—Br. WOOLLEY at Howlet Hill and Br. DINSMORE at Hamilton—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. WAGGONER at Salisbury Corners, and at Ingham's in the evening—Br. BRITTON at Pamela Corners at 10 A. M., and near Br. Woodruff's at 2 P. M.

A Universalist Conference will be held at the Union meeting-house, head of the Delaware, on Wednesday and Thursday the 19th and 20th of October. Ministering brethren who can make it convenient, are not only respectfully invited, but earnestly requested to attend. BRS. A. G. CLARK, E. E. GUILD and J. G. McADAM, will be present, and there will be preaching in the forenoon, afternoon and evening of each of said days.

A Conference in the Genesee Association, will be held the 29th and 30th of the present month, at Gainesville Centre, or at the Creek one mile south, as weather and circumstances render expedient. Gainesville is some six miles south of Warsaw. Ministering brethren belonging to this Association we hope will try to attend according to our united resolution in Council; and that our brethren from the Allegany Association and others who can make it consistent will accept an invitation. Will our brethren in Gainesville make some arrangements for the reception and entertainment of their visitors, and leave direction for their distribution with Br. Pratt at the Creek, and with Br. Hills at the Centre? Let the understanding be that public services will commence at 10 o'clock each day. ALFRED FECK, Clerk of G. A.

POETRY.

From the United States Gazette.

ELIJAH.

FIRST KINGS XIX: 11-13.

On Horeb's mount, Elijah stood,
A hurricane swept by,
With noise as of a rushing flood,
It echoed through the sky.
The mountains reeled, the rocks were rent,
Destruction filled the world,
The stubborn pines and oaks were bent,
And all in ruin hurled.
Elijah stood to hear the word,
And looked to see a form,
But nought he saw, and nought he heard,
God was not in the storm.
And still he stood on Horeb's mount,
An earthquake shook the world,
Mountain and river, rock and fount,
Were in confusion hurled.
Elijah stood, and veiled his face,
His God's commands to hear,
But nought disturbed the silent place,
For still God was not there.
Again a blazing fire came forth,
An emblem dread, of wrath,
And sweeping on from South to North,
Consumed all in its path.
Elijah bowed his aching head,
Now bursting with desire,
But all was silent as the dead,
God was not in the fire.
Again, there came "a still small voice,"
Borne softly on the air,
It seemed to say, "rejoice, rejoice,"
In whispers mild and clear.
And o'er his face, when that he heard,
His mantle close he drew,
With reverence bowed to hear God's word,
For that "small voice" he knew.
And at the entrance of the cave,
With solemn awe he stood,
Jehovah there his mandate gave,
For in that voice was God.

AARON S. PIGGOT.

A. FRAGMENT.

A being of superior intelligence, yet of sad and lonely aspect, was seen contemplating the dark mists of incomprehensible fate, as they rose from the ocean of human misery, and mournfully ascended the mountain of desolation and rested upon its ragged brow.

Dreary and desolate now the prospect, and neither the glorious rising of the morning sun, with the "ten thousand notes of nature's warblers," nor the softly descending showers of Summer, nor the sweet fragrance of the flowery plains, had power to chase away the heavy melancholy that seemed settling on his care-worn brow.—Though the distinguishing excellence of human nature was stamped upon his countenance, and though versed in every system of means by which its operations are affected; yet in moral darkness had he wandered upon the earth for many a live-long day—and now approaching the grave, he had sat himself down upon the verge of annihilation to contemplate the cheerless scene before him. Oh, blind fatality, why sport with the lot of mortals? Mysterious chance, by what unsearchable law dost thou affect thy purposes? Thus wrapt in contemplation, he sat gazing upon the ascending vapor, until his whole aspect bespoke desolation within.

Wretched mortal, look ye to yonder bright vista, just opening through the dark clouds of destiny and behold the glorious heaven! An angelic form of grace divine stands waving his pinions of transcendent beauty, and his beaming countenance reflects the light of everlasting day. A voice, sweet as if from angels harps, is echoed through the wide arch of heaven, and re-echoed down to earth, exclaiming, "The Lord God on high, reigneth;" yea, look again, on wings of love behold the heavenly visitant descends and gently lights beside the desolate being. A light, more resplendent than the morning sun shines round about. Ah, list—"Is not God in the height of heaven? behold the stars, how high they are!" In the wilderness of terror he starts from his grassy seat, and casts his wandering eyes about for a hiding place from the presence of the Lord. "Fear not," says the heavenly visitant, "for behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people"—"to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow death, light is sprung up." The tones fall gently on his ear, he turns him round to listen. "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible and we shall be changed, for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality."—He drinks deep of the joyful tidings, and they vibrate on every chord of his heart. His knee unconsciously meets the ground, his soul is instinctively raised in adoration to that great Jehovah, whose presence he realizes as the dawn of immortality upon his benighted mind. Ere the grave opens to receive him, behold him hand in hand with the celestial messenger, bearing the olive branch of peace, visiting the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions, binding up the broken-hearted, and softly whispering consolation to the afflicted.

THEY ARE ALONE.

An account of a sudden death of a little girl in New-York, thus concludes:

"This little girl was the last of the parent's family—they are alone."

Will those who read the above lines, pause a moment and reflect upon their import? Where once was heard the sound of childish mirth, the joyous life or the thoughtless prattle, there is now a mournful stillness. The parents whose labors to maintain a family were lightened by the reflection that their own children shared the produce of their labor, have no such reward for their toil—nothing to lighten the severity of their labor. At the morning's sacrifice, at the table's blessings, at evening's prayer, they look around upon the unwonted solitude, and smite their breast with renewed anguish, for "they are alone."

In sickness, who shall watch their feverish frames and minister to their thousand wants? Who shall hold the anguished head, or bathe the feverish brow? They shall have none upon whom to call, for "they are alone."

Death comes with double pain—there are none to receive the dying blessing—none to perpetuate the name and exercise the cherished virtues—no child to close the dimming eye, or to give dignity to death by natural tears—"they are alone."

What blessings has not Providence vouchsafed in children! Truly do they rise "up like olive branches," at once the source of honorable pride and the emblem of domestic peace.

"I live among mine own kindred," said the Shunamite woman, when she wished to express her means of happiness. All that met her eye were kindred to her blood—but when the blessing of a child had been super-added, she felt the kindred extended to her heart. When that child lay upon its mother's knees until it died, the anguished parent then felt the solitude of childlessness; she then understood that she "was alone."

Let us learn to cluster—let us become gregarious—our affections die without reciprocation—and he who has passed youth and manhood in the round of pleasure, or on the busy mart of trade, withdraws himself at length for enjoyment, but finds that he is alone. The man of forty years should find, wherever he turns, some face to cheer him with a smile, some tongue to bless him for favors, some heart that beats with gratitude.—U. S. Gaz.

MARRIAGES.

In Scriba, September 4, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. MARVIN ORMSBY, to MISS MARY BIRENS.

In Lebanon, on the 22d ult., by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. GREEN, of Allegany county, to Miss LYDIA LAZEL, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Clarendon, September 19, Col. WILLIAM G. BOSS, in the 61st year of his age. It is due to the memory of this man to say that he possessed the confidence and respect of all who knew him. And, though his sickness was protracted for several months, yet he manifested great composure and resignation of mind, arranging all of his temporal affairs and selecting the preacher to attend his funeral and the text for the subject of his discourse upon this occasion. A respectable congregation assembled on the 20th, to whom the writer extended the message of our Lord, recorded in John xi: 25, 26. C. B.

In Lebanon, on the 15th ult., CHARLOTTE, youngest daughter of Mr. Daniel Younglove, aged 18 months.—The writer of this notice attended the funeral and administered the consolation of the Gospel to those that mourned from Ps. cvii: 15. E. M. W.

In Hounsfield, Jefferson county, September 20th, Mr. JOHN THOMPSON, in the 46th year of his age. He had long been the subject of painful and distressing bodily infirmities, but, what is above all price, amid the waves of human wo, he had long been a steadfast believer in the all-controlling providence of that God who will cause all things, even pain and death not excepted, to work together for the final good and the immortal bliss of all his intelligent offspring. This faith gave him patience in his sickness and consolation in the hour of death. He was amiable and exemplary—as a husband and a father, he was one of the kindest and the best. He has left a most deeply afflicted widow and a youthful son and daughter, who feel that their loss is irreparable. God grant that they may feel that his grace is sufficient for them. His funeral was attended on the 21st, and the consolations of the Gospel were presented to a numerous congregation by the writer. J. F.

In Phoenix, March 28th, EATON A., son of Stephen and Mary Brooks, aged two months. A few weeks after, the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer to the mourning friends who believe and rejoice in the "unsearchable riches of Christ." They are cheered by hopes that anchor in scenes of joy and unfading glory—they enter into rest, and are the happy recipients of holy anticipations of future joys and endless life for all mankind.

In Fulton, August 6, GEORGE, son of Orvis and Lucinda Perry, aged thirteen months. Br. Cook attended the funeral and dispensed the word of life to the bereaved parents. May the richest of Heaven's blessings rest upon the mourners, and may they be resigned to the wise but trying dispensation of God, which has taken from them their lovely child to a world of unfading joys. PRIZE TALES AND ESSAYS.

PREMIUMS OFFERED AMOUNTING TO $66.

Still anxious to merit the patronage hitherto bestowed on them, and, if possible, an increase of patronage for the future, and by further improving this paper, render it more useful in the cause of God and humanity, the subscribers offer the above named sum of

SIXTY-SIX DOLLARS,

(all they feel able to offer,) in premiums for essays and tales, on the following subjects and conditions.

1. For the best essay, on the best practicable means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism—Twenty dollars.

2. For the second best essay on the same subject—Ten dollars.

3. For the third best essay on the same subject—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one year—or one, for two years.

[It is designed that the essay shall embrace the best means for teaching the principles of the Gospel not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent.]

1. For the best religious tale, embracing an illustration of the principles of Universalism—Twenty dollars.

2. For the second best tale, of the same character—Ten dollars.

3. For the third best tale of the same character—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one, or one for two years.

[The especial object or aim of each tale is left to the writer—but there must be one stated, worthy the principles embraced in it.]

Each essay and each tale to exceed three columns of this paper, in the largest type now used for matter in it; and not to exceed fifteen columns of the same.

The articles to be sent to the undersigned, free of postage, on or before the 10th day of December next, for submission to the decision of an impartial committee, and the after disposal of the proprietors of this paper. To do this properly, each essay or tale should be designated by one or more marks or mottos, and those marks or mottos should be enclosed in a separate paper, sealed, with the author's name within—this enclosure will not be opened until after the decision of the committee has been made.

In deciding on the claims of the various articles that may be submitted for premiums, the committee will be instructed to proceed in the following order with each.

1. Its adaptation to the object for which it is written. 2. The Christian feeling and spirit it breathes. 3. Its literary merit and finish. 4. Its grammatical accuracy and plain expression. 5. Its preparation for the press. 6. Its legibility in the manuscript. The article having the greatest number of these requisites, in the highest perfection, and in the order here named, (if coming under the conditions previously laid down,) will be preferred to all others. Those greatly deficient in them will be rejected altogether, even if they are the only articles of the kind that are offered.

The awards of the committee will be published in number one, volume eight, of this paper, with the names of the authors of the several preferred articles, and one of the articles pronounced the first best of their respective classes.

From the Universalist Union.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the General Convention of Universalists, at its annual session in New York, September 21, 1836.

BY WM. A. DREW, AUGUSTA, ME.

Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? Isa. xxi: 11.

As when the weary sentinels, that keep their faithful watch upon the battlements of a city during a night of storm, descend from their towers to confer together upon mutual duties and the signs of the times, so have we, my brethren, descended for a short season from our several posts on our spiritual Zion, to sympathise with each other in the mutual labors and responsibilities of our profession, and to "hold sweet counsel together" on the subject of our common cause. And, now, as the moral world begins to emerge from the long and dreary night of error and superstition, those who are here assembled, and those whom they represent, call upon us as faithful sentinels and shepherds, in the appeal of Dumah—saying, "Watchmen, what of the night? What are the signs of promise?" Where lurks the enemy of truth? Where lies danger to our cause? What monitions for the future are furnished by the history of the past?

We have now arrived, as it were, at a brief resting place upon the highway of laborious duty; it may not, indeed, be a "Jubilee," but as an annual Sabbath it cannot fail to be regarded as a season of peculiar interest to us all. And shall we not, my brethren, in the very outset, pledge anew the sacred vows of brotherhood? Ay, let the warm hearts here assembled, be rendered still warmer by the fire of divine love, till they shall meet and mingle their spiritual joys in an offering of devout and united gratitude to God. Let the kindling of a generous, Christian friendship arise, and spread, until all the affections are baptized into the spirit of a cordial and an enduring fellowship.

I propose on this occasion—though with the disadvantage of a very hasty preparation*—to expatiate for a little upon the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, in connexion with the means which experience may have demonstrated, and which sound policy shall appear to dictate, as best to be taken for the prosperity of the cause of truth. And, standing as we are at this point of observation, with the history of the past to shed the light of experience upon the future, we may first review some of the monuments that wisdom or indiscretion has erected on our course hitherto.

Under this head, I shall proceed, 1st, To notice those things which, on the whole, have proved useful to the cause, and which, therefore, still commend themselves to our respect and acceptance. 2d. Those which appear, to me at least, to have been of doubtful utility, if not positively detrimental.

In speaking of the means to sustain the cause, I would not overlook the fact, that there is a self-preserving principle in the cause itself. Truth is eternal, and will assuredly triumph at last. The doctrine of universal love, resulting in universal holiness and happiness, is, indeed, the key which unfolds the glory of every divine proceeding. It is the only system that can "vindicate the ways of God to men," or furnish them with a universal and safe rule of faith, of hope, or of charity. It is, as it were, the life-preserver which sustains the soul after the wreck of all human fortunes and all human hopes. It is the cause of God; and as surely as that Being will vindicate and prosper his own truth, it will and it must prevail. But he works by means, and has made us the instruments of advancing his kingdom in the earth. It becomes us then to consult experience for such lessons as may prove serviceable to the future.

It has always seemed to me a propitious circumstance in our religious polity, that the denomination from the first, has every where—in this country at least—adopted the congregational or republican form of ecclesiastical government. This is in strict accordance with the relation which the Gospel has revealed as subsisting between man and man, and with the genius of the civil institutions under which we live. Christianity is essentially republican. It brings all to the level of a common creation, a common redemption, and a "common salvation." It teaches that we have all one Father, and hence enjoins the fraternal obligations and the fraternal duties between all the members of the human family. It allows of no earthly master. It comprehends men as equals and as brethren. "Be not ye called Rabbi; (said Jesus,) for one is your master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant." And even in submitting ourselves to the authority of Christ, we recognize in that authority purely a spiritual government. His "kingdom is not of this world." He seeks not to govern his subjects by temporal penalties. As a spiritual governor he rules in the empire of mind; and the object of his government is, by the energies of truth to seal the pledge of the new covenant, by putting his laws into their hearts and writing them in their minds—to the end that the fountains of sin may be dried up and their iniquities be forgotten. We cannot bend to any power short of Him who made us free. We cannot assent to any human authority in matters of religion. Under Christ, as our spiritual master, we recognize no power above the people. For this reason, we eschew Presbyterianism, and have still less reverence for Episcopacy; quite as soon would we subject ourselves to Papacy—for if we must have human masters—if we must bow at the foot of kindred clay—the fewer such masters the better. Let them be resolved into a single tyrant—a Pope, if you please to call him such—then will there be at least this harmony preserved—a body with a single head; and this advantage, a unity of laws with less danger of distraction.

It is in communities the most essentially republican, that liberty of thought and freedom of speech abound. And the whole history of our denomination has shown, that where free inquiry is the most rationally encouraged and practiced, there have our sentiments found favor, and there has the cause of universal grace most amply flourished. Why has this cause come up and flourished in the United States beyond its success in almost any other nation? Is it not because of the republican spirit that is amongst us? I may be an enthusiast—but I cannot resist the conviction, that the Almighty has other objects than the blessing of mankind with civil liberty, in the establishment of the institutions of our own country. I delight to regard the genius of those institutions as leading and preparing the way for the final triumph of that "TRUTH which maketh FREE INDEED." When liberty and truth were driven by the tyranny of princely power, to seek a refuge in the inhospitable wilds of America, it may have been so ordered in Providence, that, acquiring here a new and adequate strength, they should ultimately send forth an influence which shall humble the pride that drove them hither, and thus finally secure for them a universal triumph. At least the harmony between our ecclesiastical polity, and the spirit of the religion we profess, seems fairly to authorize a conviction that it must prove fortunate to the cause of truth. Under God, the cause is in the hands of the people. Let them realize the responsibility which is thus upon them, and their exertions in its behalf will correspond with that responsibility; and such exertions will not fail to receive the divine aid and blessing. All history shows that religion flourishes the best, and truth receives the most ready encouragement, when, with the least coercion from secular or ecclesiastical powers, the means for their success are committed the most immediately to the people.

2. The free, fearless and uncompromising spirit which has characterized the dispensations of the word of truth, I think has, on the whole, been found highly advantageous to the cause. Nothing is ever to be gained by a temporizing policy. "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord." Jer. xxiii: 28. Great respect and tenderness are doubtless due to the honest opinions of other men. We should never forget nor depart from the law of charity; but that policy which shows itself in trimming to suit the delicate ears of those who are shocked at a frank and candid avowal of the "whole counsel of God," is seldom consistent with honesty, and therefore is not to be commended. The attempt to enlighten and reform the world so slowly and cautiously, that the world shall become enlightened and reformed before it is aware of the fact, is a hopeless task. No reformation yet was ever effected without boldness and decision in the reformer. It was so with Jesus Christ. The establishment of Christianity was the work of the most dauntless and uncompromising master-spirit the world ever saw. He rebuked error faithfully. He attacked the foundations of the venerated institutions of the age, fearlessly. The reformation, too, under Luther and Calvin was the work of ardent, persevering, laborious controversy. They shrunk from no responsibilities. They shunned no perils. And they conquered. We have an example of the effects of a contrary course in our respected Unitarian neighbors, who, for the last twenty or thirty years, have been attempting to effect a total, but silent and gradual reform in Orthodoxy. And what has been the result? Has Orthodoxy been reformed? It may, indeed, have advanced some on the road of improvement, for so have all sects; public opinion is never stationary; but it may well be doubted whether any of its reform has been effected at the instance of Unitarianism. So far from enticing Orthodoxy out on to the grounds originally marked out for it by Unitarians, we do suspect the hope is now well nigh abandoned, and that the voluntary pioneers that so shrewdly offered to lead the way, are themselves retracing their steps and preparing to return to the original camp. I mention this for no invidious purposes. I employ the fact as an illustration of my subject. Let the course of Universalists be, as it has hitherto been, onward; and their own resolution will inspire the more timid spirits with that confidence which is necessary to their redemption also. Let no sacrifice of truth ever be made to policy; and the time shall soon come when every other consideration shall be sacrificed to principle,

* In justice to himself, the writer of this discourse claims the privilege here to say to the public, since the Convention has ordered its publication, that, though it is, indeed, a year since he was appointed to deliver an address before the Council at the present session, yet, owing to a press of personal and professional cares and labors, he was not able to devote any attention to the duty assigned him, till just on the eve of his departure from Maine for New York, and that the production—such as it is—is the hurried result of a very few hours labor.

and the truth shall "run, have free course, and be glorified," in the face of all the people.

3. The example which our denomination has set of challenging the freest inquiry into the truth of opinion, and the readiness every where evinced by Universalists, publicly and privately, to attend upon the arguments of their opponents, and to allow them as fair a hearing as they claim for themselves, has secured us a decided advantage over most others. This course has given the believers of our sentiments, what few others possess, a clear understanding of both sides of the great question at issue, which has happily prepared them to labor with advantage in the work of controversy. They have never hesitated to risk their doctrine in any company of opinions. The conductors, too, of our periodical publications, have made it a point, not only to admit, but openly invite men of opposite opinions to be heard through their columns. Such is the confidence which truth inspires. It never trembles and hides itself at the approach of error. The world notices these things, and forms its judgment accordingly; and that judgment is tending decidedly to our favor. A candid public will not be long in making up its opinion as to where truth resides, when it sees one party openly and ingenuously coveting inquiry, and the other striving to escape it. Depend upon it, he who dares not bring his opinions to the test of inquiry, has a reason for his dread; by this act he betrays a consciousness that his opinions cannot stand under the weight of an opponent's argument. I trust the time never will come, when Universalists will close their pulpits or exclude from their periodical press, respectable preachers and writers upon the other side.

But I have detained you quite too long—longer than I had at first intended—in expatiating upon those general characteristics of our denomination, which deserve to be commended and preserved. Faithfulness requires that we should look also upon the other page, and notice the errors that may, in any considerable degree, have hindered or retarded our cause, and against which we should guard in future.

And 1st. It is possible, that in the desire to vindicate ourselves and our principles against the opposition—often the cruel and unchastened opposition with which we are called to contend—we may have fostered a belligerent habit, that is little in accordance with the "quiet and peaceable spirit" that the Gospel enjoins, and which holds a most natural communion with our religious faith. True, we are required to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints"—and I pray God none of us may ever shrink from the performance of this plain duty—at the same time, we should not forget, that in every contest we serve under the Prince of Peace, and that it becomes us, emphatically, to discharge this, and every duty, under the influence of that hallowed system of truth which brings "peace on earth and good will towards men." If, when suffering under the effects of opposition, we flud the spirit of resentment awakened in our bosoms, and allow ourselves to indulge a belligerent temper, and to contract a habit of disputation, we shall be sure to sink the dignity of the cause and bring upon it a lasting reproach. Whatever habit the spirit of resentment may create—whether it prompts discourteous crimination, or wit or ridicule—it is manifest that these things are grossly out of place, especially in the pulpit, and can seldom be employed without injury to the cause they are intended to promote.

There can be no doubt, that the circumstances connected with the rise of our cause, have required a large proportion of polemical preaching. This, however, under all circumstances, should be practiced with much humility and caution, lest it cause us to overlook and neglect the great duty of encouraging a practical and evangelical piety.

Possibly there was a time when too many of our preachers were more ambitious to demolish error, than to establish truth. That time, however, has passed away; and now, happily, the effort every where, is, to cultivate and dispense the fruits of genuine faith. The times have changed. The grounds have been broken up—the rubbish has been removed; and under a well directed culture, we rejoice to see the natural tendencies of our religion exemplifying themselves in the spirit of a pure and holy devotion, and the exercise of a cheerful and practical piety.

2. I have sometimes thought we have erred in considering ourselves a sect, in the family of sects. In any sense wherein this term can have any just application to us, there are, in fact, but two sects in Christendom—Partialism and Universalism. The former, indeed, has been abundantly prolific, whereby a multitude of sects of slight variations, has been produced—numerous varieties of a common species. We, too, may be in danger of a similar multiplication in our grand division; but the idea of a sect, as applied to Universalists, is quite too restrictive to comprehend the great and extensive designs of our systems. I object to this designation, therefore, because it does not really comport with the magnanimous and philanthropic spirit of our faith. We look upon the world as our brethren—our sect is the family of man. We do injustice to ourselves, therefore—we degrade the lofty profession that we have made, when we consent to regard our cause as the bond of a sect only. A sectarian spirit is utterly inconsistent with the genius of our system. It is this spirit which has done immense mischief in the world—which has caused professing Christians to indulge exclusive and intolerant habits, to erect walls of partition in society not justified by merit, and to "Deal damnation round the land,

On each they judge His foe."

Be it ours to set a different example, and to labor assiduously to demolish all those fictitious distinctions in society, not predicated on real, sterling merit.

3. The reputation and success of our denomination depend very much upon the character, qualifications and efficiency of its ministers. As are the teachers, so will be the disciples. It becomes him who now addresses you, I know, to speak with a humiliating modesty, on this point—but may it not be, that in our eagerness to add fellow laborers to our ranks, our councils have oftentimes been quite too hasty in allowing the applications of candidates? I think there has been an error on this subject, and that it has led sometimes to embarrassing labor and painful results. The worthiness of a candidate can never suffer by a thorough examination of his character and qualifications; for the want of such an examination, there is danger that what was intended as a benefit, may prove a serious injury to the cause. It is possible, too, that in cases of defection, the painful work of discipline has sometimes been quite too long delayed. A fear to incur responsibility, and a dread of public reproach, have in some cases, to my own knowledge, protected the undeserving till the cause has suffered seriously at their hands. If there is any thing in an evil of this kind, let the errors of the past serve as a seasonable admonition for the future.

4. Though we must admire that feature in all our public councils, which makes their proceedings advisory and not obligatory, yet it may be apprehended that, in relation to many important subjects highly interesting to the cause, the votes of our councils have not engaged that practical attention to which they have seemed fairly entitled. We have seen the moral wastes around us, and endeavored to devise means for the establishment of an itinerant ministry; we have beheld the blighting influences brought to bear upon the rising generation, by existing institutions of learning, and have attempted to remedy the evil by resolving in favor of schools and seminaries of our own, indeed, in many ways we have marked out the course, and the marks are all which remain. The error here is, that public sentiment has been prematurely anticipated—instead of directing, we must follow, or bend ourselves in more private capacities to the work of awakening public sentiment, and exciting an interest, till the people shall call for the remedies; and then the work will be done.

But I will not longer dwell on subjects of this kind. The catalogue might easily be enlarged, but I am admonished that it is time we hastened to consider what the events of the times require at our hands.

1. Let the great point which distinguishes us from all limitarian sects, be kept steadily before the people. Let salvation be inscribed upon all the ample folds of our flowing banners. Never—no, not for a moment—let the doctrine of UNIVERSAL AND EFFICIENT GRACE be sacrificed to the policy or fashions of the day. Whatever may be the inducements and temptations held out by our enemies to entice us from the simplicity of our faith, or to make us abandon the great duty we owe to the cause, let our reply to them all be, in the language of Nehemiah to Sanballet and Geshem, "We are doing a great work, so that we cannot come down; why should the work cease, whilst we leave it and we come down to you?" The moment we retire from our posts, our spiritual Zion will be in danger of becoming a prey to the wily designs of the enemy.

2. In conducting the work before us, let there be an elevated and honorable course, corresponding with the great and generous spirit of the religion we profess. Let it be our ambition to set an example of magnanimous charity—hitherto unknown—that shall put to an open shame all the exclusive feelings and partial practices resulting from a more contracted faith. Let us show that we care less for the establishment of a sect, than for the prevalence of truth and righteousness.

3. The whole history of our cause in this and all other nations, shows that it advances every where in proportion to the increase of general knowledge. It is a matter therefore of great importance, that the friends of truth also demonstrate their friendship for the cause of science. We rejoice that this subject, within a few years, has engaged the attention of the denomination, and has given existence to several seminaries of learning, that promise well in behalf of religious liberty and truth. I cannot but believe, that the denomination is abundantly able to sustain such institutions to every desirable extent. Let the people understand the importance of this subject to their children, to the cause and to the country, and we cannot doubt they will, with a liberal hand, do all that is necessary to sustain the cause of learning in connexion with the principles of the Gospel.

4. The establishment of meetings for devotional purposes—for the cultivation of the spiritual influences of our faith—promises the happiest effects in every point of view. Surely, if there are any people, on earth, who have cause for devout and united praise to God, in view of his abundant mercies, those people are Universalists; and it is astonishing that the mere dread of the spirit of fanaticism, should ever have been suffered to quench the sacred flame of a fervent devotion, that most naturally results from the doctrines we believe. True, fanaticism is an evil, that should be guarded against; but coldness is an evil equally to be deprecated. The true medium is the maintenance of a steady flame of active and well regulated piety, which while it preserves the body politic from ague on the one hand, is an equal security against a wasting fever on the other.

5. For the want of an itinerant ministry, definitely engaged to occupy the waste places in our Zion, it is believed that the cultivation of a missionary spirit amongst preachers in general, might prove highly serviceable to the cause. Hitherto there has been too much of a fashion prevailing in some sections, to wait till the brethren, unaided, and by their own patriotism, have organized societies, raised funds, provided places of worship and formally invited a minister to come and possess the fruits of their labors, before they could condescend to devote any labor in that direction. Now there are hundreds and thousands of places in our country, where there are ample fields of labor, and all that is wanted, is, that some ardent and judicious herald should go forth, erect the standard, rally the friends of the cause, propose the measures proper to be pursued, and put his own shoulder to the wheel, as a co-worker together with the brethren, determined that, by God's helping, the cause shall be established in their midst. And in most cases, it is believed, the preacher might do this without risk of loss on his part. The materials are before him, and if he will but employ his talents in bringing them together, in due time he will meet his reward, in every sense which an innocent ambition could require. Let experiments of this kind be tried, and peradventure we should see fewer persons standing idle in the market places, complaining that no man has called them.

In reference to the signs of the times, as they have been demonstrated by the history of the past, and in response to the demand in our text, I have ventured to review the foregoing characteristics of our denomination, and to throw out these hints; that the light of experience may irradiate our subsequent course and enable us, as faithful watchmen upon the walls of Zion, to suggest the means, an attention to which shall authorize us to expect and foresee a glorious day for the cause of truth. We can calculate on no favorable indications, independent of the means which experience has demonstrated, and God has sanctioned, as necessary for the spread of light and the prevalence of our holy faith.

There is, indeed, reason to believe, from the blessing which has attended the exertions of the friends of truth hitherto, that "the night is far spent and the day is at hand."

"Which kings and prophets waited for,
And sought, but never found."

The genius of freedom is leading the way for the complete emancipation of the human mind from the bondage of error, and for its full introduction into the "glorious liberty of the sons of God." I know not—I care not—whether we shall prevail as a sect—if a sect you will have it that we are—it is enough for me, that the heaven of divine truth, which the ministers of our faith have been instrumental in communicating to the mass of mind, is powerfully at work; and that it will—nay, must—in due time leaven the whole lump. The triumph of our principles is vastly greater than the triumph of our sect—prosperous, indeed, as this has been beyond a parallel. Compare the doctrines of the protestant world, as they were but fifty years ago, with what they are now, and see ye not a manifest tendency to the side of more merciful and consistent views of the character and government of God? Is not the tendency clearly towards the great, essential principles which we have avowed? We know it is so—we rejoice that it is so. In the bosom of every church there is commotion—a struggling after a faith that corresponds with the God-like desire. The dogma of endless misery has been driven back, and is now for the most part heard in whispers, or appears modified and shorn of its most odious forms—a sure presage of its final extinction. The humiliating acknowledgment, made in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at its late annual session, that this doctrine has become fearfully unpopular even amongst themselves, avows a fact too true to be long concealed from the world. Meanwhile the love of the doctrine of universal grace and salvation, which like a fire shut up in the bones, yearns at the secret springs of every honest heart—fanned by the breezes of rational inquiry, is bursting forth, here and there, and shall continue to rise and spread till "all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God." As watchmen upon the walls of spiritual Zion, your positions, my dear brethren, have enabled you to make discovery of these and other signs of promise. Gladly communicate them to the dwellers in Jerusalem. "Say unto Zion—Thy God reigneth." He bringeth the night, and also the morning. "Hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?" Will he not vindicate his cause, and secure the purchased possession to his Son for an everlasting inheritance? "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Go forth, then, and proclaim, as with the voice of a trumpet, making glad the city of our God, that under the government of an all-wise, an all-powerful and infinitely benevolent Majesty—"ALL IS WELL."

STATISTICAL REPORTS

To the General Convention of Universalists, 1836.

To the "General Convention of Universalists in the United States," to be holden in the city of New-York, September 21st and 22d, 1836.

BELoved BRETHREN—The "Maine Convention of Universalists" at its last annual session, appointed the undersigned to report to your body such information respecting the present state and prospects of the cause of truth, within the limits of its jurisdiction, as he should be able to obtain.—To this end, he begs leave to make the following remarks:

I. He deems it his duty to state, that he has not been able to obtain any considerable information in relation to the subject, upon which his report is to be founded. A committee was appointed at the late Convention in Hope, consisting of one person in each county, to collect the needed information, and to transmit it to him, in season to furnish a detailed report to the general committee—but he regrets to state, that he has received letters but from three of that committee:—two of whom merely informed him, that they were unable to communicate any information,—and the other gave him a full report from every town in the county,—thus shewing, that the project of a report in detail is practicable. But since he has not been favored with the assistance of the committee generally, he is under the necessity of making this report in general terms.

II. In relation to the present state and prospects of the cause, he feels justified in remarking, from what information he has been able to obtain, that they are highly encouraging. The number of societies, connected with the Convention, he has not been able to ascertain; nor can he state the number of believers, of which the societies are composed. It is perhaps well known, that the State of Maine embraces a large territory, somewhat sparsely settled; and the difficulty of obtaining the desired information, upon these points, is, by reason of this circumstance, very apparent. But, as an evidence of our prosperity, he may state, that within the past year, six ministers have removed among us from other States, while but one has left us by removal, and one by withdrawal. No death has occurred among our preachers. And in addition to this, four young men, of promising talents, have been licensed to preach by the Convention; and one, (Mr. Russell,) formerly belonging to another sect, is now laboring in our field. As far as can be learned, notwithstanding this increase of preachers, they are all employed; and the constant remark is, that more are needed. From which, the conclusion is drawn, that the cause is encouragingly and permanently prosperous.

III. As a further indication of this fact, he may state, that the religious periodicals have been gaining in their circulation—at least, so far as he has been informed, and is enabled to judge. He cannot state the precise number which are circulated in the State; but he thinks it must somewhat exceed three thousand. In this estimation, however, he does not take into consideration papers sent from other States. Two years ago, the circulation could not much, if any, exceed twenty-five hundred. He cannot doubt, that this increase is an indication of the prosperity of the cause, while it lays the foundation for still greater success. He cannot doubt, indeed, that the prospect is now more encouraging than in any former period of time.

IV. In addition to what has been done for the advancement of the doctrine we hold, he deems it proper to state, that something has been done, within the past year, for the cause of education. It is well known, perhaps, that a Literary Seminary, founded upon liberal principles, was not long ago established in Westbrook, near the city of Portland, and is now under the care of Br. Brimblecom. Recently, another has been established in Waterville, at an expense of about two thousand dollars, which is entirely owned and controlled by Universalists, and which is now ready for the reception of scholars. As soon as suitable instructors can be obtained, it will be put in operation; and, from present appearances, we cannot doubt of its success. If public expectation and interest have not deceived us, it will be well and promptly sustained.

V. The undersigned may also state, that agreeably to a recommendation of the General Convention, passed last year at Hartford, Conn., the Maine Convention have considered the "propriety and expediency of establishing a theological seminary," and have acted upon the subject. The committee was chosen, at its last annual session, to take the recommendation into consideration; and, as the records show, they reported against the project. Nevertheless, as the Convention were not disposed to act rashly and prematurely upon the subject, they deferred a decisive action upon it to its next annual session. Meanwhile, they have recommended the subject to the consideration of the order generally. What may be their final vote upon it, is merely a matter of conjecture.

VI. In conclusion, the undersigned may remark, that the Maine Convention feels a deep and abiding interest in the prosperity of the good cause throughout the Union, and throughout the world. They have chosen, as their representatives to the General Convention this year, from their ministers, Brs. D. D. Smith, Z. Thompson, G. Bates, and C. Gardner; and from their lay brethren, W. K. Weston, Gen. J. Wellington, Hon. J. Ives, Hon. C. Holland, A. Lyon, Esq. and Hon. J. C. Churchill. These brethren they recommend to your attention; and from whom, perhaps, you may receive a more full and circumstantial account of our present standing and prospects, than can be given in this report.

In behalf of the "Maine Convention of Universalists," who send their Christian salutations, the above remarks are respectfully submitted.

By order, CALVIN GARDNER.

STATISTICS OF NEW-YORK.

Probable number of Societies 310; Organized Churches, 75; Meeting-Houses, 125; Ministers, 125; Associations, 15; One State Convention.

Periodicals.—Magazine and Advocate, Utica, circulates about 7000 copies; Union, New-York, 4500; Herald of Truth, Geneva, 1700.

The statement above made is imperfect for want of particular information, but it is believed it does not vary essentially from facts. The cause of Universalism is prosperous in this State. General harmony prevails, and the spirit of pure devotion is exerting a powerful and an increasing influence amongst us. May the Father of mercies long continue to sanction and advance the sacred cause in this part of his vineyard through the Redeemer's name.

BALFOUR'S INQUIRY.

Somebody in the "Biblical Repertory," an orthodox publication in New-Jersey, has attacked Balfour's Inquiry. We have read the attack, as copied into the Union; and must say that for something which has the show of learning, it is the nearest nothing of any thing that we have seen. However—Br. Balfour will be after it, and the writer whoever he is, will get his due, if not "a shilling over." Rather too late in the day to be drizzling along with a wet squib in hand to let off at Balfour's Inquiry! It has already withstood the heavy cannonading of President Allen and Prof. Stuart. They had better load and fire again.—Star.

Our thoughts should always be such as we would, at all times, be willing to have known to all men.

THE INSTRUCTION OF THE PAST.

To a reflective and thinking mind, no contemplation is more melancholy, and at the same time more instructive, than that of the past. It has lessons, which, if studied, would save many sinful mortals that anguish of mind resulting from their own bitter experiences—conscience would not so often be heard, whispering fear and reproach; but soft as an angel's voice, saying "well done." Experience should be the corrector of the human heart; yet we are little prone to profit by it, unless its admonitions come in the tone of self-accusation, and self-condemnation. The history of the past has come down to us laden with much evil, and much good—we see human happiness and human misery, in contrast—the experience of ages is spread out before us—we see the rise and fall of kingdoms, empires, and republics—the pride, ambition, and folly of man—heathen idolatry, and Christian bigotry—and knowing that like causes produce like effects, where is our excuse for rashly partaking of the forbidden fruit?

It has been said that human passions are the same in all ages of the world: if so, the same passions which actuated and impelled the human mind eighteen hundred years ago, actuate and impel it now. Ambition, revenge, jealousy, envy, hatred, pride and deceit, with their opposites, charity, hope, benevolence, kindness, pity, justice and love, are the same now, as then; and as these with their various modifications, are the ingredients which compose human nature, the pages of history are rife with instruction. We there learn by example, that true greatness and goodness are inseparable, and that human happiness depends alone, upon the cultivation of virtuous principles. We should look upon the actors in the great drama of the past, though slumbering in the moss-grown tombs of ages, as mirrors which reflect ourselves; and as virtue and vice, with their attendant consequences, are held up before us, we should cling to the one, and avoid the other. History is not useful to us merely as a faithful recorder of events; but as the delineator of the human heart. It exhibits human passions in all their infinite varieties, stamped with the seal of reality—we see things as they are, and who ever contemplated, long and deeply, the past without feeling warnings for the future, deeply impressed upon the heart. Yet with the history, sacred and profane, of all ages before us, where we can trace the certain doom, to which ungoverned passions lead—where even Heaven has vouchsafed a warning by the pen of inspiration—we turn away with a blind infatuation, and seldom pause to ask, "are these things so?" And even with living examples before them, we see men pursuing the same course of folly, crime and madness, and we inquire, "what will ye do in the end thereof?"

The laws of the moral world are as fixed as those of the physical, and man can no more oppress the poor, defraud the widow and the orphan, trample under foot justice due his fellow man, and with sacriligious impiety deny Heaven, and find his reward in the smiles of friends and an approving conscience, than the fountain, at the foot of the Andes, can send her gurgling rill to its loftiest peak: but if he doubts it, let him look over the records of the past, and he will exclaim with the great bard,

"Nor florid phrase, nor honied lays of rhyme,
Can blazon evil deeds, or consecrate a crime."

Had Bonaparte contemplated the chamber of a Dyonisius, or the mantle of a Cæsar, he might have seen the end of all grasping ambition written in blood; but the experience of others had no warnings for him, and the sea-girt rock of St. Helena is left to tell his tale, and stand the monument of a reckless conqueror's doom. Who can contrast a Bonaparte's career with a Washington's, and receive no lesson by which to profit? None should; yet the pages of both sacred and profane history are glowing with such contrasts of character, and still man rushes wilfully into the pathway of wrong, and finds too late, what he might have learned otherwise than by self-experience, that the fruits of sin are misery.

We are never at a loss to know, why one person's memory is perpetuated with blessings, and another's with execrations, for ages and ages; yet we often hesitate between right and wrong, and blindly choose the latter. We never ask why the name of a Howard is ever remembered with gratitude, and lisped with veneration, from prattling infancy up to hoary age; yet we often seem to ask ourselves whether we should be good or not. We never ask why the character of the Saviour of mankind has been so much admired both by believer and unbeliever; but we often ask why he has so few imitators—why the record of his life, rich with precept and example, should be so little sought after, as a pattern of all human excellence—and the answer is found in the folly and short-sightedness of man. In his eager and selfish graspings after wealth and distinction, he often neglects the best concerns of life, and forgetful of what constitutes true happiness, steps incautiously over the boundary line of morality and religion. Once over, he seldom retraces his steps; but allows the last energies of his nature to be consumed by the wild-fire of contending passions. Now this is all for the want of a little reflection—the want of due attention to cause and effect, and the laws which govern the moral world. Trivial causes have often produced great effects—from minute circumstances, events have followed which involved the destiny of nations: so, slight deviations from the path of moral rectitude and Christian duty, involve consequences fatal to human happiness, and break asunder the strongest links of social life, morality and religion. It is the record of time, then, that should teach man to apply his heart unto wisdom—that should teach him to shun the quicksands of passion, upon which have been wrecked the fondest hopes of life. He has only to search the records of the past, to learn that the same passions which have led man, step by step, to the commission of dark and darker deeds, are alive in his own heart, and beware how he allows circumstances to call them into action; lest, in an evil hour, he becomes their slave, and plunges into guilt, which will cost him a life of bitterness, and a memory unblest.

RENUNCIATION OF UNIVERSALISM.

Messrs. EDITORS—I have concluded to renounce Universalism. I used to believe the doctrine, but now I do not believe it. I have been so shamefully treated by my enemies, that I cannot believe they will ever arrive at heaven with me; and, in fact, I so much detest and despise them, I cannot wish their society. If I go to heaven, I do not want such company.

There is nothing so much disturbs my peace, as the thought that these rascals will be saved (for they must be, if Universalism be true) when they ought to be eternally damned. I have had my patience tried enough, and it makes me so mad, when I think of them, that I know they ought to go to an eternal hell. Nothing short of this would gratify my feelings. Therefore, if Universalism be true, my feelings will never be gratified.

When a person is imposed upon, and gets as mad as I have been, he can easily see the absurdity of Universalism. Every mad man knows from experience, that revenge is sweet—and when I cannot get revenge without incurring the heavy penalty of the civil law, then the reflection that these scoundrels shall be miserable eternally, gives me that joy, which I know must be the effect of truth—and if that is truth, Universalism is false.

Now think for one moment of the absurdity of Universalism. A man insults me in such a manner that the law will not give redress. Must I bear it? yes, I must cramp my feelings down to the bitter reflection that I never shall obtain redress; and more than this, that the rascal shall be saved and go to heaven, and there be in my presence and company forever!! So much for Universalism. 'Tis false—I renounce the doctrine in toto. It is an absurd theory. It inculcates the doctrine, that all the noted scoundrels of the earth—all my enemies—shall be saved. It teaches me that I must love them all—enemies and all—but who can love an enemy? I am aware that you Universalists will plead the example of Jesus Christ, that he loved his enemies and laid down his life for them all. I admit that he was a man ("if indeed," as Josephus says, "he may be called a man") of uncommon forbearance. I admit, also, that many of his precepts seem to favor your notion, particularly where he refers us to the sun, as evidence of God's love to all. But then I do not think his precepts, or his example, or his forbearance will do away all that is said in the Bible about wrath and vengeance. I am content to believe that God is a God of vengeance. "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." And this vengeance I believe is the endless damnation of his enemies. And just so sure as God will render endless damnation on his enemies, just so sure does he hate them. And if he hates his enemies, I will hate my enemies also. Having his example, shall I not be justified in following it? most certainly. And as he takes vengeance on his enemies, I will also take vengeance on mine, whenever they provoke me and make me mad. Yes, I will be revenged if I can—and if the laws are such that I cannot, I shall have the happy consolation that a stronger arm than mine will one day take vengeance on them, and that I shall sport with their miseries throughout eternity. Oh, this is the doctrine that satisfies that spirit of revenge which is begotten by my rascally enemies! Universalism will never do this. I therefore renounce it. Yours with suitable respect, MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SUSQUEHANNA ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS, FOR 1836.

1. Met according to adjournment in the Methodist meeting-house, in Mount-Pleasant, Pa., October 5, and after uniting in prayer with Br. Messenger, proceeded to organize the Council by choosing Br. G. MESSINGER, jr., Moderator, and Brs. G. S. Ames, and T. S. Bartholomew, Clerks.

2 Appointed Brs. Russel Spencer, Freeman J. Wheeler, and Benjamin Wheeler of Mount Pleasant, a committee to arrange the order of public services.

3. Received and read credentials of delegates from the several societies.

4. Appointed Brs. G. S. Ames, Frederick Bailey, and Freeman Peck, a committee on fellowship and ordination.

5. Appointed Brs. George Kinney, Russel Spencer, and Simon Stearns a committee for the ensuing year.

6. Heard and accepted the report of the committee of discipline. No cause of complaint.

7. Appointed Brs. G. S. Ames, and T. S. Bartholomew, (clerical) and S. W. Park, and S. Stevens lay delegates to represent the body at the next session of the Pennsylvania State Convention.

8. Proposed for adoption at the next session of this body, the following amendments in articles 3d and 7th of the Constitution.

ART. 3. "All ministers of the Gospel in fellowship with this or any sister Association, assisting in this Association, shall be received as members of the Council."

ART. 7. "Fellowship shall in no case be given to an applicant, except he furnish the committee with such credentials as shall secure their confidence in the fact that he is a good minister of Jesus Christ."

9. Voted to expunge the following clause in article 8, "or shall have discontinued to preach for one fourth part of the time, for one year, except in cases of sickness."

10. Voted that the letter from Brooklyn, containing a request for a letter of fellowship for Br. Bartholomew, be received by the committee appointed to receive such request.

11. Appointed Br. T. S. Bartholomew to preach the occasional sermon at our next session.

12. Appointed G. S. Ames, to prepare the minutes for publication, with a request that they be published in the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, and copied into the Herald of Truth.

13. Voted our thanks to the Methodist brethren of this place, for the Christian feeling and friendship they have manifested in opening their house of worship for our accommodation on this occasion.

14. Adjourned to meet at Sheshequin, Bradford county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday of October, 1837.

GEO. MESSINGER, Moderator.

G. S. Ames, }
T. S. Bartholomew, } Clerks.

ORDER OF PUBLIC SERVICES.

Wednesday Morning.—Prayer, Br. A. Green. Sermon, Br. T. J. Crowe, Rom. xi: 36.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. G. S. Ames. 1st Sermon, Br. S. P. Landers, Luke xv: 11-20. 2d Sermon, Br. A. Green, 2 Peter, iii: 18.

Thursday Morning.—Prayer, Br. G. Messinger, jr. 1st Sermon, Br. G. S. Ames, 1 Cor. xv: 25. 2d Sermon, Br. T. S. Bartholomew, Gal. iv: 16.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. T. J. Crowe. Sermon and addresses, Br. G. Messinger, jr., Isa. lx: 20.—Benediction by the same.

MINISTERS PRESENT.—G. Messinger, jr., S. P. Landers, South Bainbridge; G. S. Ames, Sheshequin Pa.; A. Green, Virgil, N. Y.; T. S. Bartholomew, Brooklyn, Pa.; T. J. Crowe, at large.

LAY DELEGATES.—B. Wheeler, Mount Pleasant; E. Stearns, Harford; J. Kent, B. Tiffany, Brooklyn; N. Blood, Honesdale; N. Shipman, E. Bullard, Montrose.

REMARKS.—We are sorry to say that the different societies composing this body, were not fully represented, indeed more than one half within its limits were not represented at all, and the Council was left without the least knowledge of their condition. Now, brethren, this is all negligence, a want of zeal among you. You are all abundantly able, and so circumstanced, as to send at least one delegate from your society, at every session of the body, and thus furnish it with your representation. What will the world think of us—ay, what do we think of ourselves—when we neglect these momentous duties?

We hope that when we meet again, yea, and at every future time of meeting, we may hear whether you stand or fall in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Per order, G. S. AMES.

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE CAYUGA ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS—FOR 1836.

1. Met at Cortlandville, N. Y., September 28, and 29, and after uniting in prayer with Br. C. S. Brown, organized the Council by appointing Br. W. BULLARD, Moderator, and Br. C. S. Brown, Clerk.

2. Brs. W. G. Parker, E. Berry and A. Crittenden, (laymen,) were appointed a committee to arrange public services.

3. Letters and credentials for delegates from the different societies in the Association, were read and accepted.

4. Brs. Queal, Bullard, (ministers,) and W. Truesdell (layman,) were appointed a committee on letters of fellowship and ordination.

5. The committee of discipline reported no cause of complaint.

6. Brs. Montgomery, Bullard, (ministers,) and Br. J. F. Clark, (layman,) were appointed a committee of discipline for the current year.

7. The committee on fellowship and ordination, reported in favor of granting ordination to Brs. Boughton and G. S. Ames. Report accepted.

8. Brs. Bullard, Ames and Boughton, were appointed a committee on Conferences for the ensuing year.

9. Br. Bullard was appointed to deliver the next occasional discourse before this Association, with power to appoint a substitute if necessary.

10. Whereas, Facts within the knowledge of many of us, clearly prove that Universalist ministers are extremely liable, in consequence of circumstances beyond their control in the discharge of their duty, to leave at their decease, their families in destitute circumstances, almost if not entirely dependent on the cold charity of the world, therefore,

Resolved, That in our opinion a society should be organized within the limits of this Association, for the purpose of raising a fund to be appropriated for the relief of widows and orphans of deceased Universalist ministers, who are left in destitute circumstances.

11. Brs. Montgomery and Barber, of Auburn, and Br. W. G. Parker, of Cortland, were then appointed a committee to draft a constitution for the government of said society, and report at the next session of this body.

12. Whereas, The cause of temperance is inseparably connected with the prosperity of the pure gospel of Christ, therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend to all believers in God's impartial grace, that they abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks, and that they also urge on each other the necessity of being temperate in all things.

13. Brs. Bullard and Boughton, (ministers,) and Brs. Truesdell and Berry, were appointed delegates to attend the next session of the State Convention at Albany.

14. Appointed Br. G. Sanderson to prepare the minutes of the proceedings of this Association for publication.

15. Adjourned to meet at Scipio Centre, N. Y. on the last Wednesday in September, 1837.

PUBLIC SERVICES.

Wednesday Morning.—Prayer, T. D. Cook. Occasional sermon, Br. Queal: Gal. xviii: 4.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. Ames. 1st Sermon, H. Boughton, Isa. liii: 11. 2d Sermon, T. D. Cook, Eph. ii: 18-22.

Evening.—Prayer, C. S. Brown. Sermon, G. S. Ames, Matt. v: 33.

Thursday Morning.—Prayer, D. Skinner. 1st Sermon, C. S. Brown, Matt. vii: 11, 12. 2d Sermon, G. Sanderson, John i: 49.

Afternoon.—Prayer, A. Green. Sermon D. Skinner, Mark x: 52. Usual addresses by the same.

MINISTERS PRESENT.

D. Skinner, Utica; W. Queal, T. D. Cook, Wolcott; H. Boughton, Scipio; S. Barnes, Hannibal; G. S. Ames, Sheshequin, Pa.; W. Rowe, Scott; C. S. Brown, Lisle; G. Sanderson, Geneva; W. Bullard, Cortland; H. Green, A. Green, Virgil.

DELEGATES PRESENT.

Eldred S. Hunter, Auburn; W. Lincoln, T. Moore, Virgil; W. Truesdell, Howlett Hill; T. Simonds, Genoa; A. Crittenden, C. Berry, Cortlandville; G. Morgan, G. Babcock, Scipio; A. Round, Whitwood, Truxton; J. D. Hall, Mottville; N. Chapin, Tully.

REMARKS.—Although the weather was somewhat unpleasant, yet the congregations were very large, especially on the second day, when the house was thronged. The societies belonging to this Association were not as fully represented as we desired, still they were not as slack as on former occasions. The business of the Council was transacted with perfect harmony. A step was taken which has an important bearing on the prosperity of the cause, viz: for the organization of a society for the relief of widows and orphans of deceased Universalist ministers. The subjects selected by the different speakers were peculiarly interesting and instructive, and by them we have reason to believe, much good was done in the name of Jesus. We were received by the society in that place with kindness, and every attention paid to us while among them. The intelligence received from various sections was encouraging, affording the most undoubted assurance that truth will triumph ere long.

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

FOURTH EXTRACT.

This extract will continue the same subject as the last contained. Having shown how the intellect, prompted by the moral sentiments, investigates the causes of crime, and points out the remedy to be the removal of the causes as the only and most effectual—and having shown the only method in which those causes can be removed to be in accordance with the dictates of the moral sentiments, [and to the real advantage even of the animal propensities,] Mr. Combe proceeds to contrast the results of measures thus instituted by the intellect and moral sentiments, with the results of the merely animal method.

I regret that this extract must close our notice of this subject. Mr. Combe continues the consideration of it through several pages more, and triumphantly answers some objections to his plan; and shows also that his views do not confound but rather mark out more definitely the immutable distinction between right and wrong—between crime and misfortune. I refer all who wish to know the constitution of man, its adaptation to external objects, and the best modes of improving their fellow-beings in knowledge and virtue, to the book itself. To parents and instructors, I can recommend no more valuable work for their direction in duty; and I would that every legislator in our land would study it.

A. B. G.

Under the animal system, as we have already seen, no measures except the excitement of terror, are taken to prevent the commission of crime.—Under the moral plan, as soon as a tendency to abuse the faculties appeared in any individual, instant means of prevention would be resorted to, because the sentiments could not be satisfied unless this were done. Under the animal system, no inquiry is made into the future proceedings of the offender, and he is turned loose upon society under the unabated influence of all the causes which led to his infringement of the law; and, as effects never cease while their causes continue to operate, he repeats his offence, and becomes the object of a new animal infliction. Under the moral system, the causes would be removed, and the evil effects would cease.

Under the animal system, the propensities of the offender and society are maintained in habitual excitement; for the punishment proceeds from the animal faculties, and is likewise addressed to them. Flogging, for instance, proceeds from Destructiveness, and is addressed solely to sensation and fear. The tread-mill springs from Destructiveness in a milder form, and, as its sole object is to cause annoyance to the offender, it is obviously addressed only to Cautiousness and his selfish feelings. Hanging and decapitation undeniably spring from Destructiveness, and are administered as terrors to the propensities of persons criminally disposed. These punishments, again, especially the last, are calculated to gratify the animal faculties, and none else, in the spectators who witness them. The execution of a criminal obviously interests and excites Destructiveness, Cautiousness, and Self-Esteem, in the beholder, and nothing can be farther removed than such exhibitions from the proper food of Benevolence, Veneration, and Conscientiousness.

Under the moral system, again, the faculties exercised and addressed in restraining and instructing the offender are, as exclusively as possible, the human powers. The propensities are employed merely as the servants of the moral sentiments in accomplishing their benignant purposes, and Benevolence is as actively engaged in behalf of the offender as of society at large. The whole influence of the proceeding is ameliorating and elevating.

Under the animal system the offspring of parents who have been recently engaged in either suffering, inflicting, or witnessing punishment, inherit, by the organic law, large and active animal organs, occasioned by the excitement of these organs in the parents. Thus a public execution, from the violent stimulus which it produces in the lower faculties of the spectators, may, within twenty-four hours of its exhibition, be the direct cause of a new crop of victims for the gallows.

Under the moral system, children born of parents actively engaged in undergoing, executing, or witnessing the elevating and ennobling process of moral reformation, will, by the organic law, inherit an increased development of the moral and intellectual organs, and be farther removed than their parents from the risk of lapsing into crime.

Under the animal system, spectators of crime, and accomplices, need to be bribed with large rewards to induce them to communicate their knowledge of the offence; and witnesses required to be compelled by penalties, to bear testimony to what they have seen concerning it. Many will recollect the affecting picture of mental agony drawn by the author of Waverley, when Jeanie Deans, at the bar of the High Court of Justiciary, gives evidence against her sister, which was to deprive that sister of life. Parallel cases occur too frequently in actual experience. The real cause of this aversion to betray, and internal repugnance to give evidence, is, that the moral sentiments are revolted by the delivery of the culprit to the cruelty of animal resentment.

Under the moral system, the higher sentiments and intellect of the spectator of a crime, and those of the nearest relatives of the offender, would unite with those of society at large in an unanimous desire to deliver him up with the utmost speed, to the ameliorating influence of moral treatment, as the highest benevolence even to himself.

Under the animal system, the office of public executioner is odious, execrable, and universally contemned. If it were necessary by the Creator's institutions, it would present the extraordinary anomaly of a necessary duty being execrated by the moral sentiments. This would be a direct inconsistency between the dictates of the superior faculties and the arrangement of the external world. But the animal executioner is not acknowledged as necessary by the human faculties. Under the moral system, the criminal would be committed to persons whose duties would be identical with those of the clergyman, the physician and the teacher. These are the executioners under the moral law; and, just because their avocations are highly grateful to the superior sentiments, they are the most esteemed of mankind.

UTICA, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1836.

SOCIETY LIBRARIES.

Winter is again at hand, with its long evenings so peculiarly suited for the laboring man's social enjoyment and intellectual improvement. Nothing is wanting, after bodily comfort and enjoyment are secured, but the means to render them useful to the moral and mental powers also. The cheapest and best means, next to a good religious newspaper, is a good society library. I do wish our brethren would awaken to the importance of this subject. Every Universalist society should have one—and every such society could have one, if they would but make an effort. Thirty dollars would purchase every book published by our order, that is not already in the hands of some one of its members. Those thus already possessed, could be thrown into the common stock—loaned to the society—and a monthly contribution to be paid in at the society's monthly meetings. (and every society should meet at least once a month, to hear preaching, or read sermons and sing a few hymns together—to distribute and receive the books, and inquire respecting each others' healths and welfare,) would procure one or more literary, and such religious journals as are not taken by any of its members. Other books might also be added from time to time, out of the monthly fund, or by private donation, or general subscription. And when any book has been sufficiently read by all, it should be exchanged for some other book of equal value which is owned and has thus been read by all the members of some neighboring society.

Thus will a very small library of books in each of a number of neighboring societies, supply a very great number of persons with most useful and interesting reading, year after year, at a very small expense indeed. And if proper care be taken of the books and papers once procured, their stock will increase from year to year, and must tend to the increase of the readers of them also.

There is certainly no more useful and pleasant mode of employing leisure time than this plan will afford. The young and the old—the gay and the grave, are equally benefited by it. It saves the children from many a mischievous prank and vicious habit—the parents from many a listless heavy hour of droning complaint and yawning drowsiness—and qualifies all, male and female, to enjoy existence and its blessings; to adorn the circle in which they move with cheerful intelligence and happiness; and to perform in the most useful and easy manner, their various duties in life.

When practicable, let each member of the family take a turn in reading aloud to the rest. Each will thus agreeably exercise and strengthen the organs of speech—much promote bodily health—learn to read properly, with judgment and with discrimination—and learn confidence to strengthen them in exercising their talents in the social as well as the domestic circle. Nor is this all. Hearing one another read, begets a habit of order, silence, decorum and attention in the family—children soon learn when they may speak or play, and when they must be quiet—and the listener perceives how to correct his or her own faults of pronunciation or intonation, by hearing them in another; or to copy those excellences that mark the good reader, and render the subject most interesting and impressive.

As parents, then, we call on the heads of families to urge this measure in the societies where they are members; and by a liberal practice to second their efforts in procuring its adoption. But especially as Universalists, and as citizens of a free country—whose faith and whose free institutions alike depend on a free and universal diffusion of correct knowledge among the people—we call on our readers to urge the establishment of libraries every where—but especially in the societies where they reside. Properly conducted, rely upon it, they will increase social intercourse, Christian affection, general information, the knowledge of religious truth and the practice of Christian morality and virtue. A. B. G.

OUR NEXT VOLUME.

If the frequent and numerous commendations of various friends and subscribers, both lay and ministering brethren, may be believed, (and our own vanity will not allow us to question either their judgment or veracity!) we have considerably improved the present volume of the always excellent Magazine and Advocate. For some weeks we have been busily engaged in perfecting and procuring aid to accomplish several plans for the further improvement of the next volume. For, owing to the business incident to the transfer—establishing new agencies, and rearranging many of the old ones—illness, and various other causes, we were not able to make the present volume as good as we intended it should be. And even if we had succeeded, experience has added somewhat to our plans for the succeeding one. We are now pleased, yes, very happy in being able to say to our numerous friends, and the public generally, that, even from the little we have already succeeded in rendering certain, we feel very confident in being able to make the next volume much superior in interest and usefulness to the present. We are not yet prepared to say, at length, what we will be able to do; but in the mean time, we can say, that a series of superior brief articles for children, adapted to their capacities of thought and action, calculated to teach them how to think on moral and religious subjects, and intended to aid parents and teachers in their educational duties, has been promised us by our correspondent, the author of "Notes on Sacred Subjects." His abilities are too well known to need our praise, or the assurance that he will make them as beneficial to the persons for whose use they are intended, as his "Notes," have been to every student of the Bible. Br. J. M. Austin, of Danvers, Mass., also well and most favorably known to our readers, will also furnish a series of articles addressed to the youth of both sexes, on the formation and adoption of their personal, domestic, social, moral and religious habits, manners and principles—and on their relative and respective duties in life. These series will be in easy and independent numbers, and will embrace a very great and interesting range of subjects. That they will be well executed, and if so, must be highly useful, we cannot doubt.

Another, and very important series of brief articles will be from the pen of Br. S. R. Smith, our co-editor—also well known to all—on the evidences of the Christian religion—especially its internal evidences—calculated to show the skeptic that he cannot reasonably, nor in correct moral feeling, object to its principles, doctrines and precepts—that he has not warred, and cannot war successfully against any part thereof—and also calculated to show the Partialist, that the corruptions of Christianity cannot be defended, but must ever be the butt and ridicule of the skeptic, and that if he would not be buried in the rubbish, he must confine his defence solely to pure, primitive, uncorrupted Christianity. It will be seen very readily, that this plan interferes not with either Br. Thayer's or Br. Williamson's able works on the evidences of Christianity; but must much aid their influence and power, by adding to the pile, arguments their labors have reared.

Other plans we have for essays and series of essays, not yet certain to be accomplished, and of which we refrain from speaking at the present time. Some of them are full as important, and will be as interesting and useful as any of the above; and we cannot but believe we shall be able to get them carried out also. But we dare not yet promise they will be.

In a few weeks our proposals for the 8th volume will be sent to our agents, when we shall again call the attention of our readers to this subject, with an appeal to their generosity to continue their support, and to further aid us by inducing others also to subscribe for the paper. For to procure these invaluable articles, we have been at some labor, and shall be at additional expense—in both of which we must be losers, unless a generous and liberal public will increase our present support. For though our list is as large as when we purchased the establishment, yet we have to pay a high price for it, and are subjected to a very heavy weekly expenditure to supply each of those on it, with the paper. An increase of the list, therefore, is our only hope of being able to continue our constant exertions, and additional extra expenditures for the further improvement of the matter contained in the Magazine and Advocate. For, let it be remembered, the several series above named, and the others yet to be named, are in addition to the excellent occasional and regular contributions which we trust will be furnished as heretofore, by upwards of fifty able brethren and sisters whom we might name had we room, and were they not already well known to all the readers of the present volume, by their works. A TOUR.

Br. Aaron Kinney, (a namesake of ours, who formerly spelled his name Kinne because some of the family were given to abbreviations; but now returns to writing it the "good old way,") writes us that he has just returned from a tour of about three thousand miles, performed since May last, through Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and part of Missouri. The principal places in which he preached, after leaving this State, are Ohio City, Elyria, Florence, Sandusky, Perrysburg, Toledo, Jonesville, Coldwater, Niles, Goshen, South Bend, Michigan City, Chicago, Juliet, Marseilles, Hennepin, Peoria, Canton, and others. He says there is a great want for preachers of the Gospel in that region—that the Partialist missionaries sent among them are evidently inferior in understanding to the people, deficient in liberality, and unacquainted with human nature and its real wants. He says, "I was treated very kindly in almost every place; and feel very grateful to the friends who assisted me on my way. And those who permitted me to pay my own expenses, and desired me to 'call again,' will probably be visited by me when I am able to afford it!" On the whole, he found in all those States, warm hearted friends, and proffers his services in directing any of our preachers who may intend to journey that way, to their places of abode.

Not having room to spare for communications in this number, at the time Br. Kinney's letter was received, and wanting a subject to fill out the space allotted for editorial by our foreman, I have thus thrown its contents together in my own way—for all of which I hope for forgiveness.

WALDIE'S LITERARY OMNIBUS.

I have before me the specimen number of a large, most beautiful, and well filled sheet bearing the above title; issued by the well known publisher of the Circulating Library, and Port Folio—Adam Waldie, Philadelphia. As we shall publish his proposals in our next, we shall in this paper merely call the attention of our readers to the work, and invite any person wishing a very large weekly literary newspaper, at three dollars per annum, (two copies for five dollars, or five for ten dollars,) to call at this office, and see the specimen for themselves.

The Library (which may be seen at this office) will still be continued at the same terms, and the Omnibus will be an entirely distinct periodical from it.

When we reflect that Mr. Waldie has been most happy and judicious in the selections made for his Library and Port Folio, we indulge the fond hope that this, his third great literary periodical, will be as well conducted and as well patronized as they. Hitherto he has fulfilled, and even exceeded all his promises. The moral tone of our great weeklies, is rather exceptionable. Vice and misery are too frequently made appear laughable than horrible, in the police and other reports which largely occupy their columns. Deaths, murders, assassinations, robberies, etc., form too great a portion of their contents, especially when described with most disgusting particularity, or with shocking levity of feeling. We hope for better things in the Omnibus. And certain are we, that in its literary department it will excel—or at least equal any great weekly we yet have seen—not ministering to a depraved taste, but purifying it. At least such has always been the mental and moral tendency of Mr. Waldie's other publications.

I could wish he would publish it in the quarto or octavo form—so as to answer for preservation by binding—like the quarto New-Yorker—another most excellent weekly literary newspaper, published by Greely and Co., in the city of New-York. But at all events, we cordially recommend our friends wishing to subscribe for such a work, first to examine either the Omnibus or the New-Yorker, as they can do by calling at this office.

A HINT.

As winter appears likely to set in very early, and fuel is becoming still dearer, would it not be economy in the charitably inclined of this city (and elsewhere) to form a Provident fuel saving society, which would collect into one common fund the daily and weekly savings of the poor, and the charitable donations of the charitable, and with that fund purchase a large amount of wood—say when the Chenango canal is opened, if it will be opened—store that wood away to be distributed to the poor contributors to the fund at its minimum price? When their savings are thus paid off in fuel, then let the wood purchased by the donations be also distributed among them—especially in those cases which call for relief.—There can be no doubt that this plan would induce many to save small sums that are now squandered uselessly, if not worse than uselessly; and that one hundred dollars now judiciously expended for wood, and stored up in this manner, will save the expenditure of two hundred dollars when wood shall become dearer and be more necessary. True, to be fully beneficial, such a society should begin its operations in the Spring; but it is humbly suggested whether it is now too late—especially if the Chenango canal is to be opened this season—to provide fuel economically, for the supply of those who will be destitute of that very necessary article in our severe climate and long Winter's. Especially will it be useful as a beginning, and to teach and to aid many of our poor to save a little when they can, for the time when they need it.

DEDICATION AT DEANSVILLE.

We have received from Br. Boden a detailed account of the dedication of the new meeting-house erected by the Universalist society in Marshall, this county, but for want of room we are obliged to give the following account in the editorial department.

The dedication took place on Thursday, October 6th. The severity of the weather, (considerable snow having fallen the day previous,) prevented as full an attendance as was expected; but a goodly number of attentive hearers assembled, "and some who sat in darkness, saw great light; we pray God," says Br. Boden, "their light may increase until they shall be able to reflect it."

The house is neat, commodious, and well finished. The preaching was earnest, and the singing animated.

The services were as follows:—

Forenoon. 1. Hymn. 2. Reading of the Scriptures, by Br. Whiston. 3. Prayer by Br. T. C. Eaton. 4. Hymn. 5. Dedicatory prayer by Br. T. J. Smith. 6. Voluntary by the choir. 7. Sermon by Br. J. Potter, text, Rev. xxi: 3. 8. Voluntary by the choir. 9. Benediction.

Afternoon. 1. Hymn. 2. Reading of the Scriptures, by Br. Whiston. 3. Prayer by Br. Potter. 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon by Br. Whiston, text, Rom. xiv: 16. 6. Voluntary by the choir. 7. Sermon by Br. Eaton, text, Luke iv: 22. 8. Hymn. 9. Benediction.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. Sias is informed that earlier notice of his appointments cannot be given, unless he will furnish them earlier. His former notices did not come to hand until the time for the fulfilment of several of them was past—and of several others, near at hand. All religious notices must reach here by Wednesday morning, to be inserted the same week—hymenial and obituary notices, the Saturday morning (one whole week) previous to the date of the paper in which they are to be inserted. This is unavoidable, as the first form of our paper goes to press on the Saturday, and the second form on the Thursday previous to the date of the paper.

COMPREHENSIVE ATLAS.

We give place to the following recommendations of Bradford's Comprehensive Geographical, Historical and Commercial Atlas, because we wish to draw the attention of all who need such a work to the subject, as the agent is now in this city receiving subscriptions for it. I have not, myself, had time to examine it sufficiently to verify its correctness, so far as my limited knowledge of such subjects extends, and will not recommend any thing of which I know nothing, or which I do not positively know to be worthy of recommendation. I can only, therefore, say that in appearance, the letter press is neat, clean, and close, presenting a vast amount of matter in a little space. The maps and charts presenting a comparison between the sizes of the various countries, heights of mountains, climates, productions, etc., etc., will be found very convenient and useful, and the statistical tables, if at all correctly prepared, cannot but be extremely beneficial, as presenting at one view what otherwise must be sought for through many volumes. That they are correct, is certified by many of the ablest divines, literary men, editors and teachers in our country, most of whom profess to have carefully examined the work. We therefore commend it to the personal examination of all who may need such a work—they may rest assured that no table of contents can give them any thing like an adequate idea of the real and vast amount of matter contained in a volume of that size, unless, indeed, they are much conversant with works of the kind. The givers of the following certificates are well known to the public in this vicinity, and therefore need no recommendation of mine to ensure them the confidence of our readers.

A. B. G.

From D. Prentice, A. M., Principal of the Utica Academy.

Mr. Bradford's Atlas reflects very great credit upon the Editor and Publishers. The whole work is executed in a beautiful style, and embraces more useful matter in Geography, Statistics and Annals, in a more convenient and condensed form, than any similar work heretofore published in our country. It should be an indispensable companion to every person that reads a newspaper or a magazine; will be found very useful to teachers and scholars, and to a business man or a traveller will be worth ten times its cost.

D. PRENTICE,

Principal of the Utica Academy.

Utica, September 30, 1836.

From Rev. D. Skinner, Pastor of the First Universalist society.

I have examined Mr. Bradford's Atlas, described in the foregoing certificates, and fully concur in the favorable opinions there expressed, concerning it. I most sincerely believe, not only that no work of the kind exceeding it in value has been published in this country, but that nothing from the American press has yet made any near approximation to it, in the extent of its design, the utility of its object, and the neatness and beauty of its execution.

D. SKINNER.

Utica, October 1, 1836.

AN ERROR.

Br. Price of the Union, in noticing the removal of Br. C. Bingley Brown to Hastings, from Union Square, Oswego county, confounded him with Br. C. Smith Brown, of "Upper Lisle, Broome county," who has not removed at all. Perhaps he had better correct the mistake.

"PASSING AWAY."

Frequent as the yellow leaves,
 On an Autumn day,
 Vanish from the vine-clad eaves,
 Pass our friends away—
 By the breeze and by the blight—
 By the heavy rain—
 By the chilling frost at night
 We may hope in vain.
 "Passing" is the solemn word
 In each mourning mansion heard.

Have we jarred affection's string
 In some trusting heart?
 Left in love's unfolding wing
 An envenomed dart?
 Quickly let repentant tears
 Wash away the stain,
 Streams of woe in after years
 May be shed in vain.
 "Passing," is the solemn word
 In each mourning mansion heard.

Are there sufferings we may soothe,
 'Mid our little band?
 Dying pillows we may soothe
 With a tender hand?
 Mental blindness we may heal
 With a holier light?
 Let us to these labors steal
 Ere the day be night.
 "Passing" is the solemn word
 In each mourning mansion heard.

Ever, ever let us live
 As in view of death,
 Knowing earth has naught to give
 Like affection's wreath—
 Scattering roses while we may
 In the mourner's path,
 Lest remorse in open day
 Visit us in wrath.

"Passing" is the solemn word
 In each mourning mansion heard.

WRONG TO BE SICK.

"I take the ground that a person has no right to be sick," said an eminent physician of this city, the other day.

But you have a cold yourself; we observed.

"Yes," said he, "but I ought not to have one. I caught it foolishly. While in a perspiration last evening, I took off my coat, and though I at length began to be chilly, I neglected for some time to put it on. Now common sense ought to have taught me—or any other person—that I should not be likely to get rid of my chill by remaining with my coat off. But I neglected to attend to myself, and now I am suffering the just consequences. And thus it is with most of our diseases. We bring them upon ourselves, by breaking the organic laws in one way or another; and then we must suffer the penalty."

How just are these sentiments! And yet we fear another century will pass, and a thousand millions of human beings only live out half their days, before such sentiments will be generally received and acted upon!

If the public should ever get their eyes open on this subject, we shall not find them on the one hand worshipping their physicians, or like Balaam turning aside to "enchancements," or incantations, nor on the other despising them. Physicians—if wise—are a class of citizens whose influence is too valuable to be lost, if it could only be properly directed. We want them to teach us how to prevent disease; and it is very much to be regretted that their talents and skill should be forever misplaced by being expended in "patching up," when it would be far better to prevent the necessity of it.—Moral Reformer.

ECONOMY FOR CITIZENS.

We see by the notices of our Eastern brethren, that grapes have been very successfully cultivated—these ought, of course, to enter into the economy of every family. Every housekeeper should make it a matter of conscience, to have a grape vine on the premises. It is no argument to say that "we are only tenants, and do not know how soon we may remove." Let every tenant set out a vine—it will cost nothing—and then no matter if people do remove—they will only pass from one vine to another. We believe that landlords would do themselves as well as the public a service, by causing a good grape vine to be set out in the yard of every house they own—ever so little will accommodate it. Mr. Zollkoffler, at the corner of Sixth and Pine-streets, put out a grape vine in the yard of his house, but as no sun ever shines in the little nook where it was placed, he coaxed the vine so that it grew up to the top of the house, and an arbor was erected covering the whole roof of that portion of the building, and great quantities of grapes are every year gathered from that lofty eminence. We have drunk excellent wine, made, we believe, from the grapes that grew there. We are told that in some of the Spanish cities, where ground is scarcer and more valuable than with us, the vine is placed in the cellar, and conducted to the air through the cellar window, and thence upward. So it would seem that there is nothing wanted to the cultivation of the vine by every family in this city, but a little taste. We perceive that all have taste for grapes, and we can assure them from experience, that their taste would be improved as well as gratified, by a little attention to the remarks we have made above.

In the city, we have every advantage over our country friends, in the culture of the vine—there it is exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather, and especially liable to the attacks of insects—the rose bug, for example, will eat up leaf and fruit of a whole vineyard in the country, while they scarcely show themselves in the city.

We wish that some of our friends who go about doing good, would suggest this matter to families which they visit. We will engage that a good handful of vine cuttings placed at the disposal of children, with a little instruction as to use, will save the necessity of twice the amount of birch cuttings.—Philadelphia U. S. Gazette.

IGNORANCE AND PREJUDICE.

Ignorance and prejudice go hand in hand. They are twin sisters. Where you find one you will find the other. Those who are strongly prejudiced against any sentiment, are always ignorant of that sentiment. The original meaning of the word justifies this remark. It signifies, judging beforehand. Deciding upon a point before knowing or understanding the subject decided upon. How many are prejudiced against Universalism. They know nothing of the sentiment. When they are made to see its beauty, their prejudice flees away, and they bind it to their hearts, with the cords of sincere affection.—We have the cheering hope, that they will all see and know the value and beauty of the doctrine.—Banner.

WISDOM DWELLS WITH PRUDENCE.

Solomon says, "I, wisdom, dwells with prudence." Dost thou ask, reader, where you may find Prudence? The answer is, at the house of wisdom. "Wisdom hath builded her a house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars." She calls upon the foolish and imprudent sons of men, to come and be her guests. She feeds them with knowledge and understandings. Go knock at her door—prudence will open it unto thee. Enter thou into her dwelling, and there abide. Call her thy friend and thy sister, and make prudence thy kinswoman. Depart not from her abode, for she will be the guardian of thy life. Find the wise man and you will behold him who is prudent. Associate with him; for "He that walketh with wise men, shall be wise." Fear God, for "the fear of the Lord is wisdom."—Banner.

Speak not of doleful things in time of mirth, nor at the table; speak not of melancholy things, as death and wounds, and if others mention them, change if you can the discourse.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 12th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. HUBBARD C. POND, to Miss ELIZABETH HANNA, daughter of Marvin Hanna, all of this city.

In Springfield, September 1, by Rev. O. Whiston, Mr. JOSEPH HINDS, to Miss HARRIET LOSEE.

In Otsego, September 11th, by the same, Mr. WILLIAM C. WEEPLE, to Miss LOUISA GARDNER.

In Middlefield, October 4th, by the same Mr. REUBEN REED, to Miss LUCY ANDREWS.

In Amsterdam, September 18th by Rev. M. B. Newell, Mr. SIMON H. PHILLIPS, to Miss MARIA Mc NEIL, all of that place.

In Winfield, 9th inst., by Rev. D. Putnam, Mr. ROGER CATLIN, to Miss ELIZABETH NOBLE, daughter of Oliver Noble, of Genoa.

The name of Jane Phillis, in a marriage notice in our 38th number, should have been Eujane Philleo.

In Middleport, on the 4th inst., by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. CHARLES B. LANE, to Miss AMY JANE TAYLOR, both of that place.

In Lockport, on the 5th inst., by the same, Mr. WILLIAM MACK, to Miss NANCY MERRITT, both of that place.

In Royalton, on the 7th inst., by the same, Mr. ELISHA CLARKE, of Pawlet, Vt., to Miss OLIVE WHEELER, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Maryland, Otsego county, August 25th, Mr. SAMUEL BURNSIDE, aged 59 years. As he approached near the close of his earthly pilgrimage, his faith in the final happiness of a world grew stronger and brighter, until the vital spark had fled. Fearful that it might be said of him, as of others, that he renounced his faith in his last moments, he wished that his religious views might be incorporated in his will, together with the request that the writer of this might attend his funeral, both of which requests were complied with. O. W.

In Otsego, October 14th, Capt. SETH DOUGLASS, aged 75 years. Mr. D. was one of the first and oldest inhabitants of the town in which he resided. At an early period he joined the American army, and took an active part in some of the most trying events of the revolutionary war. Thus has another revolutionary patriot been called to join his companions who are fast accumulating around the throne of God. O. W.

In Stafford, Genesee county, on the 5th inst., JAMES DOUGLASS, in the 41st year of his age. His sole afflictions he long endured with fortitude. The consolations of divine truth was tendered to the relatives and friends, by Br. Alanson Kelsey, from Job xiv: 14.

At Clinton, October 7, Mrs. NANCY ELLINWOOD, wife of Mr. Tertius Ellinwood.

Mrs. E. was a good and affectionate wife, mother and neighbor. For several years she was subject to severe attacks of disease, which ultimately in that common scourge, and fatal conqueror of its subjects—consumption. She was a devoted believer in the salvation of all mankind, and a respectable member of our society in Clinton. She died as all true believers will—in peace.—Communicated.

At Middletown, Sangamon county, Ills., on the 8th ult., Mr. PHILO KING, aged 19 years, formerly of this city.

The deceased had just commenced an honorable career of business, with bright prospects before him; but, alas! the cruel hand of death has suddenly cut him asunder, and blasted forever a life which gave promise of future usefulness. He has left a circle of friends who deeply deplore the inscrutable providence which has removed him from this scene of existence. Long will they cherish the memory of his amiable disposition and social virtues; while all sincerely commiserate with his afflicted parents and family for the irreparable loss they have sustained.

In Newstead, Erie county, on the 7th of June, JACOB WHEELER, youngest son of Mr. Jacob Wheeler of that place, aged about 2 years. Thus, in the morning of joyous expectation, have parents been called to mourn, though not without hope, the loss of a promising child, and the family of brothers and sisters the early departure of one they loved. The illimitable grace of God through our Lord, and the consolation of the hope of a sinless and blissful hereafter, was extended to the mourning friends and sympathizing neighbors on the following day by the writer. C. H.

In Lockport, on the 27th ult., Mr. SANFORD BELLows, aged 23 years. Mr. B. had anticipated his death for some time, being afflicted with an incurable disease—the consumption. During his sickness he manifested great composure and fortitude of mind, and when his end drew near, he anxiously rejoiced at his departure. He was a Universalist by profession and practice, and died firm and unwavering in the faith of universal salvation. Just before his death, he requested that the writer should preach a discourse at his funeral, which I attended together with a devout congregation, in the Methodist chapel, on the 28th, to discharge the last office of respect to a deceased friend and brother. EPISCOPALIANISM.....No. IX.

TO THE CLERGY.

REV. SIRS—It was not the intention of Verax to say all that might be said—and with truth too—on the objectionable parts of your religious system, in the numbers which have appeared in the current volume of this paper, over that signature. His object was to show the public that Episcopalianism was not immaculate—that it was accessible in many points where not even the shadow of defence could be made, and consequently that its preservation as well as popularity, depended entirely upon sufferance. He very well knew, that you had reason to be ashamed of the origin of the English church; and he forebore to press every historical fact, and every consideration that might have been urged, on that account.

The history of the reign of Henry VIII. and of some two or three of his successors, is in fact, the history of the establishment of your church. And by the mere quotation of some of the more important parts, a series of enormities scarcely paralleled, would have been arrayed, which can never be contemplated without horror and indignation.—Take, at your leisure, the mock trial of the noble and injured queen—the pious simperings of the pretendedly conscience-smitten king, his hypocrisy and his arrant popery, and you must feel that they neither admit of apology nor justification. That there is some connexion, and an obvious one, between your prosperity as a religious sect, and the prevailing ignorance of these things, you will hardly deny. But they constitute only a part—and a very small part too—of the facts which must, at some period, be better understood by community, and which can scarcely fail of exciting a scrutiny into your system, that will well nigh reduce it to annihilation.

Verax owed you no ill will, and was therefore prepared to make every allowance for the state and temper of the times when you became a people, that you would be likely to plead with any show of propriety. But there are limits to that species of indulgence—least of all can it justify the perpetration of doctrines, prerogatives and usages under more improved institutions, and in an age of more refinement and better views. These, while they make you lament the violence of the sixteenth century, should induce you to abandon the pretensions then set up for you; and till you do this, the world will give you little credit for your acknowledgment of the errors of your predecessors. And as you have not offered even an apology for maintaining nearly every thing but the persecuting spirit of your ancestors—Verax could not well avoid informing thirty thousand or forty thousand readers, that popery—popery of the sixteenth century—had kindly thrown its vestments over your spiritual nakedness—had given you its creeds, its common faith and most of its forms of religion—all of which, like most other hereditary possessions, have been suffered to remain much in the same condition as when first entailed, their occupants being otherwise employed.

And then, again, Verax made every allowance for the prepossessions and habits of thought, which the influence of a system inspires in successive generations, and therefore declined to press you on the subject of your professions. For as candid and Christian men, you certainly do some very strange things—if they were not so common—in your avowals respecting the influences of the Holy Ghost. You profess to be moved by its divine impulses to say and do sundry things, which few men, except Episcopalians and Papists, would ever ascribe to such cause—a cause, too sacred to be thus rendered the plaything of every-day occurrences, and in an age when miraculous powers and gifts have been suspended for more than seventeen centuries. That you are reconciled by habit to the use of such forms of expression, and mean no more by them than others who use a very different phraseology, is probable: but still it is believed to be more suitable to the dignity of truth, and the simplicity of the Gospel, to call things by their right names. And it is a truth, which none of you (except perhaps a few fanatics) will question or deny, that men ceased to be specially moved by the Holy Spirit, at the close of the apostolic age. The purity of the Christian profession, requires you to admit this—not only in your private intercourse, but in your public professions and ministrations. And it is dangerous to the interests of morality and religion, for the professed ministers of both, to affect a style only compatible with the duties and endowments of an apostle—while in their daily conversation they are manifestly no more than uninspired men. It is dangerous, because it is the assumption of what few have any reason to believe true, and many will therefore be led to consider the whole system as one of pretension—because some weak brethren may think that they are actually distinguished by the possession of extraordinary powers—and because, if others deal in this species of legerdemain, ministers who set the example will have no reason to complain. And with all the charity which your institutions necessarily demand, the apostolic query forces itself upon consideration—"Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?"

On the subject of subscription, you were treated as kindly as the nature of the subject would permit. And you very well know, that the "half was not told." And it is hence, that we once more remonstrate against the practice, as one exceedingly detrimental to ministerial integrity or independence. For if the thirty-nine articles are not believed, it must be extremely difficult to reconcile the practice of subscription with the upright honesty, and plain integrity enjoined by the Gospel.—And if they are believed in all their parts and bearings, then it would seem impossible to retain one iota of independence. To think for one's self would be treason to the church—and to take a step towards the reformation of the doctrines and usages of the Liturgy, were to incur the odium of heresy. It may perhaps be admitted, that when the articles were framed, men knew of no other way to secure uniformity of opinion than by authority.—But when they live under institutions which permit them to judge for themselves, no good reason can be given why coercive measures should be still pursued. And that they are coercive, in so far as they must be adopted, or the defender is deprived of his official station in your ranks, none can deny.

Another evil in connexion with the practice of subscription, was suggested to your consideration by Verax—viz. that of professing and repeating several creeds quite unlike each other. Some of the discrepancies were pointed out, and it was then, and is still believed, that you can never turn your attention to the subject, without perceiving the correctness of his remarks. Is it indeed by no means certain, that you ever thought of the subject, for good and learned men are no more sure to criticise their creed, than the least informed of their own flock—especially when custom and interest combine to fix the profession of a prescriptive creed. But yours are so palpable, that we should as soon think of reconciling the Bible with the Koran—or of compromising truth with falsehood.

A chapter might very readily have been filled with a detail of the worldly-mindedness, sensuality and debauchery of the English clergy—with an account of their oppressions and exactions where they had the power, and of their fox-hunting, card-playing and intemperance to the neglect of the wants and morals of their parishioners, and the great scandal of the ministerial profession. All this might have been contrasted with the poverty, sympathy, humility and unaffected piety of your Catholic brethren in Ireland, who strive to mitigate the sufferings of both soul and body of the millions who were made wretched to pamper the pride and feed the luxury of Episcopalians. What an astounding catalogue could have been filled with these particulars! But Verax, in mercy to you, only adverted to the political aspects and bearings of your system, not wishing to call up the recollection of a train of evils beyond your control; in hopes that you might be admonished to reform existing abuses, and redeem yourselves and your people from the slightest imputation of approbating such enormities. And you would not now be reminded of these things, were it not for the wish to convince you, that no unfriendly motives induced the statements which were presented—and that the public may know that the facts already disclosed, are but an epitome of a multitude from which only a few selections have as yet been drawn forth.

Verax might have further shown, that in Europe at least, your church in all its memories and influences, is not an iota better—that it exerts no greater moral power, than papacy. And that your followers of the same grade, are equally intemperate; quarrel, fight and commit any other outrage as cordially and with as much impunity, as do the disciples of the pope. It is true, you enjoy in England, some political advantages over your continental and Irish neighbors; but it is a question of some moment, whether these prerogatives have been improved to your moral superiority. And if they have not—what account can be rendered of the improvement of your superior means for the benefit—the moral and religious benefit of the lay members of the establishment? And even in this favored land, where Gospel privileges are diffused like the sun-light of heaven—we have yet to learn that laymen are ordinarily suspended from your fellowship for any offence whatever. That they are so, is possible—that they are not, is probable.

You will also admit, that you have been measurably spared the pain of contemplating anew, the atrocious persecutions in which your church has formerly indulged. It was the intention of Verax, to place you before the public in the most comely attire that you could plausibly claim as your own at the present time—not to invest you with the garments of your predecessors reeking with the blood of Catholics, Covenanters and Puritans. But duty required that he should tell you and the public, though you no longer pushed your pretensions by fire and sword, there was less apparent principle in your more recent endeavors to promote them by the venal and pitiful policy which has been substituted in the place of power.

He was also careful in speaking of your pretensions to liberality, to make the lowest estimate of their objects. And he appeals with the utmost confidence to yourselves, if they have been overrated. Of this, you can form a very correct idea, by supposing some other denomination to take precisely the same steps, and pursue the same measures which you have adopted. In that case, it is believed you would feel very serious apprehensions for the purity of religion. You would fear, that such church would eventually become the same-tuary of every "unclean and hateful bird"—and that infidelity and moral evil would, in the order of things, preponderate over the intended good. Nor would the fact, that occasionally a few upright and talented men should be gathered with the common mass, diminish your apprehensions. You would perceive that they could not become the scape-goats of a numerous and far-spread denunciation. And that a few master-spirits appearing at long intervals, could no more give character to a whole people, than the piety of Fletcher and the eloquence of Massillon or Bourdalou can sanctify the enormities of popery. What think you of these things?

From these considerations—and a host of others which gather around—you should be admonished that a thorough reformation of Episcopalianism was long since called for—and is yet expected at your hands. Instead of being one of the last—if not the very last of the many sects, to admit of innovation and improvement in the form and fabric of your system, you ought, from the tone of your feelings and pretensions, to have been among the first. And this should have been done—and might have been most conveniently done, when you organized the establishment in the United States. Then—when first emancipated from political thralldom, you should have followed the example of our illustrious statesmen, and given your people a new constitution. And that you did not—is one among the multitude of other proofs, that mental and moral slavery sinks deeper into the soul, and degrades its victims to far lower depths of helplessness, than is ever effected by mere political bondage.

Instead of a pitiful imitation of the English establishment, you should have had a church emphatically your own, simplified by the republican genius of your country—unembarrassed by the restraints forged under the eye of a tyrant three hundred years since, and uncumbered with the numerous rites of a superstition which you profess to have exploded. As it is—you seem determined to render popery immaculate, by pleading its antiquity; and on the strength of established usage, to force your own system into preternatural longevity. For by all ordinary rules of the modern world, the ceremonies which an age of intense darkness fabricated and imposed upon the church, should have been long since consigned to oblivion. Happily for you, there is yet bigotry and indifference enough in the world, to protract the period of your dissolution, till you will be glad, if you do not fall into absolute dotage, to renovate the establishment.

Genuine and uncorrupted Christianity needs no amendment. It was, and is, and ever will be perfectly suited to the mental and moral wants of mankind. But to pretend that such is the genius of Episcopacy as maintained by the Protestant Episcopal church, is to set reason and facts at defiance. You well know that the system was framed at a time and under auspices but one remove from the dark ages. And it was the work—not of a benignant and inspired messenger from heaven, but of a number of earthly sycophants at the head of whom was a debauched and incorrigible papist king. To pretend that such men, at such a time, and under such influences, could, by any possible means in the multitude of chances, produce a system of rules for the regulation of public worship and morals adapted to other and more improved times, is preposterous in the extreme. And the complaints and admissions of your most enlightened and best men, confirm and justify the position.

Such being the more important features in the Episcopal economy, it is believed to be quite time that the public knew you better. Popery, Presbyterianism and Methodism have been vigilantly observed—while you have been permitted to pursue your course in undisturbed indulgence. Aided as you now are by the overgrown wealth of Trinity, we have more to fear from your measures, than it is reasonable to hope from your clemency. And you will not take it amiss, that we endeavor to open more eyes to your policy, than hearts to the conviction that there is any thing actually saving in Episcopalianism.

You have hitherto been addressed over a fictitious signature, because it was of no importance, while the articles were in progress, that their author should be known. A reply was never expected—because it was believed none could be made that would not confirm every statement, and because it was presumed that you knew this, and would therefore stand upon your dignity and bear rebuke in silence. But Verax was always willing to be known. He will reciprocate your contempt, and is neither ambitious of your smiles, nor apprehensive of your indignation. He is, with all due respect, MORNING MEDITATIONS FOR A WEEK. BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

I. He who endeavors to control his passions, to mortify his vain or evil inclinations, and in his daily conduct to act in accordance with those truths of which his judgment and conscience approve, is nearer a Christian, though he may never have heard of Christ, than he who professes a belief in all the common articles of the Christian faith, but in his life plainly denies Christ. Is he not?

II. We are told by Dr. Henderson and other travellers in Iceland, that on setting out on a journey, the inhabitants of such parts of that Island as are uncontaminated by the example of those foreigners who "live without God in the world," take off their hats and implore the Divine mercy and protection. Before crossing, and after having crossed a river, the genuine Icelanders also move his hat in token of the sense he entertains of his dependance on the supreme Being; and the fishermen when they put to sea, after they have rowed the boat into quiet water, at a short distance from the shore, take off their hats, and send up a prayer, committing themselves to the protection of God, and soliciting his blessing on their labors. Is not the example of these primitive men worthy, in its spirit, of the imitation of all right-minded Christians? Would we not feel some awkwardness in following this custom, when about to commence either a journey or any course of conduct of which our conscience did not approve? Would not this awkwardness and disinclination to pray, arise from the incongruity of our prayer and our practice?

III. If you were to send the most accomplished of infidels into the cottage of the meanest of our peasants, or into the workshop of the poorest of our artisans—the peasant or the artisan being supposed to be a true believer in Christ—one who has "drunk into his spirit,"—we should entertain not the slightest apprehension as to the issue of a conflict between parties so apparently ill-matched; but on the contrary, should await the result in the most perfect assurance that though there might be no taking off the objections of the infidel, there would be no overthrowing the faith of the believer. Skepticism can make no way, where there is real Christianity; all its triumphs are won on the field of nominal Christianity.

IV. Some traits of the patriotism of the late Hon. Thomas S. Grimké, of S. C., we have not yet forgotten, though it is nearly two years since his death. He espoused with much earnestness and zeal, the cause of Sunday-schools, Bible, tract, missionary and peace societies. It was the strong enduring faith which he possessed, that these institutions or similar ones were to be instrumental in renovating society, that made it his glory and his pride, to be actively engaged in establishing them, for, as he observed, he viewed them as the infant Hercules. Even love for his country, and his ardent desire for the preservation of this Union, had its foundation, as he himself has told us, in a higher hope. He felt that all mankind were heirs of glory and immortality, and he wished all to become acquainted with their high destination. O! for more and more of such patriots and philanthropists.

V. The number of intelligent laymen is fast increasing in this country. In almost every congregation there are a few of strong and acute sense, who know when their minister preaches understandingly and when he does not. To satisfy these men he must have an active, energetic mind—he must have resources in an early and well cultivated mind. His success and the general reputation of his office, are essentially dependent on the opinion which a few individuals form of him.

VI. If the first and most essential qualification in those who would extend the kingdom of heaven, be a participation in the spirit of Christ, the next is mental power and resources. One great reason why infidelity and corruptions of Christianity have prevailed, and do still prevail, in various portions of this country, is the destitution of eminent and intellectual attainments in the teachers of Christianity. Instead of being in advance of the community, they are often far behind. Station ministers of elevated piety and disciplined minds in every city and village throughout our land, and they will be able to accomplish great improvements, by elevating their congregations, every year, to more exalted regions of Christian thought and feeling.

VII. Setting a watch over our first thoughts, and endeavoring to make them devotional and practical, is an excellent preparation for prayer, and a right and good spirit during the day.

Many of our readers will remember the attempts of several Partialist Editors and clergymen to disprove the declaration of Professor Sears and Mr. Dwight, respecting the Universalist sentiments of the so-called Orthodox divines of Germany. They may also remember the letter we published, from the celebrated Professor Tholuck to Br. T. J. Sawyer, in which Mr. Tholuck refers especially to the writings of Henrich Jung, genannt Stilling, as advocating the doctrine of the restitution of all things. The following extract is from the writings of said Professor Young, (called Stilling).

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Messrs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—The following is a translation from a work, published by Professor Young [called Stilling] in defence of his "Theory on the Knowledge of Spirits, first American edition, Reading, Pa., printed by H. B. Sage, 1816"—pages 54, 55—wherein, I think, he sets forth very plainly, that he was a believer in the restitution of all things. Yours, etc.,

G. GROSH.

West Hempfield, Pa., October 13, 1836.

"The doctrine of purification after death, is also maintained by the Greek church; and I am acquainted with a number of pious, learned and enlightened theologians, in both Protestant churches, who agree perfectly with me, both as to the purification after death, and also in the restitution of all things. That this doctrine ought not to be brought in the pulpit, is self-evident; and I would not have touched this point, in my writings, had not the philosophers and the theologians* brought the very plausible accusation against us, that our religion retained doctrines which dishonor the glory of the supreme Being, and which make God to be a tyrant, who rejoices in the misery of his creatures. What prince would condemn one of his children to a dungeon for life, for some juvenile misdemeanor? and should God, infinite Love, punish a man, his own creature, even if he had sinned above a hundred years, with a punishment which would last myriads of years, and when these were passed, to begin anew!

Can, in the most righteous judgment, where Love itself is judge, finite sin merit infinite punishment!—away with this abominable thought! But that sinful man, from one period of his existence to another, is from time to time brought into more effectual penitentiaries, till, at last, he is conquered; for his Creator and Saviour, is Godlike, consistent with his eternal love, and just.

I ask further: Would the Son of God have completed the work of salvation, if he had saved only the fourth or fifth part of his brethren, for whom he became man, suffered and died?—No! he would have failed; and this he could not do, hence not a single soul will be lost, they will ALL—ALL be saved at last, the holy Scriptures do not in one instance say the contrary, and they cannot say it, and if it even seems so, we then must choose the most reasonable construction. But they do not even seem to say it, for all the passages wherewith some are essaying to prove the infinity of hell torments, prove nothing further, than that they shall continue a long, undefined time. The Hebrew word Olam, and the Greek Aionios, which Luther has translated by etwig (eternal) signify no where an infinite, but a very long, an indefinite time."

The following excellent essay was sent, by an absent member, to be read before the Utica Berean Institute, on the evening of October 11th, when the question at its head was debated, and decided in the negative. Having obtained permission from its youthful and estimable author, we present it to the perusal of our readers.

A. B. G.

IS A LIE EVER JUSTIFIABLE?

In the discussion of this question, I am impelled by a sense of moral duty, to avow the negative; and shall endeavor, by every means that my humble abilities afford, to substantiate and prove that side of the question. I can hardly flatter myself that I shall be able to throw any additional light upon the subject: yet if I should happen to bring forward any thing, however small, that may have escaped the observation of any of the members of this society, my highest object will be attained, and I shall rest assured that I have not labored entirely in vain.

In attempting to establish the negative of this question, I shall endeavor to prove to the satisfaction of my audience—that as virtuous, moral and upright beings—as advocates of the bright, ennobling principles of Christianity, and as honest members of society, it is our imperative duty to adhere rigidly, and on all occasions, "to the plain and simple truth;" that we can never violate its sacred shrine with impunity, or without evil consequences.

1. Can we be virtuous, or moral beings in violating truth—in uttering a falsehood? Truly not. We must lose all pretensions to that character after a lie has escaped from our lips. For in what does virtue consist? Is not veracity one of the indispensable ingredients of a virtuous character? It will not be denied. Then, how, I ask, can we be moral, virtuous beings, and yet pollute the temple of truth, and taste the bitter cup of falsehood? It is an impossibility in itself. Can a man be wise without possessing wisdom? Can a man be learned without possessing knowledge? Assuredly not. Then it must be admitted that man cannot be moral or virtuous without being an ardent, unwavering devotee at the shrine of truth. That unquestionably established, we will proceed farther.

Do the precepts and examples of Christ teach us to justify falsehood? Do they not show clearly, the fallacy and foolishness of such an attempt? To my mind they exhibit most lucidly, the folly of attempting to defend a practice that is so palpably wrong. The whole principles of Christianity, from beginning to end, reprobate falsehood in the highest terms. Can it be denied that the whole tenor of the sacred writings bears in direct opposition to the affirmative of this question? Not so with a strict regard to truth; and I do not doubt but that there is wisdom and discernment enough in those who uphold the affirmative not to attempt to prop a falling building with a rotten brace—not to attempt to support an untenable side with unstable and unfounded arguments. The precepts of the Bible throughout, hold in utter detestation the baseness of lying. Did Christ, or any of his apostles, ever intimate, in the course of their labors, such a thing as a justification for falsehood? No. If they had, then could we find one part of sacred Writ conflicting with another; for in innumerable passages we find lying denounced in the strongest terms possible, without a single exception ever being made on the score of policy or necessity. I could adduce some, but it is unnecessary. I do not apprehend that there will be the least attempt to justify lying from any portion of the sacred Scriptures. If there is, I should almost be constrained to believe that reason had lost her equilibrium and understanding had fled. To the Bible the advocates of the negative look for their strong support; and they are not disappointed:

for there is found ample, plenary proof of the supremacy of the negative of this question. Look at the fate of Gehazi, of Ananias and Sapphira, and then tell me if Christian precepts and principles justify lying. No one who peruses that sacred book, can doubt or has ever doubted this undeniable truth.

Now we come to the third and last clause of the first proposition, which speaks with regard to our support of truth as honest and worthy members of society. If falsehood were justifiable in the estimation of the virtuous part of community, what would be the state of human society? The temple of Truth annihilated, and the banner of falsehood planted where it stood, whenever policy claimed it: Where all was once peace and calm serenity under the mild influence of truth, there confusion would reign. Man would lose all confidence in his fellow beings, for who could tell whether, when his fellow spoke, the speaker was not relating a "justifiable" lie? The strong bands of society would be severed, and the stormy reign of chaos would prevail. Could it be otherwise? Were there no regard paid to truth, except as supposed expediency required, how could society exist? Is not veracity the connecting link between man and man? Destroy that and where is your society? That is one of the principal laws that binds man to his fellow-being in social intercourse. Denounce and disregard that, and you sever the silken cords. If I could not trust in a man's word—if I had lost all confidence in his truth and veracity, and was compelled to judge his affirmations by his policy, how could I hold society with him? I could not—it would be repugnant to my feelings as a votary of truth; and were it so with all mankind—were truth disregarded, and falsehood justifiable, whenever supposed policy might require it, what, I ask with feelings of anxiety, what would be the state of the world? It is needless to present the appalling picture. Every one must see the necessity, to the well being of society, of a rigid practice of and scrupulous regard for truth.

2. I shall next proceed to prove, that we can never violate truth without punishment, or evil consequences. No reflecting person, in my opinion, can ever utter a falsehood without receiving his merited and proper punishment. From the birth of sin in the bright garden of Eden, down to the present time, falsehood and iniquity of every description have invariably received full and ample punishment. If a man who has heretofore adhered scrupulously to the truth, once allow a falsehood to escape his lips, his peace of mind becomes annihilated—bitter pangs of conscience torment him, and he recovers not his wonted serenity of mind, till he has confessed his fault and made ample atonement at the shrine of truth. Then, when he has heaved off that heavy burden from his soul—when he has eased his conscience from that enormous load, then his peace of mind returns, but not till then. Look at the heavy punishment of immediate death inflicted upon Ananias and Sapphira, upon the former for concealing the truth, upon the latter for uttering a direct falsehood, and we shall see the utter hopelessness of a liar's escaping merited punishment. Look at the case of Peter, the apostle of Christ, and we shall still behold punishment, but of a far different nature, and such punishment as is invariably inflicted upon the liar, if he is not destitute of all ennobling feelings of man's nature. When he had denied his Lord and Saviour, what excruciating torments he endured! The pangs of remorse smote him sorely—the enormity of his crime overwhelmed him—his peace of mind fled—and he "went forth and wept bitterly." What punishment is more cruel than the upbraidings of one's own conscience? How miserable, how wretched must man feel, when self-condemned! This is the punishment that man endures for lying. No one that has not engulfed his conscience in the deep abyss of crime, can ever utter a falsehood without bitter feelings of remorse, and self-reproach, self-condemnation in the eyes of the immaculate God of truth.

The next part of this subject to which I would direct your attention, is the evil consequences of lying. There never yet was a falsehood told, in my opinion, but some evil grew out of it. It must be evident to you all, that, in most cases, deceit is productive of bad effects; and I hope I shall be able to show that its consequences are evil in all cases. Leaving all abstracted points, we will come immediately to the one in question. It may be doubted by many, whether lying is productive of evil, when a person utters a falsehood with purely a benevolent object in view. In my mind there is no doubt, nor can there be in any one's, who has calmly and logically reasoned upon this subject. Grant that a man tells a lie and benefits his friend by it—grant that pure benevolence prompts him. Yet after all, he has uttered a falsehood—he has countenanced the base crime of lying—he has committed that deed which is so summarily punished by the pure God of truth—and can he be justified? ought he to be justified? No. There is no pure moral principle under heaven that will justify him. If a man deems himself justifiable, in uttering a lie at one time, will he not at another? If a man justify himself in falsehood on one occasion—when if there were no evil consequences, he might in truth be justified—will he not justify himself on another occasion, when there is not near as much reason for such justification? Does he not, by lying at all, weaken the love of veracity in himself and others? Let the first step be taken, and the others will soon follow. Once deviate from the path of rectitude, and justify yourself in such a course, and the broad road of ruin is already entered. Once get into the current that leads to the waterfall, and you will soon be precipitated down the foaming cataract. Once leap the fence, and how far may you not be tempted to wander into the open field? Once depart from moral rectitude, and you will be the more easily induced, when strong temptation offers, again to prove traitorous to the mild influences of truth. Habituate yourself to justify trivial, and I might say benevolent falsehoods, and you thoroughly pave the way for the justification of greater and more deplorable ones. After the coward has been in one battle, he enters the next with less reluctance, and with more courage. The long and well known maxim—"take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves," is very applicable, in this case. Take care of the small and trivial falsehoods, and the greater ones will take care of themselves.

From the foregoing remarks, it must be evident, it appears to me, that a lie can never be justified. It is a duty we owe ourselves—a duty we owe society, rigidly and on all occasions to adhere to the simple dictates of truth. If truth be a good, as all admit, falsehood, its opposite, must be an evil; and we are not to do evil that good may come of it. According to the principles of morality—according to the ennobling precepts of Christianity—and according to the laws of society, a lie is always unjustifiable. Where is the authority of the affirmative of this question? What moralist ever justified a lie? Johnson, Addison, Paley, Mrs. Opie, and in fact every one that has reasoned and written upon the subject, have found no justification for a falsehood. Then, my hearers, may you always cultivate truth, that noble principle of moral rectitude; and may you ever be ready to exclaim, with true sincerity of heart, in the language of the dramatist—

"Oh! celestial Truth, thou fount of virtues,
Let no mortal leave thy onward path,
Though from the gulf of hell destruction cry,
To take dissimulation's winding way."

In the decision of this question, let every one reflect before the ballot is given. Let each one think well upon the subject, and I have no reason to doubt but all will maintain their moral dignity—their Christian character, and nobly stand forth in the plain and simple garb of Truth, to defend its sacred shrine from the contaminating touch of falsehood. Then, respected members, may I confidently hope, with no fear of future disappointment,

That the bright principles of Truth divine,
Around your pathway, will forever shine.

QUESTIONS FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

I have noticed from the proceedings of some Universalist Conferences, that the ministers in attendance have organized themselves into a Council, and proceeded to confer the rite of ordination on one of their number, without the counsel or consent of a proper representation of lay delegates, referring, at the same time, the whole business, for approval or disapproval, to the next annual session of the Association. Suppose the Association, when convened, should disapprove of the ordination which this Council of ministers alone have conferred; would the candidate be ordained or not? If he be not ordained till the Association votes to sanction it, might not the candidate as well wait till the Association meets, as to receive it before?

Again, if the candidate be ordained during the session of the Conference, can the vote of the Association disannul it? If it cannot disannul it, where is the necessity for the action of the Association? If it can disannul it, where is the propriety of conferring it at a Conference? Besides, is not the practice of conferring ordination by the authority of a few clergymen, taking away the rights and privileges of the laity, and leading directly to an aristocracy? As I am in the dark about this business, will some brother who has assisted in conferring ordination, without the consent of our societies, give me more light on the subject?

STATISTICAL REPORTS

To the General Convention of Universalists, 1836.

To the General Convention of Universalists in the United States, the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists sendeth Christian salutation; and respectfully submit the following

ANNUAL REPORT.

The blessing of God has evidently attended the cause of truth within our borders, during the past year. Since our last report to your body, two new meeting-houses have been finished and dedicated; two old houses remodelled and rededicated; seven are now building; and one has been erected and dedicated partly by Universalists; making in all, eleven and a moiety, completed or in progress. Of young preachers, six have received letters of fellowship, and four others have begun their ministry. Of new societies, nine have been formed. Of churches, three have been formed, and three resuscitated. One new weekly religious paper has been established.

All these additions have taken place in the territory east of Connecticut river. In the section west of that river, little progress, so far as we learn, has been made during the last year. The regions in which it is thought, the greatest degree of zeal and success has appeared, are, 1st, the county of Essex, in the northeast corner of the State; 2d, the county of Barnstable on Cape Cod; 3d, the county of Middlesex, adjoining that of Essex, north and west of Boston; 4th, the county of Norfolk, southwest of Boston, and the county of Worcester in the central part of the State, etc., etc., besides some particular towns scattered in other counties.

The statistics of our denomination, so far as we have been able to collect the particulars, may be presented at one view in the following statement, which is founded upon the one given in the last year's report:

STATE CONVENTION, organized 1834, comprehending three Associations, viz.

1. Union Association, formed (under another name) 1816, now embracing—Berkshire county, two societies; Franklin county, five societies; Hampden county, five societies, two preachers; Hampshire county, one society, one preacher; Worcester county, twenty-three societies, seven preachers, two churches of communicants.

2. Old Colony Association, formed 1827, embracing Barnstable county, seven societies, five preachers, two churches of communicants; Bristol county, four societies, one preacher; Plymouth county, eight societies, seven preachers, four churches of communicants.

3. Boston Association, formed 1829, embracing Essex county, twenty societies, ten preachers, four churches of communicants; Middlesex county, twenty-three societies, sixteen preachers, eleven churches of communicants; Norfolk county, ten societies, seven preachers, three churches of communicants; Suffolk county, four societies, five preachers, three churches of communicants.

Whole number of societies, one hundred and twelve; of preachers, sixty-one; of churches, twenty-nine. To this number of preachers, however, we ought to add six or seven, who, having no fixed engagements, could not be located in the preceding estimate; making the whole number of preachers about sixty-eight.

Institutes and Berean Societies, six, in the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Middlesex and Essex.

Weekly Religious Newspapers, two, viz. 1. Trumpet and Universalist Magazine, at Boston, 5000 subscribers; 2. The Gospel Sun, at Haverhill, 800 subscribers. Monthly periodical, Universalist and Ladies' Repository, at Boston, 1900 subscribers. Total, 7,700 subscribers.

We have thus detailed the increase of our number and means, and given our present statistics as accurately as we can. In addition to this, it may be proper to say, that there appears among us an increase also of the spirit of practical and experimental religion—a greater interest in the truth as a vital principle of spiritual life, and a greater attention to the duties it inculcates.

Our denomination in this Commonwealth continues perfectly united. Never has there been a greater harmony of feeling, or a more ready co-operation in measures and conduct.

By order of the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists. HOSEA BALLOU, 2d.

Roxbury, September 14, 1836.

The New-Hampshire State Convention of Universalists to the United States Convention sendeth Christian salutation—

DEAR BRETHREN—The following will give you a partial view of the present condition of our common cause in the State of New-Hampshire. Our State Convention was formed in 1832. We have also six Associations viz. the Merrimack River, the Grafton County, the Strafford County, the Cheshire County and the Rockingham—when formed is not known, except the Grafton and Strafford, which were organized, the former in 1834 and the latter in 1836. There are seventy-three societies. The following will give you a brief view of the cause in the different towns comprised in the limits of the Merrimack River Association—Amoskeag, one large society, one meeting-house, a church of fifty members, preaching half the time by Br. F. A. Hodsdon, very prosperous; Bedford, one small society, one meeting-house which cost $2000, preaching half the time by itinerants, very prosperous; Goffstown, one society of ninety members, one meeting-house, preaching one-third of the time by Br. F. A. Hodsdon, very prosperous; Weare, one society organized in 1803, part of two meeting-houses, has been dead twenty-four years, preaching half the time by Br. E. Trull, prospects brightening; Dunbarton, one small society, prospects small; New-Boston, one small society, preaching eight or ten Sabbaths annually, not flattering; Concord, one large society, no meeting-house, preaching half the time by Br. J. G. Adams, prosperous; Hopkinton, one society, two meeting-houses building, preaching half the time by Br. R. Bartlett, prosperous; Heniker, one small society, no meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time, prospects not known; Warren, Sutton and New-London, one small society in each, no meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Cooper, prospects not known; Lyndeborough, one society of twenty-eight members, meeting-house not known, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. C. S. Hussey, tolerably prosperous; Wilton, one small society, occasional preaching by itinerants, prospects not known; Temple, one small society, whether a meeting-house is not known, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. J. V. Wilson, prospects not known; Mason, one society, church of twelve members, whether a meeting-house is not known, preaching a few Sabbaths annually, prospects not good; Nashua village, one good society, no meeting-house, preaching all the time by Br. W. M. Fernald, very prosperous.

In addition to the above, in this Association there are many towns numbering a few believers who are true, and have occasional preaching.—Merrimack once contained a society, but having turned to the beggarly elements of the world, was some time since numbered with things that have been. Thus you will perceive that there are seventeen societies within the limits of this Association.

Connecticut River Association—The following is a brief view of the cause in the limits of the Connecticut River Association:

Plainfield, one good society, a share in one meeting-house, preaching half the time, prosperous; Cornish, one good society, a share in one meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time, prosperous, opposition blind and furious; Croyden, one society of fifty members, no meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time, prosperous; Claremont, one society of one hundred and forty members, one good meeting-house, a church of thirty-nine members, constant preaching, very prosperous; Newport, one society of forty members, a good meeting-house, preaching half the time by Br. A. L. Balch, very prosperous; Goshen, one society of twenty members, share in a meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Balch, prosperous; Wendall, one society of twenty-five members, shares in two meeting-houses, a very little preaching, prospects not known; Lempster, one society of forty-five members, share in one meeting-house, preaching a few Sabbaths annually, prospects not known; Ackworth, one society of thirty members, no meeting-house, preaching one-fourth of the time, prosperous; Washington, one society of forty members, half of a meeting-house, preaching half the time by Br. Gilman, very prosperous; Langdon, one good society, share in a meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time, prospects not known.

In this you will learn that there are eleven societies, and for the most part very prosperous.

Grafton County Association—The following will give you some idea of our condition in the limits of this Association:

Lebanon, one large society, one good meeting-house, preaching three-fourths of the time by Br. J. Moore, prosperous; Hanover, one small society, no meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Moore, prosperous; Oxford, one good society, share in a meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. J. E. Palmer, prosperous; Piermont, one small society, no meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. J. E. Palmer, prosperous; Bath, one good society, one meeting-house, just built, preaching half the time by Br. Sanford, very prosperous; Lyman, one large society, one good meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Sanford, prosperous; Thornton, one small society, no meeting-house, occasional preaching, tolerably prosperous; Rumney one good society, one good meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Adams, prosperous; Wentworth, one good society, share in a meeting-house, preaching one-fourth the time by Br. Adams, prosperous; Dorchester, one small society, share in a meeting-house, occasional preaching, prospects very fair; Groton, one small society, share in a meeting-house, occasional preaching, prospects very fair.

In this Association are eleven societies. In addition to this there has been preaching a few Sabbaths in other towns where there are no societies, and a spirit of inquiry seems to prevail generally among them—good will result from it.

Stafford County Association may be seen in the following:

Conway, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, preaching a few Sabbaths, prosperity not known; Euton, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, preaching a few Sabbaths, prosperity not known; Ethingham, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, preaching a few Sabbaths, prosperity not known; Ossipee, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, preaching a few Sabbaths, prosperity not known; Wolfsborough, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, preaching a few Sabbaths, condition—rather cold; Centre-Harbor, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Moultonborough, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Hollerness, societies not known, share in one meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Meredith, one small society, share in one meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Gilford, one small society, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Sanbornton, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Gilmanton, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Barnstead, one large society, no meeting-house, no church, no preaching, prosperity not known; Stafford, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Barrington, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Rochester, societies not known, no meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Great-Falls, one small society, one good meeting-house, no church, occasional preaching, prospects—not flattering; Dover, one good society, no meeting-house, no church, constant preaching by Br. Atkinson, prosperous.

In this county there are five societies—the cause is yet in its infancy—bright prospects are beginning to dawn—there are probably many believers where there is no organization, and but little preaching.

The following is descriptive of Cheshire County Association. It comprises—Hinsdale, one good society, share in one meeting-house, preaching one-half the time by Br. F. Loring, prosperous; Westmoreland, one small society, share in one meeting-house, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Walpole, one good society, share in one meeting-house, preaching one-half the time by Br. D. Ackley, prosperous; Alsted, one good society, meeting-houses not known, preaching one-quarter the time by Br. Hemphill, prosperous; Swanzey, one small society, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching, prosperous; Jeffrey, one good society, meeting-houses not known, preaching one-half the time by Br. Wilson, prosperous; Winchester, one large society, one good meeting-house, constant preaching by Br. Clark, very prosperous; Marlborough, one society, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Gilsum, one society, no meeting-house, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Richmond, one old society, one meeting-house, occasional preaching, prospects—rather cold; Surry, one society, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching, prosperity not known; Stoddard, one society, share in one meeting-house, occasional preaching, prosperity not known.

In this county there has been considerable preaching many years ago by our fathers, but of late years they have much resembled a field where the timber had been felled and the fire run over it—neither cleared, nor yet is it a forest! There are twelve societies in this Association.

The following is a view of the cause within the limits of the Rockingham County Association.

Atkinson, two societies, both small, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching, prosperous; Deerfield, one small society, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching, prosperous;

Danville, believers, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching, prosperous; Derry, one society, meeting-houses not known, preaching one-third the time by itinerants, prospects—aresuscitation going on; Exeter, one good society, one good meeting-house, constant preaching by itinerants, prosperity not known; Epping, one large society, one good meeting-house, preaching most of the time, prosperous; East-Kingston, one small society, share in one meeting-house, occasional preaching, prosperous; Hampsted, one small society, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching by Br. Jewell, prosperity not known; Kensington, one small society, meeting-houses not known, preaching not known, prosperity not known; Kingston, one good society, meeting-houses not known, preaching one-half the time by Br. Beckwith, prosperity not known; Nottingham, one society, one meeting-house, preaching not known, condition—dead; New-Market, one excellent society of one hundred and fifty members, one good meeting-house, a church of forty members, constant preaching by Br. Hanscom, prospects—doing wonders, all alive; Newfields, one small society, share in one meeting-house, preaching one-half the time by itinerants, prosperous; Plaistow, one small society, meeting-houses not known, occasional preaching by Br. Brown, prosperity not known; South-Hampton, one small society, share in a church, preaching most of the time, prosperous; Salem, one good society, meeting-houses not known, preaching one-half the time by Br. Jewell, prosperous; Windham, believers, meeting-houses not known, preaching one-quarter the time, prosperity not known; Allenstown, Chester, Poplin, Londonderry, Sandown, Rye and Raymond have more or less believers, and each some preaching; Portsmouth, one very large society, one large meeting-house, a church, constant preaching by Br. M. Ballou, very prosperous. There are seventeen societies in this Association.

LIST OF PREACHERS.

M. Sanford, Bath; J. Moore, B. H. Fuller, S. Laws, Lebanon; J. G. Adams, Rumney; P. Brownson, Bristol; A. L. Balch, Newport; J. Gilman, Washington; D. Ackley, Walpole; F. Loring, Hinsdale; S. Clark, Winchester; J. V. Wilson, Jaffrey; W. M. Fernald, Nashua; F. A. Hodsdon, Goffstown; D. Cooper, Sutton; R. Bartlett, Hopkinton; T. J. Tenney, Pembroke; J. P. Atkinson, W. S. Cilley, Dover; W. C. Hanscom, Lamprey River; H. Jewell, Salem; E. Brown, Plaistow; E. G. Brooks, W. Wilcox, M. Ballou, Portsmouth.

Besides the above are a few itinerants who have not had fellowship.

The above is a cursory view of the present condition of our order in New-Hampshire—so far as it extends it may be relied on as very near correct. There may be some errors, but we flatter ourselves that they are few, as we have gleaned these particulars from some ministering brother in each of the Associations appointed for that purpose. The cause is onward! It must prevail—to God be the glory! Amen.

MOSES BALLOU.

To the General Convention of Universalists in the United States, to be convened at New-York, on the third Wednesday in September, 1836, the Vermont State Convention of Universalist, sendeth Christian salutation, and respectfully submit, for your information, the following

ANNUAL REPORT.

Convention organized January 17, 1833.

Northern Association.—This Association was first organized in June, 1804, and for a number of years included within its limits the States of New-Hampshire, Vermont, and a part of New-York. In October, 1829, a Constitution was adopted; and the Association now includes the counties of Orange, Washington, Caledonia, Orleans and Essex, in Vermont, and the societies organized in Lower Canada.

Orange county, six societies, one preacher; Washington county, seven societies, four preachers; Caledonia county, six societies, two preachers; Orleans county, six societies, no preachers; Essex county, one society, no preachers; Lower Canada, nine societies, one preacher. Total, thirty-five societies, eight preachers. In this Association there are fourteen houses of worship owned and occupied wholly or in part by Universalists.

Green Mountain Association, including the counties of Windsor, Rutland and Bennington, organized August 19, 1829.

Windsor county, seventeen societies, fourteen meeting-houses, six preachers; Rutland county, seven societies, one meeting-house, one preacher; Bennington county, two societies, two meeting-houses, two preachers. Total, twenty-six societies, seventeen meeting-houses, nine preachers.

Champlain Association, including the counties of Addison, Chittenden, Franklin and Grand Isle, organized February 20, 1833, and called "La Moile Association." Constitution revised, name changed, and limits extended to the adjacent part of Canada, June, 1836.

Addison county, four societies, one preacher; Chittenden county, two societies, one preacher; Franklin county, six societies, two preachers. Total, twelve societies, four preachers. Meeting-houses occupied wholly or in part by Universalists, seven.

Windham Association.—This Association including Windham county, is a part of what formerly constituted the Franklin Association.

The Franklin Association, without any definite boundaries, was organized October 10, 1822. In September, 1829, a Constitution was adopted, limiting the Association to the counties of Franklin, Mass., Cheshire, N. H. and Windham, Vt. When Conventions were organized in those States the Associations became virtually dissolved. As the sessions of this body had, for several years, been holden in Windham county, Vt., and as societies in other counties had discontinued sending delegates to its council, at the annual meeting of the Association in June, 1834, the Constitution was revised, and the name of "Windham Association" assumed. Number of societies, fifteen; houses of worship, eleven; preachers, five.

Total, within the bounds of this Convention, eighty-eight societies, forty-nine houses of worship, owned and occupied wholly or in part by Universalists, and twenty-six preachers.

This report is, unquestionably, in some respects, imperfect. It is confidently believed that additional societies exist within the limits of the Convention; but as they failed to represent themselves in the Associations to which they respectively belong, and as the brethren to whom the subject was referred by the Convention could not recollect others, it is deemed proper to report only such as could be distinctly recollected. One hundred is undoubtedly a safer estimate of the number of societies within the limits of this Convention.

We would joyfully express our obligations of unfeigned gratitude to Almighty God, for the signal success with which he has crowned our humble exertions, to extend and build up the cause and kingdom of our blessed Redeemer in this part of his moral heritage. Our present condition is highly prosperous; unanimity of feeling, and a commendable zeal, amongst both ministers and people, prevail throughout the State; and our future prospects are truly encouraging. "The battle is the Lord's"; the victory also is his; and to his name be the glory forever. Amen.

By order and in behalf of the Vermont State Convention of Universalists.

WARREN SKINNER.

Under all circumstances, there is but one honest course; and that is to do right, and trust the consequences to divine Providence. 'Duties are ours; events are God's.' Policy with all her cunning, can devise no rule so safe, salutary and effective, as this simple maxim.—Mrs. Childs.

Peace of mind, and honest reputation, are better sources of enjoyment than mere wealth, and yet how many yield them up for the idol gold.

UTICA, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1836.

THE GOLIAH OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

We learn by our Eastern papers that a certain Elder Culver, of Washington county, N. Y., has challenged generally any Universalist to debate with him. In answer to this challenge, Br. I. D. Williamson, of Albany, says, "if the Elder will find five intelligent and respectable men in Washington county who will say they believe him to be a candid and honest man, and will engage that he shall indulge in no low and vulgar abuse, we will pledge ourselves that he shall find an opponent."

Ah! there's the difficulty, if this is the same Elder Culver, (as it doubtless is,) with whom we had a brief encounter some ten years since, in that county. For we seriously doubt, whether that number of intelligent and respectable men can be found in the county who will say they believe him to be a candid and honest man, and be willing to give the required pledge for him.

The Elder was so remarkably peaceable and still for a long time after that encounter that we supposed he had learned wisdom therefrom, and had since acted on the prudent maxim, that "discretion is the better part of valor." But it seems, that his bravery is again, as in that instance, getting the better of his discretion, and he is now anxious for another fight. For the purpose of refreshing the Elder's memory, and as a premonition to others who may engage in controversy with him, giving them some idea of the talents, piety and candor of the man, we will here briefly state the circumstances leading to and attending the aforesaid interview.

In May, 1826, while residing at Saratoga Springs, I had an appointment to deliver a lecture at Queensbury. On attending that appointment I met several brethren from the neighboring town of Fort Ann, Washington county, who strongly solicited me to visit their town and deliver a lecture on the day following. They urged, as one reason for pressing this request, that Elder Culver, whom the Baptists called their great gun, was then preaching in that town, and very zealously engaged in attempting to put down Universalism, and caricaturing its doctrines, reviling its advocates, and (in the absence of any public teacher of it) defying any of its abettors to prove it true, or gainsay what he declared concerning it; and moreover that he declared he did not want more than five minutes to shut up the mouth of any Universalist, provided they would be frank in the avowal of their opinions; but said he "they will not—you cannot tell where to look for them any more than for a frog in the mire, for like that animal, they will hop from bog to bog, to avoid being caught in their native element," etc., etc. They therefore wished me to go and preach a lecture to the Fort Ann people, so that those who wished, might hear what Universalism really was, and thus satisfy them that Elder C.'s statement of it was a mere caricature. I consented to go.

Though the notice was but short, there was a full attendance. Elder C. had an appointment for that afternoon a few miles distant; but on hearing of my lecture, he waved his own in order to attend my meeting, and that for the express purpose of putting down so dreadful a heresy in the bud. He brought with him one of his officers (Deacon Simmons) to witness his triumph. Just as I entered the house of worship it was intimated to me that Elder C. was in the neighborhood and would probably attend meeting. Very well, said I, if he comes, conduct him to the desk and introduce him to me. Accordingly, soon after I entered the house, the Elder was announced, introduced and seated with me in the desk.

Well, thought I, Elder, you shall have plain language to-day—you shall, at all events, know where to find me—I shall not "hop from bog to bog," but show myself in my true colors in open day. I invited him to make the opening prayer—he politely declined—I proceeded.—My text was Titus ii: 11, 12, "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men* hath appeared, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." I first spoke of this grace, as originally, eternally and immutably existing in God, independent of the works of the creature. 2d. Of the manifestation, or appearing of this grace in the advent and ministry of his Son Jesus. 3d. Of the salvation which this grace of God bringeth—showing to whom and how many it is ultimately brought, viz., all men without exception—proved from a variety of scriptures which were quoted, also in what the salvation consisted, viz., deliverance from sin, ignorance, darkness, error, misery and death, into the glorious liberty of the children of God. And 4th. Of the practical lessons, which this grace thus manifested teaches, viz., the denying of all ungodliness, and worldly lusts, and the living soberly, righteously and religiously in this present world; which said I, is directly the reverse of what our opponents say our doctrine teaches, viz., the indulgence in every sin, and the total disregard of all godliness.

I here took occasion to advert to what our opponents often say of themselves in connexion with the doctrine, i. e., that if they believed in universal salvation, or disbelieved in an endless hell, they would not care what they did—they would give free scope to every evil inclination of the heart—would lie, swear, cheat, steal, get drunk, rob, murder, etc., and having learned that the Elder had made similar remarks, I turned to him and said, "Whoever thou art that makest these assertions, I say to thee that (if thy words are the true index of thy heart) thou art now a liar, a swearer, a knave, a thief, a drunkard, a robber, a murderer—for thy heart is in love with all these abominations—desirous of engaging in their perpetration—and there is nothing wanting for thee to indulge freely in them all but the opportunity of doing it with impunity. But I cannot think so ill of many of our opposers as to believe them sincere when they make these declarations. I cannot think them so bad as their words would intimate, but must think, of many of them, that they know not what they say; or that they have never looked in the mirror to see what a dreadful picture they give themselves by such language." I then concluded with an exhortation to the exercise of charity towards those misguided souls who were led hoodwinked into such fatal errors, and urged the practical exemplification of our faith in the virtuous lives of all who professed it.

After concluding the sermon, observing the Elder had been sitting apparently upon live embers during a considerable part of the discourse, I turned to him and very pleasantly inquired if he wished to make any remarks. He colored up, looked confused, and stammered out a negative, observing that as the meeting had already been very lengthy and the audience were doubtless tired of sitting, he would not detain them. I then kindly asked him if he would dismiss the meeting by prayer. He answered with a snarling angry No! I then dismissed the meeting, and the congregation began to retire, when the Elder called on them to stay, for he could not in conscience go away and allow that numerous congregation to go away without warning them against the dreadful doctrine, the fatal heresy to which they had been listening. Were he to neglect the opportunity of thus warning them, the blood of immortal souls would be required at his hands.

LITERATURE AND RELIGION.

The literature of the age is beginning to feel that it breathes a milder atmosphere, and dwells in a more tolerant clime. Hence it occasionally alludes to or dwells on subjects in religion, which but a few years ago it dared not even name, unless to treat them with contumely, ridicule or contempt.

The following article is an instance, and contains within itself a more valuable instance of the truth of the above remarks. The article is copied from a shrewd, semi-grave and semi-humorous collection of aphorisms and brief definitions with remarks, entitled the "The Tin Trumpet, or Heads and Tales for the Wise and Foolish." It is anonymous, but has been ascribed variously to some of the best English writers, especially to Bulwer. As it is anonymous, however, I do not place as much stress upon the article as I do upon its quotation from the Edinburg Review, one of the best and most popular periodicals published in the land of John Knox. The Reviewer, however is ignorant of one thing—we are not "sailing under sealed orders"—for the owner of the ship some eighteen centuries ago, sent a messenger on board to break open the sailing orders, and this Master and all his mates agree as to the destination of the whole ship's crew. Let us then no longer doubt nor despair—for God having "abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence," has "made known unto us the mystery of his will, (which he has purposed in himself, according to his good pleasure"—and gave them sealed up, as the sailing orders of the world; but they are now made known to us by his Son)—"that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he would gather together in one all things in Christ—whether they be things in heaven or things in earth, even in him." Amen. A. B. G.

"OPTIMISM—A devout conviction that, under the government of a benevolent and all-powerful God, every thing conduces ultimately to the best in the world he has created, and that mankind, the constant objects of his paternal care, are in a perpetual state of improvement, and increased happiness. This is a great and consoling principle, the summary of all religion and all philosophy, the reconciler of all misgivings, the source of all comfort and consolation. To believe in it, is to realize its truth, so far as we are individually concerned; and indeed it will mainly depend upon ourselves, whether or not every thing shall be for the best. Let us cling to the moral of Parnell's hermit, rather than suffer our confidence in the divine goodness to be staggered by the farcical exaggerations of Voltaire's Candide. If the theory of the former be a delusion, it is, at least, a delightful one; and, for my own part—malim cum Platone errare, quam cum aliis recte sentire—where the error is of so consolatory and elevating a description.

"An optimist may be wrong, but presumption and religion are in his favor; nor can we positively pronounce any thing to be for final evil, until the end of all things has arrived, and the whole scheme of creation is revealed to us. 'Does not every architect complain of the injustice of criticising a building before it is half finished?—Yet, who can tell what volume of the creation we are in at present, or what point the structure of our moral fabric has attained?—Whilst we are all in a vessel that is sailing under sealed orders, we shall do well to confide implicitly in our government and Captain.'"

THE UNIVERSALIST EXPOSITOR.

Our readers have seen that it is intended to revive this excellent and much needed periodical. That such a work is really needed in our denomination, will not be doubted by any one who will consider its objects. There are many very interesting and useful subjects which require a long article to do them justice. Such an article cannot find uninterrupted room in any of our weeklies; and to continue it from week to week, is to lessen its interest, weaken its force and weary the patience of the reader. It will not do, either, to divide it into numbers; for its several parts may be so closely connected, and so dependent on each other for being clearly understood, that if published in numbers, such a continual reference from one number to another will be necessary, as to render the article more vexatious to the writer, and wearying to the patience of the reader, than if continued from week to week without being divided into numbers.

I see noticed in one of our Eastern periodicals, an error in relation to this contemplated work, which I fear prevails too extensively among our readers also. It is this:—Many persons seem to think that the Expositor is, only intended and calculated for the clergy, or for students. Such is not the fact. It will be found highly useful and interesting to all classes of readers. It is intended for the laity (not only as well but) in common with the clergy of our denomination. It avoids the use of Latin, Greek and Hebrew words as much as is convenient, and when they are used it is in such a manner and connexion that the laity will as well understand what is meant as the most erudite among their preachers. In short, it will be to all, among our religious periodicals, what the Knickerbocker, the American Monthly, the Quarterly Review, and similar works are to them among their secular papers—a receptacle of valuable and interesting articles of a solid kind and considerable length, which cannot well be published in our weekly periodicals, and which, therefore, must be forever lost to us but for such a work.

The question, therefore, is not, Do we need such a work? for every one will admit that our denomination does—but, Will we have it? It will supersede no periodical now published among us, but aid all. It will fill a chasm, now void in our circle of religious reading. And it will richly repay the reading Universalist, fond of religious literature, for his expenses in procuring it. To such, and who are able abundantly to take such a work in addition to the Universalist periodicals they now aid to sustain, we appeal for patronage to the Expositor. One thousand subscribers are needed to start and sustain it; and surely a denomination numbering over six hundred thousand members, can furnish one thousand subscribers to it—yes, thrice that number, if they will but resolve to do it. The State of New-York alone, is abundantly able to furnish the requisite number, and those who compose it will not feel the subscription money, nor be under the necessity of retrenching one cent from their other expenditures to forward the cause of truth.

There is no doubt, also, from the character of those engaged in reviving the Expositor, that they will increase and enlarge the work, from time to time, in proportion to the support that may be yielded them over and above what is necessary to support it at the first. They added to its size formerly, when they could ill afford to do so; and they will not be less generous, when enabled to do it by an increased and increasing patronage. More—much more might be said in justice and in truth, but I hope the foregoing is sufficient. We will see.

Subscriptions will be received at this office, directly, or through the medium of any of our preachers or agents. A. B. G.

SLANDEROUS REPORT.

Olmstead, Cayahoga county, Ohio, October 7, 1836.

Br. SKINNER—I am requested by our Br. Ross, of this place, and in behalf of many brethren, members of the Universalist society in Olmstead, Cayahoga county, to state to you that, for the purpose of injuring the cause of truth, a certain Rev. Israel Mattison, of the Presbyterian church, now settled in this place, has stated before many respectable witnesses, a majority of whom were his own brethren, that you have twice renounced your faith in the doctrine of the restitution of all things, on a sick bed; which he boldly challenges you to deny. He says he will prove before the public, that such are the facts, if you presume to deny them. For the satisfaction of the brethren, we desire you to state all you know relative to the subject, and also whether you have any knowledge of such an individual ever having resided in the vicinity of Utica, at any time, while you were confined to a sick bed. The said Mattison, on being told that you would be written to upon the subject, expressed a wish that we might do so, and that you would publish this communication and your answer in the Magazine and Advocate. Yours, in behalf of the brethren,

H. P. SAGE.

REPLY.

As I am requested to "state all I know relative to the subject" of the above, I hereby inform my inquiring friends in Ohio—for in this region no such information is needed—that the report of (the reverend slanderer) Israel Mattison is entirely false, length and breadth; that I have never renounced the doctrine of universal salvation, nor wavered in the least in my faith since I became a believer therein; that I have been, for the last fourteen years, constantly engaged in preaching, and for the last ten years, in writing and publishing the doctrine, and spreading it abroad through the country to the utmost extent of my power; (and have done it in all good conscience before God and men;) and moreover, that I have never known, in this place or region, according to the best of my recollection, any such individual as Israel Mattison; and I therefore candidly state my honest belief in relation to him, that he is a base liar and impostor, if he has stated what our correspondent in the above letter declares.

D. SKINNER.

WHAT WRITEST THOU?

The subscriber who dated his letter at Haight, and mailed it at Black Creek, enclosing twelve and a half cents in silver, and requesting us to send him two Almanacs, also to discontinue his paper at the end of the present volume, is informed that he forgot to sign his name to the letter, so that we cannot tell which subscriber's paper to discontinue!

As to the Almanacs we have a word to say on that matter. We have repeatedly notified persons not to send specie by mail, as the postage on it often more than swallows up what is sent. He paid the postage on the letter, (eighteen and three quarter cents,) and left us to pay the postage on the enclosure, which was as much as on the letter. Of course, even if we knew to whom to send the Almanacs, (as we do not,) we would not do it, for the reason that he has taxed us postage on his request beyond what he sent us for the Almanacs, and is actually indebted to us, instead of our being indebted to him.

I have spoken plainly, not because the case, in itself, is one of any importance—but because too many such cases occur in the course of a year, and we are almost always made to pay for the writers' carelessness. I therefore notice this one case, in hopes it may prevent the occurrence of others like it. Pay the whole postage on your letters, not as charged by Postmasters who are ignorant of what they should charge, but as the law requires. A. B. G.

NOTICE—REMOVAL.

I see it stated in several of our papers that Br. M. L. Wisner, late of Dundee, Yates county, intended to settle with the society in Springfield, Ohio. Such was his intention, but he is compelled by providential circumstances to forego his intention. He is now about to remove to Bath, Steuben county, to which place he wishes all letters, etc., intended for him to be directed in future.—He will continue to labor with the society in Kennedyville a part of the time; and the remainder as Providence may direct.

The Herald and the Union are requested to notice the above. A. B. G.

JUST RECEIVED, FOR SALE.

Christianity versus Infidelity, by Br. T. B. Thayer—price 75 cents. The occasional sermon by Br. Drew—per dozen, 33 cents—single, 6 cents—a few dozens only received. Dr. A. Combe on Digestion and Dietetics—a useful work—price $1.00. A new assortment of Combe on the Constitution of Man—price $1.00. Besides a large collection of Universalist, Phrenological and Educational works, "too numerous to mention," and Spurzheim's and Combe's phrenological busts, all at the Boston prices. Call and see.

N. B.—Our ministering brethren, who keep books for sale in this region will do well to send in their orders early for the Discussion between Ely and Thomas—Williamson's Argument for Christianity—and for the Register and Almanac for 1836, or for 1837, (all of which I can furnish at the publishers' prices,) in order that I may guess at the number I will want to supply the market, and procure a sufficient stock before navigation closes.

PORTRAIT OF BR. A. C. THOMAS.

A few copies of this excellent likeness just received, and for sale at this office—$1.00 per copy.

It is not a coarse lithograph, which may be afforded at a few cents, but a very fine steel plate engraving, done in the best mezzotinto style. The resemblance is very good—exact—striking as many would call it—except that the original looks a little younger than the engraving. However, he is every day growing up to it. The signature is admirably correct—looks precisely like the original's. Call and see it.

We have some orders to send this portrait by mail: it cannot be done, except by doubling it up so as to injure it somewhat. We wait further orders.

OMITTED.

Unintentionally we omitted the promised prospectus of Waldie's Literary Omnibus. We forgot it till too late. It will appear in our next. Also, a notice of Br. Whittemore's new book of Psalmody.

THE REMINISCENCE.

We have hitherto neglected to mention that we have published in neat pamphlet form this very excellent prize tale by Br. J. M. Austin, of Danvers, Mass.; together with some other articles from his pen, to fill out 36 pages. They will be sold at $4.00 per hundred—75 cents per dozen, or 10 cents single. Orders solicited.

THANKS to our correspondents, they have remembered us finely. Einni is very welcome—it is a finely filled sheet. I wish he would try his hand for one of the prizes for an essay or tale. C. H., J. E. H., A. C. B., S. P. L., T. J. W., and several others as welcome as he, are also received, and will appear in due time. Some not here named are already in the copy drawer. Lucia bids fair, but we have not yet had sufficient time to examine the article so as to decide fully upon it. When we can find time, we will attend to the request of the letter.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in November, by Br. BRITTON at Depauville at 11 A. M., and at Clayton in the evening—Br. C. BINGLEY BROWN at Tug Hill, and at Bush's in the evening—Br. A. WILLIAMS at Sheridan—Br. WAGGONER at Eatonville, and at Newport in the evening—Br. BODEN at Hamilton, and in Hamilton village in the evening—Br. JONES at Fulton, and Br. EATON at Ellisville, and at Bellville in the evening—Br. BULLARD at Columbus, and Br. DELONG in Cortland—Br. T. J. SMITH at the schoolhouse near Br. Carvers, at early candlelighting—subject, Matt. xxv: 41—Br. GROSS at New-Hartford.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in November, by Br. WAGGONER at Salisbury, and Esq. Snell's in the evening—Br. A. WILLIAMS at Carroll—Br. C. BINGLEY BROWN at Depauville, and at French creek in the evening.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in November, by Br. A. WILLIAMS at Oil Creek, Pa.—Br. BODEN at Madison—Br. C. B. BROWN at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening.

Br. C. BINGLEY BROWN will preach in the evenings of November 14th, at Warren settlement—15th, at three mile bay—16th, at Pillar point—17th, near Baggs' in Hounsfield—18th, as Br. McQuain shall appoint.

The Niagara Association will meet in extra session, in the Universalist meeting-house in Gaines, Orleans county, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in November. The Council will meet in the vestry room on Wednesday at 9 A. M.—Each society is requested to send two delegates—and the ministers and delegates are requested to be punctual in attendance at the above named hour, as the business will probably all be transacted early on Wednesday morning. It is expected that Br. A. C. Barry will be ordained. All of like or unlike faith are invited to attend. C. HAMMOND, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this Office for the week ending on Wednesday last.

P. M. Chardon, (O.) for S. Y.—Rev J. B. Brownville, for E. G. A.—J. W. Willink, for E. A. L. J. S. C. L. S. and A. P.—Rev J. E. H. Ann Arbor, (M. T.) for A. H. E. K. A. Canada—S. M. F. Canadie, for self, J. W. W. P. and A. H. K.

POETRY.

The following Hymn (which to our great regret, was mislaid, so that we could not find it till now) was written by a member of the Harford Universalist society, and sung on the occasion of Br. Whiston's delivering his farewell discourse.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FAREWELL HYMN.

Tune—Missionary Hymn.

Go, brother, preach salvation,
Proclaim the joyful sound,
Till every tongue and nation
The Gospel faith has found;
Bind up the broken hearted,
Bid the oppressed go free,
Nor sigh that we have parted—
Our blessings follow thee.

Go, brother, duty calls thee,
We cannot ask thy stay;
We know what'er befalls thee,
'Tis God points out the way.
With pleasing retrospection,
With naught to mar our peace,
We view our past connexion;
And must these pleasures cease?

Oh, no! the joys we've tasted
Shall bloom in future years,
Nor shall their sweets be wasted
Till death affection sears;
Then, fare thee well, dear pastor,
Though grief our bosoms swell,
We'll trust a gracious Master—
Dear brother, fare thee well.

SONG.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

—“Oh! cast thou not
Affection from thee! in this bitter world,
Hold to thy heart, that only treasure fast,
Watch—guard it—suffer not a breath to dim
The bright gem's purity!”

If thou hast crushed a flower,
The root may not be blighted;
If thou hast quenched a lamp,
Once more it may be lighted;
But on thy harp or on thy lute,
The string which thou hast broken,
Shall never in sweet sound again
Give to thy touch a token.

If thou hast loosed a bird,
Whose voice of song could cheer thee,
Still, still he may be won
From the skies to warble near thee;
But if upon the troubled sea
Thou hast thrown a gem unheeded,
Hope not that wind or wave shall bring
The treasure back when needed.

If thou hast bruised a vine,
The Summer's breath is healing,
And its cluster yet may glow
Through the leaves their bloom revealing;
But if thou hast a cup o'erthrown
With a bright draught filled—oh! never Shall earth give back that lavished wealth
To cool thy parched lips' fever.

The heart is like that cup,
If thou waste the love it bore thee,
And like that jewel gone,
Which the deep will not restore thee;
And like that string of harp or lute
Whence the sweet sound is scatter'd;
Gently, oh! gently touch the chords
So soon forever shatter'd.

FEMALE BEAUTY OF MIND.

It now begins to be well understood, that beauty of face and person, and taste and splendor of dress, attractive circumstances, I grant you, swimming gracefully down the dance, and the attainment, which approaches still more closely to intellectual, the softening and elevating charm of music—all these are, just as nothing in the view of a man of sense, compared with a rich and well trained mind, with the utterance of well chosen words, like apples of gold in pictures of silver, which convey pure, high and virtuous thoughts. There is, and there can be nothing beautiful, except in so far as it is associated with mind. Show me a woman who knows how to converse pleasantly, to give judicious counsel, and exhibit discreet management, who has the ability to know what to say, and how to act on any given emergency, who understands how to economize her wit, if she has it, who comprehends how the utterance of scandal distorts the countenance, whose passions and affections are regulated, and who possesses the intrinsic tenderness and truth of the female character, and I will show you one, who seems beautiful to me, whatever face she may happen to possess. It cannot be repeated too often in your ear, that there is nothing truly beautiful but mind.

We are accustomed to suppose, that the ultimate aim of a young lady properly and naturally, is, to become the virtuous, intelligent, respected and beloved head of a family. Hitherto, the connubial union has been, for the most part, formed simply, by the impulse of the senses; and beauty, and dress, and the external arts of pleasing, have been, perhaps, the most common incentives to it. Need we wonder that such unions are so often unhappy? When they are formed merely from the attraction of personal beauty, we have reason to think from our range of observation that they are invariably wretched. Satety, disgust, and the most insupportable of all human miseries, an incompatible and discordant union for life are the consequences. Such, nine cases in ten, is the union of an uneducated man and an untaught beauty. Ask a father, which of his children he most loves, the pert and ignorant beautiful daughter, or the plain but sensible, docile and well instructed one? Ask husbands what points they most regard in their wives, three weeks after marriage, their beauty, or their knowledge, amiability or good sense? I repeat again, there is nothing beautiful but mind. If I were a poet, you should have it in metre and in song, that a piony or a poppy are as splendid flowers as the rose. Let the one and the other be worn in your bosom, and compare their fragrance and value at the end of a month. Knowledge compared to beauty, is the rose to the piony and poppy.

Yet it gives us pain to see, that the thoughts of ladies too much centre on beauty, ornament, dress and showy accomplishments, after the order of things which once gave them so much importance, has passed away. It was natural that they should think, converse and care for nothing but these things, when they constituted their only hold upon consideration. It is humiliating to see them thinking of little but fashions and dress, now that they are in possession of other and far higher and surer claims upon homage and admiration. Who is there, who in the sanctuary of his hidden thoughts, would balance a moment in forming a partnership for life, between a flaunting belle, though robed in the finest silks of Persia, and tinted ever so brightly with native or apothecary's vermilion, and a plain young lady, neat, modest, intelligent, instructed, with a full mind and regulated heart? Who would hesitate between the beauty, fairer than the fabled hourri, who could talk of nothing but the fashions and the weather; and the woman, who, without beauty, was wise, and good and true, and compared with the other, as the rose to the piony?

I know for certain, that in the family circle, and among those with whom we mix every day, the last thing of which we think, after seeing them a few times, is their personal beauty. The untaught and unregulated beauty, we soon wish to lay on the shelf in disgust. While the instructed and sensible woman, like sterling coin, is found to possess an intrinsic value, always increasing, by the accumulation of the interest added to the principal.

I would recommend knowledge by another consideration. It has been a thousand times said in these days, that it is power, and ladies have been much misrepresented if they are not fond of power. If knowledge is power in the hands of men, what will it be, when women add it to their other weapons of empire and triumph? Just as certainly as man controls the lower orders of civilized man, just so certainly among you the wise will have the most ascendancy. You must not forget the while, that men are as much more instructed now, than formerly, as women. Every new idea that a man gains, is additional weight thrown into the intellectual scale, to incline him to think less of beauty, fashion and dress, and more of mind and amiability of character.

We would not be understood to say, that you ought not to bestow a rational estimate on fashion, beauty and dress. We would have you as studious at least of neatness and propriety as quakers. All we contend for is, that since all sensible people have come to think more of real knowledge and good sense in ladies, than dress and appearance, it is unreasonable and bad calculation, still to think and act upon the scale, that exist'd, when all these things went for nothing. We cannot help remembering that the ordinary period of life is set at seventy years. The empire of beauty seldom lasts more than ten or fifteen. What is to sustain the beauty, who has no other possession in the dreary interval, when her roses have vanished, with her admirers, never to return? Knowledge, virtue and truth are immortal. Time, age and death cannot touch them. Trust me, a plain young lady with a sound head, and a well trained mind, and an amiable and well managed heart, will find some way to aim a sharper and surer shaft, and inflict a more incurable wound, than a mere flourishing belle, who has nothing to show but her dress and her person.

Under all circumstances there is but one honest course, and that is to co right, and trust the consequences to divine Providence. “Duties are ours; events are God's.” Policy with all her cunning can devise no rule so safe, salutary and effective, as this simple maxim.—Mrs. Childs.

MARRIAGES.

In a hymenial notice in last week's paper, instead of Elizabeth Hanna read Elizabeth Hannahs.

In Fort Plain, on Sunday, October 2d, by Rev. L. C. Brown, Mr. SAMUEL POST, to Miss ELIZA DIEFENDORF, both of Danube.

In Turin, October 8th, by the Hon. J. O. Mott, Mr. GALEN RICHMOND, to Miss LAURA WILKINSON, all of Turin.

In the same town, on Sunday evening, October 2d, by Abram Miller, Esq., Mr. HARLOW SHEPARD, to Miss MARY GAYLORD, all of Turin.

DEATHS.

In Fort Plain, on the 4th September, ADAM, son of Abraham A. Waldrat, aged 5 months.

In Newville, on the 30th September, CLARISSA ANN, daughter of Asa Wilcox, Esq., aged 12 years.

In Manheim, on the 26th September, EMILY, daughter of Seffrenes Snell, aged 17 years and 8 months. The funeral was attended on the 28th, at the Dutch Reformed church in Snellsbush, and the comforts of the Gospel ministered from Job xxx: 16.

In Danube, on the 28th September, MARY, wife of Cornelius Zoller, and daughter of Mr. John Dillenback, aged 20 years. These two young women, (Miss Snell and Mrs. Zoller,) four weeks ago were in health. Each was attacked, in the beginning, only with a common cold, and both, in the flower of youth have gone down to the tomb. I mention this circumstance with the hope that it may serve as a premonition to awaken from that indifference which so generally prevails in regard to pulmonary affections. I never hear one complain of “a slight cold,” and then listen to the hoarse cough which succeeds, without thinking of the grave yard.

In Minden, on the 13th inst., FARLEY, son of Solomon Diefendorf, aged 26 years. He had lingered since last Winter, under a painful disease, which he bore with the most exemplary resignation, wishing for death, yet willing to wait God's time. He left a young companion and numerous relatives to mourn. May Heaven comfort them.

In Palatine on the 3d of October, ELSEY ANN, daughter of Oliver and Angelina Waggner, of Newville, aged 2 months and 6 days.

Scarce did the tender opening flower
Its beauteous fragile leaves expand,
When in a moment and evil hour,
’Twas snatch'd by death's untimely hand. L. C. B.

At Scipio, on the 6th inst., [the name is illegible] AIKEN, youngest daughter of Ira and Jane Aiken, aged 15 months and 19 days. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the bereaved relations and sympathizing friends, by the writer, from Eccle. xii: 7. May the glorious light of immortality comfort those who have been, by this dispensation, called to mourn; and may the affectionate and afflicted parents be cheered by the blessed assurance, that, although the dust has returned to the earth as it was, yet the spirit has gone to the God, who gave it. ORIGINAL SERMON,

BY A. B. GROSH.

"My soul longeth—yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." Ps. lxxxiv: 4.

The Psalm from whence I have selected the text, is devoted to the praise of public religious worship—the delights of God's sanctuary, and the happiness of his followers and adorers. I shall use it for the appropriate purpose of proving

I. That man is not only an animal, but a religious being—not only the creature, but the child of God.—Every research into the nature of humanity, tends to prove that man is a being of varied and extensive powers—of a complex nature, if I may so express my meaning. His growth, like the growth of all animals, is that of a vegetable. By his stomach, acting as a root, nourishment is received, elaborated, and circulated through his system in the various ducts and capillary vessels proceeding from thence. By his lungs, acting as do the respiratory vessels in the leaves of plants, the air is inhaled, its oxygen separated from its other properties, and the remainder exhaled back again into the atmosphere. Thus far, then, man, and all animals beside, resemble vegetables.

As an animal being, composed of flesh and blood, man, in common with all animal existences, has his instincts and propensities. His attachments to life, sex, children, friends and kindred, country or home, and self—his desires for food, applause, property—his ability to contrive, calculate, arrange, etc.—all these he possesses in common with the various animal tribes, some in a greater, some in a lesser degree.

As man—the representative of his Maker, the lord of this lower creation and the high priest of nature—he possesses several faculties, or sets of faculties, unknown to any earthly being beside. By his rational faculties he is enabled to investigate the causes of the various effects he witnesses around him, to compare things and events, to appreciate the sublime and the beautiful—in short, to reason. By his moral faculty he is capable of appreciating his own and others' rights—of perceiving his own and others' duties—of tracing the dependences of relative human actions and influences, and is induced to speak truth, to act justly, and to detest wrong-doing. By his religious faculties he is impelled to acknowledge and revere his relation to, and dependence on a higher being—to believe in things immortal and invisible, and to hope for a future existence in another world.

By the animal affections which bind us to our race, our country, our families, and lead us to seek our homes and our sustenance, we are raised above the vegetable tribes—but all above this would be darkness and void, if the human faculties were not superadded. But when we consider the rational and moral faculties of man, (by which we are elevated above the brute creation—as it, by its propensities and affections, is elevated above the vegetable tribes—and by which we are so pre-eminently distinguished, and invested with the lordship of creation and the sovereignty of nature,) we at once perceive that man would not be man, but brute, without an almost continual use of these ennobling and distinguishing attributes of humanity.

But even, with these alone, all above fleshly being and all beyond mortal existence would be chaos and doubt, if man had not been invested with still higher faculties. And we thank God that he has not left us here—that he has not confined our minds within the narrow space of this world, the short duration of this life, and the insulated relationships of our own immediate family circles. He has dissipated the darkness—he has regulated the chaos—he has extended the feeling and knowledge of our relationship! By his creative power he has stamped the impress of his own divinity on our souls—written the relationship existing between us and all intelligences, in our very nature—and taught us to feel around, to see whether we could not learn to appreciate our own worth and destination, and by the yearnings of filial want, find him who is our Father and our God. These most powerful impulses of humanity—these craving desires of the religious faculties—send their powerful influences down through every portion of our nature—bind the divinity and humanity of the universe together—and hence their principles, and the doctrines deduced therefrom and according therewith, are called religion—a word signifying, to rebind or reunite together.

If this view of human nature is correct, then man is not only the creature, but he is actually the child—the very offspring of God. And that this view of man is correct, I will now proceed to prove, by the voice of Nature, and by Revelation.

1. By Nature.—Here, as on many other subjects, Christians who have wandered from the positive teachings of the Bible, find themselves in the ranks of the infidel. Universalists oppose both. Believing that the nature God has given to man, however its impulses may be perverted and abused, can never receive that which is wholly unnatural, they contend that man now is, as he was at the beginning, a religious being.

The doctrine that man, in a state of nature, is totally opposed to religion—at enmity with God—inclined wholly to evil—and that before he can turn to God, or become religious, his nature must be wholly and radically changed—this doctrine we believe to be a great and injurious error and delusion. It has driven men from the altars of God, and made them aliens from their Father's courts. But go to man in his simplest natural state, and do you find it true? No! every where—in every age—among every people, you find religion and religious worship. Whence came it? By education? Who was the teacher, and upon what did he engraft his lessons, if not upon the natural stock? Whence came it? From tradition? How did that tradition first find a place in the human mind, if the soil was not prepared to give it growth?

But the skeptic is scarcely silenced, before the Partialist Christian refers us to barbarous rites and human sacrifices—to the worship of idols, stocks, stones, beasts and reptiles. True—these exist, spread widely abroad over the earth, yet instead of proving that man is not, by nature, religious, they confirm our position. They prove that man's religious desires have been more powerful than his moral sentiment—or why has the desire to worship some divinity, and to embrace some revelation, so often triumphed over his knowledge of right and wrong? They prove that man is more a religious than he is a rational being—or why have the religious desires so often overcome reason, and established such irrational modes of worship among men? They prove man to be more a religious, than he is a social being—or why has his desire to worship some divinity led him to live solitarily and alone—to renounce kindred, and friends, and country—yea, even to stifle the powerful impulses of natural affection, and sacrifice his fellow-men, and his own offspring, to please the divinities he so fervently worshipped? I might perhaps add, that these idolatries even prove man to be more a religious, than he is a sentient, or feeling being. For if this is not so, at least in some cases, why have so many mutilated and torn their own flesh—mortified their appetites by fasts and improper food—braved cold, hardships, dangers, and even death, to worship and adore some divinity or other. What folly, then, to talk of religion being unnatural to man, because man indulges in false, irrational, immoral, unsocial and unfeeling systems of worship and faith. As well might we contend that man has no natural desire for food, because he sometimes eats poison—that he loves not his offspring, because he sometimes spoils them by over-indulgence—that he possesses no natural faculty for distinguishing between good and evil, because he sometimes mistakes one for the other—or that he possesses no natural feeling of benevolence, because he sometimes bestows his charity on the undeserving!

The abuse of any faculty is, in fact, as strong a proof of its existence and power, as its proper use. And the evil consequences resulting from its total disuse, is as strong an argument that it is implanted in our very nature, and that its desires are the wants of a healthy action of our mental constitution, as are the good effects resulting from its proper use. On this point, what a powerful argument can be drawn from nature, to prove religion to be natural to man! For it is a solemn fact, testified by some of the first physicians in the world, that "Atheism is the worst of sedatives to the understanding and passions."—"The same violence is done to man's mental faculties, by robbing him of a belief in a God, that is done by dooming him to live in a cell, deprived of the objects and pleasures of social and domestic life." So says the celebrated Dr. Rush. Esquirol and Falret, two celebrated French physicians, testify that "Irreligion is, certainly, a very frequent cause of suicide. Those who think all there is of man, perishes at once—who do not believe in another life—are necessarily disposed to abandon this, when it appears to be but a source of calamities." Dr. Brigham, in his Appendix to Spurzheim's Treatise on Insanity, declares that "it is the abuse of religion that leads to insanity and suicide; for pure religion, Christianity, tends to subdue the passions of men. But if the abuse of religion sometimes leads to suicide, the entire neglect of it does more frequently." And Dr. A. Combe, in his Treatise on Mental Derangement, speaking of true religion, says it is "sufficiently apparent that religion, when once understood, is rather a preventive, than a cause of insanity."

But we thank God that he has made the religious desires so powerful, that very few can cast them off. A reaction soon follows the neglect, especially if drawn into the destructive and intoxicating whirl of a modern revival. Then, with no faith to steady him—no rational hope to support and console him—no fixed principles to guide and enlighten him—the poor indifferentist, or skeptic, or scoffer, (as the case may be,) is but a feather in the storm—a floating straw on the tempest-lashed waters of bigotry, superstition and fanaticism. Is it any wonder that, if insanity does not then enshroud his mind, he is engulfed in the awful vortex of the powerful reaction!

But are these abuses an objection to our position? Are we asked why mankind, on the one hand, run into such abominable and absurd modes of religious worship and practice—or, on the other hand, neglect or deny religion altogether, if they are in truth, and by nature, religious beings? The answer is ready. The first extreme, viz. that of fanaticism and superstition, is explained by the sentiment disclosed in our text. "My soul longeth—yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." When man yields himself up wholly, to such strong religious desires, to the neglect of his social, moral and intellectual wants; the religious sentiment not only obtains the ascendancy which is its due, but it becomes the sole dictator and tyrant in the government of the human constitution. Had David not hearkened to his other faculties, as well as to his religious desires, he too had been fanatical.

When I call man naturally religious, I do not mean that he is born with an innate knowledge thereof—but that he is endowed with an internal capacity to receive religion—an internal faculty to comprehend it—or, if you prefer the definition, an internal organization which shall lead him to desire, to seek, and, when found, to receive such knowledge. The religious desires not being supplied with an instructive or intuitive knowledge or guidance, which would certainly lead them to the knowledge and practice alone necessary and proper, may be easily misled and deceived. For "to the hungry soul, every bitter thing is sweet."

Permit me to illustrate.—The duck is a water-fowl. Its peculiar construction proves that it was made to swim. As it possesses not the rational powers of man, it would never learn what to do with its webbed feet, were it not for another property of its nature, which we call instinct. This instinct impels the young duck to run into the first water it sees, and teaches it to paddle its little webbed feet as accurately as if it had been under careful instruction for years.—Man, also, can swim; but he must learn to do so by accident, or by the slow inductions of reason. He feels no irresistible impulse driving him, while an infant, into the water; and if he did, the impulse would not teach him how to use his hands and feet when there. But reason supplies the aid. It directs our observations—say, to the frog—and tells us if we will imitate its motions, like it we may glide through the water; or, it points to the little nautilus, (a swimming shell-fish,) and tells us, if we will make a boat like his, and hoist, like him, a sail, we may swiftly ride over the caverned deep. Hence, when I say that man has an inherent inclination to worship God and believe in revelation, I do not mean that he is instinctively kept from gratifying it by embracing improper views respecting either.

Permit another illustration.—A French physician took a young kid, before it had tasted any nourishment whatever, and placed before it various kinds of food more or less suitable for it, and some poison. It passed by the noxious dishes without halting, smelled at the others, but hastened to its mother's milk, and commenced supping. Now here was instinct, infallibly directing the natural desire for food, to its proper object.

Man's inclination to embrace a religion of some kind, is as much an impulse of his nature, as the kid's desire for food was an impulse of its nature—but man being rational and moral, as well as social and sentient in his nature, and his rational and moral powers being more noble than the others, it is proper that the offspring of God should not be led about by a blind instinct, like the beasts that perish, but that he should be governed by the inductions of reason and the laws of rectitude. And when this is not done—when reason, and morality, and the social affections are discarded from a system of religion, man becomes worse than the brutes, inasmuch as he is then left without any guide whatever. A few examples will suffice to prove this fact, and answer the inquiry, why or how persons can reject all religion, etc.?

Allow the religious desires to tyrannize over the animal nature, and all the objects for which God gave us those affections and propensities, will be unattained, neglected, and, when a reaction takes place, abused. This reaction accounts for the monstrous obscenities, and licentious language and conduct of many of the fanatics in our day. Hunger and thirst, clothing and shelter, and all the comforts and decencies of life, are neglected to the manifest injury of health and enjoyment, if not to the loss of life itself. The sweet and blessed ties that constitute the relationships of this existence—that bind friend to friend, and man to his country and his home—relax, and fall asunder, to the great injury of the misled individual, and through him, to the community of which he is a member. Yes, even parental love sinks into neglect and disuse! I will not dwell on the sacrifices of children made to Moloch, by the ancient Carthaginians and Jews—we have infants sacrificed in Christian lands—even here, at home, and that, too, by their parents! Oh, my God, how often have fathers—yes, even mothers—impelled by a blind, wild, unregulated desire for religious worship, left their shivering, starving babes neglected at home—perhaps even disarmed them, by dosing them with some preparation of opium, to lock their senses in an unnatural and unhealthy stupor—and then left them, a prey to any accidents that might harm, or fires that might consume them! And this has been done, not only by day, but by night—not only day after day, but week after week, and continued at intervals, for months and years together!

In some cases the parental feelings have been too powerful to leave the children behind; and the poor little sufferer has been dragged to the damp camp-ground, or into the suffocatingly crowded church, and kept there, until exhausted nature could no longer resist neglect, and damp, and cold; when it fell by convulsions, or lingering decay, a sacrifice to its parent's ill-regulated desires for religious worship. When man tramples down his animal nature, instead of governing it—or, in more common phraseology, neglects his body to take care of his soul, he is very apt to neglect other people's bodies, also. Would that the example of Jesus and his apostles on this subject, were more heeded and followed—they did good to the bodies, as well as to the souls of men. But can we expect such benevolence from those, whose fears are so engrossed and tortured by the imaginary infinite sufferings of the eternal world, that they pay no regard to the real, and more certain punishments and sorrows of this life?

Again.—When the religious sentiments are suffered to tyrannize over the moral, every outrage on right that can be deemed beneficial to God, will be sedulously sought out and committed. Impelled by such a strong religious zeal, which the imperfect morality and contracted benevolence of the corrupted Mosaic law could not restrain nor direct, Saul of Tarsus persecuted the early Christians, committing men, women and children to prison and to death, firmly persuaded he was doing God service. For the same causes, the ancient Greeks and Romans worshipped their gods and goddesses with most lascivious and obscene rites and ceremonies; sedulously violating the most sacred moral obligations of social and domestic life, that they might be religious! By the tyranny of the religious desires over the moral and humane feelings, Calvin was induced to cause Servetus to be burned to death—the inquisition was erected to prevent the spread of heresy—thousands of men, women and children were barbarously immolated, as evidences of the fidelity of their murderers to God and his truth! By the same tyranny, many at the present day, deem it but little sin to cheat a heretic, to rob the widow, to plunder the orphan, to neglect the suffering non-professor or member of a different sect—provided, that a liberal allowance of the gain made by this ungodly conduct, is paid into the Lord's treasury!

Again.—By the undue indulgence of a desire to worship the divinity, to believe in revelation and to expect a future existence, at the expense and suppression of reason, special revelations and special departures from the order of nature, for the benefit of a single individual—modern miracles and the golden Bible—religious trances, agonies and convulsions—and various other most ridiculous, absurd, contradictory and impossible pretensions, have been palmed off on community. Men calling themselves God, and Christ, and the prophets—yes, even a woman having a family of children, and yet professing to be Jesus of Nazareth—all these have been worshipped and adored, and had their claims defended by quotations from Holy Writ!

Now, can you wonder that men, who have suffered themselves to be most egregiously duped into a belief that such conduct and such folly is warranted by Christianity, should, when reason indignantly awakes from her stupor, go to the opposite extreme, and call all religion a cheat—all revelation, imposture—all spiritual existence, a bugbear—all hope of immortality, a dream? Certainly not.

Here, then, are the proofs furnished by nature, that religious desires are as natural to man as his sentient, social, moral and rational propensities and faculties; and also the reasons why his natural desires for religion run into such very opposite extremes as superstition and fanaticism—indifference and skepticism.

2. Let us now attend to the proofs which Revelation furnishes us, in addition to the testimony of nature; and by which man, as a religious being, conjoined with his moral and intellectual powers, is constituted the image, likeness and offspring of God.

In Gen. i: 27, we find it written, that "God created man in his own image," and, "after his own likeness;" "in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." Though sin, transgression and depravity may destroy man's sonship formed by similarity of character, yet they cannot annihilate the relationship God himself established at the beginning, by creation. This is evident from the invitation of Jehovah to the backsliding Jews, "Turn, oh backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am married unto you." Jer. iii: 14. They are not merely called by the tender name of "children," but God further declares the relation to be as intimate as that formed by a union in the divine institution of marriage, where the parties cease to be twain, and become one. It is further evident from the repeated declarations of Christ—"Our Father, who art in heaven,.... forgive us our sins"—where the petitioner, a sinner, is taught to call God his Father. "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven, give good things to them that ask him"—where he calls God, the Father of the evil. Matt. vii: 14, and vi: 9-12.

We also prove that man, in any condition, is still the child of God, from the language of Paul to the heathens, who know not God, and were without hope in the world. In speaking to the Athenians, he says, "as certain, also, of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring." Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." Acts xvii: 28, 29.

We prove it furthermore by the language of James, who, in speaking of the tongue, says, "therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, who are made after the similitude (or likeness) of God." James iii: 9. The apostle does not say were made, as if he referred to the original creation of man; but he speaks in the then present tense—of men's creation at the time of his writing—"are made." This testimony is deemed sufficient.

That man is naturally possessed of capacities or faculties, whose desires lead him to discover this relationship, is evident from the language of Moses, who, after speaking of the laws of God set before the Israelites, says, "For this commandment which I command thee this day, is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off: It is not in heaven that thou shouldst say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldst say, who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it." Deut. xxx: 10-15. Lest it may be objected that this relates only to the Mosaic dispensation, I remark that Paul addressed the same language to his Roman brethren. Romans x: 6-9. "But the righteousness which is of faith, [in contradistinction to that of which Moses spoke,] speaketh on this wise: Say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven? (that is to bring Christ down from above; Or, who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead;) but what saith it? The word is nigh thee; even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith which we preach." The language of Paul to the Athenians, is also conclusive on this point. Acts xvii: 24-28; "God, that made the world....and hath made of one blood all nations of men...that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: For in him, we live, and move, and have our being." The language of our text also proves man to be, by nature, a religious being. "My soul longeth—yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." Not only is the soul represented as being drawn out in these strong desires, but by its supremacy and influence, they are declared to have subjugated all the affections, and all the propensities to their moral, rational and pleasant sway.

Now the existence of every natural desire arising out of the constitutional faculties of man, proves that the Author of that desire has created an object for its gratification and satisfaction.

I venture to assert, that no instance to the contrary can be produced, so far as the whole nature of any race of beings is concerned. Throughout the universe of creation, every means is perfectly adapted to the end it was designed to produce, and objects are always provided for the gratification of every sense bestowed on even the most minute of the sentient creation. To argue otherwise, is to deny the infinite wisdom, and universal benevolence and equal providence of God. Hence, as God has uniformly adapted means to end and end to means, so, by an analogy which never yet has failed, the very fact that he has created us religious beings, proves that he must also have devised for us a system of religion perfectly adapted to satisfy every natural desire of our souls. And this analogical conclusion, conjoined to the admission, that that religion is a revelation of the immutable principles of God's own infinite mind, and of the unchanging laws of his glorious kingdom, reduplicates our proofs that there is a similarity—a likeness—a relationship between the moral nature of God and that of man—between the principles of divinity, and those of humanity. For how, else, could man's religious desires, and this revelation, be so perfectly adapted, one to the other? And as the Bible assures us, as does God's immutability, that God will not annul the paternal relation which connects him with man; and that man, however sinful and debased he may become, cannot free himself from the filial relation and its consequent duties; so are we assured that it is an immortal relationship—one that can never be annihilated, or set aside, while the parties have a being.

Time would fail me, were I to attempt enlarging on this subject, and on the glorious collateral conclusions to which it would lead us—I therefore proceed to consider,

II. The best mode of preaching the Gospel, so as to aid God's design in its revelation to man. To do this properly, we must fully understand,

1. God's design in making a revelation to man. Referring to what I have already advanced with respect to the adaptation of this revelation to man's nature, it may be said, that his design was, to gratify the religious desires he had previously implanted in man. And this is correct; but there may be some who do not perceive the fulness of its import and the extent of its meaning. Let us therefore vary the question. Why did God implant those wants in man's nature, and then gratify them by making to man a revelation of his immortal mind? For God works not by piecemeal. His design in relation to every object, is one, great, comprehensive whole, of which each dispensation of his providence is but a part. Hence the bestowment of the rational, moral and religious faculties on man; and the bestowment of a revelation for their exercise and gratification; all, are but one great object, and are embraced in one vast design of divine goodness, wisdom and power. And by consulting the records of his revelation, as well as "His works' instructive page," we may arrive at a knowledge of that design. It is to confer spiritual happiness on his offspring, man. And this design is effected, First—By teaching man to know his Lord and Parent—to know him as a creator—as a judge—as a father—and as he is led from gradation to gradation of knowledge—from the perception of a lesser to that of a still greater glory and loveliness in the Revelator—and as he advances from the infancy of his own spiritual powers, through their childhood, and up to their maturity, man is transformed into the same image, from one glory to another of his Creator's character, until the end of God in revealing himself is attained, Second—By the assimilation of man to himself—of the child to the Parent. Such must be the result to man of being led to wonder, to revere, to admire and adore, and thus to love God, as his perfections are gradually unfolded to a mind capable of perceiving them, and of feeling these successive upwardly progressing emotions of the soul. But in marking these distinct gradations of moral improvement by gradual means, I do not mean that it is thus with each individual of our race—but that thus, it appears to me, God has dispensed his spiritual providences in relation to mankind. It is the history of his revelations to a world, not to a single being—to the successive generations of men, not to each individual.

That the revelation of himself to man, was the divine object in his ancient revelation, is evident from the fact, that nearly every threatening or severe infliction of chastisement recorded in the Old Testament, is expressly declared, by Jehovah himself, to have for its main object "that they may know the Lord hath done it"—"that they may know that I am the Lord," etc. This object is constantly kept in sight through the whole Jewish theocracy, its laws and institutions, down to the coming of Christ—for God is always considered the Supreme law-giver and king of the nation. As plainly evident is it, that the Christian revelation discloses to man the tender and endearing paternal character of God, especially if no longer dwells on the less affecting truth, that God is a Governor among the nations, but that he regards the individual with such affectionate care and minute providence, that even the very hairs of the head are all numbered and regarded. Nor will it be doubted, for it is very obvious, that the imitation of God's perfections is considered and enjoined in the New Testament, as the greatest perfection and whole duty of man. We are to love him, because he first loved us. We are to love each other, because he, for Christ's sake, has abundantly loved us all. We are to love our enemies, and do good to all men as we have opportunity, because he loved us while we were his enemies, and dispenses his blessings universally to the evil and the good, the just and the unjust, the kind and the unthankful. And to prove this beyond all cavil, (and irresistibly to lead us to fulfil his design in our creation, as knowledge shall unfold to us our greatest, highest, only true interest,) he has made nature confirm revelation, by constituting his offspring with a spiritual constitution whose impulses accord with his will. Hence, as man—as God's offspring, we cannot violate any of God's laws, without feeling miserable, from the repugnance of our feelings to the act. What is evil to man, is evil to God—what is goodness in God, is goodness in man—and what God disallows, is opposed to the welfare of man; while what yields man peace of soul and true enjoyment, God has required as a duty, and permitted as a privilege. And thus it is that the rational and truly religious Christian, can say in the language of our text—"My soul longeth—yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God."—Yes, "I would rather be a door-keeper in the courts of the Lord than a dweller in the tents of wickedness;" For one day spent in God's courts, is worth a thousand spent in any other service. For the Christian sees, and feels, and knows, that to do good is in accordance with his whole nature—and he realizes that, by employing his animal propensities in strict obedience to the united requirements of the strictly human faculties, is the only way in which he can truly and lastingly gratify even their wants, and happily every desire of his nature.

Having thus proved the design of God in revealing the Gospel to man, to be, rendering man spiritually happy, by bringing him to the knowledge of his Father in heaven, and assimilating his nature to God's, we are now prepared to consider,

2. The best mode of preaching that Gospel, so as to secure its end and aim. Here let us remember, that, though man is endowed with animal propensities, the Gospel is no more addressed to them than it is to the beasts of the field and forest, or to the birds of the air. It is to man as his child, that God has revealed himself. Hence the Christian religion is not addressed to the animal nature of man—not even to the moral faculty, alone—not even to the intellect, alone—not even to the religious faculties, alone, to the exclusion of all the rest. No; God has revealed it to the rational, moral and religious powers in man, which, combinedly constitute man's likeness to his Creator, and have dominion over all that pertains to human nature. Neither the moral nor the intellectual powers alone, could receive the Gospel fully; or great minds and pure hearts would not sometimes reject it because of its miraculous establishment, and its revelations of immortal life. Yet these must always be conjoined with the religious faculties, before the Gospel can be understood, and its precepts be received. The Gospel is intended for them all, conjointly—it is intended and calculated to enlarge, and strengthen, and elevate reverence, faith, hope, benevolence, justice, and the intellect, by throwing the universe into one world, eternity into one duration, and uniting all intelligences into one immortality of existence and glory. Hence, if the Gospel we preach is of God, it is adapted to the nature of man. And if man is the child of God, he has a nature prepared to receive a revelation of the great principles of his heavenly Father's immortal mind.

That revelation is called the Gospel—the Gospel is good news—glad tidings to man concerning God, made known through Jesus Christ. It reveals the principles existing immutably in God to the same principles implanted by him in man. The essence—the whole mass of those principles is goodness—pure, unmixed, unbounded goodness. The very name, God, is an abbreviation of the word, good. Our Father is The Good—the supreme, infinite, endless Good. His nature—all his attributes, must also be good. Holiness, mercy, justice, all these are but modifications and manifestations of goodness. From whence it follows, that to be holy is good—to be merciful is good, and to be just is good—good in man as well as in God; for what moral qualities are good in the Father, must also be good in the child. Hence the holiness, mercy and justice of God are the same, in kind, as those he requires the exercise of in his children. Goodness, then, is the principle of all moral virtue in heaven and on earth. Goodness is God's glory—for when Moses desired to see God's glory, in answer to that desire, God "caused all his goodness to pass before him." The Psalmist also testifies, that "whoso offereth praise glorifieth God;" and surely nothing deserves to elicit praise but goodness and love; and "God is love."

Now, the same principles which the Father has revealed as existing infinitely in himself, exist finitely in the children to whom they are revealed, and to these principles, only, are they addressed; for by them, only, can they be perceived and understood. Hence teachers of religion will do well to remember, that, after the intellectual powers, the Gospel is addressed only to man's principles of holiness, justice, mercy—in one word, goodness—love—to the god-like faculties which distinguish man from all other animals, and constitute him really and truly the image, likeness and offspring of the Eternal Mind. If it reaches, regulates and directs his affections for his race, country, family and self; it must, to have its proper effect, reach them through these mediums, and armed with their united sanctions.

True, the Gospel may be made to assume many forms, but it must always retain the same nature. It may command, but it must be in a voice of goodness, or it will not be obeyed by man's noblest powers.—It may threaten, but it must be with the threatening of affection for a loved object, or it never will awaken man's love to obedience. That pale faced slave, Fear, may be awaked to crouch and tremble, even while Hatred grins in malice over his shoulder; but love—goodness—will either sleep as in the arms of death, or bid defiance to your authority.—It may punish, but it must be with the just and merciful chastisements of love for the sinner, or rebellion will find a resurrection, and repentance lie down in the vacated grave. Separate all or either of these, from moral goodness—divide even rewards from affection for the rewarded, and you cannot influence the godlike faculties in man. A horse, a dog, or any other animal will then receive and obey their message—and so will man, so far as he is merely animal—but man as the child of Deity, will receive and yield to nothing merely sensual and earthy—for he will understand that, only, which is addressed to the principles of the divinity enthroned in his spiritual nature. Even where goodness in man seems so dormant that, as it appears, you must excite the animal passions to make him feel your labors, the voice of love—of tenderness, compassion and goodness, should mingle its tones with your words of irony and rebuke. Your very anger and indignation, like the anger of Jesus or the wrath of God, should be that of love, which always keeps the good of its object in view.

But, oh, beware of the error which would lead you to suppose goodness can become totally extinct, by reason of man's depravity. The lowest degree of goodness to which man can possibly fall, is the mere admiration of virtue, without its practice. And that small degree of goodness is as the mustard seed, which, by Gospel culture, shall become a mighty tree, its branches filling every avenue of the soul—or as the small measure of leaven, which, warmed by the love filling the Gospel, shall yet leaven the whole mass. Beware, then, of deeming your fellow-sinner devoid of all goodness. The brute knows nothing of faith, hope, reverence, conscience—and if man no longer possesses these, he can not be more accountable for not obeying them, than is the brute.

Hence the most vicious must still feel a reverence of, or admiration for virtue; and where will you find greater virtue to exhibit to them, than was exemplified by Jesus of Nazareth? Love still exists in the hearts of even the most abandoned of our race; and where will you find greater love to waken its energies—to strengthen its movements, and to enlarge its capacities, than in the Gospel of infinite, changeless, endless Love.

The love of God! of Him who filleth the fullness of the universe, and is all love! Oh, what a subduing, overpoweringly affecting idea! That idea is the very essence of the Gospel—proclaimed of old to Abraham, that in him and in his seed, should all the families and kindreds of the earth be blessed—confirmed in Christ, who commended the love of God to the world, while it was yet dead in trespasses and sin—and to be fulfilled in the dispensation of the fullness of times, by the reconciliation of all things, when God shall be all that is in all.

Cause any one truly to feel this great truth—not merely to assent to it with his understanding, but to feel, in his inmost soul, that his ever present Father really loves him with an almighty and endless affection, and his whole nature will be filled with unutterable fullness of joy and peace! He will have found a Father to reverence, love and imitate—a faith to believe—a hope to rejoice in for immortality of life—a morality, pure, perfect, universal and endless—knowledge filling intellectual power to overflowing, with all wisdom and truth—and a realization, in prospect of eternity, of all his benevolence can desire for every being in the universe, not excluding even his worst enemies.

Oh, my brethren and sisters, what a surpassingly glorious and happy duty is here allotted us by our Father! Let us contemplate this great and good subject, till our minds overflow with its fullness, our affections imbibe its spirit, and our lives show forth its fruits. And let us also teach it to others. Doubt not its power and efficacy on the hardened and depraved. Go to the Lunatic asylums which are governed wholly by the law of kindness and affection, and you will find the insane obedient to the voice of goodness, and oftener and more speedily restored to sanity and society, than where a sterner government is instituted. Go to our penitentiaries, and just as far as the convicts are treated in the spirit of the Gospel, you will find them more tractable, and more frequently reformed. How, then, can it be, that principles which subdue the insane, and best tend to restore to its throne the subverted mind—which soften the hard heart of the outcast of society, and lead him back to the ways of virtue and peace—can fail in efficacy any where, or on any mind? It cannot be. The principles of the Gospel must always prevail, if faithfully applied. Their triumph must ultimately be universal and endless. No truth is more certain. It is God's purpose, revealed in the volumes of nature and revelation—proven to be his will, by his dispensations of providence and grace, and made, by him, the desire of every holy being. It is God's promise, for the fulfilment of which every good being, among angels and men, devoutly prays. It is written in the nature of every intelligent being—rendered accordant with the principles of God's own eternal and immutable mind revealed in the Gospel; and made necessary to the declarative glory of our heavenly Father, and of the happiness of men and angels, on earth beneath and in heaven above—through time and in eternity! Amen—hallelujah—the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Amen and Amen.

For the Magazine and Advocates.

LETTERS BETWEEN TWO BROTHERS.

Br. GROSH—The following letters were handed to me, with a request that I would transmit them to you for publication. The circumstances are these. A Presbyterian preacher, in Virginia by the name of —, wrote a letter to a brother of his in Schenectada, a copy of which you here have. This brother, who is a Universalist, and a mechanic, wrote an answer, a copy of which you also have. Br. T. J. Whitcomb, after some solicitation, got his consent to have them published—and accordingly requested me, on leaving Schenectada for Clinton, to bring the original copies with me, and having taken them off in a plain hand, to present them to you. If you think proper to publish them, you will please introduce them with such explanatory remarks as may explain their origin. The letters were obtained on condition that the names should not appear in the paper (which you will recollect in whatever remarks you make) though there would be no objection to communicate them personally, should any unbelieving reader wish to know them. The writer of the last letter, is a subscriber to your paper.

Yours, fraternally,
Clinton, October 13, 1836.

C. B. V.

City Point, Prince George, Va., August 20, 1836.

DEAR BROTHER—I have just arisen from my bed, after having been confined there for a few days with chills and fever. I feel exceedingly weak, and am hardly able to steady my pen—I fear, therefore, that I shall measurably fail in making out a composition that can be read. I avail myself of this first opportunity in writing to you, because I received a letter from home four days ago, which stated that you had thought quite hard of me for not visiting Schenectada, during my late visit to the north. It did not enter into my original plan to visit home at all last spring.—[Here follow some family matters, which we omit as unnecessary.—Eds.] I believe I have never written more than once or twice to yourself. Perhaps I have been too negligent in this matter, but the duties of the Christian ministry are very laborious. They exhaust pretty much all my time in private study and public administration.

We have the living to warn, the sick to visit, and the dead to bury. I glory and take pleasure in the work, though it be hard. I remember the toils of my Master—the hardships of the apostles. The anxieties of the work also are great, and the responsibilities great—especially when I remember that the Gospel which I preach will be a “savor of life unto life, or of death unto death, to those who hear it.” Nevertheless, there is a pleasure in the work, surpassing any thing I have ever known. It is like the pleasure of a sin-stricken soul giving up all hopes of salvation on the grounds of any intrinsic merit of its own, or any thing it has done to recommend itself to God, and casting itself at once on the mercy—the free, undeserved mercy, of a redeeming Saviour. To feel for sinners, I consider strictly biblical and therefore rational. “O that my head were waters,” says Jeremiah, “and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people.” “Rivers of water run down mine eyes,” says Daniel, “because they keep not thy law.” “I could wish myself accursed,” says Paul, “for my brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh.” “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem,” says the holy Jesus, “how often would I have gathered you etc., but ye would not.”

I trust, as a minister of Jesus, I feel a measure of anxiety with regard to your condition and prospects, if the views which my friends informed me you had advanced with regard to the truths of the Bible, are such views as you really entertain. As they are so contrary to all my views of Bible truth, to all my views of sound philosophy, I cannot but feel sorry that they should have been entertained by one, and one only, of a family of fifteen. I could wish that that one might be gathered with all the rest, that when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and the separation of the sheep and the goats shall take place, none of this little flock may be found on the left hand.

Allow me to deal plainly with you, dear Brother, for I have no desire to wound your feelings, but to save your soul. I do not intend to enter into any argument with you, whatsoever. I will not put you to the trouble of making any defence. I do not ask for any explanation of your views or the reasons of them. It will throw no new light on my mind. I have read and understand the views of those who call themselves Universalists, and I presume you would not pretend to be any wiser than the ablest writers on that subject—nor do I care about giving you my own views, or the reasons of them. You are unable to convince me so long as I can see the fallacy of the reasoning by which the Universalist doctrine is attempted to be supported, and I presume I am equally unable to convince you. No man I believe is ever converted from Universalism, till he is converted to Christ. The difficulty lies not in the head—that is not the source of error—the difficulty lies in the heart. A little boy, not ten years old, said “I do not believe the Bible.” Was the error there in the head? Had he examined the evidence, and found it insufficient to support the truth of the Bible? No! the error was in the heart. It was the language of a heart rebelling against God. “The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.” You may take an unconverted man, and one who has imbibed fatal errors on religious subjects, and you may knock away every prop he has been relying upon, you may drive him from every position which he takes, and so shut him up that he is unable to open his mouth, and he is not convinced. And the principle is, “a man, convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still.” It is not strange to me that unconverted men imbibed error. There is no promise of God to keep them from it—while on the contrary, the Bible assures us “if any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.” The best, the holiest men, are the nearest the truth, and if any doctrine does not have the tendency to make men holy, I do not want any better evidence to convince me that it is not the teaching of the Bible. I said I did not believe it possible for you to be convinced of your error by man, nor do I. And my reason is this—A young man, who can make up his mind before he has arrived at the age of twenty, that the doctrines embraced by nine-tenths of the professors of religion—that doctrines which are believed and supported, in fact, by a far greater proportion, nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths, is nearer the truth—(for there are in these United States only about one hundred and fifty men who preach against future punishment, and thousands that believe the doctrine is taught in the Bible, and preach it, besides as great a disproportion between the members of the churches—) I say, a young man who understands not the original languages of the Scriptures, and yet can make up his mind at a leap that the great doctrines of the Bible, which have been believed since the world began, and which have been supported by the greatest, by the best, by the holiest men—a man, that can decide that all this cloud of witnesses have been mistaken, and decide it, too, without asking the advice of his best friends—without consulting them as to the light in which they view things, to see if they cannot assist him in his difficulties—a man, who has so much apparent confidence in himself, is not likely to be changed. Candor, in the search of truth, prays and waits.—Again, a man, who embraces the doctrine in question, should be slow and cautious in the extreme, because, if it be true, he is not in any danger by delay. There is nothing that urges haste, and I have always been accustomed to think that a prudent man would not avow even his belief in that doctrine without perfect demonstration, or, in other words, would not avow it at all. I could never justify myself, nor any other man, in hazarding the interests of the soul. If the thing were as plain as that “two and two make four,” then a man might with impunity believe. But if there remains a shadow of doubt, if there is only the appearance of a reason against, a man should stop with a solemn pause. He should not run the slightest risk in his own case. He should be careful how he endangers others. Is that a prudent man, is he a reasonable man, who will ride in the night over a road that has a high bridge, when there is some reason to believe that a freshet has swept away that bridge, though it is not certain, whilst at the same time, there is another way to the place, and no bridge, no dangerous places to cross? Is that a prudent man that will get into a stage coach attached to wild and unbroken horses, when there are steady horses at hand? Suppose it should be found, at last, that your bridge gives way—does not carry you safe over—will mine catch you? But suppose mine gives away, yours will catch me! Let me beseech you to consider and reconsider, and ask yourself whether prudence does not dictate some different course from that which you have pursued. Have you influenced others? Consider what an awful thing it would be to meet them at the judgment, as your accusers. Have you any regard to yourself, to your wife, to your children, to your friends—I beseech you to put the seal of eternal silence upon your lips, before you shall dare to take any course that has the slightest possibility of endangering their best interests, and that there is such a possibility, you cannot pretend to deny, unless you possess a greater share of vanity than any body I have ever yet known, or lay claim to greater discernment than all the world besides.

I have been shocked at the irreverence of Universalists, and at their trifling with the Bible—their loose modes of interpretation—how they can trample on what seems to bear against them, and explain away what cannot be explained away. It avails nothing to pervert Scripture, and be able to say something in the way of explaining it away. It may call forth the skill and ingenuity of man, but it does not destroy the truth. You may deny the truth and call God a liar, but the truth is there still, and you must meet it at the judgment.

I have been shocked at the horrid blasphemy of Universalists. I attended some of the late debates at Philadelphia, between Mr. Thomas, a Universalist, and Mr. McCalla, a Presbyterian. My eyes were opened to the spirit and moral character of Universalists. There is another thing that will prevent your ever seeing the truth, and it is this—I am told you set yourself up as a teacher, and have bid defiance to all champions. If so, it is very probable you are not any longer to be taught. You have only to acquire skill in explaining away a good portion of the Bible, and you will soon become perfect. And now I would like to ask, when you first felt difficulties on the reception of the Orthodox faith, whom you took as advisers, and what sort of books you were in the habit of reading, and if you spent much time in earnest prayer to God for guidance, and whether you now pray in your family, and set them an example of worshipping God? Did you go to holy men who live near to God, and who have better advantage for knowing the mind of the spirit than any other men? You have committed yourself by defending Universalism, and others have flattered you, and your pride and vanity have been fed and your way begins to seem right to you. “But there is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death.” Prov. xiv: 12.

The great question is, dear Brother, what does the Bible teach? What ideas do the sacred writers mean to convey to our minds? And when that is ascertained, we have no alternative left us as to what we shall believe. We are bound to believe, or meet the responsibilities of calling God a liar. We need not ask, does it accord with our philosophy? does it accord with our preconceived ideas of propriety and justice? Such questions are impious, and full of vanity and rebellion, and wo to the man that dare demur when God speaketh.

There is much that I should like to say if I had room. It was not my purpose to enter into any discussion with you, as I had thought no good would result. I have expressed some opinions, touching some particulars, as you perceive—not to call forth any reply, however, but simply to relieve, in a measure, my own conscience. I cherish nothing towards you but feelings of the most fraternal character—feelings of the greatest kindness and good will—and would as soon do you a favor as any brother I have. But I cannot compromise the truth of God with the best friend I have on earth. I wish to speak strongly on this subject, because I regard the honor of my Master as concerned. If I have used too strong language, in your estimation, it was with no intention to wound you, but because I could not convey the idea I wished, without it. I intended to have said something about my domestic matters, etc., but room is wanting. I should be glad to see you and your family, and hope the time is not far distant, when that will be the case. In the meantime I must subscribe myself, Your affectionate Brother,

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1836.

TO OUR AGENTS, AND FRIENDS GENERALLY.

The close of our publishing year is rapidly approaching, and with this (or a preceding, or succeeding) number, you will receive a copy of our proposals for the next volume. We therefore feel it our duty, and a suitable period, to address a few remarks to you especially.

For the greatest portion of a year, you have seen our labors, and witnessed, we believe, the fulfilment of every promise we made at the beginning of our career as publishers of this paper. If we have unavoidably failed in any particular, (and it is possible that we may have failed in some that we do not now remember,) we are certain we have exceeded in others. The same exertions shall be continued, and we believe we may safely say increased. For during the present volume we could not do many things for want of time, familiarity with the business, etc., which we believe we can do from henceforward. Some new contributors have been engaged—the old ones retained, generally, and others will be added to the list as circumstances will allow. The series of essays addressed to children, by the author of Notes on Sacred Subjects—to the youth of both sexes, by Br. Austin, of Danvers, Mass.—on the internal evidences of Christianity, by Br. S. R. Smith, our co-editor—and others we hope to procure, (noticed in a former number,) will certainly add much to the interest and utility of the next volume. To procure them, we have been compelled to increase our already great expenses. And to meet this increase of expense, we are compelled to solicit, through you, an increase of promptly paying patronage.

We feel in doing this, that we have no special claims on your kindness—we are already deeply indebted to many of you, for your exertions in our behalf. But we believe—we humbly believe, our labors are doing good to thousands of our race, and that if our subscription list can be increased, we shall be enabled to benefit more, and thus further advance the cause in which we are engaged, as well as benefit ourselves. If you agree with us in this opinion, may we not consistently ask your assistance in extending the circulation of this paper, without being deemed immodest or too importunate? We think we may.

We do seriously believe that every family into which you can easily introduce our paper, will receive a greater benefit from it than the money it will cost them, or the labor it may impose on you. We also believe that every additional copy you can get into circulation, will directly and materially aid in promoting the cause it advocates—a cause acknowledged to be that of God and of humanity—a cause evidently calculated to make mankind better, by giving them better principles and purer motives of action than they now have; and consequently rendering them happier. And what we thus declare of our own paper, we believe of all kindred periodicals. If we did not believe it, we would not publish nor preach the doctrine they advocate. And only so far as you believe we are thus doing good, do we feel that we have any right to solicit your aid.

The elections are, or soon will be over. The violent excitement passed, your friends and neighbors will need something of a more gentle, soothing, improving character. Now, then, is a very suitable time to introduce the subject of subscription. You will see them often before the Winter, with its long evenings, sets fully in; and we hope you will feel yourselves able and willing to urge the subject upon their attention.

One word more and we have done. It relates more immediately to our individual concerns; but is all important, nevertheless, to the prosperity of this paper. Subscribers in arrears for this volume, will do well to make payment before its close. By paying two dollars now, they will save the fifty cents additional, consequent on a delay of payment until next year. And we would rather receive the two dollars within the year, (as we would still rather receive one dollar and fifty cents in advance,) than wait till after the close of the year for the two dollars and fifty cents. The additional sums of fifty cents each, are deemed too great a tax by many subscribers, and we are glad they think so; for as the choice of payment time depends on the subscriber, and not on us, we hope all who deem the addition too great a sum, will avoid it by paying in time. But what we had to say is this. Our annual expenses are very great, and we have no resources whatever to meet them, but the income of the paper. Thus far it has been pretty good, but still not enough to pay all. Besides this, we pay interest on the heavy amount of purchase money for the establishment, and one instalment of the principal will be due at the close of the year. All these sums united, will require a large amount of cash to liquidate them. For humanity's sake to us, as well as for the sake of saving fifty cents to each subscriber yet in arrears, and for the sake of common justice, (for we do believe we give full value for all we ask,) we desire to have every subscription paid and credited on our books so far as possible.

We shall soon send out our bills. It sometimes happens that our agents do not immediately notify us of persons who have paid them. In such cases, it is possible that some may receive bills who have paid. Will they please let us know to whom they have made payment? For in this way, only, can we keep up order in our affairs and correctness in our accounts. But agents who have such payments now in hand, had better immediately notify us of them, even if they cannot remit the money, and so save us from sending bills, and subscribers from being troubled with them.

With hearts gratefully impressed by the punctuality of subscribers who have paid, and by the kindness of agents and friends who have otherwise assisted us, as well as confidence in the generosity, justice and good will of our subscribers and readers generally, we close this not very pleasant, but necessary article.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

THE GOLIATH OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

[Debate with Elder Culver Concluded.]

Elder Culver. I well know the fatal tendency of this doctrine—I well know its artful, plausible and insinuating character, the wily deception of its advocates, the demoralising influence of the doctrine and the fatal snare in which it will inevitably involve its votaries. For I was once a Universalist myself, and my father was a Universalist before me, and my grandfather before him. Then I had no religion—no vital piety—no godliness at heart—no love to God nor man—I could then visit the tavern and the grocery, and drink, and sing songs, and tell stories as well as any of them. It is true that, at times, I had my serious doubts and misgivings in regard to the doctrine; and conscience would occasionally hold a parley with me, and ask me, Are you a Universalist? I am. What makes you a Universalist? My Bible. How do you read your Bible? As other people do. How is that? Why, to find proof of the doctrine. Ah! is that the way you read your Bible? At length I became fully convinced that I had read my Bible wrong, and with a wrong motive; and I resolved to commence reading it anew. I determined to read it rather to see what it taught, than to find proof of a particular doctrine. And I moreover resolved that, before making up my mind or drawing my conclusions respecting any portion of the Scriptures, I would read a writer through, and see what was the main tenor of his arguments and the scope of his reasoning, and thus have his whole premises before me. As a suitable book on which to make an experiment, I pitched upon St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and commenced a prayerful perusal of it. The result, under God, was, that before I had read the second chapter of that inspired book through, I became fully convinced that Universalism was false, made up my mind to abandon it. I then renounced it and have ever since deemed it my solemn duty to raise my warning voice against it. And I hereby solemnly warn this congregation against so fatal a heresy. O beware, my dear dying friends, beware of the snares of the adversary. Remember that wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat. But straight is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. O, beware of wolves in sheep's clothing, who with smooth words and fair speeches, come to you in the garb of friendship, but like wolves would devour and destroy you. I entreat you to remember that by their fruits ye shall know them. For men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles. A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit, neither can a good tree bring forth evil fruit.

[Much more of the same general import was said by the Elder, in all of which he occupied something more than half an hour, so that the audience became satisfied he wanted more than "five minutes to shut up any Universalist." At length he paused.]

Mr. S. Have you concluded your remarks, Elder Culver?

Eld. C. I—I believe I have for the present.

Mr. S. I beg leave, bespeaking the patience of this audience, to make a few remarks on what my friend has said. I take no offence at the observations he has made—presume they were well intended; and if so, if he really thought it his duty to make them, and that "the blood of souls would be required at his hands" if he did not, he has done perfectly right. I have no fault to find with his motives. But as I ever feel that my regard for truth should be superior to that which I may feel towards any man's person—that what I have preached is the truth, and that my friend Culver labors under a mistake, I feel it both a duty and privilege to pass in review some of the observations that have fallen from his lips.

In the first place he tells us he well knows the insinuating character, fatal tendency, etc., of Universalism, for he was once a Universalist himself, and his father and grandfather before him. So it seems he is very certain that he was a Universalist; for he proves himself to have been such, not because he believed the doctrine, but by heirship or inheritance from his ancestors! Well let us see what kind of a Universalist he was. He tells us all about it—how he lived, acted and felt. Let us see whether he was a Universalist practically. He says he had no religion, no vital piety, no love to God nor man—that he could go to the tavern or the grocery, and drink and sing songs, and tell stories, etc., etc. Now was this practical Universalism? Was this what I have enjoined on you my hearers, in the sermon just preached? Is this what St. Paul, in my text, enjoins, and tells us that this doctrine teaches, viz., the denying of ungodliness and worldly lusts, and living soberly, righteously and godly? No, my friends, very far from it. He was never a practical Universalist, by his own account, but as far from it as darkness is from light, or hell from heaven; he was in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity. Well, let us now see whether he was a Universalist in theory, or in faith. He says he had at times his serious doubts and misgivings concerning the doctrine—that conscience used often to hold a parley with him, reproach his insincerity, and at length convinced him that he read his Bible from a wrong motive and did not sincerely and truly regard its teachings, or words to that effect: so it is perfectly evident from his own showing, that he did not honestly, conscientiously and heartily believe the doctrine. For conscience holds no such parleys as he speaks of, with honest Universalists—it never upbraids them with insincerity and bad motives. He therefore most clearly was not a Universalist, even in theory, but a vile hypocrite and impostor, fighting under borrowed colors, and assuming to be what he was not. And being an impostor, we are heartily glad he renounced all pretensions to Universalism—that we got rid of him as soon as we did. For we want no such hypocrites as he was—we want better men; and thank God we believe we have them. ("The galled jade winces.")

In regard to the manner of reading the Bible, if my friend read it, as he says he did, to find proof of the doctrine, instead of seeking to know what it truly taught, he read it in a very wrong and unjustifiable manner. For we should all read our Bibles rather to be taught by them what the truth is, than to teach them what doctrine to support, or try to warp them to favor our own opinions. He however adopted a very judicious rule by which to ascertain the truth—a very excellent rule in deed, if he had only carried it out in practice. He says he resolved on reading a writer of any book he might peruse, through, from beginning to end, and seeing what was the main scope of his reasoning, etc., before he made up his mind or drew his conclusions. O that the Elder had carried out this rule in practice, and read the Epistle to the Romans through! But no, this he did not do—he forgot all about his favorite rule—for he tells us he had not read the second chapter through, before he made up his mind, and drew his conclusions that Universalism was false, renounced the doctrine and began to raise his warning voice against it! Now had he so far regarded his own rule as to have read the book through, he would have found its author, St. Paul, as staunch a Universalist as ever lived or wrote. (See and read Rom. v: 8-21, viii: 21-39, xi: 15-36 inclusive, much of which was quoted on the occasion, and the reader will please examine.) Indeed, language can hardly be framed so as to express the sentiment more strongly and fully than does the language used in the book of Romans. Again, by the manner in which my friend speaks of the broad and the narrow way, it is evident that he means to insinuate that we are in the broad way that leadeth to destruction, and that he and those who go with him are in the straight and narrow path that leadeth unto life. But a moment's reflection will satisfy you of his mistake on this point. For we are very few in number compared with the vast multitude of our opposers. We are the few—they are the many—and we leave it to the congregation to determine our relative conditions, if the Saviour spoke the truth when he declared of the way to destruction, that many there be which go in thereat. In reply to Elder C.'s insinuations concerning wolves in sheep's clothing, corrupt trees bringing forth good fruit, etc., I have only to say that if we take the account which he gives of himself as being true, he may find a very ready application of those passages without going far from home, and I leave it altogether to those best acquainted with him to say how near home the application might with truth and propriety be made. Again, as my good friend, the Elder, seems to think "the blood of immortal souls," will be found in his skirts unless he warns this congregation against what he calls the heretical sermon I have preached, I would wish to inquire of the gentleman—presuming him to be Calvinistic in his sentiments—whether he believes God did, from all eternity, know who and how many in this congregation would be saved and eternally happy, and who and how many on the other hand, would be damned and eternally miserable; and whether he believes that my preaching here to-day, can jeopardize or render any less certain the salvation of those that God eternally knew would be saved, or render any more certain the damnation of those that God eternally knew would be damned? (No reply.) Turning directly to the Elder—Do you believe, Sir, that God has willed the salvation of all mankind without exception? (I had quoted in the sermon 1 Tim. ii: 3-6, and Eph. i: 11.)

Eld. C. Why, y—ye—yes.

Mr. S. Well, Sir, has he willed the means for accomplishing that end?

Eld. C. Yes.

Mr. S. Well, then, my Dear Sir, what is the inevitable conclusion from these premises?

Eld. C. Why, hem! I—I don't think that is a fair question. I want to know how you explain Matt. xxv: 46—"These shall go away into everlasting punishment but the righteous into life eternal."

Elder C. then drew from his pocket a paper on which was written down quite a catalogue of questions and texts of Scripture, which he thought bore against Universalism, and which he propounded for answers and explanations. I very readily answered his questions and explained his texts, the latter almost uniformly by referring to the contexts where the passages were found.—And in almost every passage, the context was clearly seen, instead of opposing, to absolutely favor the idea of universal salvation. The congregation evidently saw it, and this circumstance greatly vexed the righteous soul of the Elder. He at length read, and demanded with an air of great apparent triumph an explanation of 2 Thess. i: 7, 8, 9, and 1 Peter iv: 17, 18. I turned directly to the contexts, read them, and with a few brief comments and the reading of a few parallel passages, satisfied the congregation that the texts related primarily to the severe judgments that (soon after the passages were written) fell on the Jews, and the dreadful destruction that overtook the persecutors of the early disciples, and that therefore they had no necessary allusion whatever to a future state of being. The Elder, becoming desperate with the desperate condition of his cause, at length referred once more to Matt. xxv: 46, and solemnly declared, "Now, Sir, if you deny that this passage relates to yonder world, or the future and final condition of man in another state, I have done—I will talk no longer with a man who thus shockingly wrests the word of God."

Mr. S. Well, Sir, you have the liberty to discontinue the conversation whenever you desire. But as for the text referred to, it is a matter of perfect indifference with me, so far as the issue relative to Universalism is concerned, whether its application be confined to this state of being or carried into the next. For in either case, the passage, so far from proving endless misery, in my opinion directly disproves it, and most obviously favors the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all. For the Greek word aiōnios, there rendered everlasting, does not of itself necessarily signify endless, and the text here clearly shows that this cannot be its meaning in Matt. xxv: 43, for the Greek word kolasis, here rendered punishment, properly signifies correction or chastisement for the good of the punished. Such being the fact, and it being clear that endless misery cannot be for the good of the sufferer, it is thus evident the text favors universal restoration rather than endless misery.

Here the Elder turned away, apparently in great indignation; and his brother, Deacon Simmons, whom he had brought to witness his victory over Universalism, now quite crest-fallen, thought it was time to be going; and thus the meeting and discussion ended. The congregation, almost to a man, remained to the last, and listened with the most fixed and silent attention. And never did I witness more apparent satisfaction than was generally manifested at the result, by nearly all that were present, (excepting, of course, the Elder and his friends.) I was then quite young, had but recently entered the ministry, and had no notice, or the most distant expectation of meeting any man in public debate. The Elder was then in the meridian of manhood, called a great champion, and had come prepared, armed and equipped for "putting down the young heretic." But never was I so fully impressed with the superior advantages of truth, though in the hands of a feeble advocate, over error, though the latter was espoused both by talent and experience. The Elder soon after left the place; and while I remained in that region, I heard no more of his boasting over, or pretended defiance of Universalism. Many of my friends at Fort Ann will still recollect with distinctness. I doubt not, all the particulars here narrated, and perhaps know how to apologise for the predominant egotism of this article. Since then, if we mistake not, the Elder has been engaged in a political campaign; having finished that, it seems he is now endeavoring to fulfil the declaration in 2 Peter ii: 22. But let him beware how he kicks against the pricks, lest a worse evil overtake him. D. S.

WHAT AM I?

This question is sincerely proposed by many who have not yet been able fully to decide what they do believe on religious subjects—or with what system of religious faith their belief agrees. One case of this kind has lately been laid before us. It is that of a subscriber in Georgia, who is a member of the Baptist church, and styles himself "a strict predestinarian." He says he has read the Magazine and Advocate for about a year, with much profit and satisfaction—also the "Primitive Baptist," (a paper published in the South,) with similar results—and cannot tell whether he is most Baptist, or most Universalist. His wife, he says, "is a Methodist, which I think comes pretty near to being a Universalist." He desires to be honest before God and man in his religious sentiments, abhors hypocrisy, and hopes soon to be able to determine whether or no he is a Universalist.

There is a sincerity, simplicity and frankness about this man, that I love. He professes no more than he is certain of—and where he is in doubt, he prudently waits for further light and decided conviction. This is as it should be. We should patiently search for truth—the whole truth; and when found or as far as found, we should as boldly avow it. And to aid our honest brother in this search, I offer for his consideration, the following remarks.

Our brother's opinions of predestination, so far as the certainty of God's purpose in the final salvation of man, is concerned—and his wife's Methodism, so far as the extent of God's purpose to save all men, with an endless salvation, is concerned, unitedly make up Universalism. She is, therefore, no nearer being a Universalist, than he is. For it takes both these sentiments together, to constitute Universalism. God designs to save all, and that purpose is certain—therefore universal salvation is true.

Dr. John Evans, in his "Sketch of the denominations of the Christian world," in speaking of the Universalists of England, (who differ in some minor points from some of the Universalists in this country,) says:—

"Their scheme includes a reconciliation of the tenets of Calvinism and Arminianism, by uniting the leading doctrines of both, as far as they are found in the Scriptures, from which union they think the sentiment of universal restoration naturally flows, in opposition to the common and almost universally believed doctrine, of the eternity of hell torments."

Thus they reason:—"The Arminian proves from Scripture, that God is love: that he is good to all; that his tender mercy is over all his works; that he gave his Son for the world; that Christ died for the world—even for the whole world; and that God will have all men to be saved."

"The Calvinist proves also from Scripture, that God is without variableness or shadow of turning; that his love, like himself, alters not; that the death of Christ will be efficacious towards all for whom it was intended; that God will perform all his pleasure, and that his counsel shall stand. The union of these scriptural principles is the final restoration of all men."

"Taking the principles of the Calvinists and Arminians separately, we find the former teaching, or at least inferring, that God doth not love all; but that he made the greater part of men to be endless monuments of his wrath:—the latter declaring the love of God to all, but admitting his final failure of restoring the greater part. The God of the former is great in power and wisdom, but deficient in goodness, and capricious in his conduct—who that views the character can sincerely love it? The God of the latter is exceeding good, but deficient in power and wisdom—who can trust such a being? If, therefore, both Calvinists and Arminians love and trust the Deity, it is not under the character which their several systems ascribe to him, but they are constrained to hide the imperfections which their views cast upon him, and boast of a God whose highest glory their several schemes will not admit."

"The Universalists teach the doctrine of election, but not in the exclusive Calvinistic sense of it: they suppose that God has chosen some for the good of all; and that his final purpose towards all is intimated by his calling his elect the first born and the first fruits of his creatures, which, say they, implies other branches of his family, and a future ingathering of the harvest of mankind."

I trust these remarks will tend to the satisfying of our brother's mind on this important subject—especially when I add, that we believe every threatening made in the Scriptures will be first fulfilled, (for we do not believe sin and suffering to be endless, either in their nature or in the purposes for which God has permitted them,) and that then, universal and endless salvation from sin and misery will take place. Thus we reconcile all the threatenings and all the promises of God with each other, with God's character, glory and purpose, and with the holiness and happiness of the whole intelligent universe.

As to our friend's peculiar opinions on baptism, or on any other subject than man's final destination, they may or may not be held by him, and he still be a Universalist. And so with those of his wife—they may be held or not, and she still believe in the ultimate holiness and happiness of every intelligent creature in the universe. May such be the result—their union in the only faith that can unite both their views. A. B. G.

TO SOME MINISTERING BRETHERN.

We found the names of several ministering brethren on our list to whom Br. Skinner sent the paper without charge. We have continued to do the same, and cannot but infer, from their receiving it and paying the postage on it, that it meets their approbation. We may be mistaken—but we have endeavored, and shall continue our exertions, to make it useful to the common cause in which both they and we are engaged as co-laborers.

If we are not deceived in our inference, and have not wasted our efforts, may we not respectfully request all such to lend us their aid in extending the circulation and consequent utility of our paper, in the vicinity of their labors and travels? Perhaps some of them may be pleased to add to this favor, the additional assistance of their pens. Either or both will be gratefully received—or any other assistance they can render us—and we trust they will not find their kindness lavished on unworthy objects. We had hoped for the pleasure of addressing each of them by letter—but our numerous cares will not permit, and we therefore trust this more public request will be received instead.

There are others, not now on our list, to whom we would be pleased to send our paper, could we believe it would be sufficiently acceptable to them. If, therefore, any of our ministering brethren wish to receive it, they will please notify us of their desire, and it shall be cheerfully gratified; and we trust, in that case, they also will be disposed to aid us so far as is consistent with their other duties and interests. Let us help one another. A. B. G.

THIS NUMBER.

The length of the sermon has excluded many excellent articles prepared for this number, and especially the able answer to the letter of the Presbyterian preacher to his brother. We would have deferred the letter itself, until we could give it and the answer in the same number, but one of our hands having been burnt out at the fire, last week, and therefore occupied with his own affairs, and the letter being already in type, we could not do otherwise than we have done.

Contrary to our usual course, we publish two advertisements this week, on our last page, instead of the usual miscellany,—one of what we believe will prove a first rate literary and news periodical—and the other of Br. Whittemore's new book of Psalmody, which we believe will deserve and meet a general and ready sale. A supply of the latter is expected this month, or early in December; and subscriptions for the Omnibus will be received, (and a specimen shown,) at this office. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. WAGGONER at Salisbury, and Esq. Snell's in the evening—Br. A. WILLIAMS at Carroll—Br. C. BRIDLEY BROWN at Depauville, and at French creek in the evening—Pr. M. B. SMITH at New-Berlin village.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. A. WILLIAMS at Oil Creek, Pa.—Br. BODEN at Madison—Br. C. B. BROWN at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening—Br. W. M. DELONG at Burlington Flats—Br. M. B. SMITH at Smyrna village, and at Sherburne village in the evening—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford.

Installation.—Br. M. B. NEWELL will be installed as pastor of the Universalist society in Amsterdam, on Wednesday the 23d inst. Sermon by Br. RAYNER, of Troy.

It is expected there will be services in the forenoon, afternoon and evening of said day, at the usual hours. Ministering brethren who can make it convenient to attend, are respectfully invited to do so.

Conference.—For reasons which need not be stated, the Conference appointed to be held at the Union meeting-house, head of the river, was postponed—therefore, notice is hereby given that said Conference will be held at said place, on Wednesday and Thursday the 16th and 17th inst. E. F. G.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES.

Received at this Office for the week ending on Wednesday last. H. S. Bellville, (Pa.)—S. S. B. Hammondport, for S. Q.—P. M. Chardon, (O.)—D. R. A. South Shaftsbury, (Vt.) for A. D. D. H. R. F. A. F. E. B. and D. H.—B. A. Kelloggville, (O.)—Rev. L. L. S. Co. lumbus, (O.)

THE WELCOME.

Our readers will recollect that, on Br. Potter's leaving Fly Creek, the choir sung a farewell Hymn, which we published. On his return to visit them, the second Sunday in October, as he entered the dock, they sung the following voluntary in welcome of his return:

Hail, our beloved brother, hail!
Returned again thy flock to find—
Come give us bread that cannot fail
To satisfy the longing mind.

Come, welcome to thy fold again;
The words of truth and life impart,
To feed the mind and soothe the pain,
With healing balm make glad the heart.

Rejoice, dear friends and brethren, all—
Lo, hear the glad news of peace,
From Zion's Watchmen on the wall,
Proclaimed for captives a release.

O, come to-day, your hearts prepare—
Receive the words of Gospel seed;
And thus the bread of life we'll share,
With those who are from bondage freed.

Rejoice to hear the word of God,
(Proclaimed by angels from above;)
Oh! may it bud like Aaron's rod!
With joy produce the fruits of love.

Rejoice, the land is good, rejoice!
Our shepherd's come—rejoice again,
And let us raise the tuneful voice,
And joyful hearts respond, Amen!

TRUE RICHES.

Health and the simplest fare—If thou hast these Accompanied with one single steadfast friend—
A conscience which thou dost not fear to bare
To the great Searcher's eye, and that strong hope Whose wing ne'er tires, e'en o'er the yawning grave—
Go thou thy way—thou art an emperor
Bearing thy crown e'er with thee—go thy way,
And thank thy God, who hath bestowed on thee
The gold which monarchs covet but in vain. J. H. S.
Towanda, Pa.

TEMPERANCE TOAST.

The following toast was offered by Rev. Mr. Pierpont, of Boston, at the late festival of the triennial celebration of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, in reference to a sentiment which had been proposed complimentary to the clergy:—

"Hot water and cold water: the first, the greatest source on earth of mechanical power; the last, the safest thing on earth to direct and control that power."—Gospel Banner.

MARRIAGES.

In Holland, October 17, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. HIRAM MURDOCK, of Ridgeway, to Miss CAROLINE DIXON, of the former place.

At Fly Creek, by Rev. J. Potter, Mr. WILLIAM GRACE, of Cooperstown, to Miss EMELINE TUCKER, of Hartwick.

In Fabius, August 16th, by H. Chapin, Esq., of Tully, Mr. HUBBARD NEALSON, to Miss MARCIA PARRY, both of Greene, Chenango county.

In South New-Berlin, October 2, by Rev. N. Doolittle, Mr. ALANSON HOLMES, to Miss SARAH EUPHRASIA RATHBONE.

At Mount Upton, October 6, by the same, Mr. JOSEPH TOBY, to Miss CATHARINE GARRIETT.

In McDonough, October 19, by the same, Mr. NATHAN BARKER, to Miss ELIZABETH NORRIS.

DEATHS.

In McDonough, October 14th, FRANCIS WINFIELD BARTLETT, infant son of Dr. Bartlett, aged 6 months.

"Adieu sweet child! thy tender form
No more shall racking pain distend;
No more shall life's tempestuous storm,
Upon thy helplessness descend.
Sweet child, thy death to us is great,
But unto thee 'tis boundless gain;
'Tis for ourselves alone we weep,
For thou art free from all our pain."

The funeral services were performed by the writer, and a discourse delivered at the Methodist chapel, from Lam. iii: 31-33. N. D.

In Guilford, July 57th, Mrs. MERCY SHELTON, aged 59 years. The death of Mrs. Sheldon is severely felt and deeply lamented by a large circle of friends, on account of her many Christian virtues. In her, the afflicted children of humanity have lost a benefactor—her children, the kindest and best of mothers—her husband, a faithful and affectionate companion, and society one of its most valuable members. She died as she had lived, in the firm belief of the ultimate restoration of the whole human family to holiness and happiness.

A discourse was delivered on the occasion by the writer, from Job xiv: 14. N. D.

In McDonough, July 23, Mrs. BATHSHEBA NILES, of pulmonary consumption, aged 30 years. Her amiable disposition and Christian character had endeared her to a numerous circle of kindred and friends, who deeply deplore her departure. She bore her illness with patience and fortitude, and manifested a calm resignation to her heavenly Father's will, through whose divine mercy she believed all intelligences would finally be purified—and, saved from sin and death, be brought to the enjoyment of endless life. The funeral services were performed by the writer, and a discourse delivered at the Methodist chapel, from John xiv: 1. N. D.

In South New-Berlin, on the 19th of September, PARDON BURLINGAME, aged 58 years. By this dispensation a valuable citizen and a worthy member of the Christian community is called away, possessing the esteem of the many who knew him, on account of his humane and benevolent principles, and his faithfulness in the discharge of all the duties of life.

We trust he has gone home to his immortal rest in the paradise of God; in which rest he firmly believed all intelligences would ultimately be brought to share. May those who mourn, be abundantly blessed with the consolations and hopes of the Gospel. A discourse was delivered on the occasion by the writer, from Lam. iii: 31-33. N. D.

In Barrington, Steuben county, September 17, EDWARD L., son of D. J. and Louisa Sunderland, aged 1 year and 5 months. The funeral was attended in the Calvinistic Baptist meeting-house, and a discourse delivered by the writer, from Job i: 21. M. L. W.

In Bath, October 12th, of consumption, FRANCES, daughter of Benjamin and Nancy Dudley, aged 9 years. A funeral sermon was delivered by the writer, from 1 Cor. xv: 22. M. L. W.

WALDIE'S LITERARY OMNIBUS.

It was one of the great objects of "Waldie's Library," "to make good reading cheaper, and to bring literature to every man's door." That object has been accomplished; we have given to books wings, and they have flown to the uttermost parts of our vast continent, carrying society to the secluded, occupation to the literary, information to all. We now propose still further to reduce prices, and render the access to a literary banquet more than twofold accessible; we gave and shall continue to give in the quarto Library a volume weekly for two cents a day; we now propose to give a volume in the same period for less than four cents a week, and to add as a piquant seasoning to the dish a few columns of shorter literary matters, and a summary of the news and events of the day. We know by experience and calculation that we can go still further in the matter of reduction, and we feel that there is still verge enough for us to aim at offering to an increasing literary appetite that mental food which it craves.

The Select Circulating Library, now as ever so great a favorite, will continue to make its weekly visits, and to be issued in a form for binding and preservation, and its price and form will remain the same. But we shall in the first week of January, 1837, issue a huge sheet of the size of the largest newspapers of America, but on very superior paper, also filled with books of the newest and most entertaining, though in their several departments of Novels, Tales, Voyages, Travels, etc., select in their character, joined with reading such as usually should fill a weekly newspaper. By this method, we hope to accomplish a great good; to enlighten and enlighten the family circle, and to give to it at an expense which shall be no consideration to any, a mass of reading that in book form would alarm the pockets of the prudent, and to do it in a manner that the most skeptical shall acknowledge "the power of concentration can no farther go." No book which appears in Waldie's quarto Library will be published in the Omnibus, which will be an entirely distinct periodical.

TERMS.

WALDIE'S LITERARY OMNIBUS will be issued every Friday morning, printed on paper of a quality superior to any other weekly sheet and of the largest size. It will contain,

1st. Books, the newest and the best that can be procured, equal every week to a London duodecimo volume, embracing Novels, Travels, Memoirs, etc., and only chargeable with newspaper postage.

2d. Literary Reviews, Tales, Sketches, notices of books, and information from "the world of letters," of every description.

3d. The news of the week concentrated to a small compass, but in sufficient amount to embrace a knowledge of the principal events, political and miscellaneous, of Europe and America.

The price will be two dollars to clubs of five subscribers where the paper is forwarded to one address. To clubs of two individuals, five dollars; single mail subscribers three dollars. The discount on uncurrent money charged to the remitter; the low price and superior paper absolutely prohibit paying a discount. Subscribers to the Library or Port Folio, two dollars and a half. Mail remittances to be post paid.

On no condition will a copy ever be sent until payment is received in advance.

As the arrangements for the prosecution of this great literary undertaking are all made, and the proprietor has redeemed all his pledges to a generous public for many years, no fear of the non-fulfilment of the contract can be felt. The Omnibus will be regularly issued, and will contain in a year reading matter equal in amount to two volumes of Rees's Cyclopaedia, for the small sum mentioned above.

Address, post paid, ADAM WALDIE,
46 Carpenter-street, Philadelphia.

NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY.

Just published and for sale at the Trumpet Office, No. 40, Cornhill, (up stairs,) the New Book of Psalmody, entitled "SONGS OF ZION: or the CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC: designed for the church, for the social meetings of Christians, and for family worship, comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work: arranged with a figured bass for the organ or piano forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the Art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the instructions being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE.

This book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres, which may be divided into three classes: 1st. A small and choice selection from the best of the old American authors. 2d. A selection from the European tunes which have become popular in this country; and 3d. A large variety of original tunes which have never appeared in any work, and which cannot appear in any other than this. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of anthems.

This work contains upwards of 350 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection;" and will be sold at the same price, viz., $1. single; $10. per dozen to societies. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains, nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing schools." On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. Some old and very popular pieces, that have of late been neglected, are herein revived. In a great number of cases, the whole hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use.

HOPE.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAT.

"Hope is one of the choicest gifts, which Heaven mercifully deigns to mortality." When the storm is awaked from its repose in the clouds, and tempests are walking abroad, then hope, our guardian angel, supports our drooping spirits, and the rays of her consolation gladden our hearts. Were the light of hope banished from the world, how dark and cheerless the prospect that would reign! It is this which lights us on our way. When clouds and storms come up—when darkness lowers and gloom oppresses: it points us to flowery landscapes and sunny skies beyond this cheerless prospect. It tells us that soon the clouds will vanish away—the storm be hushed to rest, and the darkness disappear before the glory of the monarch of the spheres.

But hope can never satisfy the longings of the soul, unless it points beyond the scenes of this world. Man knows that there is a period advancing, when this earthly tabernacle must lie mouldering, low, even with the clods of the valley. Notwithstanding all the flowers which hope culls from earthly scenes, and strews along his path, he is not satisfied. There is still a vacuum in his heart which must be filled, or he roams in misery.

No—that soul can never be happy which hath no light for the future. Let the sun beam upon his habitation ever so brightly—let the song and fragrance of earth linger in his bowers—let every thing smile joyously around him, as if desirous to lull him into repose and enjoyment; and they bring him no peace—but add to his sorrow. They roll not back the tide of his unhappiness and infelicity; for he thinks to bid adieu to all their smiles and loveliness, and repose in the charnel-house of silence and oblivion—his hope has laid down at the grave, and despair has written in its depths—

"Death is an eternal sleep!" No; man cannot be happy, unless possessed of the glorious hope of immortality. It is the Gospel hope which drives sorrow from the heart—which causes man, when he seeks the couch of repose, to slumber in peace. Oh! it is a high and a glorious hope! It will cheer and gladden our hearts when all the charms of earth have fled—it is the angel which will stand by us when all our friends have vanished away, and sing of a home and a father—it pours an oil upon the troubled waters of affliction and they become as calm and serene as the slumbers of innocence—it takes from the chalice of human life the bitter dregs of sorrow and infelicity, hushes every turbulence and commotion within the bosom, makes soft the sick man's couch, smooths the pillow of death, and points to heaven!

Oh! how sure and steadfast is this hope! 'Tis as an anchor thrown on mercy's bosom; which secures from danger and alarm, the tost and agitated soul! When friend after friend is departing to the shadowy land—when death is snatching from our fond embraces, the heart's loved and cherished ones—when disappointments, afflictions, and sorrows are rolling their accumulated tide upon the soul, and tempests are walking the wave; if it possess the anchor, HOPE, it stands as firm as the sure-repelling rock—it smiles at the storm, and looks to God!

The Gospel hope is not only sure, but how tenderly and soothingly it speaks to the heart! It does not merely tell us, in its joyful whisperings, that we shall live again; but speaks of happiness—of undying and eternal bliss in the paradise of God, for every child of earth! It tells the soul, that it shall become purified from all earthly affections, and be as the angels that surround the throne of the Eternal! Oh, it is as an angel of light, sent to cheer the benighted and the wandering! When cares and disappointments have bruised the spirit, and unsealed the fountains of grief in the heart, then she whispers peace! When we stand by the dying couch of a dear friend, and witness the dim flickering of the lamp of life, and the beating of the pulse, as it grows feeble and more feeble;—

"Weep not, she says, at Nature's transient pain, Congenial spirits part to meet again!"

This hope rests on a firm and an unshaken basis. Time in his ravages, affects it not. His earthquakes may rock the towering pyramid into ruins, which has braved the shock of ages; but this, — NEVER! Cities, nations, kingdoms and empires may be dissolved and vanish like the "baseless fabric of a vision;" but the foundation of the glorious hope of immortality, shall remain unshaken and indestructible! It is a foundation which our heavenly Father has laid in the everlasting Gospel, and if on this we rear the fabric of our hope, it shall never fall, but receive its fruition in a blessedness as firm and immoveable as the habitations of eternity!

"Eternal Hope! when yonder spheres sublime
Pealed their first notes to sound the march of time,
Thy joyous youth began—but not to fade—
When all the sister planets have decayed;
When wrapt in fire the realms of ether glow,
And heaven's last thunder shakes the world below;
Thou undismayed shalt o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile!"

THE EARLY SNOW.....A FRAGMENT.

* * * * * Long and mournfully I gazed through the window at the beating storm of snow that was fast covering the earth with a mantle of white. I was truly sad. Meditation came over me, and my mind was ranging in busy contemplation upon the Summer that is past. The lovely prospect which had spell-bound my soul in admiration when all was bright, and green and gay, now presented the sable sheet of Winter; and the driving snow hid from my eye, herb and flower. I hied to the green pasture, where oft I had roamed to witness the antics of the playful and tender lamb in its native glee—the sober tread of the submissive ox—the grazing of the quiet and useful cow, the hum of myriads of happy insects, whose music echoed to the purling of the gentle brook which coursed its steady way through mead and bog; and I looked upon the scene, and lo! it was changed. Nought of the mirthfulness of sunny days was visible; but the resistless wind, as if in mockery of the gambols of the sportive lamb, whirled in wrathful glee the whitened garment of earth! The music of the buzzing bee was hushed, and the angry blast alone hummed an echo to the murmuring stream that still found its course onward, and washed its bordering banks of snow, yet not with that gentle and musical tone which was its wont in milder days, when it playfully laved the green herbage, and bounded in happiness at the nodding smile of its bordering flowers. I then cast my eye to view the beautiful grove that lay at a little distance—where upon the moss-covered, prostrate tree, many a musing hour have I sat, enjoying the shade of the over-hanging branches, and listening to the carols of the praise-meeting family of nature, warbling forth their notes in harmony of numbers, and united with the gentle and cooling breeze from the adjacent hill, fanned me into the repose of calmness, poured over me the serenity of peace, and inspired my mind with a holy devotion to Him who made the bird, the breeze and cooling shade. But lo, here too, a change had come! The branches which had bended willingly 'neath the weight of the feathered songsters, now groaned in fearful agony under the oppressive burden of accumulated masses of congealed vapor, which had bowed their heads to the very earth. The warbler's note was mute; and the trembling breeze from the setting sun, was changed to the rustling wind. Each—all, seemed to have forgotten the music of other days, and were listening to the sound of the mournful, fearful breeze, which was tuning in melancholy strains, the requiem of departed joys! I viewed it in silence, and turned my footsteps homeward. When I reached my room, I seated myself before the blazing hearth, and gave myself up to the deep musings of an hour.

What though God in his providence has seen proper to draw a veil of sleet, for a season, over the fair face of nature? Has he not also, on every returning Spring, permitted yon bright and rolling orb; with winning smiles and warm kisses to dissolve the deep driven snow, and show the earth in her loveliness—yea, in a beauty brighter than ever? What though he has sent the whistling winds in a furious voice? Does he not again permit the gentle zephyr to waft to our senses, odors from ten thousand fragrant flowers of Spring? What though he has sent the driving blast, and warned the feathered tribe of approaching Winter, and that it was time they had departed to a milder clime? Has he not again invited them back, by dispelling the clouds of dreary Winter, and displaying the enticing scenes of returning sunshine and gentle breeze, that they may greet our ears in redoubled strains of praise to their great Creator—that they may sing forth their notes of gratitude to God, and teach man the devotions of nature? And art thou, O! man, so selfish that thou wouldst not grant to thy fellow-creature of other climes, the pleasure of listening for a short season, to the song which has delighted thine own ear during the sunny Summer past? Say, wouldst thou deprive thy kindred of other lands, when reclining 'neath the shade of their pleasant bowers, to tune their heart's melody to heaven, in harmony with those that God has taught to chant his lovely praise? No, mortal. Away, that selfish thought! He of other clime is thy brother—and God is your common Father.

Whilst wrapped in this meditation, a neighbor had entered unperceived, and sat by my side. The first notice I had of his presence, was given by a violent shudder of his whole frame, accompanied by a murmur of discontent on account of the early and continued snow. He complained that there would be a scarcity of food for flocks and herds—that man would suffer, and beast would perish before the opening of another Spring, or the gathering of another harvest. I interrupted him; for I felt that to leave him proceed, would be silently to hear reproach cast upon my God—it would be wickedly listening to disgrace brought upon His name who hath "done all things well."

Neighbor, believest thou in the overruling providence of an all-wise Creator?

Verily, thou hast broken thy Quaker silence, in the form of an extraordinary inquiry. Do you mean to question my belief in God? Have I not been a firm advocate for the pervading power of Jehovah, and warned my dying fellow-creatures to flee to the ark of safety, from the judgment of his fiery indignation?

Friend, thy interrogatory reply does not satisfy. Wilt thou tell in plain words, whether thou hast faith in the wise Ruler of heaven and earth, who governs all things, and whose providence is a part of his government?

I have.

Thou hast wisely answered. I would fain continue to ask thee more. Has not that God in whom thou believest, protected thee in times past—sheltered thee from the pitiless storm—saved thee and thine from famine—given thee health and strength to labor, and fitted thee for the enjoyment of the labor of thine hands—supported thee in six trials, yea, in seven has not left nor despised thee—filled thy garner with the bounties of earth, and supplied thy wants from the first of thy frail existence? And wilt thou not trust him for the future? Are not thy barn-sills now bending under the weight of a plentiful harvest, the ingathering of which gave thee joy? Hast thou no confidence to believe that He who has done so much for you, will continue his mercies?

He who hath placed us here, knows how to adapt the seasons to the circumstances of his creatures. And though he permit the clouds to gather thick above our heads, and pour down their snows from their bosom till the earth is wrapped in the gorgeous robe of Winter, yet the same hand will brush the overshadowing storm far away, and send in its stead, the peerless smile of the king of day over nature, that it may put on again a brighter garment of joy and gladness, than that even for which thou now sighest. Knowest thou not that "variety is the spice of life"?—that thou art indebted to storms like that which now beats around us, for the enjoyment of the beautiful Summer suns? It is even so. Be silent then, and adore that wisdom and goodness which have ordered all things for the best—which shine as well in clouds as clearer skies. Let not a sigh of discontent, nor thought of murmur escape thy soul; but bow unto thy God who formed thee, and "praise him for his wonderful works to the children of men."

TRUTH.

BY GEORGE L. PLATT.

"The search for truth is the noblest of employments, and its promulgation a duty." MADAME DE STAEL.

How correct is the above sentiment. Truth is, indeed, the noblest, most exalted pursuit in which man can be engaged in this terrestrial realm below. There is nothing that imparts more dignity to man's character, than to be employed in a diligent, unwavering search for truth. The above sentiment is an axiom in itself, and consequently requires no proof. But how often do we see it disregarded—entirely rejected—although it is self-evident. How often do we see the advocates of a partial grace in our Creator, forsaking the bright and flowery paths of truth, and plunging headlong into the labyrinth of error and misrepresentation, in support of their false and unfounded doctrines. There are ample reasons for this. If the advocates of Partialism were to adhere strictly to truth—were they to labor unweariedly to discover and promulgate it, they would inevitably arrive to the conclusion, that their doctrines are false, unsanctioned by the divine attributes of love, justice and mercy, and entirely unfounded on any of the precepts of the Bible, or the ennobling principles of Christianity. How pleasant it would be to see them forsake the winding paths of error, and nobly stand forth and espouse the divine cause of truth! But, alas! as yet, few have been able to extricate themselves, after being once lost in the maze of error. But the light of divine truth is beginning to illumine the entrance to error's gloomy caverns; consequently, few, very few attempt to enter its obscure apartments, and many, who had partially entered, being struck with the gloom and darkness within, have joyfully retraced their steps, and are now enjoying this life under the heavenly influence of liberty and truth. And the hope, that the darkness and mist of error, which for ages, have encircled a vast portion of the family of man, will soon be dissipated by the divine rays of truth, is a joyful one, and one that the experience of a few years past demonstrates is within the pale of realization.

Oh! would that all mankind were strongly impressed with the truth of the noble sentiment at the head of this article, and that they would persevere, with untiring and unyielding assiduity, in the search for, and promulgation of truth. May every benighted spirit that is groaning under the galling yoke of error, be emancipated from his thralldom, and brought to bow in humble adoration before the sacred shrine of truth. Then, when man shall have emerged from darkness and come into the broad light of day—when he shall have been brought to the knowledge of the truth, and when this divine principle shall "run, have free course, and be glorified"—then, what a happy scene this world will present!

Reader, must this all be imagination? Will it never be realized? Will the world never be disenthralled from the shackles of error and superstition, and be brought to the knowledge of the divine love of our heavenly Father? Oh! gentle reader, never let a doubt enter your mind, but do you resolutely and firmly resolve, that,

"Whilst the kindling of life in your bosom remains," you will manfully persevere in the search for and promulgation of TRUTH.

ATHEISTIC OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

BY REV. S. PRESSON LANDERS.

It has frequently been objected to the doctrine of the existence of a supreme Intelligence, that we have no reason to believe he ever was seen. The unbeliever in the being of a God, affirms it as his belief that a being which cannot be seen, or perceived by the senses in general, is no being at all. He believes that there is such an empire as China, because some one has been there. He believes that there is such a city as Paris, because he has seen some one that has seen that. But God we never saw, therefore we have less positive evidence of his being, than of the places just named. Seriously, we must consider the faculty of believing very deficient in a person, who cannot believe in the being of any object unless he sees or feels it. But to the subject.

It is admitted by all, that there is in connection with the physical constitution of man, a mysterious something which we call mind. However, much the world may contend about its materiality or immateriality, all agree that it does actually exist. Now, by what possible process can its being be known by the perception of the senses? The mind is not an object of sense. The only possible means by which we can know its existence, is by its effects. This is all the evidence that the most confirmed Atheist requires for his faith in the existence of the invisible mind. Now, if we look abroad on the page of nature, we discover in every possible part, marks of a forming hand and contriving mind. We see design in the minutest particle of matter; wisdom establishing certain and infallible laws, and goodness bringing about the greatest possible happiness of all intelligent and animated being. In one word, we see operations and effects which prove the existence of intelligence separate from matter; and by the same means that we know mind exists in man, we know that mind exists, operates in and pervades the vast system of the universe. The mind of man can no more be perceived by the senses, than the mind of God, and both are known to exist by the effects of that mind.

Mr. Williamson, in his reply to the skeptic concerning our inability to comprehend the Deity, says, "What is matter?—Why, it is a substance that has form, and extension, and inertness, and solidity. Well; what constitutes the real essence of the thing itself? There you must stop. What is God? I answer, he is a being who possesses wisdom, and power, and goodness. Well, what constitutes the essence of this being? There I must stop. But, mind you, if my inability to answer your question, is a good reason why you should reject the existence of God, then I contend, that your inability to answer my question, is precisely as good a reason why I should reject the existence of matter. Come, let us compromise this business. I confess that I know nothing of the omniscient Mind, save its qualities and operations. You must confess that you know nothing of matter, save its qualities and operations. Of its real essence, you are as profoundly ignorant as I am of the nature of God. Why, then, do you believe that there is any matter in the universe? It is because you know some of its properties. Do you ask why I believe that there is a God in heaven? I answer, I recognise the attributes and operations of the Eternal mind in the works of nature around me." Pages 71, 72.

Again; no cause can produce an effect equal to that cause. The hand, for instance, can make no machine equal in skill to the hand itself. The effects of the mind make but little approximation to the mind itself; and the mere circulation of the blood, and the pulsation of the heart, are far inferior in wisdom to the apparatus which is the cause of this action. These effects are foreign to the will of man; therefore man is not their cause, and they must be attributed to some higher agent. When we examine the laws of the universe, we see fixed and infallible rules operating the same in America as in China, the same in Patagonia as in Lapland. When we see the immediate connexion between animals and vegetables, between both and the elements, and between the elements and the planetary world, we not only conclude that the cause of all these relations and laws, is greater than the laws themselves; but we conclude that their cause is infinitely great and powerful, one and the same agent or mind, pervading all space, and we conclude also, that we have as clear and full certainty of the existence of this cause, or God, as we have of the existence of any being whatever, save ourselves. We know that we have life, but our senses never perceived this. We know we have a mind, but we know it only by its effects, and we know by the same evidence that there is a God.

Again, when I say that I see my friend, I am understood as beholding a thinking or intelligent being, and not merely his body, form, or color. Says Bishop Berkely on this subject, "I do not, strictly speaking, see my friend, i. e., that individual thinking thing; but only such visible signs as suggest and infer the being of that individual thinking principle, or mind. Even so, in the same manner it seems to me, that though with eyes of flesh, I cannot see the invisible God; yet I do, in the strictest sense, behold and perceive by all sense, such signs and tokens, such effects and operations, as suggest, indicate, demonstrate, an invisible God as certainly, and with the same evidence as any other signs, perceived by the senses, do suggest to me the existence of mind, spirit, or thinking principle, which I am convinced of only by a few signs, effects and motions of one small organized being. Whereas, I do at all times and in all places, see signs and effects, which evince almost to an ocular demonstration, the existence of a God."

THE BENEFITS OF EDUCATION.

In this age of intelligence, when so much is being done for education, that one should presume to enforce its claims, may appear to some the height of folly; yet when we compare what is with what might be, we wonder that stronger, and deeper, and louder tones, are not raised in its vindication. We wonder that there are so few worshippers at the altar of science—we wonder that the flood-gates of wealth, which are opening in every portion of our country, pouring out treasures for every namable improvement to enhance physical convenience, should be so readily shut, when education asserts her right; as if mental improvement was of secondary importance, and the smallest link in the chain of national existence, or human enjoyment. We wonder, too, that the sons of a land so richly blesed of Heaven—a land where Omnipotence has impressed the seal of infinite goodness, in the variety he has given of soil and climate, in the awful cataract and lofty mountain, in the gurgling rill and lowly valley, in the boundless forest and wide-spread prairie—should do so little for the bringing up of the mind from mental degradation, and assimilating it to its great original. And especially do we wonder that so little is done for the maturing of female intellect—that her means of education are, comparatively speaking, so limited. The important bearing education has upon the stability of free institutions, no discerning mind will deny; and let those who doubt it, turn over the leaves in the dim old volumes of the past, and they will find that aristocracies originated in ignorance, and that nations were enslaved, only, in proportion as learning decreased, and vice superseded virtue. But I need not repeat the warnings of time—they are written on the mighty ruins of classic Greece and Italy, and the traveller who gazes on the relics of domes, and palaces, and monuments—who wanders through their tombs, now the “stall of the ox”—pauses, and deplors the ignorance which has shrouded such a glorious land in such a darkness.

But the perpetuation of our republic is not the paramount claim education has upon its fostering care. The happy influence it exerts over every grade and condition of human existence—the power it extends over social life, in sustaining and calling into action those higher and better affections of the human heart, which gush out in streams of sympathy, blinding mind to mind—and above all, the high moral tone it gives to society, demand that it should be sustained. It has been said and truly, that knowledge and virtue are inseparable, and that the happiness of society depends on their cultivation. They break through those barriers which wealth has erected around the social system, and gold is no longer a passport to favor. When they enter the dwellings of the rich, benevolence sits on every countenance, and the law of kindness is written on every heart; charity and good will go out and in before them, and wealth is a blessing. When they pass the threshold of the cottager, contentment, and gratitude, and love smile on every feature. When they preside in the council chamber of statesmen, wisdom directs their energy, and party spirit is lost in the love of country. When the poet embraces them, they lend wings to fancy, and his visions partake more of heaven than earth. When they guide the pen of romance, hearts aspire after a purer existence. When they go with him who ministers in holy things, up to the altar of the living God, his lips drop love, and hope lights up his heart. Not so with ignorance and vice; wherever their foot-steps are planted, there tyranny, and slavery, and bigotry, and woes unnamable, make up the sum total of human life.

But the superior excellence of education, is found in the charm it throws over the Christian virtues—in the strength and beauty it gives to Christianity—that plant which the breath of ignorance will blast, and which flourishes only when watered by the dews of knowledge. Let, then, the proper education of youth be attended to, and its redeeming spirit felt by them, and not one century will have passed away, before bigotry and superstition, vice and immorality, will slumber in their graves beyond the hope of a resurrection. Then, parents and Christians, awake! let your zeal for the advancement of knowledge, be increased; and be assured, the greatest blessing we can receive at your hands, is knowledge, and the greatest curse, ignorance.

EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

The above mentioned work is one, concerning the merits of which little need be said. Those who are acquainted with it, already appreciate its value, and those who are not, would be able to form but a faint idea of its worth, by any article in relation to it that we could pen. But notwithstanding its value as a work of merit, and its importance to our denomination; it has never been duly appreciated by the reading portion of the Universalist public. This has arisen, not from want of ability on the part of our friends, but from the fact that it has never been examined by them. It was patronized in a good degree, (if I am not mistaken,) by the preachers, and kept by them upon their shelves; without being put into the hands of their friends for examination.

We have done by it, as we are apt to do in relation to other measures of importance—acted as though we considered it as not being any part of our particular business to sustain it, and suffered it to be suspended while we were waiting for each other to act. It was with deep regret that I read a notice that it would be suspended at the end of the third volume, for the want of adequate support. And it was with some degree of pleasure, that on examining the minutes of the General Convention of Universalists, of the United States, I found that body to “earnestly recommend the revival of that excellent work, The Expositor and Universalist Review.” I am glad it was earnestly recommended, and I indulge the hope that it will be earnestly acted upon. Should it be, I am fully persuaded, the work can not only be revived but well sustained. We owe it to ourselves as a denomination, to the community at large, and to future generations to support a work, in which can be embodied labored expositions of our doctrinal views; the best articles that can be produced, by our writers of ability and experience, on Biblical Literature; together with a minute and circumstantial history of the important passing events of the religious world; and a review of those works that have a bearing upon religious truth, that from time to time appear. The Expositor and Review is just such a work, as will meet these objects. And I am well assured that the denomination possess ability and means, to issue and sustain such a work, not only competently, but respectfully. All we want is proper exertion. An organization, for the purpose, is highly important to secure the object. We want our interests enlisted—our particular and individual interests. We make more effectual exertions to secure our individual than general interests. I believe this is a self-evident fact. I am sure it applies to myself, and how generally it may be applicable to others I cannot say.

What measures shall we adopt then, to enlist our interests and secure the object? I would suggest the following, and if they are not accepted, I hope they may induce some one to point out more effectual ones.

There are more than three hundred preachers of our denomination, in the United States, and probably that number that can reasonably expect to be both pleased and profited by having such a work in their libraries as the Expositor. Let us, then, give a pledge to be responsible for five copies each; or more, if we can reasonably expect to obtain more subscribers. This would secure a subscription for fifteen hundred copies, a number that would probably sustain the work respectably.—What say you, brethren—will you come forward and give the pledge? A less number than the one named above, will procure the revival of the Expositor. I perceive by the circular of the committee of the Rockingham Association, that one thousand will warrant undertaking the work; and will secure the labors of Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d., as Editor. To fill the editorial department, probably no one could be engaged, who could be more universally acceptable than Br. Ballou.

To procure one thousand copies would require, but an average of three and one-third copies each, for three hundred pledged agents; or five copies, each, for two hundred. We have nearly two hundred young preachers, who could by their united efforts, thus secure the publisher in undertaking the work.

I can conceive of but one objection to this measure that could be urged, by any one who feels friendly to the object. That is pecuniary inability to meet the pledge, if the number of subscribers could not be obtained. This objection might, perhaps, be urged with as much propriety by the writer, as by most of our brethren in the ministry. But I am perfectly sanguine that I could procure the subscribers, to meet the pledge, without any extraordinary effort.

This seems to me the only practicable means of reviving the work. Shall we not, then, adopt it, and try the experiment at least? If we succeed, we will get our reward in the gratification that the work will afford. If we do not, the loss will be but small to each, and but slightly felt. We are frequently writing to our Editors. Shall we not then send in our names, and the number of copies we are willing to be responsible for? For my part, I will give Br. G. W. Bazin liberty to hold me responsible for five copies, and promise him that if he can issue a prospectus for the work, of the same size of volume third of the Expositor and Review, to be edited by Br. Ballou, he shall hear from me again on the subject. J. E. HOLMES.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF MICHIGAN.

This Association held its semi-annual session at Adrian, according to appointment, October 5, 1836. Br. J. BENY, of Adrian, Moderator, and Br. J. E. Holmes, Clerk. Six sermons were preached on the occasion—Brs. Wheelock, Holmes, Brown and Thornton, one each, and Br. Stacy two. Brs. Stacy, Holmes and Curtis were a committee on fellowship, and reported in favor of granting a letter to Br. Edmund B. Wheelock, of Plymouth, Wayne county. Report accepted and letter granted accordingly.

Requests were received from two societies, for the fellowship of the Association. One known as the First society of Plymouth and Canton, formed September 3, 1836, consisting of twenty-two members, and the other known as the First society of Plymouth. The time of forming the last named society, or the number of members, not stated. Thomas Huston, Clerk of the society of Plymouth and Canton, and C. N. Booth of the society of Plymouth.

Delegates were in attendance from the church and society at Ann Arbor, and also from those of Adrian. The church and society at Ann Arbor enjoy the labors of Br. Stacy. The number of members of the church is thirty, and of the society fifty-five. The church was formed in July last, and held its first communion on the first Sunday in August.

Br. Wheelock preaches with the societies of Plymouth and Canton, and of Plymouth, each, once in four weeks.

The Association adjourned to hold its annual session at Ann Arbor, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1837. And it is hoped that no society in the State, will at that time neglect to be represented by its delegates; or neglect to give a full and perfect report of their numbers and apparent prosperity. J. E. HOLMES.

VICTIMS OF FANATICISM.

Mrs. Giles, of Eaton, N. H., (says the Gospel Sun,) committed suicide by cutting her throat, October 7. She had come to the conclusion that she had sinned away the day of grace!

Yet another case is given by Br. Drew in a late number of his paper, in the person of a “dear and affectionate sister” of the Editor. She died a maniac in the New-York Insane Hospital one week previous to his late visit to that city, and her insanity was the result of despair induced by a too sincere belief in the church, (Dr. Spring’s, we believe,) to which she belonged.

Quere? Can that be the religion of Jesus which produces such awful results? Christ said “Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for my yoke is easy and my burden is light.” How then can his doctrine impose a yoke so grievous and a burden so oppressive, as to hurl reason from her throne, and make even existence a curse too intolerable to be endured?—Pioneer.

EXTRACT FROM A DISCOURSE,
Preached at the funeral of Mrs. MARY WILMARTH.
BY REV. K. TOWNSEND.

"The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"
John xviii: 11.

In speaking of the virtues of the deceased, your aged neighbor and friend, I would desire to speak of her as she was—to do justice (if my feeble powers were sufficient for the task) to her worth and the excellences of her character—for she was not only theoretically but practically a Christian—a humble follower of our meek and lowly Master. Realizing the importance of religion, feeling her dependence upon God and her obligations to her Creator, she made the subject of his character, his purposes, and his designs a matter of serious and anxious inquiry, and was rewarded for her labors in the assurance that she had a Father in heaven. But she stopped not here: her benevolent heart was exercised with anxiety for others, as well as for herself. She saw that all were dependent upon the same God, all destined to pass to the chambers of death, and again and again did she search the counsels of her Maker, and fathom the waters of salvation, until she found that the mercy and the goodness of God were as a shoreless sea, vast as the wants of his creatures—that he had made ample provision not only for the present, but for the future wants—that he was the Father of his creation, and all mankind were his offspring—that all had their origin from the same common Parent, and were destined to the same blessed and immortal home.

This faith was the anchor of her soul. It sustained her through her long, useful life. It enabled her to discharge her numerous duties as a wife, a mother, a Christian, a neighbor and a friend, and that these were all discharged with fidelity you are witnesses. In the hour of unalloyed prosperity, when friends surrounded her and fortune smiled, she humbly acknowledged her indebtedness to God, with gratitude for his unspeakable mercies; and when called to pass through scenes of sorrow—to endure pain and sickness—to stand by the bedside of dying children and failing friends—the language of her heart was in unison with our text—"The cup which my Father giveth me shall I not drink it?" You know that her last sickness was indeed long and painful—for days, and weeks, and months she stood upon the very brink of the tomb, expecting every moment a summons from her Father to that land of spirits she fondly called "her home." Still the goodness, the loving-kindness of God was her constant theme. She bowed in meek submission to his rod, and looked forward upon the future without a doubt or a fear. For her confidence was fixed, and based, and grounded upon the Rock of ages. All her pain was borne with unexampled fortitude, without murmuring or repining, and she was at all times resigned to the dispensations of Providence. And if under any circumstances, failing nature led her to shrink back at the prospect of protracted suffering, exclaiming, "If it be possible let this cup pass from me"—her faith enabled her cheerfully to add, "not my will, but thine, O God, be done!"

Often, as I stood by the bedside of this dying Christian—witnessed her patience, her fortitude, her resignation—saw her while her whole soul was absorbed in the love of God and her faith triumphed over the fear of death, I was led, in the fulness of my heart, to exclaim, "O that I might die the death of the righteous, and my last end be like hers." But she has gone. Tired nature has fallen under the mighty load. Our aged father has been called to part with the wife of his bosom, the companion of youth and of old age, she who shared in all his sorrows and his joys. Her children have lost the mother who watched over their tender infancy, who was the counsellor of their youth, and whose early precepts taught them to look to the God of our spirits and address him as their "Father in heaven."

The society of which she was a member have sustained a loss which they will long and deeply feel. Often, my dear brethren and friends, has our departed sister assembled with us in the courts of the Lord—often have we taken sweet counsel together as we went up to the house of our God. Her attendance upon our stated meetings has been constant and untiring, for she loved to listen to the tidings of salvation and to unite with us in the praises of our heavenly Father. Under the burning Summer's sun, in Winter's bleak and biting storms, her place was seldom empty, and in her last sickness she often expressed her regrets that she could no more enjoy this privilege until she was removed to the courts above. This weeping family could tell you what great sacrifices of comfort she was ready to make, that they too might mingle in the service and worship of our Creator. The interest she took in your welfare is known to you all; it has been exhibited not only in words but in acts. Often has she, in her sickness, expressed to me and to others her anxiety for your prosperity. That we might all live together in the bonds of unity and affection—might together strive for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem, and that the vine which our heavenly Father has here planted, might extend itself until it entwined each son and daughter of our race—until we should all rally around the banner of everlasting love.

Brethren and sisters, I pray God that these prayers may be answered—these wishes realized, for then, indeed, shall we prosper in all our undertakings—then, indeed, will each member of our society adorn their profession—then, indeed, will our duties be discharged with fidelity, in humility and in love.

But her character as a wife, a mother and a neighbor was not less consistent than her conduct as a Christian. It would be indeed wonderful if in looking back upon a long life, busy memory should recall no duties left undone. But yet, in reviewing the past, she felt a consciousness that according to her ability she had endeavored to do her duty. This was the legitimate and proper influence of her faith. It worked by love and purified her heart. It influenced her conduct and directed her steps. Every where, in every situation, whether of joy or sorrow, the love of God, his unbounded goodness, his eternal love for sinners, and the unsearchable riches of Christ, were her constant themes, and there are very many here present who have witnessed how much her whole mind and soul were absorbed in these glorious truths. Not contented to feast alone upon these enduring riches, she would have all know and feel their obligations of gratitude to God, their relation to him and to each other. And can we wonder that, while she felt the value of such a faith, the benevolence of her heart should lead her to desire that others might enjoy the same privilege? Her faith she tested through a long and useful life. She leaned upon its consolations when called to part with her children, with her companions and friends. She had tested it in the hour of sorrow, in pain, and in sickness, and in its triumphs she commended her family to the kind care of our almighty Parent, her spirit to the God who gave it, and peacefully fell asleep in Jesus. She has gone from us to be seen no more till we meet before the throne of God. But her virtues shall be long remembered—her precepts, her memory, will be treasured in the bosom of affection, and long after her remains shall have mingled with the dust, shall her consistent example influence the conduct of those who have witnessed her fortitude, her resignation and her devotion to the best interests of her fellow-creatures.

LETTERS BETWEEN TWO BROTHERS.
ANSWER.

Schenectada, September 30, 1836.

DEAR BROTHER—I received yours, August 20, with joy and satisfaction, and read it with deep interest. Your apologies with regard to my dissatisfaction are sufficient, since I have ascertained the particulars which I was then ignorant of, which caused the dissatisfaction.

Dear Brother, I entertain no hard feelings against you, but with sentiments of affectionate regard, I remain your affectionate brother and well-wisher.

The plain language that you have addressed me in your kind letter has not wounded my feelings in the least, for I rejoice to see any one plain and unequivocal. If the language you have addressed me is from the bottom of your heart, and sincere, which I have no reason to doubt, I shall then regard it as such. But, as you requested no answer in refutation of the arguments you advanced, nor in defence of my own sentiments, I hope you will pardon me if I should disobey the request; for my own conscience will not allow me to remain silent upon this subject. Should I address you in language as plain and unequivocal as you have used with me, and perhaps more so; it will not be with the intention to wound your feelings, but to substantiate that sincere faith which I now enjoy—a faith in the final salvation of all men from sin and misery—from sin, you will recollect, and not in sin—for God informs us Jesus came to "save his people from their sins," and not in them; and he also informs us that "he shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied." But will he be satisfied, short of accomplishing the great work which his Father gave him to do? that is to "finish sin, and make an end of transgression, and bring in everlasting righteousness"—to "destroy death, and him that hath the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them, who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage"—when God hath assured us that surely as "the rain and the snow fall from heaven, and return not thither, without watering the earth, and causing it to bring forth and bud, so that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, so shall his word be that goeth forth out of his mouth; it shall not return void, but shall accomplish that which he please, and prosper in the thing whereunto he hath sent it"—and when he hath assured us that "he will make unto all people a feast of fat things, etc."—that "he will swallow up death in victory," and "wipe tears from off all faces," and "destroy the face of the covering that is cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations"—that Christ "must reign until he hath put all enemies under his feet," and when he hath made manifest that all things are put under him, "then shall he be subject to him that did put all things under him, that God may be all in all." I might multiply passage after passage, until my eyes were dim, of the plain and simple testimony of Holy Writ which is too plain to be misunderstood. You might also say that you could multiply passage after passage, denouncing the threatenings of God—but what would it all amount to? Were not the promises made four hundred and thirty years before the threatenings, and shall they be disannulled? I as firmly believe in the threatenings of God, as I do in the promises, but if the threatenings be endless, then the promises cannot be fulfilled.

You stated that I had made up my mind before I was twenty, to believe in a doctrine which is opposed by nine-tenths or more of the people, and proclaimed by only about one hundred and fifty persons. Had you said three hundred and fifty, you would have come nearer the truth; for there are over that number, who are preaching the joyful tidings of a world's salvation. But admitting that there were not one-fourth of this number—now, would that be any criterion to go by? What if the same argument should have been advanced to the good old Elijah, when he stood in a giant-like power before the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, trusting in the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, who is the Saviour of all men, would it have proved any thing on account of its minority? By no means. The time has been, when Calvinism and Arminianism were at as low an ebb as ever Universalism was, and the time is not far distant when they shall have returned to their former state—for the time has come, and is coming, when people will read, hear, and think for themselves, and no longer be guided by that priestly influence which has led, or rather driven, so many to believe in the soul-chilling doctrine of endless misery, which, if true, was kept a secret for four thousand years. But in my humble opinion, as in the opinion of the great and learned, as you seem to resort to them as a weapon, no such doctrine was ever taught, or in the slightest degree intimated, within the lids of the Bible. Were I to resort to great men as a weapon, I might refer you to Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin, and a host of other worthies, and even to Dr. Huntington, of Connecticut, who preached the doctrine of endless misery all the days of his life, on account of its popularity, and at death left his manuscripts to the world in defence of the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men. We will come down to a later period. Even some persons of high standing as professors of the original languages, on which you so much depend as a standard of your faith, with whom I have conversed, and whose names I would mention but for their own sake, totally deny the doctrine of endless misery. I mention these few out of the many that might be mentioned.

You stated that you viewed me in a great error, and warned me to be on the safe side. However great the errors may be which I have imbibed, and which you seem to think originated from the heart, I must say that God only knows my heart. As you warn me to be on the safe side, in order that I may stand two chances, I would ask on what side you imagine I consider myself, if not already upon the safe side? for I do not delight to be in an error.

Suppose, for instance, that I had a desire to cross the wide ocean, where foaming billows roll beneath the canopy of heaven, and there should be presented to me a large, staunch vessel, apparently able to carry a large multitude of people with perfect safety, and I should be invited to embark on board of her, and at the same time an opposition should arise, and present to me a small, leaky vessel, with a strong invitation to embark on board of the small vessel instead of the large one, stating at the same time that we should stand two chances—in case the same little one should fail, the large one would catch us—this would be relying on the doctrine of chances, which I have little faith in. Would not good reason and sound philosophy teach me at once to embark on board of the large, staunch vessel, which I considered perfectly safe, and save the trouble of disembarking and going on board of the small, leaky craft? My judgment teaches me that it would be far more consistent.

I view the doctrine of endless misery as a small and leaky vessel—one that I have no desire to embark on board of in the beginning—one that is fatal in its tendency—one that is spreading death and destruction throughout our land. I have witnessed the most distressing scenes of wretchedness, even in my own connexion, and even within the last few days I have witnessed scenes most distressing. I have seen the raving maniac, driven to insanity by the cruel dogmas of endless misery, lodged in the alms-house or the penitentiary, to linger out a miserable life, with shrieks and groans unutterable. I might mention hundreds of such instances, for they are almost daily occurring.

O may God, in his infinite mercy, forever keep me from embracing that doctrine which is calculated to drive me to commit suicide—to make some mad, and others melancholy—and may the teachers of that soul-chilling and God-dishonoring doctrine soon become more acquainted with the deadly influence it has had on community, and no longer proclaim so dreadful a heresy. Could I be instrumental in the hands of God, as a feeble worm of the dust, to convince you of the error of your ways, and lead you into the green pasture of peace, and beside the still waters, that you might go forth, and appear beautiful as did those upon the mountains who preached the Gospel of peace and published salvation, it would be a source of great joy to me.

You stated that we were bound to believe, or meet the responsibilities of calling God a liar. Let us carefully and candidly examine and see who it is that calls God a liar; and also what we are bound to believe. Does not the sacred historian inform us that "if we believe not the record God hath given of his Son, we make him a liar"? Let us see whether it is the Universalist or Partialist that disbelieves the record, and makes God the liar, and also what this record is. We are informed in St. John's Epistle, that "this is the record, that he hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." "He hath given to us eternal life," not offered, but "given to us eternal life." Now, would it not be perfectly absurd for me to say that I had given you ten dollars, when I had merely made you an offer of it, you might not accept? A gift presupposes a reception, sooner or later. The gift of God is eternal life. Now, a thing cannot be given unless it is already received in the purpose of God. But how far does this gift extend? to the elect only, or to the few belonging to the Orthodox church? Ah! we have something more than man-made assertions to prove the answer. Yes, thanks be to God, we have the testimony of Christ, that God "hath given him power over all all flesh, that he shall give eternal life to" how many! to a part? no—"to as many as the Father hath given him." But how many did he say that the Father had given him? He says that he "hath given all things into his hands"—even "the Heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession." Well, what is the consequence? Why, eternal life is their portion. But how many there are living in sin and rebellion against God, totally unacquainted with the truth that he hath given to them eternal life, and are travelling in the hard and thorny path of iniquity and transgression, where nought but the consumption and the burning ague mark their footsteps, and whose wages is a moral or a spiritual death—where there is no peace, but they are like the troubled sea which cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. Could these poor mortals be made acquainted with the true character of God, and view him as their Father and their never-failing Friend, whose tender mercies are over all his works, and who suffers not the very hairs of our head to fall to the ground without his notice, and who hath assured us that he "will not cast off forever, neither will he be always wroth, lest the spirit should fail before him and the souls which he has made"—who "though he cause grief, yet he doth not afflict willingly, but for our profit, and he will have compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies"—I say, could they gain a thorough knowledge of him, and no longer distrust his almighty arm that is able to subdue all things unto himself, and enter into the enjoyment of his love, they would find that there is indeed joy in believing—not in believing in the endless damnation of a part or nine-tenths of the human family, however—there is no joy in such a belief. "Whosoever readeth, let him understand."

We are informed that "there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance." But if the repenting of one sinner cause joy in heaven, will not the repenting of two cause still more joy than of one, and of three still more than of two? and so I might go on multiplying; and when will there be perfect joy in heaven, if the repenting of sinners be the cause of that joy? Not until every son and daughter of the Adamic race shall be brought to bow to the mild sceptre of Prince Immanuel, and be gathered into the great fold of Christ—when there shall be but one fold and one shepherd—when every prodigal son shall have returned to his father's house, where there is bread enough and to spare.

O, happy thought! blessed immortality! This is the belief that gives joy. This is that true and happy enjoyment which the believer enjoys. Rob me of this belief, and you will rob me of one of the choicest blessings God has given to man. Yes, you will rob me of that which every Christian denomination is continually praying may be true, but yet have no faith to believe that their prayers will be heard—and even turn round, after having prayed for the salvation of all men, as we are in duty bound to do, and call it a damnable heresy to believe that their prayers will be heard and answered. O, faithless mortal, are you aware that that which is without faith is sin, and that without faith it is impossible to please God? And now, why will you continue your long series of prayers to God for the conversion and salvation of a world, without one particle of faith to accompany them? when God hath assured that he "will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth," for "he is of one mind, and none can turn him."

Of one thing I am satisfied—that according to your uncharitable assertions against Universalists, you have but a slight knowledge of their writings, or of the doctrine they inculcate. If you have any knowledge of them, it must be an incorrect one, or else your early education and prejudice outweigh your charity.

One word more and I have done, as the want of room will prevent—that is, in all the long series of letters written by Abel C. Thomas, and addressed to Doct. Ely, I have not discovered, so much as in one instance, the least particle of blasphemy or ridicule. That discussion is now before the world. It is a discussion that I would like to have you examine for yourself; for there one of your main champions has been brought to the work, and has presented his strongest arguments. If either are to be charged with ridiculing, I think the Doctor must be the one—for he would often resort to that, and was frequently checked by Mr. Thomas. I know Universalists are frequently charged with ridiculing and blaspheming religion, when they are only exposing the superstitious notions that mankind have imbibed.

I hope ere long to see you and converse with you face to face. If not, I have the fullest assurance of meeting you, together with a ransomed universe, to swell the triumphant song of Moses and the Lamb, forever and ever.

May these few lines, which have been written with the most friendly feeling, find you enjoying the blessings of health and prosperity.

We are all in good health, and send our best respects to you and yours.

Your truly affectionate brother,

IMMERSION—CAMPBELLISM.

Wadsworth, Ohio, September 9, 1836.

Br. SKINNER—There is a question agitated in this part of the country, whether a man can truly be a follower of the examples of Christ and the apostles if he is not immersed. There is a very numerous denomination here who style themselves Disciples, and are by others called Campbellites. They are generally liberal in their views; but cling with the greatest tenacity to immersion. Now if you will give your views on the subject in full, through the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, you will greatly oblige one, and perhaps many ENQUIRERS.

ANSWER.

The question which our correspondent says is agitated in that part of the country in respect to immersion we answer in the affirmative. We do believe a man can be truly a follower of the examples of Christ and the apostles without being immersed—i. e., literally immersed in water. If he is immersed in the spirit, and temper, and religion of Christ, and performs the great moral, practical and social duties enjoined and practiced by Christ and his disciples, he is truly a disciple and follower of their examples. What though Christ and his apostles were immersed? They were also circumcised—they kept the passover, and observed many other Jewish ordinances—moreover they wrought miracles. Now if no one can be truly a disciple and follower of their example unless he do every thing that they did, then no one can be a disciple and follower of Christ unless he be circumcised, keep the passover, work miracles, heal the sick, raise the dead, etc., because Christ and his apostles did all these things.

In regard to immersion, or water baptism, we would observe, that we consider it, not as a saving or indispensably necessary ordinance in the Christian church of the present day; but as a solemn and interesting ordinance, which is to be used "not for the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience," (1 Pet. iii; 21,) by all such as conscientiously believe it their duty to be immersed. Paul circumcised Timothy, (see Acts xvi: 3,) not because he deemed the ordinance saving or necessary, but in accommodation to the consciences and feelings of others. Immersion is a solemn ordinance—a beautiful emblem or figure of the washing of regeneration, or purification of the soul—of our deadness to sin, through faith in Christ, and resurrection to newness of life and new obedience—a figure of the burial and resurrection of Christ—also of the burial and resurrection of the human family. It was administered, though not in person by Christ, yet by several of his apostles during their personal ministry. St. Paul administered it in a few instances, but thanks God that he had baptized no more of the Corinthians than he did, which would hardly be compatible with the idea that the ordinance was indispensable to discipleship. It has been continued to a greater or less extent in all ages of the church down to the present time: and it probably will be, and we have no objection to its being continued through all future ages of the church by those who deem it a duty.

We once regarded the ordinance of much more importance than we do at present, and received it in person about the time we commenced the ministry of reconciliation. Moreover we have in a number of instances since then administered it to others, and should do it again with pleasure if desired. But then we do not and cannot regard it as does Mr. Campbell and his followers, as the Alpha and Omega of the Christian character, the sine qua non of discipleship. For we know many amiable and devout followers of Jesus, who are, to say the least, as good Christians both in theory and practice, as Mr. Campbell's followers can justly claim to be. And to deny them the name and character of followers of Christ and his apostles, merely because they have not been immersed, would be doing great injustice to them and manifesting an unpardonable lack of that charity which is the bond of perfectness, which is truly the sine qua non in the Christian character, without which we are but as "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

We regard Rev. Alexander Campbell, the founder of the sect of Disciples or (Campbellites) as a man of great talent and still greater tact—of great zeal and perseverance—of good scholarship and Biblical knowledge, generally—and of an ambition as boundless and insatiable as that which prompted Napoleon to enter the dominions of the Russian Autocrat. As the founder of every new sect—although Mr. C. professes his is not a new one, but simply an effort to restore the ancient order of things, or the primitive state of Christianity, an object, by-the-by, professed by Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, Christians, Episcopalians, and all other sects—as the founder, we say, of every new sect must and will have some distinguishing hobby, on which all their followers must ride, would they enter the kingdom, so Mr. C. in common with all the rest has his hobby, viz., immersion. All must mount this or be denied the name of Disciples. However, we will not quarrel with him about this—let him and his followers ride it as long as they please and dismount when they please—we are equally well satisfied. They have done, and are doing some good, we believe, and as our correspondent remarks, "are generally liberal in their views," excepting always their rigid adherence to immersion as the Alpha and Omega of discipleship.

We expect, however, soon to have a discussion with Mr. Campbell, on a more grave and important question than that respecting immersion. In the mean time we wish him and his followers peace and prosperity.

MIRACLES.

Rev. T. Flint, in his prefatory chapters to "The Art of being Happy," translated by him from the French of Droz, speaking of the doctrine of an overruling Providence, says:—"The providence in which I believe, supposes no exceptions, infringements, or violations of the universal plan of the divine government. Miracles only seem such to us, because we see but a link or two in the endless chain of that plan. An ingenious mechanician constructs a clock, which will run many years and only once in the whole period strike an alarm bell. It is a miracle to those who comprehend not, that it was part of the original plan of the mechanician. May we not with more probability adopt the same reasoning, in relation to the recorded miracles, as parts of the original plan of the Eternal?"

The illustration is a very correct one. Miracles are the alarm bells of divine Providence; made rare, because designed to awaken attention when most needed.

TEMPERANCE.

"The Bramble," and "The Hoe to uproot the Bramble," are the titles of two pamphlets on the subject of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. The first is by Br. J. Gregory, of Woburn, Mass. It is (I must say it) uncharitably severe on members of temperance societies generally—as much so, as were his denunciations, but a very few years ago, on all who would not become members of such societies. Pity it is, that men cannot oppose a cause without impugning the motives and discrediting the veracity of its advocates. For such a course injures the very cause it is used to sustain.

The latter is anonymous. I have not seen it, but judging from some extracts given in the Trumpet, it appears to appeal to prejudice to put down Br. Gregory. Some of our Editors also, appear to rely on the same weapon. This is ungenerous, to say the least of it. Prejudice, like jealousy, is cruel as the grave, and puts down not the arguments, but the man. Like persecution, it never can convince, but confirms even the errand in his errors. If the question between the parties cannot be discussed without sacrificing candor and charity, better—far better it had never been noticed at all.

Another error committed by both parties in discussing the question now noticed, deserves censure. Instead of judging an action by its motives, they decide it to be sinful by the practice of our Saviour, his forerunner and apostles, the patriarch and prophets. And as some of these have practiced total abstinence, and others have used wine, they virtually bring some of them into condemnation, let the question be decided which way it may. Thus, one brings David's use of wine, to prove total abstinence to be wrong. The other brings forward Daniel as a real cold water man, and hence argues the use of wine (and he might add of meat) to be very wrong. Remembering, also, that John the Baptist came neither eating meat nor drinking wine, he adduces his example to prove that it is very wrong, indeed, for people to drink any wine (and he might add, to eat any meat)—while the first opposes the practice of Jesus, who came both eating and drinking, (and hence was called a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber,) to the example of the Baptist, to prove total abstinence wrong.

But should not both sides first consider the questions—Were these persons morally divided against each other? If they were, what becomes of Christianity? Did Solomon, David or Jesus sin in eating meat and drinking wine? Or did Daniel, or John the Baptist sin in confining themselves to vegetable diet and cold water? If these are moral actions, in themselves, one party or the other are not what Christians deem them—holy men. Yea, they are not what they deemed each other to be; and the Bible, instead of either side of the question, falls to the ground.

Now, it is evident to me, that neither party sinned—for their actions were not moral in themselves, and were performed with good motives, and furthermore, properly adapted to their several circumstances and wants. Both were right. It is good to eat meat and to drink wine; and it is good to eat vegetables and to drink water—but circumstances should determine not only when you should eat and drink either, but also how much. Excess in either is wrong and injurious. All the Scripture characters thus arrayed against each other, did many things which none of us are bound, in moral duty, either to observe or to avoid. We may, or may not, dress, eat, drink, sleep, walk, sit or stand as they did, our circumstances being the same as theirs were, and be neither sinful nor virtuous in so doing, or in not so doing. Hence, instead of placing these worthy and holy men between the two parties, to be shot at by both, let the parties aim at the fortresses erected by each other. Argument for argument. And instead of imitating them only in actions which are merely important as relates to health and comfort of body, let them also strive to copy their moral excellences. And above all things, "put on CHARITY, which is the bond of perfectness."

THE RECORD.

CONVENTIONS.—The Connecticut Convention met at Berlin, October 12th. Br. Asler Moore, Moderator; and Mrs. S. C. Bulkeley and R. O. Williams, Clerks. Various amendments were made in the Constitution, and the case of Robert Smith, who had been suspended from fellowship, occupied nearly the whole time of the Council. A series of resolutions disapproving his conduct and withdrawing the fellowship of the Convention, were passed by a unanimous vote. [As Mr. Smith complains of the present and former proceedings of the Convention as unscriptural, illiberal and unfair, and intends appealing to the public, if not to the United States Convention, I will merely mention one of the charges preferred against him—viz: that he passed himself off as an unmarried man. He admits the charge; also, that he has a wife; but contends that he is justified by certain circumstances, in not considering himself morally bound to acknowledge himself her husband, or her as his wife—though legally such.] Appointed Br. A. Moore, of Hartford, to preach the next occasional sermon, and Standing Clerk—a committee to prepare a code of by-laws for the Convention, and Hon. Levi Barnes, William Field, Esq., of Stafford, and Ira Ambler, of Danbury, committee of discipline for the ensuing year. Four sermons were delivered. Adjourned to meet at Danbury on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in August, 1837.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Washington Association met at Athens, Ohio, August 27th. Br. T. Strong, Moderator; Br. O. R. Loring, Clerk. Appointed Br. J. J. Hollister, Standing Clerk; E. Deming, B. Roberts, and H. Goddard, committee of discipline; and Br. S. Hildreth, Treasurer. Circular and minutes by Br. J. J. Hollister. Adjourned to meet at McConnellsville, Morgan county, Ohio, on the Saturday preceding the last Sunday in August, 1837.

The Old Colony Association met in New-Bedford, Mass., September 6th. Br. E. Hewitt, Moderator; Br. T. K. Taylor, Clerk. A resolution in favor of a theological seminary was negatived, 7 to 7. Two laymen and five preachers for, and four laymen and three preachers against it.

The Cheshire Association met at Jaffrey, N. H., September 7th. Br. A. Hodsdon, (layman,) Moderator; Br. D. Ackley, Clerk. Eleven preachers were present; six sermons were preached. Adjourned to meet in Westmoreland, N. H., on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September, 1837.

The Richland Association met in Fredericktown, Knox county, Ohio, September 9th. Br. C. Rogers, Moderator; Br. A. A. Davis, Clerk. Appointed Brs. A. Corbin, A. Coleman and J. N. Ayres, committee of discipline; C. Keith, Recording Secretary; A. Coleman, Treasurer; and T. Strong, Corresponding Secretary, for the ensuing year. Received the society in Fredericktown into fellowship, and granted a letter of fellowship to Br. H. S. Marble. Four sermons were preached. Adjourned to meet in Peru, Huron county, on the second Saturday in September, 1837.

The York, Cumberland and Oxford Association met at Poland Corner, Me., September 13th. Br. G. Bates, Moderator; Br. C. C. Burr, Clerk. Chose Br. Z. Thompson, of North Yarmouth, Standing Clerk. Received the societies in Otisfield, Durham, Raymond, and in Lewiston Falls into fellowship. Eleven preachers present; five sermons were delivered. Adjourned to meet in Norway, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1837.

The Penobscot Association met in Exeter, Me., September 27th. Br. A. A. Richards, Moderator; Br. G. Smith, Clerk. Received the four societies in Palermo, Norridgewock, Madison, and Charlestown in fellowship. Chose Br. E. Averill, Standing Clerk. Voted to confine the limits of the Association to Penobscot county, and recommended the formation of a new Association in the limits of Somerset county—another in Lincoln, Waldo and Kennebec counties, and another in Hancock and Washington counties. Returned thanks to the Methodists for opening their meeting-house, and for their hospitality. Adjourned to meet at Eddington, ("Pond village,") on the last Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1837.

The Grafton Association met at Bath, N. H., October 12th. The venerable friend of Murray, Br. Caleb Keith, Moderator; Br. M. Sanford, Clerk. Amended the Constitution so as to embrace Coos county in the limits of the Association. Received the four societies in Warren, Thornton, Northumberland and Lancaster into fellowship. Resolved, That ministers who engage in worldly business and make preaching a secondary consideration, should not receive fellowship. [Query—had they not better resolve that societies that will not render worldly business for a preacher unnecessary, should not be in fellowship? But even then, what is to become of preachers that may be conscientious on the subject of receiving pay? And now, what is to become of us printers and Editors, who rely most on our secular labors for support? "He that provideth not for his own," etc.] Adjourned to meet on the first Wednesday and Thursday in October next.

The Kennebec Association met in Augusta, Me., October 19th. Br. John Bean, Moderator; Br. C. C. Burr, Clerk. A committee reported resolutions in favor of a theological seminary—another against the sectarian efforts of temperance societies—another in favor of establishing an itinerant ministry. Received "the first Universalist [society, I suppose] in Bowdoin into fellowship." Eleven preachers were present, and four sermons were delivered. Adjourned sine die.

CONFERENCE.—The Essex county Quarterly Conference met at Methuen, Mass., October 19th. Br. J. M. Austin, Moderator; Br. O. A. Skinner, Clerk. A resolution in favor of reviving the Expositor was passed. Accounts from various societies are published, which show a favorable state of things.

NEW SOCIETIES.—New societies were formed, September 4th, in Lee; same month in Warren; in Thornton, and in Northumberland, all in New-Hampshire. Also, one in Scituate Harbor, Mass., consisting of twenty-seven members; in Swanville, Me., in September, of thirty members, which will raise one hundred dollars for the support of preaching.

NEW PREACHERS.—The Rev. Mr. Barnum, of Huron county, Ohio, a Baptist preacher of twenty-seven years standing; and Rev. Mr. Tilton, another Baptist preacher of seven years standing, have renounced Partialism, and commenced preaching Universalism. This latter makes the fifth conversion in the ministry, announced within a few months, by the Glad Tidings, of Pittsburg, Pa.

PER CONTRA.—A warning against Benjamin Gass is published in the Sentinel and Star. He was never in our fellowship, except with the society in Cincinnati, which has again withdrawn it from him.

We regret to learn the decease of Br. T. K. Fulmer, of Bucksport, Me., who departed in peace on the 21st ult., deeply lamented by all who knew him. Also, that Br. W. C. Hanscom, of Lamprey River, N. H., has been obliged to suspend his ministerial labors on account of very feeble health. A monster in the form and garb of a Methodist preacher, reported that his illness was caused by debauchery; and when brought up to meet his falsehood, denied having uttered it, thus giving the lie to several respectable persons to whom he told the dastardly falsehood. Community will avow the slanderer.

ORDINATIONS.—Br. J. Nichols was ordained at Hingham, Mass., October 12th. Sermon by Br. Folsom. Br. William West, now pastor of the Universalist society in Cincinnati, Ohio, was ordained in the city of New-York, September 22d, under direction of the committee on ordination and fellowship of the Pennsylvania Convention. The ceremony was performed by Brs. Le Fevre and Rayner, they as well as the candidate having been converts from the Episcopalians.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. Chase from Geneva to East Bloomfield. Br. J. G. Adams from West Rumney to Claremont, N. H. Br. George Hastings to Hyannis, Mass. Br. J. Nichols from Hingham to Watertown and Newton, Mass. Br. J. Gilman from Washington to Concord, N. H. Br. E. R. Crocker from Westfield, Mass., to Elizabethtown, Va. He will preach one fourth of the time in Wheeling. Br. Jasiel P. Fuller from Dana, Mass., to Rushville, Ills. Br. T. K. Taylor from Sippican to Mathepoisett, Mass.

MEETING-HOUSES.—An excellent brick meeting-house is being erected in Woodsborough, Md., where the cause has been but lately introduced, and is flourishing under the labors of Br. G. McCune. Meeting-houses, owned wholly or in part by Universalists, are being erected in Waitsfield, Williamstown and Berlin, Vt.

DEDICATIONS.—The Universalist meeting-house in New-Bedford, Mass., was dedicated September 7; sermon by Br. H. Ballou, of Boston. The house is sixty by forty-six feet, and contains seventy-two pews. Another, a beautiful specimen of architecture, was dedicated at Bath, N. H., October 12th. Sermon by Br. M. Ballou, of Portsmouth.

IREMS.—Br. L. S. Everett has disposed of the Pioneer and Liberalist of Baltimore, Md., to Br. L. F. W. Andrews, late of Charleston, S. C. Br. Andrews is an excellent man and writer, and as the former proprietor and Associate Editor will still be retained as Editors, this change brings a good accession to the corps editorial.

The Star in the East, also gains an accession in the person of Br. Moses Ballou, of Portsmouth, N. H., as Associate Editor. The paper adopts the many-headed system—the Concord head being retained, a head added for Portsmouth, and another for Claremont, whither its former Editor, Br. J. G. Adams, has removed. We hope none of these heads will be without bodies any week; for though heads may be a pleasing study for craniologists and anatomists, our newspaper readers generally pay most attention to the body of the paper. Hitherto the Star has been well provided with a good head, judging from the body of the paper—at least nearly all under the head was excellent. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR.

The paper containing our remarks on the proposed revival of this excellent work, had scarcely gone to press, before an article on the same subject from the pen of Br. J. E. Holmes, came to hand. This article and his pledge to take five copies, will be found in another part of this paper. I cannot but hope his example will be extensively followed in orders for three, five and ten copies each. We will be happy in adding them to our list of subscribers for that work, which as yet, looks rather small, but is increasing. A. B. G.

VICTOR, N. Y.

The society in this place have entered into another engagement with Br. K. Townsend, and will now sustain preaching the whole time. Would that others of our large and able societies in the interior of the State, would arouse themselves, and do likewise. A. B. G.

WARNING.

Br. G. McCune warns the public against a Mr. James Gallion, recently of Franklin county, Pa., who is now travelling in the Western country, professing to be a Universalist preacher. He is not in fellowship, and Br. McCune says there are some circumstances connected with his conduct which need explanation, before he can be received as such, if ever. A. B. G.

BACK NUMBERS.

We can yet furnish back numbers of the present, and of several of the former volumes, at the subscription price; and would be glad to do so in all cases where new subscribers will state they want them.

Our agents will do us a favor, if they will mention this fact to persons about to subscribe, and procure and forward their orders for the back numbers of the present volume especially—or of any of the preceding volumes in our power to supply.

Br. Skinner has a few perfect sets, from the commencement, bound, which he will dispose of at $2.00 per volume—those who want them, had better apply soon, as full sets are very scarce. A. B. G.

APOLOGY.—Ever since my return home I have been too busy in other matters to be able to furnish the precise quality of editorial I could have wished. Illustrations and explanations of Scripture require a clear head, and leisure to look up authorities, to be really what they should be. I will endeavor soon to answer a few requests that have been on hand for some time.

A long and excellent article on the adaptation of Christianity to the various conditions of mankind, from the pen of Br. Smith, has been crowded out of the editorial department this week, to give place to the Record, which would not "keep" as well. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching to-morrow, by Br. MARTIN at Durhamville, at half past one, P. M., and at Clockville in the evening—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. A. F. McCABE at Mohawk village, and at Frankfort in the evening.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. A. WILLIAMS at Oil Creek, Pa.—Br. BODEN at Madison—Br. C. B. BROWN at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening—Br. W. M. DELONG at Burlington Flats—Br. M. B. SMITH at Smyrna village, and at Sherburne village in the evening—Br. GROSH at New-Hartford—Br. WAGGONER at Frankfort, in the evening—Br. BIDDLECOM at Russia, and at Colebrook in the evening—Br. A. F. McCABE at Paine's Hollow.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. A. F. McCABE at Middleville, and at Newport in the evening.

Br. A. G. CLARK will preach in the evenings of Tuesday, December 6th, at Hamden—9th, at Bloomville—13th, at Devenport—15th, Head of the river—16th, at Roxbury—19th, at Bloomville—20th, at Hamden. Also; on Sunday, December 4th, at Mercedith, forenoon and afternoon—Sunday, 11th, at Hobart at 10, A. M., and at Harpersfield at 2, P. M.—and on Sunday, 18th, at Hartsfordsville, forenoon and afternoon.

* * Union, please copy.

Br. E. E. GUILD will preach in the evenings of Thursday, December 1st, at Otsdawa—2d, near Br. Metcalfe's. South Oxford—6th, Upper Lisle—7th, near Br. Taft's—8th, at Panther Hill—12th, at Oxford—13th, at Preston Corners—14th, at Norwich village—15th, Great Brook, South New-Berlin—16th, Mount Upton. Also; on Sunday, December 4th, in the stone schoolhouse near Smithville, during the day, and in the schoolhouse near Br. Crandall's in the evening—Sunday, 11th, at South Norwich during the day, and in the schoolhouse near Br. Wetmore's in the evening—Sunday, 18th, in Unadilla village, forenoon and afternoon.

* * Union, please copy.

CONFERENCE.—A Conference of the Otsego Association will be held at Cedarville on the 14th and 15th days of December next. Full attendance is requested, and ministering brethren are especially invited.

By order of Committee on Conferences.

THE COTTAGE HOME.

If you've ever observed the neat cottage
That stands by a neighboring wood,
The sweet little cottage—the cottage,
I know you would love it—you would.

If you've seen the fine flowers in motion
That wave their rich hues to the eye;
And heard the lone song of devotion
As it rose on the wings of the sky;
If you've seen the fond parents in prayer,
With their children all kneeling, at even,
And heard the kind spirit's desire
At it breathed for the blessings of heaven;
If you've heard the responsive and hearty—AMEN,
You needs must desire to hear it again.

And such is the home—the sweet cottage home,
The kindest of parents is there,
The present is happy and nothing to come
Can mantle its pleasures with care.

O, may I be blessed with a neat little cottage,
The love undissembled—its own;
I ask not for riches, I ask not for lottage,
But grant me, kind Heaven, a neat cottage home.

RETROSPECTION.

BY P. J. WARNER.

Man, the creature of circumstances, varies with the scenes around him. Prosperity and adversity give him a temperament as fluctuating as the air he breathes. I mean not that noble examples of firmness and perseverance are wanting, but in that quality which distinguishes him as a social and reflective being, he assimilates himself to circumstances; these regulate his temperament and give vent to his intellect. Though all men are reflective, and are furnished with the same themes for reflection; yet their conclusions vary with the minds which attempt to investigate, and diversity of opinion arises not from diversity of hypotheses, but from the peculiarities of investigators. Nowhere do we see difference of opinion more marked, than in the estimates of the past.

The past! It is a gallery of paintings viewed in perspective, where the most fastidious palate can be gratified, and the sourest grumbler find enough to lash with censure. Almost all prefer to look on the brighter side, and few are they who cannot find some themes for enlightened enjoyment. The unfriendly thistle is passed by unheeded, while the fragrant rose is plucked with avidity. Is there one, one solitary being, so destitute of every source of happiness, that in viewing the long catalogue of departed years, he can glean from thence nought but pain and anguish? Yes, there is one—'tis the Indian, the proud inheritor of two centuries of accumulated wrong! There he sees, painted in the blood of his ancestry, the fall of his native forests, the desecration of his hunting ground, the sacrifice of the graves of his kindred, and hears the imprecations of rapacious avarice and iron oppression, commingled with the shrieks and groans of his squaw and pappoose, ascending to heaven amid the curling smoke and flames of his kindled wigwam! Retrospection causes him to clench his tomahawk with deadlier grasp, and set his teeth in undying revenge, while love of country heaves his bosom and calls on nature's God to avenge his wrongs of helpless innocence. But the oppressor's arm is upon him, and his proud, noble spirit, like the chafed tiger gnawing his chains, covers to brutal force, and the crushed Cherokee, as he leaves his native soil, leaves all that is near and dear to natural affections, and muttering thick curses on unfeeling Georgia, wends his joyless, tearless way toward the setting sun, and in the dimness of futurity hears the last appeals of violated justice and bleeding humanity, stilled in the mild waves of the Pacific!

Strange though it may seem, memory loves to linger most fondly where adversity has cast her darkest frown. Where ease and pleasure have passed the lethargic year, and fortune smiled propitiously, memory finds little to keep alive its retentive powers and buoy up the soul in retrospective delight. The instructive tale and interesting story dwell not on the bright and poetic morn of Spring, when the songsters tune their pipes, and not an exhalation dims the brightness of the sun, but when the black cloud with its forked tongue and muttering growl, frowns o'er the peaceful vale—when the sea tumbles in agony and nature seems at war with herself. The veteran when recounting the scenes of by-gone days, rolls not of the ease of the camp and the luxury of home, but of walls greeting him with flames and iron hail, of the fierce encounter, the deadly assault, and even, the grapple with the grim monster himself. The hardy mariener seated by his domestic hearth, cares not for days and weeks of listless calm, but the angry storm, the groaning vessel, the fatal wreck. The man, and "to be a man," says the historian, "is more than consul"—the man will sometimes lay aside his dignity, and on the wings of retrospection flit back to his school boy days, and shudder again under the uplifted ferule beating learning into his cranium, or feel the astounding box on his ears setting his senses to rights!

Is the past but the pencillings of fancy or the tissue of poetry? Shall we strike it out, and live and learn from the present for the future? As well blot the sun from the heavens or hurl the earth from her wonted course! Man would sink to his primitive rudeness, and the whole moral world become one stagnant pool of ignorance. Would man be satisfied with his present attainments—be content with one "everlasting now?" The speculator would not; the scholar would not; the lover would not; "the man with the toothache would not." 'Tis by uniting the past, present and future, we form that sum the God of nature designed us to enjoy.

Genius, like a sparkling firework, flashes while it blazes. When the sudden flash bursts on our mental vision, forgetting ourselves, we seem transported to the fiery concave with the light that dazzles—but the blaze vanishes—we are but ourselves—simple men. When the orator's wand touches the sympathies of the heart, like willing captives he leads us along into the wilds of fancy and amazement, till at length like Morpheus from Rip Van Winkle, he flits away and leaves us to grope back through the labyrinths of enthusiasm to the cold shores of reason and reality. 'Tis retrospection that gives the orator his electric power. Interest flags and attention faints when he plods his way through abstract reasonings and moralizings, and when carried too far, we very excusably resign ourselves to drowsy sleep and the better entertainment of pleasing dreams; but let him touch the dead corpse of the past and interest springs on its feet—let him strike the rock of historic treasure, and abundant streams of attention gush forth! The past shows man as he was and is. No incentive genius is wanting to create comedy or tragedy. At the mention of Waterloo, or Lodi, or Marathon, or Thermopylae, rivers of blood, bearing barques freighted with disembodied spirits, seem coursing along to the great harbor of human existence; while the faces of kings playing with crowns as with marbles; the freaks of ignorance and superstition mingled with the gambols of witches on broom sticks, sweeping the dust from the eyes of the stars, with a Gilpin for a driver; furnish ample combustibles to explode wasting melancholy. The Italian, though enervated by luxury and enfeebled by dissipation, indifferent to all that is ennobling to man or dignifying to human nature and prostrate in supine effeminacy at the feet of the pope, can yet be aroused to feelings noble and patriotic, by the rehearsal of the deeds of his ancestry, achieved twenty-three centuries ago. The veterans of our own land—they can tell of the sweets of retrospection. Every returning year that whitens the frost on their venerable heads, and deepens the furrows in their cheeks, adds to the relish of our theme, and makes the shackles of life hang lighter on their aged limbs. The annual celebration of our national anniversary, kindles anew in their bosoms the fires of '76, through the medium of retrospection, and every cannon that pours forth its significant peal on that cherished day, awakens themes dear to their recollection, and they seem to live again those days when they earned the rich legacy they transmit with such liberal hand to a grateful posterity.

But how will this age appear when viewed in retrospect by coming years? An age of literature, an age of enterprise, an age of invention, an age of steam, an age of bumps! an age of ologies and isms; an age teeming with institutions, abandoning the old stale practice of dealing out morality in doses like ipecac, but giving good, plain, wholesome, practical food, such as reason and nature dictates—an age when truth and error can be investigated with impunity—an age when "constitutions spring up like mushrooms, and are kicked over as easy"—an age when republics blaze like meteors, and like them, too, vanish!—an age as abstemious as the learned Pythagoras who forbade his disciples to eat beans, because, forsooth, they were made of the same materials as man!—an age when philosophy has found at least one incontrovertible truth, "that a big head fills a big hat!"

To the student will retrospection bring naught but remorse and regret? Newton would not say so—Franklin would not say so. True it is, youth has its sport and pastime, its follies and vanities; so has age, and he who would freeze the light and prattling current by constantly painting a gloomy and desolate futurity—who would dampen every buoyant and aspiring emotion by perpetually descanting on the emptiness of pleasures and the futility of honors, deserves the isolated cave of the mountain, or the gloom of the impenetrable forest, where no human influence can come within his palying influence. More to be dreaded than the Upas of Java, is the perpetual dreamer of melancholy and despair. Though seats of eminence are not reserved for the patient searcher after classic lore; though useful rather than great must be his motto, yet the past is not without its pleasures; desert though it be, yet here and there a lovely oasis relieves the eye and cheers the heart. Days of gallantry are there—days of innocent mirth are there—there the latent spark of genius first disengaged itself, perhaps in penning the album ballad or comic song. There he sees the lecture room and debating hall, that miniature Congress, where he plotted the work for his riper years to erect. He has left the mimicry for the reality of life, and is better pleased with the imitation than the substance. Newton could quit the stars and fancy himself again tinkering his water clock, or smoking his lady's finger! Franklin could lay aside his lightnings and thunderbolts, and fly his paper kite or blow his dear-bought whistle!

Sweet, then, is retrospection to students who can look back and say with the poet—"We have talked with our past hours—they have borne a good report to heaven."

MARRIAGES.

At Fly Creek, on October 22d, by Rev. T. J. Smith—Mr. JAMES HAMILL, of Massachusetts, to Miss MARY JANE LUMLEY, of the former place.

At Bridgewater, October 26th, by the same, Mr. S. HUBBELL REYNOLDS, to Miss CLARISSA BABCOCK, youngest daughter of Oliver Babcock, all of that place.

In Cuba, September 18th, by William Hicks, Esq., Mr. SAMUEL EGLESTON, of Pike, to Miss SARAH ANN COMSTOCK, daughter of Russel and Rachael Comstock, formerly of Delhi, Delaware county.

DEATHS.

In Victor, September 8th, Mrs. MARY WILMARTH, wife of Ira Wilmarth, aged 67 years. She had formerly been a member of the Methodist church, but embraced Universalism some years since. Of its influence upon her life and conduct—of her life, her example and triumphant death, a feeble and imperfect account is given in the extract from the sermon published in this paper. Her funeral was attended on the 10th, and a large number of surviving relatives and sympathising neighbors and friends participated in the last sad offices of respect. K. T.

In Spring, Crawford county, Pa., September 11th, after an illness of eight or nine days, Captain ELISHA BOWMAN, aged (on the day of his decease) 79 years. Captain B. was originally from Connecticut, but resided for some time in New-Hartford, N. Y., from whence he removed to his late place of residence, then called Beaver. His consort, who died on the 4th of January last, had she lived, would have been 77 years old on the same day that her husband completed his earthly existence and his 79th year. Captain Bowman died in the full assurance of immortality for all mankind—consequently, reconciled to God, and at peace with man. In him the poor, the widow and the orphan ever found a friend. The funeral was attended by Elder O. Barr, of the Christian denomination. B. A.

In Lee, October 25, Mr. JACOB CHASE, father of Rev. J. Chase, of East Bloomfield, aged 85 years. C. U.

In Perrinton, October 17, of consumption, Mrs. MARY EATON, consort of Joshua Eaton, aged 35 years. Mrs. Eaton possessed a strong mind and a benevolent heart. She had been educated in the belief of endless misery; but her faith in that gloomy doctrine had been declining for a number of years, and at length terminated in the firm persuasion that God would have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth. Retaining her reason and speech to the last, she expressed her belief that she would again meet her friends and the whole world, in a state of existence, holy and happy, beyond the grave. To the afflicted relatives and sympathising friends the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer. W. E. M.

THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON,

BY REV. ALFRED PECK.

"For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe. These things command and teach. Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity." 1 Timothy iv: 10-12.

There are many things in the life, and connected with the services of the Christian ministry, that are exceedingly grateful to the affectionate and feeling heart. It is not, however, a life of perfect ease, where servants wait the pleasure and minister to the gratification of every imaginary want; but on the other hand, it is a life and calling filled with important duties; and many of its unceasing labors, are arduous and irksome. The powers of the body and strength of the constitution are brought into requisition to endure the fatigue of itinerancy, the pastoral care of the flock, and the public labors of the desk; and these last, have ruined many worthy and useful members of community. And the mental energies and every power of the mind are called for, to investigate and teach the glorious truths of the sacred pages—to defend the honor of the word from foes without and foes within—to collect and dispense the testimonies of life and love—and to present and enforce those sublime lessons of instruction, so needful to the peace of man. There is a warfare with the superstitions of the age, and the prejudices of many; and a controversy with many vices and evils rendered acceptable by popularity, reproaches from abroad, discouragements at home, and many disheartening circumstances where we expected the most faithful support, and the most cordial co-operation. And I would never advise any one to enter the ministry, and excite the expectations of his fellow-men, or make vows of service in the cause of God; until he sits down and counts the cost—until he has made up his mind to forego privileges and advantages the world deems honorable—until with him truth is paramount to every other consideration. He should commit himself, and his cause, and his all to God, as to his faithful Creator. Possessing a deep and thrilling interest in the honor of God, the power of the Gospel, and the peace of man; he should fortify his soul to bear all the reverses of fortune, and trials which may await him: and however much deceived as to the acceptance of what he deems truth, or disappointed in the result of his labors; he should still trust in the living God.

To illustrate the spirit of these remarks, let us advert to Paul, the author of our text. From what is told of his origin—his education and his influence; we have reason to believe that he possessed advantages above many of his day. Born at Tarsus, a city of Cilicia; still he was educated at Jerusalem under one of the most eminent doctors of the law. His conspicuous standing, popular faith, ardent temper, unparalleled zeal, knowledge of the Scriptures and powerful eloquence; pointed him out to the authorities as a suitable person to suppress the infant but growing cause of Christianity. Having received the necessary instructions and authority for committing Christian men and women to prison, or bringing them bound to Jerusalem; he was employed in these cruel purposes and on his way to Damascus, when he was converted from his enmity, and brought to espouse the cause he was opposing. Convinced of his error, and enlightened as to the knowledge of the truth, with the same ardent feelings and untiring zeal, he enlisted as a Christian teacher, and promulgated the Gospel of life and peace, and counted all things but less, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ. And he who could before his conversion, hold the clothes of Stephen while he was stoned to death, and himself inflict cruel and various persecutions on the humble believers of Jesus, was now prepared to face danger and endure suffering, and even wished himself accursed from Christ, if he might but enlighten the world and establish that Gospel which is the power of God unto salvation. For nearly thirty years he preached the Gospel of the grace of God. He travelled in Arabia, Asia, and Europe; and labored from city to city. He suffered hunger, and thirst, and nakedness, and cold, and fastings, and watchings, and the fatigues inseparable from long journeys, undertaken without any prospect of human succor. He disputed in his own hired house, and taught daily in the school of Tyrannus. And he omitted no opportunity by night or by day, to visit private houses to confirm believers; and to convince unbelievers of the truth. He was stoned and cast out of the city of Lystra for dead. Five times he received of the Jews forty stripes save one. Twice was he beaten with rods by the Romans. Thrice he suffered shipwreck; and a night and a day was he in the deep. At length he was bound with chains, and carried to Rome, where he remained a prisoner two years.

What armed the apostle with fortitude, and sustained him through all this unparalleled series of suffering? He trusted in God. Did he not despair of benefiting the world, and look back upon his Christian ministry, as a life of useless labor and folly, and approximating to the close of his career, a prisoner in chains, regret the stand he had taken? Nay, he congratulated himself with the pleasing reflection; "I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

In the early part of his life, he was bred in the most strictest sect of the Jews—lived as touching the law blameless—and verily thought he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus. But when converted to Christianity, the bold and intrepid spirit and noble energies of his soul, were engaged where a sense of duty called—to impart to the sinful and unhappy children of men, the peace that passeth understanding. Bred a Pharisee, he believed that the spiritual favors of Deity were confined solely to the righteous, who, after death, obtained an easy return to life; while the wicked—the great mass of sinners, were to be confined in an eternal prison. After the enlargement of his views by his conversion to Christianity, he could teach, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Thus, formerly, he believed that God only designed to save the few, who were, like himself, obedient and blameless in the law. Instructed by special visions and revelations from Christ, he learned and taught, that "God our Saviour will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth." Once he believed Christianity to be an imposition and error of that nature, that it tended to lead its votaries, and those whom it should beguile, from every hope of salvation; and could reproach it as injurious to the public weal, and fatal to the soul. But converted, himself would labor and suffer reproach, because he trusted "in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." How great was the change in his mind; but how consistent the actions of his life. While ignorant of the truth, he could teach partial favor from God. Ignorant of its tendency, he could reproach those whom he considered as unbelievers. Brought to the knowledge of the truth, he taught impartial favor, universal grace, that God is the Saviour of all men. He had then no friends to favor, no foes to persecute: but in the spirit of his glorious doctrine, he would rather suffer persecution and reproach, than to reproach and persecute.

As we believe in this cheering and important truth, and in its salutary and healthful influence upon the public hopes and peace, and upon the public morals; we will proceed to lay before you, some doctrinal considerations in its favor, and the moral improvement it requires.

I. As the first consideration of the Christian's hope, and the firmest foundation of his reliance and trust in Deity; we may mention his wise and benevolent designs. God either has designs, or he has none. If he has none, then all the circumstances of man's present temporal being, instead of flowing from the wisdom, and benevolence, or any providence of Deity; are but happy accidents and fortunate casualties. And the Gospel has no system about it, nor end in view. It arose from chance: its favorable aspect is the result of chance; and its termination cannot be known, nor pledged, but depends upon chance. Every Christian, then, to avoid practical atheism, must admit that God has designs. Design, not only implies a plan, but a purpose or intention in the plan. Therefore, in the creation of man with a physical constitution, mental powers, and moral faculties; the divine Being, not only put the machinery in operation, and designed that man should exist; but he must have had some general intention with regard to the ultimatum of that existence. And whatever the result proves, is the manifest intention; and must have been embraced in the original plan. Hence, should the dread catastrophe of living death and endless woe take place: worse, far worse than extinction—a privation of all joy and satisfaction—a despair of all mercy,—and excruciating torture fill every fibre and power of life; it is plain that Deity must have designed this unhappy result of being. This conclusion robs God of every pretension to benevolence or mercy, and consequently to all claims to the homage or affectionate regard of men. This, instead of honoring God, becomes, to use paradox, but Christian diction; and destroys much of the confidence and peace, and hopes and happiness of men.

We find the remark abundantly exemplified within our own observation. What glory, I ask, is reflected on the divine character, by saying the Deity has no absolute designs, or charging him with merciless intentions? See many poor souls, whose belief runs into one of these errors; for themselves, their mind is harassed with doubts; and for their fellow-men they will water their pillows with their tears. O what a weight of woe, in prospect, rests upon their minds! They have no confident reliance upon the mercy and future dealings of Deity: but incertitude and unsatisfied anxiety pain the soul. Not so with those who believe in the benevolence and purposes of Jehovah, as embracing the future welfare and eternal salvation of the whole human family. No, they have a foundation on which to rely, and that foundation is as stable as the pillars of the eternal throne. They trust in the living God.

Admit, what every Christian must, that God has designs, and then let us examine for one brief moment, the nice and critical, but unwise distinction that has been made, between God's foreknowledge and his determination. Is the knowledge of God perfect? Yea; in Scripture language, "Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things which are not yet done." We ask, then, was his design compatible with his knowledge? Or did he design, what he knew could never be; and know that his design must be abortive? Shall we confess God's perfect knowledge, and yet talk of the uncertainty of events and results in what God knew? Shall we admit the certainty, and yet deny the design? Shall we acknowledge the design and yet dispute the certain fulfilment of the divine purpose? We do not wonder that men, who reason thus, or are not capable of reasoning more soundly, should be tossed in perpetual uncertainty, and be distressed with doubts and fears.

Far different was the view and theory of the apostle Paul. When he speaks of the "manifold wisdom of God," he declares it was "according to the eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." He taught man's salvation, "not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." And to the Romans he says, "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son." Let the original intention of this text, be what it may, and its application what you please, it proves that for which we have cited it; that the foreknowledge of God is consistent with his designs and purposes.

Once more on the designs and purposes of the Deity. When God instituted the plan of salvation, and designed to send Jesus into the world to rescue, save and deliver our race from the misery of mortality, and the thralldom of sin; was it to carry out and complete the original, and perfect, and only design of God—of happiness as the end of our being? Or was it a new and necessary design, as a matter of expediency, to remedy an evil unprovided for, and to make the best of thwarted designs and broken purposes? If we allow that the Deity makes trials, suffers defeats, and resorts to new plans—what confidence and trust can we ever feel, in the plans of him whose purposes have been known to fail? Allow that the gift of our Lord and Saviour was agreeable to the original design of God, as to the end of our existence; and we are under no necessity of admitting a failure or frustration of any purpose of the Most High. When we learn that God not only "declared the end from the beginning," but says "my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure," and worketh all things after the counsel of his own will—that none can stay his hand—then we learn the faithful saying, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners—gave himself a ransom for all—and God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of this glorious and eternal truth—we can then, feel to rely on the security of our happiness; trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those who believe; and rejoice in hope of his glory. On this view of the plan of salvation, all are embraced in the good designs of God; and we discover that "God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." And notwithstanding all the obstacles that impede man's recovery, and foes to his peace, he shall come off conqueror, and more than conqueror through him that loved him; for it is written, "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord," and that Jesus "shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." "We see not yet all things put under him"; but that need not shake our confidence; "for we see Jesus who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man." Thus we see the work in progress, according to the gracious design. This satisfied Paul, and it should satisfy every believer, that the end is certain, so that with the author of our text, he can trust in the living God as the Saviour of all men.

Thus having thoughts of peace, and designs of mercy as the end and object of our being; God designed a Saviour as a part of the original plan to carry that purpose into effect. Having designed a Saviour, he spake unto the fathers by the prophets, and revealed this glorious purpose of his love. These prophecies were fulfilled when Jesus came to save his people from their sins, and give himself a ransom for all men. When "the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, with songs of everlasting joy upon their heads—when they shall obtain joy and gladness and sorrow and sighing shall flee away;" then, the design of God shall have been accomplished. If, therefore, we deny absolute designs to Deity, we shake all confidence in his mercy, and fill the heart with doubts and fears. But if we admit impartial designs, we can rejoicingly trust in him. And salvation being not according to our works, but according to his purposes and grace; he is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.

II. Let us present some farther Scripture testimony of the fact, expressed in the text, that "God is the Saviour of all men." When the divine Saviour was about to make his appearance among men, he was announced by a heavenly messenger to the shepherds. "Behold I bring unto you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people; for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour which is Christ the Lord." Let us analyze this heavenly declaration, that we may learn its import and extent. It is first declared, "Behold I bring unto you, good tidings of great joy". In the second place it is affirmed, that the same good tidings which is brought to them, shall be and extend to all people. It is important for us in the third place, to inquire and learn, in what consists the good tidings proclaimed by angels to men? "Unto you is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Is God the Creator of that which he never created—the Preserver of that which he does not preserve? Is Christ the Saviour of those whom he never saves? The good tidings to the shepherds consisted not in the fact, that Christ would become their Saviour, if they would comply with known or unknown conditions to make him so; but in the simple fact that he was their Saviour. And if his being a Saviour implies deliverance or salvation, all to whom he is Saviour, must enjoy salvation. And if the good news above expressed be unto all people, then all people will be saved, and the doctrine is true, according to the above argued design, and according to the will of God; "For God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth."

This angelic announcement, is in perfect conformity with the design of God in the creation. Let us see how subsequent facts and declarations, accord with this heaven-taught truth. Although the world was lost as to innocence, alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in them, and involved in guilt and misery; yet the Saviour teaches the object and result of his labors, in the following language. "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." To save was as much an object of his coming, as to seek. He says to man, "seek, and ye shall find." Will he seek and not find? Or finding, will he not save? In another place the Saviour teaches, "For as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up." The brazen serpent was lifted up upon a pole, and was typical of the lifting up of Christ upon the cross. And as the poor wounded sufferers in the wilderness, were healed by the type; so should the moral maladies of man be healed by the anti-type. Again says Jesus, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Thus do we learn, that he came to seek the lost—being lifted up, he will draw all men unto him and by virtue of the cross will he save them. Well might the apostle Paul teach the doctrine of the salvation of all men, for the messengers of God from heaven, and Jesus our divine Lord, had taught it before him.

Jesus had not only taught it in the foregoing declaration, and in allusion to the above figure; but in the following explicit instruction. "All that the Father giveth to me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will who hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." To ascertain the extent of this, we read—"Ask of me and I will give thee the Heathen thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth, thy possession." And to show that they were received, the Saviour declares, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father." Again he says, "thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." The only import of these testimonies, is that all mankind, the Heathen and uttermost parts of the earth, were given to Christ of the Father, and that they shall come to him in such a manner, that he will in no wise cast them out. For this is the Father's will which he came down from heaven to do, that he should lose nothing of all this gift, but raise it up at the last day. For the accomplishment of this vast labor, God gave all power into his hands, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father had given him. This gift, and these qualifications, were bestowed upon the Son for the express purpose of performing the design and will of God. Could Jesus receive the plaudit, "well done, good and faithful servant," if, possessing all the necessary powers, he failed to seek, and save, and raise up at the last day, God's ample gift? And how could the declaration be verified, "I have finished the work thou gavest me to do"? The apostle speaks of the will of God, which Jesus came to do, in the language following. "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." Here, the substance of the foregoing argument is embraced; and the doctrine of the text established as the will of God, which he had purposed in himself according to his good pleasure.

Let us take another view of the subject.—To accomplish the designs of God, and will of the Father, thus sung by angels and taught by Jesus Christ; the blessed Mediator gave himself a ransom for all men—tasted death for every man; and thus all mankind are bought with a price. The consideration here to be presented is, whether this purchased possession, or any part or moiety thereof, can be distrained and held in perpetuity, in the service or bondage of another; without the hope of rescue or possibility of release, and no injury or injustice be done to the purchaser? Should your purchased possession be seized by fraud or violence, and yourself deprived of its enjoyment; no argument, not even a theological one, would convince your mind, you was not wronged! By what known or unknown power of logic, then, are we to arrive at the conclusion; that a vast majority of the human family shall be seized by an unconquered and unconquerable enemy, and confined in a prison of fire, and he who purchased them by his own blood, suffer no wrong? Will he receive the small portion he is enabled to obtain, as the travail of his soul, and be satisfied?—The object of Jesus in all his labor and his mission, is expressed as follows: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." What argument will convince the mind unsubdued by the powers of darkness, that the works of the devil may, and can, and will remain to all eternity; and yet the purpose of the mission be accomplished?—But the same object is expressed elsewhere, in different language. "Forasmuch, then, as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." How plain is the idea communicated, that Jesus passed through and suffered death, that he might destroy the devil, that has the power of death. And equally as clear, is the following idea—that he endured death and engaged in the destruction of the devil.

to deliver the partakers of flesh and blood, from the bondage to which they were subject all their lifetime. Shall we maintain that Christ has suffered death, but the devil remains undestroyed; and the children of humanity shall endure his still more cruel bondage and imprisonment, world without end? and yet that he hath finished the work that was given him to do, and done all things well? And shall we then ask the assent of your mind to these manifest absurdities? What! the devil and his works to be destroyed, and yet remain as long as their destroyer? What! man to be delivered from bondage, and yet his bondage, increased, shall remain to all eternity; and Jesus be adored and lauded as his deliverer? Let us apply one of the wise and prudent sayings of Jesus. "What man going to build, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he be able to finish? Or what king going to make war with another king, sitteth not down and consulteth, whether he be able with ten thousand, to meet him who cometh against him with twenty thousand?" Thus our Saviour taught, and did he not thus practice? Then when he endured the cross and despised the shame, he had before him the joy of sitting down at the right hand of God, having raised up the whole gift of the Father, and lost nothing; to see of the travail of his soul with divine satisfaction, and be enabled to say, "Behold, I and the children which thou hast given me."

[Concluded in our next.]

KINDNESS.....No. 1.

"For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink."

There are duties which may be denominated indeterminate, as they are not founded in legal right. They are founded in humanity and sympathy, and are called by various names; such as charity, mercy, compassion. It is not a little remarkable, that many persons who are legally just and upright, seem in reality to want these virtues; while, on the other hand, others who have no very imposing traits of common virtue, possess these in great perfection. This may be seen in almost every neighborhood. One, punctilious in the observance of every legal requirement—exact in the performance of all things of which the law takes cognizance—nice to a farthing, in the fulfilment of every engagement, the omission of which involves a penalty; at the same time will not hesitate a moment to take advantage of the poor and unfortunate; and, in the words of the poet,

"With one hand put a penny in the urn of poverty,
And with the other take a shilling out."

Another, careless or regardless of legal consideration, indifferent to the performance of contracts made with his neighbor, involved in numberless lawsuits, on account of his total disregard of legal right, and perhaps guilty of actual crime; is, at the same time, alive to the distresses of his fellow-creatures—sympathetic in his nature—weeps with those who weep—charitable to the poor and needy, and ever ready to assist the unfortunate.

But it is when these two obligations, legal right and moral principle, are blended in the same individual; when a punctual regard for the laws of our country and the laws of God, are fixed in the heart, and manifested in the life, that we see the whole duty of man exemplified in the attainment of that perfect character which is the height of human excellence. It is not our object, however, to enter into a disquisition of the distinctive particulars which subsist between these virtues. It shall be our business in a few successive articles, to speak of duties which our Saviour particularly recommended, and which evidently comprise that righteousness which exceeded that of the Scribes and Pharisees. We shall appropriate the term kindness to designate these indeterminate duties.

The particulars noticed in the language of Christ, at the head of this article, imply want. Now, in strictness, no person can be said to be in want, who can provide for himself. It is when the "barrel of meal, and cruse of oil" have failed; when all the springs of joy have dried up, and when ghastly famine applies its energies to its pale and meagre subjects—then kindness comes in angel form, in mitigation of human woe. It is when our own resources, like the prodigal's, are exhausted, that we realize our want, and feel the kindness of the hand that administers relief.

Let us contemplate a scene.—On the one hand, want with all its haggard forms and its concomitant sufferings, has seized as its prey, a human being. Hunger, with its desolating power comes on, enervates and brings to emaciation his once robust form, and paralyzes every function of the body. Thirst, with its keen and unwelcome attendants, seizes his vitals, and dries up the last fountain whence spring the least of pleasurable emotions, and leaves him, as it were, upon the burning sands of Africa's thirsty shores, where death stares in the face the victim of this barren and waterless waste. On the other hand, view some agent of Heaven's bounty, whose bosom is warmed with kindness, and whose hand is ever ready to relieve the wants of his suffering fellow-beings. In contemplating such a scene—hunger, thirst, want, on the one hand; kindness on the other, all our faculties are suspended for the result. We can almost suppose superior beings engaged in contemplating this scene.

Hark! 'Tis the voice of mingled joy and gratitude—joy for the reception of the benefaction, and gratitude to the giver. As the fountain of gushing waters to the weary and thirsty traveller upon the desert plain of Sahara, so is the kindness of one of the sons of benefaction to the child of want. As the joy of the weather-beaten mariner, at the sight of his home and of his friends, so is the feeling of gratitude which gushes from the full heart of the recipient of kindness, at the moment of his relief. And this one moment may thus become one of the happiest of human existence. Nor is it confined to the recipient alone, the giver catches the delightful impulse, and feels "that it is more blessed to give than to receive."

DICK ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF SOCIETY.

I have lately read this excellent work, and I must say that I have seldom read any book with more pleasure. The spirit that directed the pen of Br. J. M. Austin, when he said "Enlighten the people, ENLIGHTEN THE PEOPLE," appears to have been ever glowing in the author's bosom. In one or two short paragraphs he clearly expresses his faith in the dogma of endless misery; but it is surprising that a believer in that doctrine can so constantly breathe the atmosphere of Universalism, and that, too, in such purity and perfection: indeed I am persuaded that he is not a Partialist, only once in the while, when he happens to think of the old creed; and even that appears to have occurred to his mind but just once, during the writing of the whole book; and there, speaking of the renovation of a wicked man on entering the immortal state, he says, "It would be contrary to any thing we know of the moral government of God: it would strike at the foundation of all religion and morality"—and after adding a few words more to the same effect he takes his leave of this subject and launches out on the broad ocean of universal philanthropy, embracing in the ardor of benevolence every kindred, and tongue, and people under heaven; binding all together by that imperishable cord, the illimitable paternity of our common Creator. I have only room to give one or two short extracts as a specimen of his style, when his mind is engrossed with this delightful theme. On page 332, he says,

"When knowledge is conjoined with a recognition of the Christian precept, 'thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' its possessor will easily be made to enter into such considerations as the following, and to feel their force:—That all men, to whatever nation or tribe they belong, are the children of one almighty Parent, endowed with the same corporeal organs, the same intellectual powers, and the same lineaments of the divine image —that they are subject to the same animal and intellectual wants, exposed to the same accidents and calamities, and susceptible of the same pleasures and enjoyments—that they have the same capacities for attaining the higher degrees of knowledge and felicity, and enjoy the same hopes and prospects of a blessed immortality."

"How various, then, the ties, how sacred and indissoluble the bonds which should unite men of all nations! Every man, whether he be a Jew or a Greek, a Barbarian or a Scythian, a Turk or a Frenchman, a German or a Swede, a Hottentot or an Indian, an Englishman or a Chinese, is to be considered as our kinsman and our brother; and, as such, ought to be embraced with love and affection."—p. 333.

He speaks in the most unsparing language against all party spirit and sectarian divisions among Christians, and as a remedy for these evils, he says, "we must discard the greater part of those systems of divinity, and those polemical writings and controversies, which have fanned the flame of animosity, and which have so frequently been substituted in the room of the oracles of God." He says we must discard "the technical terms of polemical theology, such as trinity, hypostatical union, sacraments, etc." (I suppose the etc. might well include endless misery.) "and, in our discussions, especially on mysterious and doubtful subjects, adhere as closely as possible to the language of the inspired writers." In very deed! Should all Limitarians learn to feel, to speak, and to write like this philanthropist, what would become of the doctrines of Partialism? They would be numbered with things that have been, but are not. Lord, hasten the happy time!

The work is calculated to exert a powerful influence for the promotion of science, morality and pure religion. I wish I could see it in the possession of every family.

TO TRAVELLERS'S.

Messrs. EDITORS—As your beautiful city is the great thoroughfare to and from the West, your public houses therefore become subjects of interest to the traveller. I hence feel impelled by a sense of public duty, to make known the following occurrence.

A few weeks since I called at "Bagg's Hotel," now occupied by one Churchill; and for the mere use of one bed-room and one bed, from 4 o'clock in the afternoon until four o'clock next morning, he, (or his bar-keeper, with his knowledge) made out a bill, which I paid, of two dollars and fifty cents! This, to me, had the appearance of barefaced extortion. Those travellers who desire to pay such bills, will doubtless continue to patronize that house. But those who possess no such inclination, I have no doubt, will avoid it. I have the bill still in my possession; and it can be left at your office for inspection if necessary.

A TRAVELLER.

The above has been on hand for some time. The writer is well known to us to be a man of undoubted veracity; and however disagreeable it may be to record such occurrences as the above, we do not feel at liberty to connive at the conduct exposed, by refusing it a place in our columns.

ANECDOTE.

About the year 1789, my father lived in Williamstown, Mass. One day, being at the house of the settled minister of the parish, he heard the following conversation between a parishioner who came with a load of hickory tops which grew on open land, as the payment of his minister tax, and the clergyman.

Parishioner.—How do you like the wood?

Minister.—Oh it is such crooked stuff—when cut up there will be little of it.

P.—Very well; let one thing answer the other. Remember, it was crooked stuff I had of you; and if it was made straight, there would be much less of it than there is of the wood!

ADEQUATE RETRIBUTION.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

"For she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

Calmet, a French monk, who has furnished the world with an invaluable dictionary of the Bible, which has been reprinted with extensive amendments, improvements, and retrenchments, under the supervision of professor Robinson, of Andover, gives us the following interpretation of this text. He says, "for a right understanding" of this passage, "read the counterpart—that which fits, the commensurate quantity, extent, or number of her sins; that which is adequate, all things considered, as a dispensation of punishment. This passage does not mean twice as much as had been deserved, double what was just, but the fair, commensurate, adequate retribution." How this interpretation can be made to agree with the professed opinions of those who have endorsed it, concerning eternal rewards and punishments, subsequent to a day of general judgment in a future state, I confess my utter inability to show. If the punishment which Jerusalem had received of the Lord's hand, were commensurate in quantity and extent to the number of her sins; if, as our author says, it was an "adequate retribution," then, may, we not inquire, if endless misery would not be unfit, unjust, and inadequate. There is certainly an inconceivable disproportion between the limited punishment inflicted upon the Jews, which in this case, is said to be a "commensurate quantity" and an "adequate retribution," and the popular sentiment which contends for an eternity of misery, as being no more than an adequate punishment for their transgressions.

Now, it will be observed, that the text states two things. First, that Jerusalem hath received of the Lord's hand an adequate retribution, and, Second, that this punishment was not the quantity inflicted for any one particular sin, but "for all her sins." The first particular proves that the Lord judges and recompenses his people in the earth, and consequently, does away all necessity for a day of judgment in a future existence. The moment, that we establish it as fact, that men are justly rewarded for all their sins in this world, it supposes that they have been judged worthy and deserving of such punishment. Why should there be no peace to the wicked? why should the way of the transgressor be hard? and the pains of hell afflict the sinner? if God has not judged them deserving of the punishment they receive. And, if God does judge and reward his people in time, it certainly becomes the duty of every faithful steward to vindicate this truth.

The second particular assures us, that the Lord inflicted upon Jerusalem an "adequate retribution" for all her sins. The history of this people shows that their sins were as numerous and as aggravated as that of any other nation under heaven. Consequently if it were possible to inflict a commensurate punishment upon them for all their sins, it is also possible to inflict a just retribution upon all men in the earth. And it is not only possible, but morally certain in my mind, that such is the fact, as "God is no respecter of persons." But notwithstanding this view of the divine government appears plain and true to me, I am satisfied that it does not appear so to all others. There is no sentiment opposed with greater ardor, or treated with greater caution than this. Hence, frequent objections are raised by some, and a silent cautious policy pursued by others. Among the objections, I am inclined to consider only one, which I judge is thought to be as invulnerable as any.

"Suppose," says the objector, "that a man intentionally murders his neighbor, and then immediately commits suicide, when and where will he receive an adequate retribution?" Before I answer this objection, I would make one or two suppositions. First—Suppose that I am unable to reconcile this statement with what the Scriptures teach concerning the punishment of the sinner in the earth, does my inability to solve and harmonize a human supposition, disprove, or invalidate that truth which God has revealed? I envy not that man's faith in the inspiration of the sacred Scriptures, nor his reverence for the Bible, who is intent on suppositions designed to impeach what he otherwise acknowledges to be its express teachings. He should first assent to that which is real, and then he may attend to that which is fictitious; but never will the time come to prefer the latter to the former. Second—Suppose, (and I challenge the world to disprove it,) that the man who committed the murder and suicide, was insane, that he had not the exercise of his reason, and knew not what he was doing, how much punishment would he deserve, in justice and equity? That there ever was a person possessing a sane mind, that destroyed the life of another, and then his own, immediately, I do not believe. The simple act of suicide, itself, would be sufficient proof to my mind, that the person was insane; and, therefore, not morally, or justly accountable for the deed. And it should not be overlooked, that as we cannot know the motives, or the guilt of any sinner, so we cannot judge in righteousness the amount, or extent of the punishment he may deserve; and this circumstance alone, should teach men to be more humble, than to assume opinions opposed to what God has revealed, because their limited capacities cannot comprehend the whole plan of the divine administration.*

* As staunch believers in punishment after death, whether limited or unlimited, do not admit that the Bible teaches that all sins are punished on earth, or in this life; but expressly declare that, either directly or indirectly, it teaches that the punishment of some sins will be in a future state, this remark cannot be considered by them as embracing them; but only those who believe as does Br. H. respecting the express teachings of the Bible, and yet would evade its testimony with suppositions. All such, certainly do show very little respect for the Bible. A. B. G.

LETTER TO REV. MR. HEALY.

DEAR SIR—Having for some time past been confined to my room through sickness, and hearing that you were to preach at Cox's chapel on Sunday, September 26th, I felt an inclination to avail myself of the opportunity offered of joining you in the worship of our common Father. I was well aware that preachers of a Limitarian creed in general, seeing in their congregations individuals who believe in the unbounded and immutable love of God, take occasion to injure their feelings by charging them with holding opinions at once unscriptural and untrue; but I felt confident from a previous knowledge of your general character, that I should be permitted to sit under the droppings of the sanctuary and feel my soul refreshed with the bread of eternal life, without being insulted, and while we together bowed before the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and you were addressing the divine Majesty, I felt persuaded that "neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature" should be able to separate me from the love of God. But to my great astonishment, I soon heard you announce from the sacred desk, that Universalists believed that the wicked enter heaven in their sins, and that their doctrine was calculated to lead men into error here, and destroy both body and soul eternally when time with them was no longer. And furthermore, you asserted that you had been a Universalist—were acquainted with that doctrine—and had advocated it until your eighteenth year, when you were changed by the spirit of God.

What, sir, was I to understand by these unwarrantable assertions? Either that you were then, and still are, totally ignorant of that doctrine which you, in the blindness of your zeal, was making efforts to annihilate! or that you spoke without any regard to truth. If, as you stated, you were nurtured and brought up in the principles of Universalism, I shall be so candid as to tell you, that your early and religious instructions were much neglected; otherwise you must have altogether departed from the truth—for nothing could strike me with greater astonishment, than to hear from your mouth such unfounded assertions against that religion which teaches and inculcates the principle of God's unbounded goodness and unchangeable love. But, sir, I discover it as no new thing for the enemies of truth to speak after this manner; yet this kind of sophistry will not do, for the weakest capacity can detect it; and, allow me to say, that the members of your own church do not place it to your credit. Give me leave to inquire if it would not be more in accordance with your duty as a minister and district chairman, and more compatible with divine revelation, to have employed your time and talents in healing the schisms and restoring peace to your distracted church, instead of throwing arrows of malevolence and envy at an inoffensive and persecuted people? Already there are five denominations of people in this Province, claiming exclusively the name of Methodist. A war of extermination is, in consequence, waged, and will continue to rage, if lucre is sought instead of truth. Let conscience answer, if it would not be far better, and if your labors would not be more acceptable in the sight of God, had you pointed out the errors of your own people, and exhorted them to put far from them the evil thing, and with St. Paul have said, "let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice, and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you?" If ignorance is in reality your excuse, lest you should again commit the like error, I will briefly state for your consideration, a few prominent features of the Universalist belief.

As respects sin and its inevitable punishment, they believe "the wicked are like the troubled sea whose waters cast up mire and dirt;" that "there is no peace to the wicked;" that "he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong that he doeth," and "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." This, sir, they do believe, and this they ever have believed, notwithstanding your assertions to the contrary.

Delicacy would doubtless have prevented my writing to you, was I not in some measure constrained to do so. I stated in the foregoing part of this letter, that I had been for some time ill; and indeed, I was then so weak, that while riding to the meeting I nearly fainted several times; the service was rather long, so that I felt very much fatigued before the conclusion, and on seating myself in the waggon to return home, I became very faint. Some persons present seeing me in this situation, concluded that the sermon I had just heard was the cause thereof. But I affirm, I know not an individual, who holds a faith similar to that you asserted to be Universalism; why then, should my feelings undergo so great a change? However, the hue and cry is gone forth, and the report is industriously spread, but thank Heaven! I have not so learnt of him who is willing and able to save, as to tremble and faint at the word or frown of a mortal.

Judging from what I saw of your zeal, I conclude that your anxious soul is longing for an opportunity to oppose this supposed heresy, and feeling a desire to gratify you, as there is not at present a professed minister of our faith in these parts, I offer myself to meet you in public debate—the time and place to be mutually agreed upon—the subject for debate to be, Is endless punishment taught in the Scriptures of Divine truth? I conclude, praying that when you again stand up to minister in holy things, that spirit which guideth into all truth may so direct your mind into the knowledge and love of God, that you may embrace the whole world as children of one common Father. An answer to this will be expected as soon as possible.

Respectfully yours, MARY ANN CHURCH.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the New-York Association of Universalists for the year 1836.

Met according to adjournment at North Salem, Westchester county, N. Y., on Wednesday, the 5th ult., and proceeded to business by choosing Br. H. Scott, Moderator, and Br. L. C. Marvin, Clerk.

United in prayer with Br. N. Dodge. Read the proceedings of the last session of this body. Voted to approve them.

Resolved, That this body appoint a committee on letters of fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year.

Whereupon Brs. C. F. Le Fevre, S. J. Hillyer and L. C. Marvin were appointed said committee.

The committee of discipline report that no cause of complaint has come before them during the year past. Report accepted.

Resolved, That the ministering brethren present, not members of the Council, and any lay brethren who shall be introduced by any clerical or lay delegate, be invited to join in the deliberations of the Council, but not to vote.

Resolved, That this Association appoint a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

Whereupon Brs. Sawyer, Le Fevre and Marvin were appointed said committee.

Adjourned to meet on Thursday morning.

Thursday morning. Met according to adjournment.

Resolved, That this body appoint delegates by which to be represented in the next session of the New-York State Convention to be holden in Albany, in May, 1837.

Whereupon chose Brs. Le Fevre and Marvin, clerical, and B. Ellis and W. G. Burr, laymen, delegates to said Convention, with power to appoint substitutes.

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Standing Clerk to furnish the delegates to the State Convention with proper credentials.

Resolved, That when this Association adjourns, it adjourn to meet at Huntington, L. I.

Appointed Br. C. F. Le Fevre to deliver the occasional sermon before the next session of this body, with power to appoint a substitute.

After some little deliberation the following resolution was passed unanimously.

Resolved, That the Constitution of this Association be so far amended as to leave the time of its annual sessions with the Standing Clerk, who will appoint as near the usual time as possible, but with especial regard to that period when we may avail ourselves of moon light.

Appointed Br. L. C. Marvin to prepare the minutes of the session for publication and accompany them with a circular.

After uniting in devout and ardent prayer with Br. Le Fevre, adjourned according to a former vote. H. Scott, Moderator.

L. C. Marvin, Clerk.

Ministering brethren present.—C. F. Le Fevre, New-York; S. J. Hillyer, North Salem; S. C. Bulkeley and H. Lyon, Danbury, Conn.; L. C. Marvin, Newark, N. J.; N. Dodge, New-London, Conn.

Evening.—Prayer, Br. Dodge. Sermon, Br. Dodge, Mark xvi: 15, 16.

Thursday morning.—Prayer, Br. Marvin. Sermon, Br. Lyon, Luke xix: 10.

Afternoon.—Prayer, Br. Bulkeley. Sermon, Br. Le Fevre, 1 Kings iii: 27.

Evening.—Prayer, Br. Marvin. Sermon, Br. Dodge, Eph. v: 26.

CIRCULAR.

To all the children of God, the New-York Association of Universalists sendeth wishes of health, right teachings and peace.

Brethren—The Lord has seen fit according to the multiplicity of his mercies to permit us again to assemble to mingle our prayers and supplications for the upbuilding of our beloved Zion. We thought it was good to be there. We felt our strength renewed, our hopes confirmed, and our faith we trust received assurance from the testimony of inspired truth. All things were done decently and in order, and we hope to the acceptance of the great Master of assemblies. No jarring sound, no note of discord was heard to mar our peace, or blight our joy. Owing to the extreme inclemency of the weather but few were present from a distance, and our meetings were not so numerously attended as they would otherwise have been. Nevertheless there were many present who waited upon the Lord in faith, in hope and in love. The services of the sanctuary were serious and impressive, and the spirit of rejoicing was in our midst. And it did our hearts much good to be permitted to take the warm hand of kindly greeting, and to part "in the unity of the spirit and the bonds of peace." May Zion's God permit us once more to shake hands in a universal convention above, where parting never comes, and where every man shall be a priest at the altar of heaven forevermore. Amen.

UTICA, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1836.

ADAPTATION OF THE GOSPEL TO THE CONDITION OF MANKIND.

1. It will readily occur to every one who reflects on the subject, that the Gospel is now—what it ever has been, and must continue to be—the same as when first announced to the Hebrews by the Son of God. In the meantime, it is certain that during the process of eighteen centuries, the human mind and the social habits of man have experienced and exhibited every modification of barbarism and refinement. The social and mental condition of the whole race, have been in a perpetual ebb and flow—constantly changing, and as constantly assuming new and distinct features. Where the grossest and most profound darkness and ignorance once held their empire, science and the arts have long made their home, and cheered all classes with their mild and beneficent influence. Where the sturdy barbarian bent his war bow, the shepherd tends his flock, or the husbandman gathers his harvest in peace—the mechanic quietly pursues his calling, or the merchant counts his gains. And where crime in all its forms of craft, and violence, and blood, was the sport of rude and lawless tribes, the influence of wholesome laws is seen and felt in personal security and the protection of individual rights and possessions. The degraded and brutalized slave of an iron tyranny that he could neither evade nor resist, has been transformed into the independent and intelligent citizen—and where he once bowed before a grim and blood-stained idol, he now adores the living and true God.

But while these beneficent changes have been progressing to their results, a series of events have been as constantly operating of a far different nature. Where science and civilization once diffused their comforts and blessings, a wild and untutored race has risen up—strangers alike to social order, domestic happiness, and mental cultivation. Where astronomy had its birth, the very heavens have become dark—and neither sun, nor stars are regarded for the purposes of science. The valiant Ptolemies have been dethroned by the enthusiastic Ottoman; and the numerous and civilized nations of the East, have dwindled into semi-barbarous hordes of voluptuous Mussulmen. The speculative and philosophical Greek, no longer pursues or enjoys his theories, his learning, or his taste; but has sunk into a mere servant of servants; the poor—the oppressed victim of pride and power. The lordly Roman is no more. His land groans under the burden of the ruins of his former splendor and greatness—while his nation presents a still more deplorable ruin, in its intellectual degradation. And Italy, though still the land of music and statuary, is yet spell-bound by a habitual servitude to the requirements of an all-controlling superstition. The very soul must be the subject of some unwonted energy, before its dungeon can be enlightened by the torch of freedom. And liberty—precious in all things, but most precious in religion—is reserved for some more deserving, but future generation.

The Gospel claims an appropriate application of the same general principles and maxims, to the mental condition of every human being throughout all time. But the distance between the simple child of nature, and the cultivated man, is immense, while the intermediate range of intellectual attainments admits of an almost infinite number and variety of gradations. To reach all these, with a few comprehensive rules, suppose that they are of the most simple and intelligible nature. And this fact should forever explode the idea, of any difficulty in understanding or explaining whatever is of importance for man to know respecting the Gospel. This is the basis of the admission, that the fundamental and essential doctrines of Christianity are so obvious that they can be comprehended by the lowest capacity, and applied by the most obtuse understanding. On no other possible supposition, can the Gospel be of general use to mankind. On any other—instead of a system of divine benevolence, it becomes one of partiality and cruelty, in all its features, bearings and purposes—leaving an overwhelming majority of mankind to endless conjectures, as, to whom it applies, and to indefinable wretchedness respecting human destiny.

The particular principle of the Gospel which bears upon this subject, is benevolence. This will soften, and refine, and purify the feelings and affections of the rude and barbarous; while its influences will be equally applicable to every successive step of the progress of mental improvement. And when mind shall have received the last ray of enduring light, and the full measure of knowledge shall have been poured into the human soul, benevolence will constitute the bond which shall bind it in the bundle of life and assimilate man with the Deity.

The age in which Jesus lived and taught—in which his disciples planted the Gospel in different and distant lands, was one in which hatred of strangers and enemies was cherished, injuries retaliated, and the worst passions of our nature freely indulged. By the Gospel, men were taught to overlook or forgive injuries, to cherish the benevolent affections, and to carry them out to their results in every action of life. It is true that this would not at once transform the unlettered into men of science—but it would, and it did convert the wise and the ignorant to the knowledge and enjoyment of the only true philosophy of social being. The so-called philosopher, needed the benevolent spirit of the Gospel as much and as obviously as almost any other man; and from his acknowledged pretensions and the consequent influence which he was able to exert, it was perhaps of more importance to him, on account of the well being of society. And the cultivation of the affections, and the improvement of the social condition, are among the first steps in the ascent to a state of civilization.

If evidence of this fact were demanded, it is found in abundance, by running the eye over the map of the world. Compare the social character, literature, arts—the whole mental condition of the people in Pagan or Mohammedan countries, with that of those where Christianity has prevailed, and it will be found that refinement is every where connected with the Gospel. Nor will this truth be materially affected by the existence of a semi-barbarism in some Christian lands. So far from it, the corruptions—the gross and palpable corruptions of Christianity, will at once be recognized as the reason why they are not more improved. This remark more particularly applies to the influence exerted by the respective Greek and Roman Catholic churches. In Russia, the former has retarded the advances of improvement and civilization—in Italy, the latter has perverted or broken down the lofty and noble aspirations of dignified and upright minds, by its eternal intermeddlings with every interest and every employment. Had these lands enjoyed the awakening power of the spirit of the reformation, the mental energy or social refinement which marks their different people, had borne a very different character.

But even in these extreme cases, there is good reason to believe, that the progress of improvement has been greater and better than in other countries possessing superior external advantages, but destitute of the Gospel. And as a general illustration, a comparison of Russia and Turkey may perhaps be sufficient. Fifteen centuries since, and Byzantium, or Constantinople was the seat of the arts and the refinement of the world. The Turk eventually came and prostrated the power of the Christians, since which time—in defiance of the great influence of an extensive commerce, upon the mental and social character of a people—no visible improvement has been made. On the contrary, he who recollects what the great hive, whence swarmed the mighty Northern host, was fifteen hundred years since, will have reason to believe, that under a Slavonian Winter, and the scarcely less frigid ritual of the Greek church, there is still warmth enough preserved in the few elements of Christianity there taught, to soften the heart, and improve the social condition of benighted man. If in this instance the inference is correct—and it seems impossible to doubt its being so—then the general position is also shown to be correct, that Christianity tends to the social and intellectual improvement of the human race. And that its benevolent principles are adapted to every human condition while man is man—while he has prejudices to overcome, or passions to control, or affections to cultivate.

2. The Gospel is professedly adapted to the moral condition of the human race, irrespective of any peculiarity in the circumstances of individuals. And the reason is obvious—morality, or right and wrong action, depends entirely upon the feelings, affections and principles of the heart. These are radically the same in all men, at all times; and consequently one set of rules meets the moral wants and circumstances of every individual of the human race. Some may have made greater progress than others, in moral knowledge and the practice of virtue. But these superior attainments serve to increase the weight of obligation, in the degree that the moral sense is enlightened and purified. The Gospel fixes its hold upon the affections; and though urgent in its demands of obedience, it expects that obedience will correspond with the degree of information enjoyed. It instructs parents to love and provide for their children—children to serve and obey their parents, and all men to “speak the truth—to do justly, and to love mercy” in their intercourse with each other, and to “walk humbly with their God.” This is not only intelligible to all, but is perfectly suited to the situation and the moral wants of all. It meets man universally in all the relations in which he stands to those around him; and it imposes such, and only such duties as he must feel to be best for himself—best for his race.

Love, the eternal principle that always seeks the good of its objects, is the great requisition of the Gospel.—And it commands itself to the acceptance of all, by the knowledge which it imparts of the affinities that bind man to man. It does more than this, when not counteracted by the influence of erroneous views, or the ebullitions of unrestrained passions—it interweaves its benignant spirit with the feelings of the heart, and secures by its power there, the obedience which it commands. And it commences its operations at that very point—in that particular place and sphere, most effectually calculated to reach, in its ramifications, every member of community. Its first impression is made in the domestic circle—upon the parents’ heart—the ductile mind of the child, and every better feeling is sanctified by the approval of Heaven.

Nor does it stop with the mere injunction of love to man. It adapts itself to the religious feeling so universal in him, and requires him to love his God. This requisition was unknown to man, and is contrary to all the forms or views of religion entertained among mankind previous to the advent of the Gospel. It remained for the Gospel to present a Deity to the devotions of mankind, whom it was their duty and their interest to love—and who is so presented as to secure the exercise of that affection. And thus the basis of all religion and virtue is laid in a single requisition—and that one can be fully appreciated by the humblest capacity. For the most ignorant are capable of knowing enough of the divine benignity, to understand both the reason and propriety of loving God. ‘And the wisest of our race can do no more: they may entertain more enlarged views, and be actuated by more exalted feelings; but their love for the Deity rests on the perception that he “first loved us.”’ The one may only discover the blessings of the sun and the rain—and enjoy the mercies of redemption; while the other with more capacious powers, or better cultivated mind, may see “a God employed in all the good and ill that chequers life.” But in the astonishing adaptation of the Gospel to the moral condition of man, both learn—and learn alike—that the sum of all true religion and true morality is comprehended in love to God, and love of man.

3. There are great diversities of condition, independent of the social or moral circumstances of mankind. Health and sickness, joy and sorrow respectively exert an astonishing power over their feelings and conduct. So that while man is under one of these, he nearly ceases to be under its opposite. He thinks, and acts, and reasons on subjects while in health, in a manner very different from similar exercises in the season of sickness; and his feelings under the impulses of joy, are quite different things from what they are when sorrows wring his heart. And all these reasonings and emotions assume new and previously unknown features in the near prospect of death. Standing on the border of the grave, and looking down into its cold and silent chambers—every previous mode of thought, every accustomed feeling merges into one new consciousness, where the past, the present, and the future mix and blend, and unite their several and distinct influences, absorb all interests, concentrate all feelings, and fill and occupy the soul.

The Gospel professes to suit these various circumstances of health or sickness, joy or sorrow, life or death. In health and comfort, men are generally less attentive to their religious interests, than at other times, and under other influences. And the reason is, they are immediately and deeply interested in the cares, or labors, or amusements which naturally, and perhaps properly, occupy a very large share of attention. But even then, the Gospel comes to them with strong appeals to the reason and the heart. And it demands not only a state of preparation for other scenes, but the instant adoption of its precepts and doctrines, as means for rendering the present situation more supportable. For not only the ordinary business and duties of life have their perplexities and vexations, but its very amusements become insipid and irksome. To bear up under these, is more than can usually be done with equanimity and comfort. The peaceful and submissive spirit which the Gospel was designed to impart and cherish—the calm and holy meditations which it spontaneously inspires, tend very materially to lighten the burden of human cares, while they encourage and promote the faithful discharge of every relative obligation. At the same time they furnish the reflecting mind in its hours of relaxation and joy, with purer pleasures. When the heart is glad, there are fountains of rapture opened to the believer, at which he refreshes his spirit with joys that can never know abatement. And he lives in the constant assurance, that the best enjoyments of earth are eventually to be succeeded by those which are pure and eternal.

The scenes for which the Gospel would prepare us, are sickness, sorrow and death. And it is quite too plain to need proof, that some preparation for these events is demanded by the circumstances of our being; and that it is the part of reason and prudence to undertake the work, while in health and in the possession of a sound mind. For it is impossible to suppose, that when languishing under the pains and depressions of disease, the intellect is at liberty to exert its full powers, or is capable of close application to any given subject. And it is equally difficult to believe, that in the season of overwhelming sorrow, the mind that has not already been refreshed and strengthened by the waters of life, can at once go to the fountains of comfort and consolation. The Gospel invites and even entreats us to perform this work, when we are in circumstances to do so. And its adaptation to these scenes, is expressly predicated upon the ground of previous attention to its invitations. He who disregards these solicitations at the proper season, has no reason of complaint, that he does not, and cannot realize all the benefits of the Gospel in the moment of his greatest need.

In sickness, the Gospel imparts the spirit of submission to the will of Providence, and arms the mind with fortitude to bear with dignity the ills which it cannot control. The Christian understands and feels, that his pains and sufferings are not the angry visitations of an offended Deity—but the unavoidable consequences of a human constitution. And he perceives in the many comforts and blessings left to him—and which, if God were not beneficent would have been denied—abundant reasons for praise and gratitude to his benefactor. Besides, if these views and principles were laid in the heart at the proper period—if their influence had been duly exerted over the life, they furnish inexhaustible sources of comforting retrospection. And the sufferer looking back on the past, finds fountains of present peace opened, from which he drinks the needed consolation.

Again, sorrows are perpetually pouring abroad their streams among mankind; and at times overwhelming them with the deepest afflictions. The dearest friends are forced from our embrace—the tenderest ties are severed; and those in whom our highest pleasures centered, are mingling dust with dust. When the awful moment arrives in which we most need the sustaining power of the Gospel, how deplorable is his situation who has never given his attention to the truth! How happy on the contrary, is he who understands that glorious and divine system, and who feels the sustaining power of the hopes which it furnishes of another and a better life. He feels that it is the Gospel alone, which reaches, or can suit his condition—and he cherishes the prelibations of eternal joy with his departed kindred, as the most gracious bestowment of his God. He looks with a heart at rest, to that spirit-land beyond the grave; and he sees it peopled with immortal and happy beings—the “wicked have ceased from troubling and the weary are at rest.” And this view—these comforting influences, attach to the Gospel in every age, and adapt themselves to the wants of “all that mourn.” While the common sympathies and affections hold a place in the human heart, so long neither rank nor station, neither social refinement nor in ecclesiastical culture can render the hopes of the Gospel less efficacious, or sanctify those hopes with more consoling power.

Finally, man must die. That busy, anxious, active being—so wise, so susceptible, so interesting, passes away from earth. This he knows, and for this, the Gospel admonishes him to be in constant preparation. That preparation is provided for, and the means tendered in the instructions given by the Christian system. And these means consist in cherishing the hopes of the resurrection; and in the retrospect of an innocent and virtuous life. The Gospel alone furnishes and secures these. Neither reason, nor philosophy is able to moralize the life, or sustain the soul in death with well established hopes of immortality. Yet these are and will be necessary to the support of the last hour, while man is man. Nor are they less essential and important to one, than to another of his whole race. It is not a softer pillow, a richer canopy, or a greater fame, that soothes the anguish of nature's last mortal pang; but the mind at ease, the soul sustained by hope, the brighter and more enduring prospect of a life to come.

Such are the adaptations of the Gospel—so apparently difficult and complicated in theory, so simple, and easy, and certain in fact. And it may be safely assumed, that a system which meets the condition of man in the circumstances enumerated, can with the same certainty and facility, reach every possible or conceivable variety of human character or situation. And doing so, it must, from that consideration alone, contain the highest possible evidence of its divine origin. For no man—however misled by theory, or blinded by prejudice, or infatuated by superstition—can indulge the vain supposition for a moment, that human wisdom could devise, or human foresight provide and apply the means for accomplishing any considerable part of a plan so great, so benevolent, so stupendous.

"AN ARGUMENT FOR THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY, In a series of Discourses. By I. D. WILLIAMSON, Albany, N. Y. New-York, P. Price and Co. No. 2, Chatham Square. Stereotyped by Redfield and Lindsay, 1836." 18 mo. pp. 252.

The above is a most welcome and useful publication. It has been before the public for some weeks, and should, in justice to its merits, have been before noticed; but we had expected a notice of it for our columns from another pen ere this, and besides we have actually not had time to peruse it till now. We have just finished its perusal, and are happy in saying that, considering the size of the work, it more than meets our expectations in its general merits and interest. True, we had expected a good production from the well known pen of its esteemed author, which is seldom or never wielded in vain; but in this he has rather excelled his ordinary productions. The work, it is true, is not faultless,—as indeed what human production is?—as we discover a few grammatical errors, (whether of the author or printer we know not,) one error in point of fact, wherein the discovery of the Copernican system is attributed to Sir Isaac Newton; one at least questionable in which he ranks Thomas Chubb on the side of infidelity, and a few positions which we should at least hesitate to adopt, though not at all affecting the argument with the skeptic. But, bating these, which are indeed but trifling matters, and do not at all weaken the force of his arguments in proof of the truth and divine authority of Christianity, the work is truly excellent and well calculated to be extensively useful. And one thing which more than any other, makes it eminently so, is the plainness of its language, its adaptation to all capacities, and the force and energy, somewhat peculiar to the author, thence given to the argument with the common and indeed the great mass of readers.

Although the subject is a somewhat hacknied one, on which it is next to impossible to find a new idea, or advance any new argument, yet our author has by no means pursued the commonly beaten track. He does not waste his time and labor in proving, what has so often and clearly been proved before, and therefore does not need to be proved again, that the Scriptures were written at the times when they purport to have been, and by the authors whose names they bear; but goes to work manfully to prove that whether they were thus written or not, they are true in themselves—he proves from philosophy, from nature, from reason, common sense, experience, and observation, as well as revelation, that what is stated in the Bible is true—that God exists, possesses all the attributes there ascribed to him, viz. infinite power, wisdom and benevolence—that he governs the Universe, rewards virtue and punishes vice, just as nature and reason would, and experience does teach us that such a God would be likely to govern the world, and reward and punish the subjects of his government—that the promises of the Gospel, are just such as would be consistent, and only consistent with the character ascribed to him—that the resurrection of Christ, in confirmation of those promises and in proof of the Gospel, is not only proved by numerous and overwhelming arguments and facts, but is in itself a reasonable doctrine, consistent and only consistent with the character of God and the wants of mankind—that the Gospel is in itself superexcellent and superhuman, in its origin, doctrine, precepts, morality, tendency, etc., altogether superior to and different from all other systems of religion ever known in the world, and therefore it must be of God—that the objections raised against Christianity by its enemies, are in general puerile and without force, and at all events contradictory to and inconsistent with each other. Indeed our author, to employ a modern phrase, seems completely to have "used up" the infidels of the modern school. The work in general is conducted as an argumentum ad hominem, and as such is very happily managed, doing equal credit to the head and the heart of the author.

One thing more we must say in favor of the book. It is unincumbered with those odious doctrines, which originated during the dark ages of the church, which are too often interwoven with the defences of the Gospel in modern times, such for example as original sin, total depravity, the trinity, endless misery, etc., etc., which have actually done more towards alienating good minds from the faith of the Gospel than all their other arguments, however good in themselves, have done to win them to it.

The work is for sale at this office, and we recommend to every one who is able, and has not already done it, to procure a copy forthwith, and peruse it faithfully and often.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

The November number came to hand some days since, and has been hastily skimmed over and partly perused. It continues to be sustained in its former interest and merit, and by an increasing subscription list. There is an able, closely logical article in the "Editor's table" department, by Dr. Beasley, in reply to a former correspondent, "Junius," in refutation of Hume's celebrated sophism against miracles—all of which, however, might have been spared had Dr. B. but taken the rational and perfectly defensible grounds, that miracles are not a violation of the laws of nature. Mr. Hume's sophism rests wholly on the supposition that they are violations. However, even on Mr. Hume's own ground, I think the Doctor has fully refuted him. Dr. David M. Reese, (who has written an uncanonid and vituperous reply (which is no reply) to Dr. Brigham's excellent work on the influence of religion upon health,) is severely yet justly reviewed in the literary notice of said work. He has frequently misquoted Dr. Brigham's language, and misrepresented his ideas; as well as indulged in coarse abuse toward him. Dr. Reese's work is called "Phrenology known by its fruits"—as great a misnomer as if the reviewer had headed his dissection of Dr. Reese's scandal and Christian honesty, "Methodism known by its fruits"—for his work has as close a connexion with the doctrines he advocates, as Dr. Brigham's work has with the system of philosophy of which he is a defender.

Of the other and many excellent things in the number of the Knickerbocker before us, I have not now room to write—and have selected those only most appropriate to our paper.

PUBLICATION DAY.

In order to enable a greater portion of our subscribers to receive their papers in time for reading on Sunday, and to avail themselves of the religious notices, we have for some time meditated a change of our publication day from Saturday to Friday. The present year containing fifty-three Saturdays, will afford us one vacant week to make the arrangement, and gain the necessary advance in time.

The measure will also be beneficial to those subscribers whose papers cannot now always be mailed within the week; for in such cases they lie over until Monday to be mailed here, thus causing a delay of two whole days. True, this does not always happen; but in busy seasons can only be avoided by this proposed change.

Our agents and others will please bear this change in mind in procuring subscribers, as it may afford an additional inducement to many to take the paper; while it can be a detriment to no one. After the present volume, the Magazine and Advocate will be published every Friday.

G. and H.

NEW AGENTS.

Dr. S. Wallace and James M. Clark will please act as our agents in Paldwinsville and vicinity.

Br. Lampson Wright of Penn Line, Pa., will act as our agent in that vicinity.

Br. O. W. Ranney will act as our agent in Oswego and vicinity.

Aaron Thumb, Mottville, will please act as our agent in that vicinity.

G. and H.

Mr. Ira Baker, of Angelica, is authorized to collect arrearages due for former volumes of this paper, in Allegany county. His receipt will be valid, and we hope all who have not yet settled their accounts will, without delay, pay their bills to him; unless they have a better opportunity of sending directly to this office. Old accounts must be settled forthwith.

D. SKINNER.

Owing to a mistake in estimating the length of the Sermon, we are obliged to defer its conclusion till next week.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. A. F. McCABE at Middleville, and at Newport in the evening—Br. SKINNER at Salisbury and Br. WAGGONER in this city—Br. SIAS at Perch River, and at Jenk's school-house in the evening—Br. GRESH at New-Hartford.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in December by Br. SIAS at Lockport, and at Carthage in the evening—Br. A. G. CLARK at Meredith, forenoon and afternoon—Br. GUILD in the stone school-house near Smithville, and in the school-house near Br. Crandall's in the evening—Br. T. J. SMITH near Br. Carver's in the evening (instead of the third Sunday inst., as noticed)—Br. J. FRENCH at Field Settlement, and in Talcott's school-house in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in December by Br. FRENCH in Denmark—Br. GUILD at South Norwich, and in the school-house near Br. Wetmore's in the evening—Br. A. G. CLARK at Hobbart, at 10, A. M., and Humpfield, at 2, P. M.—Br. SIAS at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

We understand the amiable, but afflicted author of the following touching stanzas, is—if living—very low, and almost daily expecting to take her departure to a brighter and happier world. O how consoling and soothing the doctrine of universal salvation in the hour of affliction and death! And how happily is its power and influence expressed and exemplified in this case! D. S.

THE TIME TO DIE.

When Summer's radiance fleets away,
The roses fade, the lilies die;
The gentle race of flowers decay,
And bright parterres in ruins lie.

While thrilling melodies still ring
In sylvan woodland, field and dell,
And feathered songsters sweetly sing
To Summer's charm the last farewell—

When Autumn's brightest golden hues
Are sprinkled o'er the leafy Lowers,
And pensive twilight weeps her dew
On Flora's withered sleeping flowers—

When cold Autumnal winds do sigh,
And nature's gladness turns to gloom—
This is the season when I'd die,
The time to lay me in the tomb.

While youth still lingers on my brow,
And peace within my bosom reigns;
I would depart as I am now,
From this frail scene of care and pain.

While friendship's voice still greets mine ear
In accents sweet as seraph's lyre,
I would exchange the parting tear,
The last farewell and then expire.

And O, I'd die in full belief
Of God's impartial, boundless love!
How sweet to close mine eyes in death
In hope to meet a world above!

O happy morn, when Adam's race
Shall rise at their Creator's call,
And sighs to endless songs give place,
And boundless love encircle all!

Of the proceedings of the Universalist Historical Society.

THIRD SESSION.

According to adjournment, the Universalist Historical Society convened in the city of New-York, on the 21st and 22d of September, A. D. 1836.

Wednesday, September 21.—The Society was called to order by the President, and after having heard the records of the last session read by the Secretary, it proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year, when the following individuals were declared duly elected:—

THOMAS WHITTEMORE, President; PITT MORSE, Vice President; THOMAS J. SAWYER, Secretary; DOLPHUS SKINNER, Treasurer.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARIES.—William A. Drew, Maine; L. R. Paige, Massachusetts; W. S. Balch, Rhode Island; R. O. Williams, Connecticut; John Moore, New-Hampshire; Warren Skinner, Vermont; I. D. Williamson, A. B. Grosh, New-York; L. C. Marvin, New-Jersey; S. W. Fuller, Pennsylvania; L. S. Everett, Maryland; John Corr, Jr., Virginia; G. C. Marchant, North Carolina; Allen Fuller, South Carolina; Allen Greene, Georgia; Willis Atkins, Alabama; Jonathan Speyker, Tennessee; E. W. Camp, Louisiana; A. R. Gardner, Illinois; Jonathan Kidwell, Indiana; Samuel Tizzard, Ohio; Nathaniel Stacy, Michigan; Solomon Bingham, Lower Canada; Oliver Smith, New-Brunswick; Amos Seamans, Nova Scotia; John R. Board, David Thom, England.

Thursday Morning, September 22.—Heard the Secretary's report, and addresses from several members present.

Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d, having mentioned a volume written by a minister of the Greek church, a part of which related to the doctrine of endless misery, and tended to show that this doctrine was not received by said church, it was Resolved, That Br. Ballou be requested to translate such parts of said work as relate to this subject, and cause the same to be published in the Universalist periodicals.

The following preamble and resolution were introduced and adopted:—

Whereas, It was one of the original objects of this Society, and also very desirable, to collect a Library of Universalist books, embracing all, or as many as can now be obtained, which have ever been published on this subject; therefore

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to devise the best means to attain this important end, and that it report at the next session of the Society.

The Secretary having reported that he had in his possession a manuscript written by Rev. David Thom, of Liverpool, England, containing a brief narrative of his life; it was Resolved, That the Secretary be hereby instructed to publish said narrative in the Universalist periodicals.

Thursday Afternoon.—The Secretary being absent. Br. A. C. Thomas was appointed Secretary pro tem. Br. H. Ballou, 2d, having declined a re-election to the Presidency, on motion of Br. L. R. Paige, it was Resolved, That the thanks of this society be presented to Br. H. Ballou, 2d, our late President, for his services the past two years.

On motion of Br. W. Skinner, the Society adjourned to meet in the city of Philadelphia on the third Wednesday and following Thursday of September, 1837.

THOMAS WHITTEMORE, President.

T. J. Sawyer, Secretary.

OBSERVATIONS.

The past session of the Universalist Historical Society, was one of greater interest than either of the preceding. The signs of the times to which several of the members alluded, evidently wear a more and more favorable aspect. In our country there is an obvious and increasing tendency in almost all denominations to embrace more enlarged views of the great salvation through Jesus Christ. Even the schools for the prophets which have been reared for the purpose of preserving the peculiarities of sectarian faith, are found incapable of resisting the influence of the times. Andover and Princeton, the very bulwarks of Calvinism, show evident signs of change. The doctrine of endless misery can no longer be defended on old and popular principles, and new schemes are introduced to subserve a temporary and very doubtful purpose. It is worthy of remark that the changes now referred to, are not the result of any adventurous spirit, any love of novelty or innovation, in the clergy of the popular sects in our country. They are not the fruit of enterprise but necessity. The laity have taken the lead, and the clergy have been constrained by force of circumstances to acquiesce.

The spirit of inquiry is abroad. The love of truth is excited, and no power of divination is necessary to foresee some of the results. Some of the revolting features of Calvinism have already been removed, and others are silently but surely passing away. Calvinism is not now what it once was, nor is it now what it will be ten or twenty years hence. And may not the same be said of Arminianism? The public mind is eagerly inquiring for something better than its dreary uncertainties. The world would know that "the Lord reigneth," and that Jesus Christ is the common Saviour.

The prosperity of our cause the year past is a matter that calls loudly for our devout thanksgivings. The word has had free course, and many have been brought to taste that the Lord is gracious. Numbers have been added to our ranks, and faith and love have been increased.

From Europe we have received gratifying intelligence. It gives us pleasure to state that in England and Scotland there are several interesting congregations of Universalists, and that the whole body of Unitarians in that country are believers in the final holiness and happiness of all men. In Germany, as is already known, a very large part of the clergy, and of the educated of all professions, are Universalists; and we doubt not that through the influence of German divines, no less than by our own exertions, a salutary impression will be made upon the minds of the learned among our religious opposers in the United States.

The prospects of the Universalist Historical Society are encouraging. Of its usefulness, if its capabilities are judiciously called into action, no one we are persuaded, can entertain a doubt. It offers the best means for both domestic and foreign correspondence. It forms a convenient and needed centre for receiving and presenting historical information, and it is highly desirable that every member of the Society and all interested in its objects should contribute to its usefulness. Much may be done with little effort if every one will perform his part.

There has hitherto been a remissness on the part of Corresponding Secretaries generally. Exceptions, however, must in justice be made in a few instances. But generally the Corresponding Secretaries have made no exertions to acquaint the Society with the history and present condition of Universalism in their respective limits. We trust that this neglect will be remedied the present year, and that the fullest reports in their power will be returned to the next session of this society.

T. J. SAWYER.

MAN.—An image of the Deity, which occasionally acts as if it were anxious to fill up a niche in the temple of the devil. The only creature which, knowing its mortality and immortality, lives as if it were never to die, and too often dies as if it were never to live: the soul being gifted with reason, the only one that acts irrationally; the nothing of yesterday—the dust of to-morrow. Man is a fleeting paradox, which the fullness of time alone can explain; a living enigma, of which the solution will be found in death.—In Triumph.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 9th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. LAMAN WILLIAMS, to Miss HARRIET RAYNOR, both of Springfield, Mass.

In Middlefield, October 15th, by Rev. O. Whiston, Mr. ORIS MUMFORD, of Milford, to Miss LOUISA SMITH, of the former place.

In Hartford, Licking county, Ohio, October 10, 1836, by Rev. Mr. Garland, Mr. CHARLES COGSWELL DUFFEY, to Miss HARRIET SCOVEL.

In Brookfield, October 25, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. EDWARD W. LAMB, of Onondaga county, to Miss DIANA MORGAN.

In Madison, September 2, by the same, Mr. JUDSON S. LEWIS, to Miss ANN TYLER.

DEATHS.

In Brookfield, October 31, JEDADIAH H. PECK, Esq., aged 72 years.

Br. Peck was a soldier in the revolutionary war, and was one of those choice spirits whose object and aim is to do right, and trust the result with God. Since the adoption of our constitution, he has held many offices of responsibility and trust; the duties of which he discharged with honor to himself, and to the satisfaction of his constituents. He was trustee of our society in that place, and one of the best and most active members. Love for Universalism was the ruling passion of his life; and in the hour of death was not diminished. He was always ready to oppose the God-dishonoring doctrine of endless misery, and few men could do it more successfully.

His funeral was attended on November 2d, and the doctrine he loved and practiced in life, was exhibited to a large and attentive audience, in a discourse from Rom. xii: 21, by the writer. E. M. W.

In Fenner, on the 16th of October, LOIS ELRINA, daughter of Robert and Lucy Ransom, aged 2 years and 5 months. This is the second child that our friends have buried in a few years. But we trust they are prepared to say, in the language of Job, "the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord." The funeral was attended by the undersigned, on the 18th. E. M. W.

In Centreville, N. Y., October 1, of bilious fever, Mrs. ALMIRA HIGGINS, consort of Timothy Higgins, aged 29 years. It is due to the character of the deceased, to observe that she was a most worthy woman, and greatly esteemed; that she was a zealous and valued member of the Universalist society in that place, and one of its brightest ornaments; that she died rejoicing and triumphing in the glorious prospect of a better world, a sinless and happy immortality for herself, her family, her friends, and the whole intelligent creation.

The funeral was attended on Sunday, October 2d, by the writer of this, he being in the place on an exchange with Br. L. Paine, the resident preacher, who of course was absent. The meeting was held in the Presbyterian church, the use of which was kindly offered for the occasion; and a numerous and sympathising congregation listened attentively to an attempted delineation of the objects, the grounds and extent of the Christian hope, with its accompanying comforts and consolations, its sureness and its steadfastness, in a discourse founded upon Heb. vi: 9. THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON,

BY REV. ALFRED PECK.

"For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe. These things command and teach. Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity." 1 Timothy iv: 10-12.

Let us introduce still another brief argument.—There is no fact expressed with greater emphasis in the sacred pages, than this, that "God worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." It was unquestionably in view of this fact, that Jesus said, "The Son of himself can do nothing, but what he seeth the Father do." Hence the apostle said, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." We cannot, therefore, believe that any part or portion of the world, will eternally remain unreconciled, because God through Christ has undertaken the important work of reconciliation. He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will; and his ways are not our ways, nor his thoughts our thoughts: nor are we told in the oracles of life, that he will by and by give up his counsel, and work according to the sinner's will, or an enemy's will, and not his own. Jesus must reign in his mediatorial kingdom until he hath destroyed death, the last enemy; and subdued all things unto himself; then he gives up the kingdom to God the Father, that God may be all in all. But where—we ask the advocates of the doctrine—where, in all the record of divine truth do we learn, that Jesus will ever give up the mediatorial kingdom, until the last enemy of our race is destroyed, and every sinner is reconciled to God and subdued by the power of divine grace? And how can God become all in all, if corruption, and sin, and wo, remain to all eternity? And how does God work all things after the counsel of his own will, if a frustration of his will and purpose, by sin, in the first place rendered a Saviour necessary?—if the devil can destroy more than God by this expedient can reconcile—more than Christ can save?

Thus, we see, the salvation of all men is the will of God. It was promulgated by the angels, taught by Jesus Christ, and constitutes the burden of apostolic instruction. I am aware that it has been objected to this view of the subject, that God has denounced punishment against the sinner. We admit the fact, but do not consider it as a valid objection to the conclusion we have drawn. He will "punish the world for their evil," and "render unto every man according to his works." Now as all mankind are sinners—and must receive "just recompense of reward;" and "receive for the wrong they have done:" unless he saves those whom he punishes, he will not save any. This appears to be the fact. Sinners are to be punished; yet the apostle says, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." This goes to show, first, that if sinners are not punished, the denunciation is not true. Secondly, the punishment is not endless; for then Jesus could not save. So that the veracity of the Word, and success of Jesus, depends upon the fact that punishment is limited. This brief remark shall suffice on the subject of objections to the general theory. And although our argument in favor of the doctrine presented, is but the beginning of a preface, to the great volume of testimony and argument on the subject of universal purity and endless joy; yet we thank Heaven that we are enabled by the light of his word, rejoicingly and confidently to trust, without doubts or fears, in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.

But how many there are, who are so unfortunate as to live in perpetual fear which hath torment. Unlike the apostle, they lack stability to their confidence and strength to their hope. To justify this remark,—we hear them saying, with particular reference to this text; "If all men are to be saved, why is it said especially the believer? No, this is the believer's exclusive privilege." We can answer all this difficulty in few words. The declaration of the apostle is positive, involving no obscurity. God is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe. Of the salvation of all men we have spoken. It is that joy and blessedness, which originates in the design and purposes of God; which is effected through the mediation of Jesus Christ; and will be enjoyed when God shall be all in all. It is that lasting state of bliss, consequent upon the resurrection, when the whole creation shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. This is universal and impartial; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace. But the peace in believing, the life and joy of faith, is the believer's alone. To say with the apostle, "the life I now live, I live by faith on the Son of God;" belongs especially to those whose living faith works by love and purifies the heart, and gives them a rich antepast of heaven, an earnest of their inheritance on high. Many reason on this subject as though they thought the use of the word, especially, weakened the force, curtailed the extent, or nullified altogether the preceding affirmation. But because the believer enjoys a special salvation, we are not, therefore, to conclude that the preceding affirmation concerning "all men," is untrue.

Let us elucidate this point by another text.—"The cloak that I left at Troas, with Carpus, when thou comest bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." Did Paul mean, and Timothy understand him, that the parchments alone should be brought? But if Paul desired the books and cloak, and still wished to lay greater emphasis on the parchments; then we learn the use of the word, especially. It does not affect the preceding affirmation; it only gives emphasis to that which follows. Hence, in the expression of the text, "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe;" the salvation of all men is affirmed; but a particular or emphatical sense, given to that of the believer. And the apostle adds, "These things command and teach." That is, the preacher is not to insist on this, alone, that God is the believer's Saviour. Nor is he to dwell on that, alone, that God is the Saviour of all men. But he is to teach both—"these," in the plural number—"these things command and teach."—The former is as true as the latter. And if the believer feels and enjoys the one, he should not deny and contend against the other. We believe, and therefore we teach the salvation of all men.

When, then, we look around, and see the vast portion of our fellow-beings who are uncomfortable by the truth; and feel no inward joy and divine satisfaction in the prospect of immortality before them—thousands and thousands, pouring forth their unavailing tears and unmitigated sorrow, over departed loveliness and worth, and kindred and friends—and hundreds and hundreds, even in religion, pained with the prospect of endless, and unpitied, and irretrievable ruin:—O, how the feeling and sympathetic heart, desires to speak the words of comfort,—to soothe the anguish of the sorrowing,— and rejoice the fearful bosom with the hopes of salvation! But he who can not himself trust in the living God as the Saviour of all men, although he may have a faint hope for himself; is illy prepared to speak the rejoicing words of hope to him whom he views as a sinner; or to impart consolation to mourners, over many a wayward child of earth. His confidence arises not primarily, from God, but from the works he has done, the conditions with which he has complied; and consequently, when he has no evidence that the same works have been performed, and the same conditions fulfilled, he feels not at liberty to tender the consolations of the Gospel. And he must become callous in his feelings to the wants and woes of humanity, or feel pained over the case of every hopeless sinner.

On the other hand, he who views himself but one of a helpless race of sinners—his actions only affecting his present being with joy or misery; but every act and energy powerless, with regard to eternal things—who views in the divine counsel wise provisions for the future, and an inheritance secured without partiality or respect of persons, and can trust in the living God as the Saviour of all men: he looks not to meritorious works to justify him in speaking the life-giving words of mercy and peace, but to the unpurchased favor of kind Heaven; and he "blesses God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort; who comforteth him in all his tribulation, that he may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, with the same comfort wherewith he himself is comforted of God." He sees the mourner bending over blasted hopes and crushed affections—and he remembers the life beyond the grave, when death and tears shall be no more: and his words are full of comfort and peace. Perhaps a widowed mother wrings her hands in anguish over the coffined remains of her infant child: and he remembers, of such is the kingdom of heaven. It may be, a numerous circle stand filled with sorrow and shame at the recollection of one whose path was marked with folly:—but the voice of mercy whispers in accents of peace, Jesus came to save sinners, and his grace is sufficient for them. He sees a poor deluded fellow-mortal despairing of acceptance, nor daring to ask for mercy; and he remembers the great love wherewith God loved us, even when we were dead in sins, and that he is without variableness or shadow of turning; and how his soul throbs with the ecstasies of joy, if he is but made the humble instrument of turning him from darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God; and directing him in faith to the words of life and testimonies of love, which fill the mind with peace! O, who that has the feelings of a man, would not labor and suffer reproach if he might but spread far and wide the Gospel of peace, comfort the afflicted, raise up the bowed down, and soothe the anguished spirits of suffering humanity! Who would not suffer some earthly privations, to bless his fellow-men with the hopes of life, and give them joy and peace in believing? Who would not suffer some pecuniary embarrassments and the reproach of a thankless world, to carry good news and glad tidings of salvation, and enrich the poor wanting children of earth, with the earnestness of a spiritual inheritance—with durable riches and righteousness?

It was for these, and similar benevolent and glorious objects, that the author of our text, as a philanthropist and Christian minister, labored so assiduously, and so long in word and doctrine.—He had known by what hateful passions the mind is goaded on to wrath and enmity. He had seen the misery of man around him, and felt the sad and sorry consolations of his own former, partial, selfish views. Converted from the mad feelings of a persecutor, to all the joy and peace in believing the doctrine of boundless and impartial grace, so much was his mind enriched by the soul-cheering views of life immortal, that he would count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ. But can we suppose that he would have suffered stripes, imprisonment, and all the nameless ills he endured, to teach his former partial Pharisaic notions—favor to the few, and an eternal prison to the great mass of men? Nay, these views would lead him rather to inflict cruelty and suffering on others, than to bear it on their behalf. Would he suffer all the amount of evil he was called to pass through, to preach to the scoffing multitude, if he verily believed his preaching would be the means of sinking nine-tenths of those who heard, deeper in the unimaginable abyss of woe? What! labor and suffer reproach, when all his toil alters not his own eternal condition, and to the world does more hurt than good? It is thus, the Gospel minister is called to labor; to convince the mind of the above blessed truth, and strengthen the joyous hopes of heaven; to inspire that faith which works by love and purifies the heart, and leads to a peaceful, obedient, and virtuous life; to cheer, comfort and encourage the weary sons of earth. Not only are there before him, blessings in a spiritual and doctrinal point of view; but the rectification of morals, holiness and righteousness of life, and the blissful results of viewing mankind, as one vast brotherhood in practice as well as doctrine, are objects of the Gospel ministry.

But thousands are indifferent on the subjects the minister has so near at heart. They are cold-hearted, and have no disposition to receive the instructions he would proffer. They may not be inimical, but they are not convinced of the mental peace and practical utility of adopting the course prescribed by the Gospel. Early opinions, educational bias, or in some cases even bitter prejudices, may induce them to reject without examination, the wholesome doctrine based in illimitable love. The doctrine may be reproached as a device of the devil, pleasing to the carnal heart, acceptable to the human understanding, but immoral in its tendency—leading to pernicious and dangerous consequences:—its teachers as wolves in sheep's clothing—men of corrupt minds, no religion, not benefited by the doctrines they have imbibed. O, how exceedingly necessary, that by an humble and pious life they should commend themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God, and "let their light so shine before men, that others seeing their good works, should be led to glorify our Father in heaven."

It was in view of the influence of practical religion that Paul penned the latter clause of our text, and affectionately and feelingly addressed his son Timothy, who had been inducted into the ministry by the laying on of hands. "Let no man despise thy youth. Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity."

"Let no man despise thy youth." As if he had said, Away with that playfulness and levity so natural to thine age. Maintain a deportment and dignity, compatible with the station of a public instructor—compatible with the weight, and seriousness, and truth of thine instruction. Then the youthfulness of thy character, and the gravity and importance of thine instruction, will not excite, by contrast, the ridicule of enemies, and lead thy friends to despise thy conduct as unsuitable for the advancement of the glorious cause.

"Be thou an example of the believers."—Would you improve the moral condition of mankind?—show them by a well ordered life, to what you would lead them.—Would you remove the charge of corrupt and immoral tendency from your sentiments?—let your life be an example of the salutary and healthful influence of the doctrine of love. Would you correct the deficiency but too visible in the practice of your fellow-believers?—be the pattern of what they ought to be, to be consistent and happy. Would you show the power of the Gospel over the ills of life?—let patience have her perfect work; show your fortitude under all reproaches and wrongs of men, the reverses of fortune, and trials of the heart.—Would you render your instruction acceptable to all, and beneficial to those who receive it?—be consistent with yourself; and exemplify in life, the peace, and holiness, and joy, consequent upon grace and love in the soul.

Be an example in word, or as it might be expressed, in doctrine.—Teach and inculcate nothing but that which you believe to be the truth of God; because nothing else can benefit. And what you believe to be true, teach it, regardless of the prejudices of men, and leave the result with God.

Be an example in conversation.—In your whole conduct and every department of society which you are called to fill, whether domestic or public, let your speech be with grace, your conversation be as becometh the Gospel: "for if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body."—Then be discreet; free, sociable and familiar; yet no body in other people's matters: ready to converse, always sincere; never double-tongued and deceptive, nor indulge in open vituperation and censure.

Be an example in charity.—In that actual and active love to man, which springs from inward love to God, and from a realizing sense of the great love, wherewith God loved us. "If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor." Hence you should not rejoice in iniquity—in censorious judgments of your fellow-men; nor by unfriendly actions, belittle yourself unseemly.

Be an example in spirit; or in the feeling and disposition with which actions are performed. Charitable deeds performed with that proud and selfish spirit, which would sound a trumpet, or seek open commendation; that has less of another's benefit than the doer's applause in the actions; are worthy of the rebuke of the Saviour and the classification he gives them, when he says, "Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, and be as the hypocrites." And on the other hand, it is important to avoid churlishness, and the peevish spirit of the misanthrope—every appearance of ill humor, or indisposition to social kindness and peace.

Be thou an example in faith.—This being a moral virtue, has unquestionably, the sense of fidelity. Be faithful in the duties of your calling—faithful in social and domestic life—faithful to neighbors, and the trust reposed in your care—faithful to the public in the fulfilment of all expected labor—faithful to improve every gift that God bestows—faithful in the cause you have espoused.

Be thou an example in purity.—Be discreet in conduct, chaste in conversation. Live holily, and justly, and unblameably among those that believe. "Who is wise and endued with knowledge?—let him show out of a good conversation, his works with meekness of wisdom."

But wherefore should the servant of God and the minister of the Gospel, set good examples before the public? Are not those examples to be followed, and the pattern to be imitated? Then, if it becomes the duty of the minister to be the example of men in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity;—and put the brethren in remembrance of these things, that he may be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith and good doctrine—it is perfectly apparent, that the public thus requiring the good example and holy life of the teacher, are under obligation to profit by copying after the example, and becoming wholesome members of community, and pious servants of Christ. Especially if the minister should be an example of the believers:—believers, favored with such an example, should strive to follow. And if his speech should be seasoned with grace;—their conversation also should be uncorrupt. If in the preacher, a charitable deportment is necessary, and a kind spirit indispensable—if fidelity in his calling, and purity of life are requisite: O, how should believers try to live, as becometh the Gospel of the grace of God!

Do the public then ask, Wherefore do the Universalists preach? We are free to acknowledge, it is not because we are goaded on by the terrific horrors of unceasing wrath. It is not because by our assiduity, we expect to achieve an inheritance in the realms of bliss. Nay, we have a more disinterested motive. "We trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." We would preach of the great salvation, to inspire hope in the bosom of our fellow-men. Distressed by the vicissitudes of life—tortured with anxiety and fear, and pained with all the bitterness of woe, over the mortality of man; we would point them to the abolishment of death, the end of tears, and to life and immortal joys, at the right hand of God. We can invite their faith and love. We can persuade them to break off from their sins by righteousness. We can teach them to trust in the living God for time and for eternity, who is the same merciful benefactor, yesterday, to-day, and forever. Thus we honor God by pleading the constancy and perfection of his goodness. And thus we rejoice and bless mankind, by bringing them to a knowledge of the truth. Those who thus believe and conform to the example described, enjoy especial salvation.

We will therefore labor, although we suffer reproach and contumely. Our cause is benevolent. Though it be deemed licentious, and ourselves be counted as the offscouring of the earth;—we realize that if they have called the Master of the house Beelzebub, much more them of his household: and we still "trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those who believe." Enjoying this special salvation, we will endeavor to give glory to God, by walking before him in holiness and righteousness all our days; and trusting in his mercy through all the sad reverses of fortune;—ever vindicating the honor of his grace, as we labor in the cause of his love.

We close, in the words of the apostle. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."—Amen.

ADVANTAGES OF RELIGIOUS PERIODICALS.

BY REV. C. HAMMOND.

Among the many advantages to be derived from a well conducted religious periodical, I would mention the following, which appear to swell their consequence to such an extent, that I am unable to find any apology for those who withhold their patronage, and dream away an existence in slothful ignorance, wretchedness, and disgrace.

Though this remark may not fall so heavily upon Universalists as others, yet it is presumed, that not more than one-fourth of the families, who profess a faith in "the restitution of all things," have availed themselves of the privilege of instruction, afforded by our religious newspapers. And the consequence of this indifference is, that they suffer themselves to live without a correct knowledge of the abundant evidence on which their faith is predicated—without a knowledge of the progress and prosperity of our common cause, and without that spiritual life and comfort, which the pure Gospel generates in the heart of the believer. Nor is this all. Those who pay but little attention to our periodicals, generally pay less to their Bibles; for it is clearly observable, that the influence of these is no less than to awaken inquiry, and stir up the mind to an examination of the Scriptures. They call forth that attention which is peculiarly befitting a candid investigation. How many individuals are awakened each year from a state of moral stupidity, indolence, and death, by one of these little messengers of the Gospel—these heralds of salvation. How many, who now rejoice in the hope of the Gospel, can date the commencement of their Christian experience to the period, when the light of divine truth broke in upon their understandings, through the medium of some paper devoted to Universalism! How many are indebted to our periodicals as a means for their emancipation from the darkness of unbelief and the terrors of Heathen superstition! Through this medium, the Gospel may be communicated to those whom no Universalist could approach with the least prospect of securing their conversion. There are thousands who may be persuaded to read one of our papers, who would not consent to hear one of our preachers. Such is the force of prejudice over their minds, and such the fear of exciting the contempt and scorn of a bigoted world, that they have not sufficient independence of mind to attend a Universalist meeting, if they have opportunity. This being the real condition of so many, it becomes our duty to avail ourselves of the most efficient means that can be employed, to communicate light to those that sit in darkness, and inspire their minds with that fortitude, which triumphs over the tyranny of a superstitious despotism. Observation has taught me that there is more than one Nicodemus in our world, and though such timidity would be disgraceful to a Universalist, yet I do not anticipate its existence, when the subject shall be converted to the truth. Therefore much good may be done by affording instruction, through the medium of our periodicals, to those whose weakness will not allow them any other opportunity. Go to meeting, they dare not, will not, or can not; but to read a Universalist book or paper, they have no objections, because nobody need know it.

A second advantage, which is by no means the least, is, that our papers contain that information which is of incalculable value to every Universalist, and at a much less expense than could be afforded through any other medium. They state to us the proceedings of each body of Universalists in America—the number of ministers and societies received into fellowship—meeting-houses erected, besides sermons, essays, and interpretations of Scripture, of more value than four times the cost of the paper. And they not only serve to instruct the parent, but his children, giving them correct views of the character and perfections of their Father in heaven—their relationship to him and all mankind, and their duty to both. And it should not be overlooked, that those children who are not instructed in the truth, will most assuredly embrace errors, that will require years of sober industry to remove. I hold it, therefore, to be the duty of all Universalist parents to teach their children Universalism—impress upon their minds the arguments for and evidence of its truth. This may be done by encouraging them to read papers and books of our order, and compare such reading with the language of nature and revelation.

Another advantage of our papers over all others, is, that through them we can read both sides of any controverted point in theology. They are open to every candid and important objection to Universalism, and the whole army of the opposition have an opportunity of defence or offence. Hence the evidences of both sides are placed before us for examination. But this is not all. The patrons of a religious newspaper may preserve all this information for future reference and consideration.—When years have wasted away, these papers will be new. And I promise myself no little satisfaction, in perusing these volumes at some future period of my life, when the events that are now transpiring will be brought up fresh to my mind.

But the more I enlarge upon the advantages of our periodicals, the more numerous they appear, so that unless I resolve to be carried away with the subject before me, I must conclude, by saying to every patron, continue your subscription, and to those who are not patrons, send on your names and the advance pay for the next volume.

KINDNESS..... No. II.

"I was a stranger, and ye took me in."

The particular kindness, alluded to in the above passage, can scarcely be appreciated in this country and in this age of the world. Suitably to understand the duty here referred to, it will be necessary to recur to Scripture history.

In the times of Abraham, we learn much that illustrates this particular. When he sent his servant to procure a wife for his son Isaac, we have an affecting instance of hospitality to strangers. The servant with his attendants, arrives towards evening at the watering place, near the city. Here, the first person whom he meets was a damsel, who runs to inform her friends that a stranger was in waiting. Another member of the family is sent to make inquiries and to welcome him. The stranger is informed that there is "straw and provender for the camels, and room to lodge in." And, this custom still obtains among the Orientals. Travellers, I believe, invariably represent the hospitality of the East as very greatly exceeding that of the West. That this custom prevailed in Judea in the time of our Saviour, appears from a variety of cases, particularly from the journeys of Jesus from Gallilee to Jerusalem. And in one instance, the neglect to observe towards him and his disciples the rights of hospitality, furnishes us with a most interesting example of forbearance in him; when the disciples would have called down "fire from heaven." Paul, also, in describing such widows as were deserving the regard of the church, enumerates amongst their virtues—"if she have received strangers." Thus this virtue consists in receiving and entertaining travellers; and it consisted in sheltering them for the night, in giving food, and even raiment if needed.

And while upon the subject of hospitality to strangers, perhaps it would be well also to make some remarks upon the subject of civility to strangers.

The people of this country are not only less hospitable than the Orientals, but they actually are guilty of treating strangers uncivilly. And that, too, most generally, because they are strangers, and not because they are naturally uncivil or impolite. In associating with their own neighborhood, or community, they are as complaisant perhaps, as any people in the world. But woe to the traveller—the stranger—that experiences the common civility, or rather the uncivility, which characterizes a portion of the Western world! I mean that character, who makes it a practice to assail every stranger he chances to fall in with, by commencing a torrent of uncivil questions, unwelcome inquiries into his business, and a hundred other impudent things, which probably they would frown upon themselves, and be ashamed to do, were the subject of their unmannerly curiosity, any other than a stranger. Now these things ought not so to be. Christ says in his enumeration of kind acts—"I was a stranger, and ye took me in." This comprehends not only the bare hospitality of sheltering, but all that appertains to the entertaining of strangers. It embraces protection, a respect for his feelings, a regard for his convenience while he tarries, a civility of language, a politeness of manner, and a kindness of treatment which tells him that your hospitality is inspired by the goodness of your heart. The Orientals in ancient times, and the practice still remains in some countries, went so far when a stranger had once eaten with them, partaken of their hospitality, as to consider themselves bound—sacredly bound to remain his friend, and consider his rights as inviolable as an intimate, when many ties prompted them to befriend and protect. Hence, the complaint of the Psalmist against one whom he called his own familiar friend, in whom he trusted—"who did eat of my bread; even hath lifted up his head against me!"

But there is another kind of civility, or rather a neglect of civility, which is too common in this country. The want of attention to strangers when they come into a place, either as temporary or permanent residents: but more especially the latter!

It is not uncommonly the case, that when individuals, or a family take up their abode in a place, they are obliged to force themselves into notice, else live an unlimited length of time as an isolated oak upon our Western prairies. Do they wish to go to meeting? There is no one to introduce or welcome them to a seat in church—no one to invite them to attend meeting and see them comfortably seated; and being strangers, they feel a little diffident about going where they have, as yet, no common right, and as far as they have learned, or are likely to learn, no common feeling or interest.

With credit be it said, however, there is one part of community, which, in general, manifests a laudable zeal in endeavoring to introduce strangers into meeting. Whether from true politeness, or something else, we will not now say. But we wish we could say, in truth, the same of the zeal of that part of community, to which the writer is attached in religious opinion. Alas! it is not so. In this respect, "the children of this world are in their day and generation, wiser than the children of light." Although our Partialist brethren, as we believe, deviate widely from genuine politeness in many of their endeavors in proselyting, yet we think they manifest a civility to strangers to induce them to attend their meeting, much more honorable and praise-worthy, than a cold (I had almost said criminal) neglect of which Universalists are often guilty.

We do not mean by these remarks, to recommend an unceremonious attack upon every new-comer into your society, without any regard to decorum or propriety; but invite them civilly, earnestly and affectionately to take a seat with you in meeting. Let them know that you would be pleased to see them there, and that they will be welcome. It is very often the case, that a person comes into a place who is attached to no religious denomination, but is a church-going character—has a disposition to attend regularly, some religious convocation; and cares not what one, so long as he is welcomed and treated respectfully. The Partialists are aware of this, and they act accordingly. And by inducing him to attend their meeting, they secure him as a member: unless they are so impolitic, as to show the monster's many heads, too soon, in which case he will not likely to tarry long. But they are prudent enough generally to show but one head at first; and thus forming his acquaintance, if he is not willing to exchange what appears a very civil society, for one which he is unacquainted with, and which seems not to seek his acquaintance. Accordingly he continues where he was first introduced, and finally joins the church and becomes one of them: whereas he might by that attention which common civility to strangers demands, have been attached to our society as well as theirs.

Now, I do not mean to insinuate that Universalists are more uncivil or less hospitable, as a general thing, than others. No—God forbid that they should be any more inconsistent, impolite, unmannerly, or descend to meaner efforts, than those which we sometimes see in a certain class of proselytes, who prowl about, engaged in every body's business but their own, for a sectarian purpose. But there is a strange apathy existing among the Abrahamic believers generally, in regard to efforts of this kind, to increase the number of faithful believers in a world's salvation. And why is it? Do they need the fear of endless misery to goad them on, and give them a zeal for the extension of the cause they pretend to believe? Do they need the flaming fire of an infernal pit to give them an earnestness in spreading abroad the sentiments they advocate? Will they show to the world, by a perfect indifference, that a partial system—a system fraught with terror and full of cruelty—can inspire efforts in its favor, more zealous than that system which has God for its author, and for its hopes a renovated universe? And will not a sense of the love of God banish from their hearts this apathy, and from their conduct this uncivil neglect and unworthy course, and give them a consistency of action and a praise-merited life? It will. And I am confident that it is a want of this sense of Heaven's love, that shuts the ears and blinds the eyes of so great a mass of Universalists against their own good and that of their dying fellow-mortals. It is this want of Jehovah's goodness in their hearts which produces a coldness that would congeal every rising energy of ten warm souls, and freeze them into a mass as lifeless as their own zeal! It is this want of the living mercy of God in their hearts, that produces just such effects as we should suppose a belief in the doctrine of interminable anguish would inspire—a fear that others would believe it—a dread lest their fellow-beings should be brought to a faith which creates nought but unmixed misery to their own souls. It is because they hold the truth in unrighteousness, that an apathy, more deadly in its influence than the palsying incubus, is thrown over the energies and deadens the deeds. For it is impossible that an individual who has imbibed the holy spirit-giving sentiment of unending grace, and feels its power in his soul, can be indifferent about its prosperity. This we know. Of this fact we have incontestible evidence in the deeds of many a true hearted disciple of our Lord and Master.

We have said that some who are called Universalists, are guilty of almost unpardonable neglect in common civility to strangers, and a zeal for the extension of the doctrine of God. This we believe to be true; and we have told what we conceive to be the reason of such conduct. But fortunately for the general interest of moral purity—to the honor of human nature, and to the glory of God, there are many noble exceptions. There are many who have a zeal for good works, and the spread of that system which is so preeminently calculated to produce uprightness of heart and rectitude of conduct. Else how could this glorious system have made such progress—going on conquering and to conquer its enemies—subduing the stiff-necked—mollifying the steel-hardened soul—showing its consistency, exemplifying its moral influence and its redeeming might, until it has grown from a mere plant, to become a wide spreading tree, whose size and whose beauty of proportion command the respect and the admiration of the surrounding forest? How could it else, have spread its renovating principles—its soul-comforting consolations, and its heaven-ward hopes, until its redeeming power is seen, and heard, and felt so generally in this part of the moral heritage of God?

I speak as unto wise men. Brethren, think of these things. E.M.

EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS.

On the Anniversary of the day of the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1836.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

* * * * *

I have endeavored to portray to your mental vision, the deep and ardent thirst of the soul for Independence—for political freedom—for self-government; I have indicated some of the noble ends which the possession of even this lowest form of freedom may, under the guidance of enlightened legislation, be the parent; and I have dwelt a little upon the sacrifices and the efforts by which every step to freedom—every step in the advancement and amelioration of society was, in general, to be wrought out and accomplished.

Grateful as we feel to the originators and the self-sacrificing laborers for our much-valued and much-prized inheritance, we have open before us a way by which we may cause to descend to our posterity an independence much more to be esteemed, much more invaluable, and by which we may ensure to ourselves a nobler, more profound, more heart-felt gratitude. There is a nobler and a more desirable independence, than independence of the interference and the overmastering sway of a foreign potentate. We may be free from the yoke of a superior physical force prescribing our modes of physical labor, and the manner in which we shall dispose of the fruits of that labor. No power may compel our labor; no master seize upon, or deprive us of its fruits; no man may hinder us to dispose of it as we please; and no monopolies may prevent our supplying our wants as we best may. But with all this absence of outward compulsion from the overmastering will of others, we may be the subjects of a baser slavery, the victims of a more degrading, a more destructive despotism. We may be the slaves of IGNORANCE and FOLLY—yea, the very thralls of WANT OF THOUGHT. We may feel impotent to resist the mastery of opinions and customs which reason condemns. We may, with the dastardly spirit of cowards, deem it easier to submit to the dictation and the rule of erroneous opinions and of irrational practices, than to think again and again, and well assure ourselves of their absurdity and defencelessness; easier, at all events, and safer to submit than to resist. Will the man who listens to this base spirit of indolence and love of ease—who will not think, or thinks so feebly that he is ashamed or dares not to avow his thoughts: Will such a man dare to tell me that he is free, that he feels in his inmost bosom the proud satisfaction and the confident self-complacency of a hero and a free-man? Is he free? not a jot! Feels he as many a self-devoting hero has felt, as many of the signers of our declaration felt, of whom, we presume not a few could say, "We have now pledged ourselves to what is Right not to what is most Easy; we have risked life and property, and are willing to sacrifice all, rather than submit to injustice": Feels the man with the craven spirit, like this? The man who is actuated by such a spirit, may live in the land of freedom, and may boast the name of free-man, but in his soul he is a coward, and ready to be a slave. He is a traitor to the cause of manhood, of truth, of liberty, of the advancement of society. We agree to this. Well; and let us put the question to ourselves, and ask what we are willing to sacrifice, what hardships in thinking and inquiring what is truth and right, and what we are willing to endure of the evil-speaking, and malice, and scorn of those who are slaves to error and wrong, and many of us will be unable to avert the finger of conscience, or dispute its condemning voice when it says, Thou art the man!

We fear that among the mass, the multitude of men, there could be found but a very small minority bold enough to head and to lead on a resistance to opinions and customs based on error and folly, but countenanced by society. Reason condemns with so feeble a voice, and the fear of consequences is so overpowering, that to a declaration of mental independence there cannot be aroused enough of spirits of commanding influence, who would brave and buffet the weapons of malice, misrepresentation and consequent contempt and ridicule, until the whole lump of society should be leavened with the same spirit. Many are aware that they would deserve the respect both of themselves and others, could they only be bold enough to renounce the authority of popular delusions, and feel and act as if fearless of all consequences. It is by men of such a spirit that every step in the progress of society is first taken. But too many are yet bound in the chains of indolence and fear, and while so they deny themselves the unutterable delights of mental vigor, self-sacrifice, heroism. Now, and again, in a fit of discontent or evanescent bravery, some will arouse them and shake their chains; but anon, they shrink back into what they consider safe, if not honorable submission.

Let this spirit of discontent be cherished, let a sighing after mental freedom and independence be kept alive, until it shall burst forth in a general declaration of independence of popular error and mistake, in some noble band of devoted and dauntless deliverers of society. Let each friend of such freedom endeavor to arouse the public mind to a feeling of its subjugation, and its slavery. Agitate, agitate, agitate until the people are aroused to a sense of their wrongs and their degradation. Show them the meanness of their masters. Paint to their alarming gaze the nobleness of being mentally free—the self-complacency and self-respect which shall reward their daring and their labors to be free—paint the more perfect forms of society and of the inner man which shall result from the combat and the victory. Let the friends of mental emancipation and independence, endeavor to disseminate and inflame this spirit of discontent with our present subjugation to popular fallacies, and cherish the desire and the essay after things that are more excellent. If this is not done, the mass of the people will not be able to appreciate the worth of a mental leader, nor be willing to support him in his plans and his operations. If it is done, the mass will soon be leavened—soon be prepared to know their real friends from their noisy but blind leaders, and will be prepared to assist those forward minds who must take the lead in this march of mind. If this is done, perhaps the next or another generation may behold the proud birth-day of mental independence,—the noon-day splendor of the mighty, the sublime, the inspiring spectacle—a people with courage and ability to think for themselves.

In making the above selection for publication, from a hasty composition designed to be spoken, not read, we have complied with the wish of a friend, who accompanied the returned oration with the following epistle.

"DEAR FRIEND—The passage which I have marked with my pencil, attracted, during its delivery, much of my attention, and I should like you to take the trouble of transcribing it and having it submitted to the reflections of many more than those who heard it. It suggested and commenced in my mind a very serious train of thought: I hope it may do so in some other minds.

Would to heaven, my dear D—, that men were assensible of, and sensitive to the deprivation or absence of their rights and privileges as thinking beings, as they have been and are as to their political rights. Then would the day you so much dream of, soon arrive. But, alas! men forget their relationship to the supreme Mind, to the source of thought, power and a sound mind. They forget that they are sons of the Highest. The spark of the Divinity within them lies neglected and dormant. The age, therefore, is not ripe for any vigorous exertions; but, I believe, it is ripening. More minds now than twenty years ago, are sighing after the power of bold, vigorous, accurate thought. More and more are bursting the chains of indolence, and the incubus of Orthodoxy. There is more of liberal, individual and unfettered intellect than there was in my younger days. And I hope and pray that my declining years may be cheered by a sight that will cheer—the people's progress in the powers of thought and in the fruits of love!

The disciples of our revered Master and Teacher were told, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples, indeed: and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." They misunderstood his words, you know, thinking he referred to their personal or political freedom. To counteract this mistake he added, "Whoever committeth sin is the servant of sin,"—not a hewer of wood, not a drawer of water, but bondsman to a more tyrannical master than the ruler of such slaves. From this thralldom (he meant them to understand) which is more grievous than a conqueror's yoke, that truth which springs from knowledge and obedience to my word, shall make you free. If ye cordially embrace these precepts, and doctrines, which the Son of God has come, with full authority from his Father, to inculcate; and if ye pursue that course of life which they prescribe, ye shall be free indeed;—free from that ritual of Moses which has fulfilled its task, and is now become intolerably oppressive;—free from the commandments of men imposed as the doctrines of God;—free from the tradition of Elders,—from the domination of Scribes and Pharisees—from mental and moral slavery—from the terrors of superstition—from the fear of man—from the fear of death. Ye shall be free, he meant to say, for ye shall possess that freedom of the soul which is more to be prized than that of the body, which can never be cloven down by the sword, nor lost amid the conflicts of political convulsion. Such I understand to be the lesson meant to be inculcated by our divine Teacher; and to such means of deliverance, such instruments in working out man's highest freedom, were my thoughts first directed whilst meditating on the agents by which the improvement in society, which you urge and advocate, is to be wrought out and brought about. The mass of the Jews allowed others to think for them and prescribe for them their creed, as the mass among us do at this day. The Pharisees were the self-styled Orthodox in those days. From the slavery of such spiritual leaders—such blind leaders of the blind—the truths taught by Jesus, would, when understood and influential, at that time deliver the enslaved; and now, they will work for every one who intelligently and cordially receives them, a similar and signal deliverance. Inspiring into the mass the spirit of inquiry, the spirit of intelligence, the spirit of independent thinking will do much, I admit, but I wish more to see the mass inspired with the truth and the spirit of Jesus, for that will do more.

I look with considerably ardent hopes to the improved race of school-teachers, and to the improved modes which they will employ for exercising and perfecting the minds of youth. If the powers of the mind were exercised at an early stage, judiciously and vigorously, men when called to form opinions upon political, moral or religious questions, would not find the task of thinking so difficult as to resign it into the hands of leaders to think for them, with such lamentable frequency as is done in the present day. If properly trained in youth, men will not find the task of thinking consecutively, logically and confidently, of such fearful magnitude as to alarm their indolence and love of ease. In youth the fondness for knowledge is perhaps stronger than at any other time, and a judicious teacher might take advantage of it to stimulate to steady and strong exertions.

These are two of the means of mental progress, to which my thoughts have been directed lately—the love of truth—the truth in Jesus—and early, judicious, steady exercise of the mental powers. One of the fruits of free and fearless inquiry—of greater vigor and liberality of thought among the mass of mankind—would be the promotion of peace, and harmony, and good will, instead of quarrelling, evil-speaking, and traducing among those of different creeds and sentiments. Some remarks of Bishop Smith, of Kentucky, recur to me at this moment. "In my mind," he says, "it is exceedingly evident, that every advance of the human mind towards the perfection of theological science, is a corresponding advance towards an entire pacification of theological controversies. Who are the fiercest polemics? Never the most profoundly learned theologians. The unprofitable and interminable questions which arise in all sciences, are meekly and gently touched by the profoundly learned and wise, and become bones of bitter contention only to novices—to those taught late in life or to the half-learned.”—“Whilst the effects of the Christian religion remain partial, prejudice may hold reason in chains, and the head and the heart may be influenced by repellent laws, rather than by those of attraction. But who can say, when the influence of that religion shall be thorough and universal, but the minds of men will first be attained to perfect harmony, and then their hearts? Or who will not feel inclined to hope and to predict, that the perfection of theological science may be the instrument of bringing about that agreement in the truth, that harmony of feeling, and that union of effort, by means of which alone, the kingdom of the blessed Redeemer can be carried to the remotest boundaries of the globe, and thoroughly established in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, over all hearts. Blessed and happy beyond expression, will be that day, when Christians will think, and act, and feel enough alike to make them one peaceful and happy family on earth, as they hope hereafter to be in heaven! The promise of such a day is most refreshing; may the good Lord, according to his great mercy, hasten its coming.”

In the views expressed by this excellent man, I suppose, we both agree, as, I know, we do in his concluding prayer.”

THE DRUNKARD'S SON.

“Mother, this bread is very hard—why don't we have cake and nice things, as we used to when we lived in the great house? oh, that was such a pretty house, Mamma, and I loved to live there so: you made sweet music there, Mamma, with your fingers, when Pa would sing; Pa used to laugh then, and take me on his knee; and said I was his own dear boy. What makes Pa sick Ma? I wish he was't sick, for it makes me afraid, when he stamps on the floor and says so loud, George go off to bed! Say when will he get well; and take me on his knee, and love me as he used to? But Ma, there is a tear in your eye; let me wipe it; there, another comes; oh—another! did I make you cry these tears Mamma?”

“Hush, little innocent, you cannot stop your mother's tears, for they are the very overflows of a fountain, filled with blighted hopes, anguish and misery. She cannot tell you ‘when your father will love you,’ for alas he is a DRUNKARD.”

“I heard a beautiful boy, scarcely four years old, lisping this to his mother; and I pitied him from my inmost soul. His name was George Elwyn. His father was once rich and happy, and nearly idolized his little son; but in an evil hour he began to sip the intoxicating cup; the habit had grown upon him, until the peace of his family was destroyed; and he became a tyrant. The beautiful house in which they once lived, was now exchanged for a miserable cottage in the suburbs of the city, and little George doomed to be the companion of the indolent and vicious.”

The above extract from a Philadelphia paper, is not copied with the expectation of reclaiming a single individual who has become so dead to the voice of reason and humanity as to sacrifice the peace and happiness of himself and family to the gratification of his appetites; for the man—if such a being is entitled to the name—who can withstand the tears and entreaties of a heart-broken wife, and be so regardless of the welfare of those whom he is bound by every tie that is sacred, to love and protect, is too callous to be moved by this simple picture of sorrowing innocence and blasted hopes. Neither is it for the purpose of wounding afresh the feelings of those who have long and silently wept over their unhappy lot, and shuddered at the thought of the impending destruction that awaits all their earthly hopes; but is to prepare the minds of those who read it, for the important question, whether the repetition of such scenes of human degradation and their attending miseries cannot be prevented? If we, as Universalists, are sincere in our professions—if we rejoice at the prospect of the final termination of all sin and misery, we are already prepared, and will not, can not refuse, nor even neglect to use our utmost exertions to check the further progress of this desolating evil. “But,” says one, “you cannot cure the habitual drunkard, for all the ingenuity of man has been put into requisition for that purpose, and in most instances has proved ineffectual.” Grant it. But have we performed our duty, when we have made a few unsuccessful attempts to reclaim a drunkard? I unhesitatingly answer No! We have merely attempted to kill a tree, by plucking off a little fruit or some of its upper branches—we have not commenced at the root. We must first ascertain the cause of intemperance, and block up the paths which lead to it, before we can successfully impede its progress.

“We all know the cause of intemperance,” says one, “a man gets drunk because he has a strong appetite for ardent spirits.”

Very well; but how did he come by the appetite? Whoever heard of a person becoming a drunkard immediately? Is it not by degrees that this appetite is formed? And, if so, who that has encouraged the use of ardent spirits, either as a habitual or fashionable beverage, has not, either directly or indirectly, been instrumental in bringing many an unfortunate family to poverty and wretchedness? I repeat the inquiry, and earnestly solicit every one to answer this question in his own mind, and then ask himself, Am I, who profess to love my neighbor as myself, who dwell with rapturous delight on the happy prospect of universal holiness and happiness, encouraging, in any way, a vice which has brought its thousands and millions to an untimely death, and doomed to hopeless sorrow and wretchedness innumerable multitudes of innocent and helpless women and children?

What Universalist, for I appeal to Universalists, can be unmoved on this subject? I do not appeal to those who expect to witness with heavenly rapture the unending misery of their fellow-men—for such would not be very likely to be troubled about the sufferings of this life—but it does appear to me, that those who are imbued with the benevolent and philanthropic spirit of Universalism, cannot refuse to use their influence in checking, instead of aiding the progress of that which is productive of so much unhappiness, by discouraging the use, in any form, of ardent spirits.

It is true that many can make, and many have made a temperate use of the article—have for years taken their regular drams, without ever becoming such slaves to their appetites as to fall victims to intemperance; but what then? Have not others enjoyed equally as good health, and enjoyed life as well in every respect, who have adhered to the principles of abstinence? And now, let me ask, which has set the best example to his fellow-men? He who has shown to the world that he can enjoy health and every other blessing of life without ardent spirits, or he who has shown to the world that he has been enabled to sustain the character of a temperate drinker? The one has shown that ardent spirits, as a drink, is entirely useless—the other, that one man has been blessed with a constitutional temperament which has enabled him to escape the dangers which have overcome thousands whose judgments or constitutional temperaments were not as cool and even as his own.

But few, if any, who have disgraced humanity with their beastly habits, expected to become drunkards when they first commenced drinking.

Encouraged by the example of the temperate drinker—or temperate man, if you please—they saw no danger in temperate drinking, until alas! they, as if awaking from a delusive dream, have found themselves victims of a raging, and uncontrollable appetite. Will we, then, throw the weight of our influence—for influence every one has—in favor of drunkenness, by making any use of a poison which causes so much evil, and so little, if any, good? Or will we by precept and example, manifest our desire to banish intemperance, its causes and effects from our land? Let us remember that preventive is the surest remedy, and act accordingly. A FRIEND TO HUMANITY.

THE SLANDERER.

If there is a character in all the world the most detestable, and destitute of every refined feeling, it is that of the slanderer. The wilful slanderer is not in possession of the least particle of honesty or humanity. He cares not how dear may be the reputation of the object of his revenge; he cares not what may be the result of his unfounded and irreligious calumnies, but at one fell swoop he drives character, reputation and all that is near and dear to man, to darkness, desolation and ruin.

“He that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed.”

Slander, like jealousy, is “the green eyed monster which doth mock the meat on which it feeds.” He who can choke the sweetest flowers of social love, and taint them with disease—and in the paradise of earthly bliss, where the plants of virtue flourish, spread the blight of mildew, hatred and destruction—who can crush his neighbor's name to dust and build upon its ruins—who can write infamy upon the brow of others, to prove his own purity—who can heap disgrace upon an innocent fellow-being—is neither man nor beast but a heartless fiend. Those who have had their dearest rights tampered with—who have known what it is to have the priceless gem of a good name sullied by the poisonous breath of cold un pitying slander—those can truly say that the slanderer has no heart, except it be one of adamant. We have often been visited with the poisonous weapon of our enemies, but the greatest pang of sorrow, regret and disappointment which it gives us, was, that it came from those who were professedly the friends of Christ, and from whom we ought to have received a different treatment.

The vocabulary of the English language does not contain words black enough to paint a true portrait of the slanderer. His tongue “outvenoms all the worms of the Nile,” and his heart beats with cruel satisfaction over the disease, disgrace and death of which he is the producer. There are but very few, however, pure and virtuous, who escape this deadly poison. Even our Saviour and his apostles were every where spoken against—the slanderer hesitated not to heap upon them the vilest epithets. But their lives proved the assertions of their enemies false; and it should be the fixed purpose of every individual thus calumniated, not to heed the viperous arrows of their enemies, but to conduct himself, so as to refute the assertions of their slanderers. By so doing, the arrows of venom will fall dead and harmless at their feet, or rebound with a tenfold vengeance upon their author's heads. AN ADVOCATE.

Auburn, N Y., 1836.

If there were a totally depraved rational being in the world, or such a creature as a personal devil, we do not believe any argument could convince either of the truth of universal salvation, for the doctrine of endless misery would be more congenial to their feelings. We believe it to be more difficult to make a corrupt heart believe in God's impartial goodness than a virtuous one.—Christian Intelligencer.

CERTAIN PUNISHMENT.

The utility—nay, the necessity and consequent truth of this doctrine is beginning to be seen and felt by the more sagacious and thinking portion of mankind. I have once before noticed the tendency of the human mind, as evinced in the literature of the age, to embrace a better, because more humane and rational system of religious views, than is now inculcated by the teachers of the thousand different and differing sects upholding Partialism. That tendency is as evident in relation to the subject before us, as in relation to any other doctrine. Long have those novelists and romance writers been pronounced of doubtful utility, who do not, in their works, deal out even handed justice in this state of existence to the rogues and villains they introduce on the stage of action; and duly reward the virtues of the poor, the persecuted and oppressed, with ultimate earthly triumph, or, at least, certain inward peace and joy. The same is true of poets and dramatists. Why the common sense of the reading community requires denouements in these pictured scenes of life, so different from what they profess to believe is the fact in real life—and of man to be more just to the creations of his fancy, than they believe God is to his creatures—is not the question now to be solved. Sufficient is it, that such is the fact—that this judgment of common sense, in direct contradiction to the religious creeds of community, has placed literature in an attitude partially hostile to many of the doctrines of the day; and that the effect is again reacting on its cause, and increasing the bias of the human mind in favor of more liberal, just and humane doctrines and principles in religious faith and practice. It is the glimmering day star, ushering in the dawn of a day in which there will be no darkness—when the light of truth will no longer be obscured by shadows cast by the many forms of error and ignorance. It is an outbreathing of common sense, too long suppressed and rendered weak and voiceless, against the absurd and licentious doctrine of Partialism—that vice yields earthly peace and enjoyment, while virtue is weighed down to continual misery by grief and care in this life—that neither are duly and justly dealt with on earth, and that therefore there must be a day of judgment in the eternal world, when injustice shall have an end with both, and endless retribution of rewards and punishments succeed.

But this is not all. Not only have our poets, novelists and dramatists generally, exhibited the doctrine of immediate and certain punishments in their several departments—represented even successful villainy and splendid vice as ever surrounded by remorseful fears, restless nights, poisoned joys, embittered pleasures and murdered hopes; and virtue in her greatest calamities and depths of persecution and oppression, filled with internal peace and resignation, smiling at the dagger's point and bidding danger defiance—but our literary writers generally are beginning, more and more to look deep into the scenes of real life—to lift the smiling mask from dissembling human nature, writhing in the agonies and loathings of sin-sickness and moral death.

Nor is this all. Our moral and mental philosophers are coming to the aid of reality and common sense.—They investigate the moral powers of man—trace their connexion with external nature around us, and their adaptation to the everlasting laws of righteousness and morality, and thus show, not only why rewards and punishments are immediate and certain; but also, that they must, in the very nature of things, ever be so. The same moral powers man possesses now, he will ever possess. Hence, no moral laws can be brought to bear on them after the resurrection, but what already exist for their government. The righteousness of God is the same in time, that it ever will be in eternity—and that is the only kind of righteousness he ever will require of man. Consequently, neither man's moral nature nor God's moral government can so far change in eternity from what it now is, as to cause any moral action to produce different moral results from what it now produces. Hence, if vice now produces no misery in man's moral feelings, it never will—and if virtue gives not spiritual peace and joy on earth, we have no proof that it ever will experience these as its results in heaven. In other words—if the vicious are the happiest portion of earth's children, and the virtuous, the most miserable, hell will be an endless place of bliss, and heaven, of woe and grief. Our moral philosophers have not yet drawn the conclusion—but they are rapidly laying down the premises. And should truth continue to be the object of their search, and they proceed further in investigating the nature of man, the conclusion will not be far distant from their premises—and that conclusion will be, the doctrine of universal salvation.

These reflections originated in the perusal of "The Art of being Happy," translated from the French of Droz, with prefatory remarks and an Appendix by Rev. T. Flint. On page 34, the Rev. translator says—

"You will study the moral laws of the universe, of which you are a part, because you are moral beings, and because obedience to these laws constitutes the tie of affinity between you, the higher orders of being, and the Divinity. You will respect them, because it is the glory of your nature, that you alone, of all creatures below, are morally subject to them. Laying out of the question their momentous sanctions in the eternal future, you must be aware, that the Creator has annexed pleasure to obeying them, and pain to their violation, as inevitably as gravity belongs to matter. One would think, it must be enough to determine the conduct of a being, who laid claim to the character of rational, to know, that no art nor dexterity, that no repentance nor return to obedience, can avert the consequences of a single violation of these laws; and that no imaginable present good can counterbalance the future misery that must accrue in consequence."

Who would sin if this were universally felt and known? Yet such is but the duplicate of the teachings of Universalism, so often termed demoralizing, licentious and dangerous to the best interests of society! God forgive the slanderers of our most holy faith: for truly—truly "they know not what they do."

In speaking of the trite adage, "honesty is the best policy"—which he says is no more than an acknowledgment, that God's moral laws are so constituted that it is every man's interest to obey them—he says, page 35,

"Yet the greater portion of the species do not constantly act upon a full belief of this hacknied maxim. They think, apparently, that they can in some way obtain the imagined advantage of dishonesty, and evade the connected evil; not aware, that detection and diminished confidence may be avoided for once or twice; but not the loss of self-respect, the pureness and integrity of internal principle, the certainty of forging the first link in a chain of bad habits, and a thousand painful consequences which it would be easy to enumerate in detail."

Permit me to close with the following additional extract from the same author, beginning on the page last named. Alas, the sinner is really a crazed man—and he only is wise that is virtuous! Our Saviour truly knew what was in man, when he prayed for the forgiveness of the greatest crime, saying it was caused by ignorance.

"We hold the man insane who should leap from a high building upon the pavement, or attempt to grapple with the blind power of the elements. But it is scarcely the subject of our remark, that the multitude about us, in the most important, as well as the minute concerns of life, live in habitual recklessness or violation of the organic and moral laws; and yet we certainly know, that whoever infringes them is as sure to pay the penalty, as he who madly places himself in opposition to the material laws. I can never present this astonishing and universal blindness in too many forms of repetition, if the effect is to bring you to view these two species of folly in the same light.

"The reason clearly is, that in too many instances, men take no pains to acquaint themselves with these laws, and their bearing upon the constitution of man; or, deceived by the clamors of the inclinations, and the illusions of present pleasure and advantage, when balanced with future and remote penalties, they commit the infractions, and hope, that between the certain pleasure and the distant and contingent pain, they can interpose some evasion, and sever the consequences from the fault. The expectation always ends, like the alchemist's dream, and the projector's perpetual motion. Even in the apprehension of the consequences, the mind is paying the penalty of unquiet conscience, and of an abatement of self-confidence, and self-respect, penalties, which very few earthly pleasures can compensate."

To this permit me to add the no less correct, though quaint and humorous remarks of the author of the "Tin Trumpet," (never mind the title, reader!) who says under the head "Vice"—

"It may be doubted, whether vice be so effectually repressed by the fear of future, as of immediate punishment. Jack Ketch exercises a more potent influence than the devil; for none can doubt the existence of the former, while evil men have a strong motive to be skeptical as to the existence and avenging power of the latter. The hope of future reward is the best consolation to the good under affliction; but the belief that virtue and vice are their own reward and punishment, even in this world, will moralize many from a sense of interest, who might not have been so certainly reclaimed by a sense of duty." LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

ANOTHER DONATION.—In addition to the former liberal donation of R. W. Haskins, Esq., of Buffalo, he has recently presented an excellent Theodolite, Surveyor's Compass and tripod, and a superb doubled barrelled air pump, to the Clinton Liberal Institute. These last articles cost considerably above ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS.

Are there no other men of wealth who will do likewise? S. R. S.

MINUTES OF THE SUSQUEHANNA ASSOCIATION.

It is with regret I notice the errors in the published proceedings of this Association; yet with a hope that it may prevent similar errors in future. Too little attention is paid in our councils to the selection of those persons who will make the best clerks; as our publishers well know—and too little by the clerks to preparing the minutes in the most correct form, and in a natural and condensed style. Hence, too often, the Editor and compositor have to guess at the words, and so alter their arrangement, erase and make additions, as to cause them to express what they think the clerk meant they should express. This can generally be pretty well done, for the preceding and following sentences and words serve to explain the illegible, obscure and unintelligible—but even with these aids the best guesses and decyphérations will sometimes fail. But in proper names there are no such aids. After making out a list of all the different names the characters resemble, we must take the most probable one, running ten chances of giving a wrong name after all. These remarks are not intended merely for the ease before us—but for general application to all similar cases, and Heaven knows they are too numerous. The fewest and most common words, properly used to express most clearly the meaning, is the best business style—the classification of the same subjects together, according to their natural relation, is the best order—and the hand writing which always makes each separate letter clear and distinct in form, the letters properly joined, and the lines straight and distinct from each other, is the best penmanship, whatever flourishers may say of it. A mechanic, farmer or laboring man generally writes so as to be read more easily, than professional men—especially those who mistake flourishes and ornaments for good penmanship.

But enough. I hope no offence will be taken, for none is meant in any of these remarks—and gladly would I have omitted both them and the following corrections, had I not believed both were alike necessary and called for.

Will the reader, by request of Br. Bartholomew, of Brooklyn, Pa., turn to number 43, pages 340 and 341, current volume, and make the following corrections in the minutes of the proceedings of the Susquehanna Association, there published?

"5. Appointed Brs. George Kinney, [of Sheshequin,] Russel Spencer, [of Mount Pleasant,] and Simon Stevens, [of Springville,] a committee [of discipline] for the ensuing year."

N. B. The omission of the places of residence was my act—the other errors were of the copy.

"A." Read "articles 3d, 7th and 8th of the Constitution"—"Art. 3. All ministers of the Gospel in regular standing and fellowship with this or sister Associations residing in this Association," etc.—"Art. 8. And that the following clause be expunged," etc.

In the list of lay delegates, read "P. Tiffany," for "B. Tiffany," and add the following names—"Simon Stevens, George Avery, Springville."

Br. Bartholomew also desires us to add to the remarks, that—"It is true that some of the societies within our boundaries were not fully represented; but it is due to them to state, that our limits are more than one hundred miles in length, in which 'hills on hills arise'—that the season rendered it difficult for farmers to secure their crops, and therefore disabled them from sparing a week, as many must have done, to attend our session—and that the unprecedented snow storm at that period, prevented the attendance of some delegates, as well as of many hearers. The visiting brethren and sisters were received with great hospitality by our friends at Mount Pleasant, and the ministering brethren, in particular, have great reason to thank the small congregation, composed of various denominations, for their great liberality in the collection [$41.53] taken up on the occasion. Their devout attention to the preached word was great, and their countenances evinced joy in hearing it. The deliberations of the Council were harmonious, and every vote, but one, was given with unanimity of thought and feeling."

* * Br. Bartholomew requests all our publishers who have copied the minutes, to insert the foregoing corrections and additional remarks, also. A. B. G.

NEW PREACHERS.

Br. Stephen Hull, at present residing in Carlisle, Lorain county, Ohio, has commenced preaching the Gospel of impartial grace. Br. Tenney says he has labored thus far to good satisfaction. Br. Hull was formerly from Massachusetts. He will act as our agent in those places where he may travel and labor.

In Feering township, Washington county, Ohio, there is a congregation of Germans, with a pastor of their own named Theodore Schreiner. It has but lately been discovered that these emigrants from "the Father land," are Universalists. Br. Schreiner lately attended our Western Convention, and is highly spoken of by Br. Davis, of Pittsburg, who was also there.

A correspondent at Sandy Creek, Ills., says—"I have just returned from Sangamon county, where I had the pleasure of hearing Br. Gibson preach the illimitable love of God. Br. Gibson was formerly a Tunker, and by reading your invaluable paper was convinced of the truth of Universalism." More probably of the propriety of preaching it. The Tunkers generally are Universalists, but deem it a doctrine proper for saints only to know. I have been credibly informed that the Tunkers in Illinois, when they have no meetings of their own, give Universalist meetings a decided preference by attending on them in a body.

Be this as it may, here are three more added to the ranks of those who advocate the universal and endless goodness of God. A. B. G.

MR. CAMPBELL.

"A Reader" is informed that the numbers of the Millennial Harbinger he forwarded us, are very acceptable, although we had seen them before. As to the controversy there commenced, it will be continued by Br. Skinner on the part of the Universalists, as soon as Mr. Campbell, (who has been written to on the subject,) will signify his readiness to engage in it. The change is made in consequence of Br. Montgomery's health, which will not permit the labor a continuation of the discussion would impose upon him.

As to Mr. Campbell's desire to meet a Universalist in debate, I would remark, that he did not, to my knowledge, (and I have made some inquiry on the subject,) make it known to those whom he supposed old enough—though Br. Montgomery gave him the addresses of a number of our preachers at the East, that he might be gratified in his desire. Mr. C. may have called on some of them—though I could not learn that he did—but returned to Virginia again in peace and silence.

The following extract from the Christian Palladium, a paper known to be not partial to Universalists, will show what others think of his refusal to meet Br. Montgomery, and of his subsequent silence, after expressing a desire to meet some older, more noted preacher of our denomination. For myself, my opinion of the matter depends somewhat on how he may conduct in continuing the controversy already begun. And of this our readers will be able to judge, as both sides will be given in both papers.

"MR. CAMPBELL.—The gentleman whose name we here present, has made a preaching tour through this State and a part of New-England. But we cannot yet learn that his preaching in any place has produced any considerable excitement. His intention was declared more than two years ago, that he intended to visit New-York and get the wheels a rolling in this great State. When at Auburn, we are told, he said he calculated to get up a debate at Boston. But we believe the wheels in this State have not increased their velocity much in consequence of his coming, and the good people of Boston love peace, union, freedom and religion better than empty speculations and hateful quarrels.

"At Auburn, Mr. Montgomery, a learned and talented young minister of the Universalist society, offered to debate with him; but Mr. C. we are told declined, with the apology that Mr. M. was too young. We suppose if Hosea Ballou had made the proposal he might with as much propriety have said he was too old. So our good friend Mr. C. has gone on his way to the South in peace, and we are all left in these northern climes in the enjoyment of the same blessing."

THE UNION.

A chance of procuring copies of the first volume of this excellent periodical, just closed, is offered by its proprietors, as may be seen by the following. And while on the subject of back numbers, we will say, that we can yet furnish new subscribers with a few perfect sets of our present volume. But here is the offer of Brs. Price and Company.

FIRST VOLUME OF THE UNION.

The first volume of the "Universalist Union" closed on the 5th of November inst. An extra edition was printed through the volume, and the proprietors find that they have from one hundred to two hundred perfect copies which they can dispose of. As the paper needs an extension of its list, to remunerate those engaged in conducting it, the undersigned would respectfully appeal to the Universalist public for such aid as can be consistently rendered, without injury to kindred periodicals. It is believed that in many places where the Union does not now circulate, individuals may be found to take it, who are not now taking any paper. As some inducement to ministering brethren and others to seek out these, we will furnish five copies of the second volume of the Union, and one copy of the first volume for every $10.00 remitted free of expense. Postmasters would generally without doubt, forward the amounts. The first volume of the Union, commences the foreign correspondence of Br. Le Fevre, which renders the volume more interesting and worthy of preservation.

The second volume commenced on the 12th of November, 1836, and is printed in large quarto form well adapted for binding. Specimen numbers will be furnished to those who may wish them. Letters should be addressed the undersigned, "No. 2 Chatham square, foot of Bowery, New-York." P. Price, and Co.

New-York, November, 1836.

LADIES' REPOSITORY.

Publisher of the Universalist and Ladies' Repository, please forward the paper with the back numbers, to D. Robertson, and to Miss H. Warlack, both of Fulton, Oswego county, and charge this office. The former remittance of $16., on the part of Br. Eaton, credit as follows:—Mrs. Anderson and Miss E. M. Chase, Baldwinsville, Onondaga county; Miss R. Ives, Oswego; Miss A. E. Fay, Fulton, and Mrs. Pierce, Hannibalville, Oswego county; Miss C. Butterfield, Wolcott, and Miss L. Lamson, Sodus, Wayne county; and Mrs. Hanford, Ferrinton, Monroe county. These all take the Repository now, and are here noticed by request.

One word more on the subject of the Repository—not to the publisher, but to the ladies. It is an excellent monthly—cheap in price, neat in appearance, especially intended for your sex, and generally filled with interesting tales and essays on various subjects connected with or embraced in the glorious, amiable and benevolent doctrine we profess. It is improving in its contents, and it is presumed an increase of your patronage will be used to render it still better. If you want—and you all do want—and can afford to take it, send on and get it, with the back numbers of the present volume. If more convenient, subscriber's names and money will be received at this office, and forwarded safely to the proprietor, Br. Abel Tompkins, Boston.

Specimens of the work may be seen at this office, or in the library of the Utica Pervan Institute. A. B. G.

BOOKS—NEW ARRIVAL.

Just received and for sale at this office, a new supply of large and pocket Hymn Books, in various bindings; Horne's Introduction, in 2 vols.; Phrenological works, a general assortment, including Macnishi's new work; Br. Whittemore's new singing book called Songs of Zion, per dozen, $10, single $1.; the Billings and Holden Collection of ancient tunes as originally written, single, 88 cents; the Stoughton Collection, per dozen, $9, single, $1.; the Register and Almanac for 1836—also for 1837, at publishers' prices—besides a number of other works usually kept for sale at this office.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

IMPROMPTU.

I joy to think that this frail earth
Is not our resting place—
And that a pure immortal birth,
Awaits our kindred race.

With such a faith before me,
My saddest hours are bright,
And through dark scenes of misery,
Will beam some star of light.

A SISTER.

MELODY.

BY WILLIAM LEGGETT.

If you bright stars which gem the night,
Be each a blissful dwelling sphere,
Where kindred spirits re-unite,
Whom death has torn assunder here;
How sweet it were at once to die,
And leave this blighted orb afar!
Mix soul and soul to cleave the sky,
And soar away from star to star!

But oh! how dark, how drear and lone,
Would seem the brightest world of bliss,
If wandering through each radiant one,
We failed to find the loved of this!

If there no more the ties shall twine,
That death's cold hand alone can sever,
Ah! then those stars in mockery shine,
More hateful as they shine forever!

It cannot be: each hope, each fear,
That lights the eye, or clouds the brow,
Proclaims there is a brighter sphere
Than this bleak world that holds us now.

There is a voice which sorrow hears,
When heaviest weighs life's galling chain,
'Tis Heaven that whispers—"dry your tears,
The pure in heart shall meet again."

ASPIRATIONS OF YOUTH.

Higher, higher we will climb,
Up the mount of glory,
That our names may live through time,
In our country's glory;
Happy when her welfare calls,
He who conquers, he who falls.

Deeper, deeper let us toil,
In the mines of knowledge;
Nature's wealth, and learning's spell,
Win from school and college;
Delve we there for richer gems
Than the stars of diadems.

Onward, onward may we press,
Through the path of duty,
Virtue is true happiness,
Excellence true beauty,
Minds are of celestial birth—
Make we then a heaven on earth.

Closer, closer let us knit
Hearts and hands together,
Where our fireside comforts sit,
In the wildest weather;
O, they wander wide who roam
For the joys of life from home.

From the Southern Evangelist.

NOBODY IN PARTICULAR.

Messrs. Editors—I have a question I would like to put to the readers of your paper; but before proposing it, I beg leave, for the purpose of having its merits fairly understood, to give a little narration, with some remarks thereon, respecting certain circumstances which have transpired in that part of the world where I live.

Mr. Snibbets professes to be a Universalist—is usually called one—subscribes for, and probably reads a periodical advocating the sentiments of that denomination. As respects his temporal affairs, he is the proprietor of a large farm, worth twenty or thirty dollars per acre, with good buildings on it—owes no body—and if not considered wealthy, is at least, a thrifty farmer, raising an abundance of the necessities of life, all of which, in the place where he lives, may at almost any time be converted into cash.

He invited Br. Evangelist (whose name being interpreted, as the Bible has it, signifies Gospel preacher, or good-news teller, alias, a preacher of Universalism) to come and spend a Sunday in his neighborhood. Br. E. is one of that class mentioned by the apostle. "poor, yet making many rich." His poverty arises partly from ill health, but mostly from his zeal in the promulgation of the Gospel of reconciliation. All the property he possesses, exclusive of a horse, and a growing family, would hardly exceed fifty dollars. He attended the appointment—preached as well as he could—(which you know was all St. Paul was capable of doing)—and after having been favored with a view of Mr. S.'s abundant harvest, returned home to purchase a little bread-stuff for his family and some coarse grain for his horse, whenever he could procure the necessary means. Mr. S. had raised a large crop of wheat, oats in great abundance, other crops in plenty; and yet he permitted Br. E. to go home, quite at a distance, without even a cent, or the value of cent as a pecuniary compensation, or even the promise of either at some future day.

Now, Messrs. Editors, when I see an individual bestowing his entire aid upon the opposers of Universalism, and investing his whole influence in the promotion of their cause, I pronounce at once that he is not a Universalist at all, any more than the Tories of my grandfather's day, were true patriots. But I am not going to say this of Mr. S., as the assertion might be unjust. I shall only say, that I think he possesses not much Universalism. We will suppose, by way of illustration, that so much Universalism as is possible for one individual, by faith to possess, shall be reckoned as equal in value to half the state of New-York. This you know, is incomparably below its real value; since the fact is, that all the wealth of the world sinks into utter insignificance, when compared with "the unsearchable riches of Christ," and we read of becoming "joint heirs" with him. But as I said, we will suppose this for illustration; and we will also suppose that flour shall be selling at one-tenth of its present cost. In this case, I say, I think that neighbor S. may probably have enough of the former to purchase as much of the latter as would prevent him from starving for a little while at most—perhaps longer that it would take to read this article.

Now for my question. How much Universalism must a man possess, in order to be justly entitled to the name of Universalist? I subscribe myself,

NOBODY IN PARTICULAR.

TRUTH IS POWER.

Some men say that "wealth is power," and some, that "talent is power," and some that "knowledge is power," and others, that "authority is power;" but there is an aphorism that I would place on high above them all, when I would assert that "truth is power." Wealth cannot purchase—talent cannot refute—knowledge cannot overreach—authority cannot silence her, they all, like Felix, tremble at her presence. Fling her in the most tremendous billows of popular commotion, and cast her into the sevenfold heated furnace of the tyrant's wrath; she mounts aloft in the ark upon the summit of the deluge; she walks with the Son of God untouched through the conflagration. She is the ministering spirit which sheds on man that bright and indestructible principle of life, light and glory, which is given by his mighty Author to animate, to illumine, and inspire the mortal soul, and which, like himself, "is the same yesterday, to-day and forever." When wealth, and talent, and knowledge, and authority; when earth and heaven itself, shall have passed away, truth shall rise, like the angel of Manah's sacrifice, upon the flame of nature's funeral pyre, and ascend to her source, her heaven and her home—the bosom of the holy and eternal God.—Southern Evangelist.

NO DEVIL!

A Scotchman having heard a Lutheran preacher contend against the existence of the devil, as an individual spirit, was anxious that his wife should attend the same church in the afternoon. "What!" exclaimed she, raising her hands in horror, "wad ya gar me gang to a kirk where they hae nae deil!"

Poor woman! She had no idea of going to such an abominable place, as a church where the doctrine of a personal devil was not taught. There are many more just such wives, (ay—and husbands and children have the same ideas,) at the present day.

If the doctrine of the old fashioned personal devil should turn out to be false, what an awful thing it would be!—Star in the East.

DEATHS.

In Gaines village, October 26, MARIETTA, daughter of Jephtha and Eliza Woods, aged 4 years.

The circumstances attending the death of this little girl are peculiarly disastrous and afflictive. It is supposed that in passing near the fire, her clothes were brought in contact with the flames, which were entirely consumed before any one came to her assistance. Her parents were both absent from the house at the time, and when they returned it was but to witness the vital spark nearly extinct. She survived about four hours. On the same day the consolations of the everlasting Gospel were tendered unto the deeply afflicted parents—a mourning group of little sisters—and to a respectable concourse of people, by the undersigned, at the Methodist chapel.

May the blessings of our heavenly Father rest upon all those who, by this afflictive dispensation of his providence, have been called to mourn; and may he grant them all needed comfort and consolation. A. C. B.

PROPOSALS.

For publishing the Eighth Volume (for 1837) of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

LONG and favorably known, this periodical needs few words to describe its objects. It is principally devoted to teaching and defending, by reason and Holy Writ, that there is one (and but one) God, the Father of all; one Lord; Jesus Christ, the Saviour of all; and one holy and blissful immortality, the destiny of all our race—that, therefore, all men are brethren—that love to God supremely, and to man universally, is the fulfilling of the law—that the practice of virtue is the only true interest of the human family; and that every transgression of God's laws, will certainly receive its due and proper punishment. In addition to, and conformity with these principles, it will defend RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, from whatever source assailed, and aim to inculcate a high literary, moral and religious tone and feeling. Such are its objects—the following are its means to effect them, and its claims to support.

There are no known complaints of the management of its present proprietors; and they have received warm commendations from many of the ablest and best friends of Universalism, on their past labors. We believe every promise we have made, has been fulfilled. Yet many circumstances, which no longer exist in so great a degree, prevented us from making some improvements in the seventh volume, by means of which we hope to render the eighth superior in worth to all its predecessors. For this purpose, some able writers have been engaged to furnish series of articles on particular subjects of especial interest and importance. These, with the contributions of about fifty excellent regular and occasional correspondents, besides the PRIZE TALES and ESSAYS on particularly interesting subjects, (for which premiums have already been offered,) will surely render the volume worthy of patronage. For thus will we be enabled pleasantly and usefully to vary its contents with doctrinal, moral and practical SERMONS and ESSAYS, EXPLANATIONS and ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE, RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE, scientific and literary MISCELLANY, and POETRY.

Notwithstanding the present high prices of the necessities and comforts of life, while our terms remain as low as ever, we have thus added very materially to our publishing expenses to make these additional improvements. Burdened as we are with a heavy debt, (contracted by the purchase of the establishment,) nothing but the sanguine hope, that we will be liberally supported in our efforts to foster pure piety and devotion, and promote moral and intellectual improvement among our readers, could have warranted these extra expenditures. Shall this hope be disappointed? Can no more good subscribers be added to our list, and all now on the list, be retained? It depends on our faithful agents and friends to answer these questions. In their kind exertions we confide, assuring them that no pains nor cost, in our power to bestow, will be spared to render the Magazine and Advocate the equal in merit, as it is in cheapness, of any Universalist paper in the United States.

CONDITIONS.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE will be published every Friday, commencing with January, 1837, on a royal sheet, good paper and fair type, in a neat quarto form, each number containing eight pages, (the volume, four hundred and sixteen,) including a complete index at the close of the year, at $1.50 per annum, in advance; $2.00 if not paid within three months; and $2.50 if not paid within the year. Agents or Companies paying for eight copies, will be allowed the sixth copy gratis; and so in proportion for any number over three. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money be paid in advance; and none discontinued until all arrearages are paid. Punctuality will be expected and required. A failure to notify a discontinuance before the close of one volume, will be considered as renewing subscription for the next.

AGENTS.—Universalist ministers in good standing, and responsible men, especially Postmasters, friendly to the work, and disposed to assist in extending its circulation and usefulness.

All communications to the Publishers or Editors (unless they enclose at least a five dollar bill) must be POST PAID OR FREE.

Names of new subscribers must be returned by the first of January, 1837, or as soon thereafter as possible, to the Proprietors.

PRAYING MACHINES.

BY REV. O. WHISTON.

Even in this teeming age of invention, I doubt not but the caption of this article will startle some sensitive mind. "A praying machine! who ever heard of it?"—A few days since, while looking over an old Edinburg Review, I found the following description of one which I copy for publication.

The writer is relating an account of his travels among the Calmucks, and after stating that prayer is one of the principal duties enjoined by Lamaism, goes on to say, "The followers of the Grand Lama have invented praying jennies which do the work to perfection. It is a doctrine amongst them, that as often as the paper, or other substance upon which the prayer is written, is set in motion, this movement of the written prayer is as meritorious as its oral repetition. The Kurada, or praying machine, is therefore constructed upon this principle;—it consists of two cylinders or drums, filled within side with rolls of paper covered with prayers and ejaculations, written in Tongotian, or sacred language. The drums are hung in a neat frame, and are kept on the whirl with great facility, by the simple contrivance of a string and crank; and every turn of the cylinder is equivalent to the repetition of all the prayers contained in it.

"The turning of the Kurada is an agreeable pastime in the long evenings of the Winter; but the Tartar ingenuity has discovered a method of dispensing even with this slight exertion. We make 'swift trochais' roast our meat—they employ the smoke-jack to say their prayers for them—and the Kurada which spins over the fire in the midst of their hut, transfers all its devotional merit to its owner! The Monguls are yet more wisely economical of individual responsibility. Amongst them the inhabitants of a district construct a Kurada at their joint expense, which is placed in a mill house, beside a running stream, and this subscription Kurada is made so large that it holds prayers enough to serve for all the parish, and consequently, except in seasons of uncommon drought, when the water is too low to turn the mill which grinds prayers for the parishioners, they are completely exonerated from the obligations of wasting their time in the Churule, or Temple."

Here we have the description of a praying machine, somewhat new to us—but the question arises, Do not many people in our day, adopt the labor-saving principle to accomplish the same object? Do not too many pray by proxy, and make a machine of their minister? Let a person survey a congregation of modern, fashionable worshippers, during the hour of prayer, and how many will appearances lead him to believe, are joining in that solemn service? Let him notice the sly wink—the stifled laugh—the look that speaks, and the thousand modes adopted for silent conversation, and he will be disposed to think that a large majority of them have invested their interests in a praying jenny.

But we see this praying by machinery more fully in operation during a protracted meeting. Here, as among the Calmucks, "small rolls of paper are covered with prayers," and handed into the hands of the machinist, by different portions of the congregation—some for a heretic father, some for an abandoned husband, some for a Universalist brother, till the hour of starting the machine arrives, when Jedediah turns the "crank," and the whole work is in full operation, and the business of perhaps a thousand prayers is done (in the language of Jedediah) "as easy as to turn your hand over." Now, if people must pray by proxy, would it not be well to adopt the Calmuck machine at once, which would be less injurious to man, and full as acceptable to God?

SYMPATHY.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

"Teach me to feel another's wo."

There is no virtue, perhaps, more beneficial to intellectual existence—none that more adorns and dignifies the children of men, than sympathy. I mean not the sympathy that gathers flame from the wild-fire of the passions, and spreads in its course, confusion and despair—intoxicating the understanding, and drying up the fountain of benevolence and compassion, which, otherwise, might flow in refreshing streams from the human heart and bless mankind. Oh, no; but that deep fellow-feeling which originates from the "divinity within us"—that inspires the heart to deeds of love, and thus fulfils the Gospel law. I mean the sympathy that draws our feet to the house of mourning, where the heart is softened, and therefore enabled to lay aside its selfishness, and "weep with those that weep"—that stretcheth forth the hand with liberality to the needy and perishing—protects and consoles the widow in her loneliness—fosters the lorn and helpless orphan, and strives to meliorate the condition of the suffering children of humanity, whether friends or foes, wherever we find them.

"Jesus wept:" and, as he went about doing good, mingled the tear of sympathy in the cup of human wo. Is he our pattern—our leader? and shall we not follow him? The tear of sympathy is a cordial to the afflicted—is registered in heaven as a gem of eternal lustre, awarded to those who adhere to the richest precepts of the divine law.

"Do unto others, as ye would that others should do unto you." In keeping this command there is great reward, and the kingdom of heaven is within us. "Great peace have they that love this law, and nothing shall offend them." There are numerous avenues to the human heart, and all are crowded with propensities, good or ill. O! may the good preponderate, and bear away on virtue's wings, from heart to heart, the delicious blessings of harmony and peace; and as the kingdom of heaven is within us, may it also be round about us. Thus may the domestic circle become a compact of love and concord; peace and good will flow from neighbor to neighbor; community rejoice with community—wide and more wide,

Philanthropy her genial influence shed,
Through every heart; through all the world be spread;
Till all are taught to feel for other's wo,
And earth becomes a paradise below.

Go, thou brother, and thou sister, "and learn the luxury of doing good," before the days come, "when you shall say I have no pleasure in them"—when the lighting down of "the grasshopper shall become a burden upon the bending shoulder;" and ye shall need the support ye are no longer able to bestow.—Yea, go while the rich hue of the rose is upon thy cheek—while youth and health revel at thy heart and through thy veins impetuously flow—go, seek the breaking heart; dress the wounds with the healing balsam of sympathy and fraternal attentions—go, visit the abodes of want and wretchedness; thankful that thy "liberal heart deviseth liberal things," and that from the table of Providence thy cup is made to overflow with blessings whereby ye are enabled to cause the hearts of the pale subjects of poverty, to "leap for joy." Where disease and pain seize upon the mortal frame, and death stands upon the threshold, eager for his prey, be thou there to hush each sound that may disturb—moisten the fevered lips—smoothe the uneasy pillow—wipe with a gentle hand, the damps of death from the marble brow; and when "heart and flesh fail," cheer the fleeting spirit in its departure from time, with the Christian's hope. These do, and the "blessing of those who are ready to perish shall rest upon you,"—even "the soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy." "For ye have one Father, and all ye are brethren."

CONTENTMENT.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

In our eagerness to grasp at some future good, we are too apt to overlook present blessings. There are many, and those I believe embrace the greater portion of mankind, who live only in the future; there is nothing that they possess at the present time, which appears worthy their attention; but at some future period, when they have accomplished such and such an undertaking—have accumulated a little more wealth—advanced another step toward the goal of fame, or have freed themselves from some of the cares of business which now press so heavily upon them, they then intend to enjoy the fruits of their labors. But do we ever realize in full, our anticipations of the future? The experience of the past teaches us that we do not; for even if we succeed in accomplishing all our plans of future aggrandizement, do they bring the expected happiness? Our dispositions remain the same, ever in pursuit of a phantom mis-called happiness, while the reality, under the name of contentment, is in the power of the humblest individual to obtain. We mistake the gaudy trappings of fashion, the allurements of frivolity, or the proud and haughty majesty of power, for that which is only to be found in the modest and unassuming dress and demeanor of content—which is oftener to be found by quietly performing the duties enjoined by charity and industry, in the walks of humble life, than in the palaces of wealth and power.

But it is impossible to attain to that state of contentment, which will enable us to endure with calmness the revolutions of this ever changing world, unless we accustom ourselves to look upon every dispensation, whether joyous or grievous, as emanating from the hand of a wise and good God, who ordereth every thing aright, and who, as a kind and benevolent Father, seeks the good of his children; and every situation in which he sees fit to place us, as that which is most proper for us, and will finally result in our good, although we may not be able to understand why. He who sees the end from the beginning, cannot err; and He who is perfect in goodness, will never cause one useless pang, or allow one tear to drop in vain.

Then let us, instead of repining that we do not possess more of this world's enjoyments, content ourselves with the comforts within our reach, (and believe me they are not few,) relying on the goodness of that God who knows what is best for us, better than we short-sighted creatures—looking forward with confidence to the time when we shall realize to the full extent, that happiness which all are in pursuit of, but which can only be found in the immediate presence of Him who is the dispenser of all good.

GOD'S PROVIDENCES.

BY REV. W. BULLARD.

In all the providences of God, whether special or general, the good—the best good—the highest happiness of man is doubtless the great, primary object. We say doubtless, because no other view of the subject can be made to harmonize with his adorable nature and exalted attributes. The nature and attributes of God, are the broad foundation upon which is established all our rational views touching the designs of his moral government—it is the grand criterion by which, alone, we can judge correctly of the nature of his dealings with the children of men. This settled, (and certainly none will question the position,) with a clear and enlightened knowledge of God, we can not mistake in our conclusions concerning the great and primary object of his providences. Nor do we hazard any thing in giving it as our opinion, that all who are in possession of the knowledge of the true character of God, will also be found to agree with us in our definition of this object, as given above. Indeed, as to the real character of God, abstractly considered, there is in reality little or no difference of opinion. Nor, when we consider that a clear and enlightened knowledge of the character of God is necessary to a rational belief in his existence, should we think there would be any want of information, at least in a Christian community, on this subject. Were it possible, however, to suppose any one ignorant or mistaken relative to the character of God, we would only request such an one to open his eyes, at least for once in his life, and see for himself. Behold, then, thou blind mortal, the power, wisdom and benignity of Jehovah stamped upon the broad face of universal nature, and doubt no longer concerning his character. "The heavens declare the glory of God." In the wide spread firmament, his handy work is displayed most conspicuously. The rain and sunshine bespeak his impartial and unvarying goodness. Our blessed Saviour refers us to the wonderful works of God displayed in nature, as illustrative of his loving kindness and universal benevolence.

How beautifully the holy Bible harmonizes with the works of its sublime and adorable Author. What a striking coincidence is every where observable between the works and dealings of God in nature and providence, and the teachings of Christ and the apostles! Christ teaches us to address our Creator by the fond and endearing appellation of Father. And the character of a father is that of a friend—a never-failing benefactor. The beloved apostle sums up the attributes of God in one word—love. "God is love." Love comprehends all that can be said of him. It bespeaks his true character in the fullest possible manner. His name—his nature—yea, his very essence is love—unmixed, undivided, undervived. And we are assured that "love worketh no ill." Turning our eyes again, to gaze upon the face of creation, we are ready to exclaim—O, how conspicuously is the love of God displayed throughout the varied, the unbounded scenery which we behold! Ask me not where its evidences are seen, but rather where they are not.

"It warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
 Glows in the stars, blossoms on the trees;
 Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

The Bible and nature unite in declaring, that in all the thoughts, and ways, and works of God concerning the children of men, he designs the promotion of our happiness. Though portentous clouds arise, and seeming evils prevail, they are sent but to chasten us for our sins—restore us to obedience, and consequent happiness. "Whom the Lord loveth he correcteth, even as the father the son in whom he delighteth." Whether he rewards us for our virtues, or punishes us for our vices, his motive is the same—the advancement of our ultimate good. Alike in what he withholds, as in what he gives; "the same yesterday, to-day and forever"; keeping steadily in view the salvation and felicity of his creatures. "Let every thing that hath breath, praise the Lord!"

FRUITS OF PARTIALISM.
 BY REV. W. H. WAGGONER.

It was about the last of April, when the deep snows of a long and tedious winter were wasting beneath the rays of the returning sun—when the gladsome verdure of Spring was once more presenting itself, brightening the countenance and gladdening the heart of man—as nature's songsters were commencing their rapturous anthems on boughs bending to the refreshing breeze—that the writer was journeying on horse-back to meet an appointment he had been requested to make not far from T—F—, a place of great resort in the summer season. He was plodding his way slowly along, unconscious of any danger—meditating on the duties of his profession, and the subject he thought of presenting to his congregation the following day—when, all of a sudden, his horse was affrighted and threw him into the road, which was filled with snow, mud and water. Fortunately no limbs were broken—but he was considerably hurt, and his clothes bore the aspect of the place he had just been in. It was near the residence of Mr. K—, a believer in God's impartial and efficient grace, who had a short time previously, heard the writer preach a discourse in its defence, and respectfully and fraternally invited him to call at his house, when convenient. I was truly much relieved, after beholding my unfortunate situation, by the reflection that, in yonder dwelling lived a man, professing that religion, which consists in binding up the broken-hearted, and raising up those that are "bruised and half-dead." I accordingly moved toward the place where I thought of meeting with a hearty welcome, and where I should receive all necessary attention. I entered the house, and Mrs. K—, perceiving that I was lame and not a little muddy, at first manifested some sympathy, and gave me her attention. But as soon as my name was mentioned, all was changed—for she was a Partialist, and had heard that I was a preacher of that doctrine which teaches that all have one Father, and that all are heirs to the same unpurchased blessings beyond the confines of the tomb. A sudden gloom came over her countenance—her sympathy became malevolence and hatred, and she spoke forth the words of bitterness to those around. The dinner, which was in preparation, was removed—her sons came in from their work, and when they inquired about dinner, she abruptly replied—"If you want any, go to the closet." She treated me with the utmost contempt, and in fact done all but tell me to leave the house. Perceiving all this, and asking myself, can this be Christianity? I soon made for the door, bade her good day—but she said not a word. The kindness and attention shown me at that time, by Mr. K—, is remembered with gratitude—but, dear reader, what think you of the conduct of his wife?

RETURN HOME.

Messrs. EDITORS.—It has often been remarked by different speakers and writers, that "man is a creature of circumstances," and although I have not heretofore had any just reason for doubting the correctness of such an idea, yet I think I have of late, gathered facts from my own experience which will amount to ocular demonstration of the truth of the above oft-repeated assertion. You will recollect, that it is but a short time since I addressed you, requesting you to notify the public that I was about starting for the southern part of the State of Ohio, with the expectation of spending the Winter in that section, etc. I now write again, for the purpose of asking you to do me a favor by counteracting that notice, I have been absent from this place about two months, most of which time I spent in Michigan. I am not unsuspicious of the fact, that some of my beloved brethren in this vicinity, attribute the cause of my journey to the unsatisfied cravings of an appetite for travel. I will not deny that I have more than an average development of the travelling propensity—but I am far from believing that I should be willing to undergo the labor, fatigue and privations incident to a Western tour, without any other consideration than the mere gratification of this propensity—knowing at the same time, that it must necessarily be to my own pecuniary disadvantage. My word for it, brethren, the moving cause of my leaving this vicinity and going West, was the prospect of recovering my health. Having experienced the desired effect, I return back contented and satisfied, feeling thankful to my heavenly Father for the beneficial result.

I have only to add, that I wish all papers and communications intended for me to be directed to GAINES, ORLEANS Co., N. Y.; as I intend making this my stopping place for the present. I am not at present under any engagements—during the coming Winter I expect to employ my time in supplying destitute societies and neighborhoods with the preached word, in this part of our Master's heritage—and in the Spring, I anticipate settling again in some place where I think my labors will be profitable and acceptable. KINDNESS.....No. III.

"I was sick, and ye visited me."

See that youth in the joy of life—health imparts vigor and elasticity to his limbs—all his motions are fraught with pleasurable sensations—his eye sparkles with vivacity and delight, and his countenance blooms with animation and beauty.

But disease soon comes and lays his hand upon him. His enervated limbs refuse to perform their wonted office—his eyes sink, their lustre fades, and his rosy features are exchanged for the wanness of paralyzing sickness. He who is the inspiring soul of the gay circle, visits it no more—the little party of congenial hearts have lost one of their number, who flitted in the sunshine of youthful sports and gave zest to all their pleasure—he is not there, and the music of his voice is changed to languor and hollow groans!

Approach his bed of languishing; it is hung around with the solemn emblems of desolation! The very furniture seems to partake of the sufferings of its prostrate associate. The noiseless footsteps of his assiduous attendants seems the prelude to the grasp of the icy hand of death; while the softened whisper of anxious inquiry and responding doubt, impart a contagious gloom to the bodings of affection.

Hark! 'Tis the feeble voice of the sufferer. He inquires, where are my friends? Where are those who once hailed me to the social party—whose cheerful converse beguiled the passing hours, and whose friendship seemed so assimilating as to leave us but one soul? Have these forgotten me in this hour of darkness and suffering? Is it only in the sunny days of happiness and health that they smile upon me? And am I to languish in solitude through these days and nights of pain: made long and dreary by protracted suffering? To these inquiries, a voice of kindness responds. One friend is there; the faithful representative of all others. And commonly it is woman's voice. Yes, woman, who supports our infant steps, wreathes the garland of joy that crowns the brow of youth and manhood, and mingles her sympathies in every scene of life, forgets us not, forsakes us not, but watches over and smoothes the pillow of sickness, and closes our eyes on time forever.

Thus pure kindness will ever act. In the sunshine of prosperity and health, when all is light and life and joy, it will sink perhaps into the shade. But when the clouds of gathering adversity and distress are hovering above our heads, dense and dark—when sickness in its devastating influence, shows its power in the pale and ghastly sufferer; then the hand of kindness, as an angel of light and mercy standing in the holy beams of benevolence which glow from the fount of Jehovah's love, comes with its healing balm and pours its cheering draught into the soul borne down with sickness and pain.

Be wise, ye mortals, and let your wisdom guide you to the suffering sons and daughters of humanity; and when there, let kindness have its work, and you will have performed deeds that angels will delight to dwell upon.

ARGUMENT FOR CHRISTIANITY.

Having just finished a careful perusal of this elegant little volume, by Br. I. D. Williamson, recently from the press of P. Price and Co., New-York, I feel great pleasure in acknowledging the high gratification derived from its perusal, and I do most cheerfully and earnestly recommend it to the attention of the public.

I consider it unnecessary to give an analysis of the work. Suffice it to say, its plan is original, its execution admirable, its style plain and terse, its arguments conclusive, its spirit devotional, its illustrations pertinent and clear; and, as a whole, it is remarkably well calculated to instruct and convince the mind and improve the heart. It is an honor to its author, to the denomination to which he belongs, and to Christianity. It tends to inspire richly deserved respect for the Bible as a gracious revelation from the Father of mercies to a sinful world, and remove darkness and doubt from the unbeliever's mind; and I trust it will descend to posterity among the long catalogue of similar works, which unanswerably show that the glorious temple of Christianity rests upon an imperishable foundation.

[Our subscriber, and the author of the following address, in our behalf, to the readers of this paper, merits our thanks and gratitude, (not the less due because he is personally a stranger to us,) for the earnest and forcible manner in which he pleads for our interests, and through them, the advancement of the cause in which we are engaged, and with which we feel those interests to be closely connected. The matters named in his letter to us, were noticed last week.

TO THE READERS OF THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

Dear BROTHERS AND SISTERS—The idea that it would be a good plan for every reader of the Magazine and Advocate to obtain another subscriber, and thus at once double its circulation, the number of its readers, and consequently the amount of good it was then doing; as well as to more amply reward the publishers for their great expenses, and the great weight of care and anxiety that necessarily devolves upon them, was suggested some time since, I think, by one of its editors. I then thought it was practicable, and I still think it is. Though I had little time to spare, being under the necessity of improving it all for the support of a large family—though I lived in one of the darkest corners of the universe, (if Limitarianism and superstition have the power to darken)—still I set myself about it, and after conversing and arguing with a great number, at length succeeded in gaining one, J. R.—, four miles from where I lived.

Now, brothers and sisters, I verily believe that every reader of this paper might obtain an additional subscriber, (myself again, of course among the rest,) by taking the same trouble and pains that I took to obtain the one above mentioned. And more than this,—as I said, I live in a dark place; and the same amount of labor bestowed in the same way, would, in general, obtain more than one. As a new volume of this valuable paper is soon to commence, I propose that every reader of it, whether old or young, male or female, exert him or herself to obtain another subscriber. If this could be brought about, (and I see no reason why it cannot,) the amount of good done would be almost incalculable.

Can those who believe that "God is good unto all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works?"—"That every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father," look upon the transactions of the present day without the deepest sorrow? Can they contrast their own happiness—the calm serenity that pervades their own bosoms—with the doleful nightly yells, groans, and screams, which issue from those collections of poor deluded mortals, called revival meetings, without feeling the greatest anxiety to reclaim them from the errors of their ways, and from the follies they have embraced; and bring them back to decency and order, and set their feet in the blessed paths of truth and peace? If any of us who call ourselves Universalists, are so hard-hearted and careless as to pay little attention to these things, and care little about them, unless fanaticism and insanity find their way into our own families, let us remember that we know not how far the poison may spread, or where it may stop. I am satisfied that the mind of a child may, in one hour, be wrought upon in such a manner as to affect it more or less the rest of its life. But this selfish principle is not the one on which we ought to act! We, ought to care for all—feel for all. Are we not "all of one blood"?—are we not "all brethren"? If we are, and really feel as we ought, towards those who "know not the way of peace," we shall do all that we can to reclaim and enlighten them: and can we do, as much any other way, with the same labor, as to obtain, each one of us, another subscriber? Can we not think of some neighbor, (whether he is, or is not, a Universalist,) who through love of truth, or information, or novelty, or through the habit of reading something or other, may be prevailed upon to subscribe for it? If we have no such neighbor, have we not acquaintances in another neighborhood, or another town, who will subscribe; and also use their influence to obtain others? Now, brothers and sisters, let us all (and remember that we believe all means all) sit about this, with a determination never to give it up, until we have each one of us accomplished our task. Remembering at the same time, that the greater good may be accomplished by making payment in advance.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Messrs. EDITORS—Permit me, although an entire stranger to you, to acknowledge myself a believer in and an advocate of that doctrine which, "in accents sweet as angels use," whispers peace—that which was taught by all God's holy prophets since the world began; and that which you have been so ardently engaged in disseminating. You are engaged in one of the most benevolent of all causes; and it is my earnest desire and prayer to the Father and Benefactor of all mankind, that you may be sustained and encouraged in such a glorious undertaking.

Once I was led to believe in the tradition of the Elders, that a part of mankind were reduced to the awful necessity of wailing beneath the ire of God's eternal wrath. But, thank God, the scales have fallen from my eyes; and I can now say, as one of old, that "whereas I was once blind, now I see." I now can, in the doctrine of the Gospel, and the purposes of God, recognize the wide-spread family of man saved with an everlasting salvation, and introduced into that better, brighter and fairer world on high. I rejoice in the anticipation of that long-wished for and happy period, when death shall be destroyed, and him that hath the power of death, that is the devil. And as the poet hath most beautifully expressed it,

"Then the end, beneath his rod Man's last enemy shall fall—
Hallelujah! Christ in God,
God in Christ, is all in all."

He who believes in the doctrine of God's universal goodness and benevolence to all mankind—that a being of almighty power, unerring wisdom, and unbounded love, is seated at the helm of affairs, and is making every event promote in its appointed measure, the highest happiness of all intelligent creatures—must possess perpetual serenity and peace. The storm of adversity may gather above him, and burst upon his head; but he is prepared against it, and it can not dismay him. He knows that the evils which encompass him are only blessings in disguise. The fair face of nature smiles upon him with a brighter radiance; and enables him to bask in the warmth of God's eternal love. "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love,—dwelleth in God, and God in him." How expressive and appropriate!

"Love, and her sister fair, the soul,
Twin born from heaven together came.
Love will the universe control,
When dying seasons lose their name;
Divine abodes shall own its power,
When time and death shall be no more."

The person who habitually contemplates all mankind as the children of one common Father, and appointed to one common destiny, can not be a persecutor or a bigot. His heart swells with love to God and good will to man. He glories in acknowledging this boundless affinity. He exclaims with Malachi, "Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us?" This Father of all, is good unto all, his tender mercies extend as far as the human track has marked the soil. To the utmost of his ability, he will enlighten the ignorant, correct the erring, sustain the weak, bear with the prejudiced, and reclaim the vicious. Many people have entertained mistaken notions respecting the doctrine in which I am a humble believer; they contend that it leads to licentiousness—which is as far from truth as light is from darkness. If there is an individual in all the world, who is under strong obligation to love God with all the heart, soul, might, mind and strength, and those around him as himself, and to serve God with all his powers and faculties, it is he who believes that God will, in his own good time, reunite, or re-head all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him. Will not man be inclined to imitate the God he worships? Hear then what the Universalists must imitate. "I am the Lord God, gracious and merciful, long suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, slow to anger—I will not always contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth," etc.

Here is a positive declaration from the infallible God, who himself is invariable truth, that he will not contend with his offspring for ever. And I think it is logical reasoning, and a just conclusion, from this declaration, that when this universal bowing takes place, and this universal acknowledgment is made, then all rebellion will cease, and when this rebellion ceases, then transgression, sin, and iniquity, will come to an end, and everlasting righteousness be brought in and permanently established and enjoyed by the ransomed family of man.

Syracuse, N. Y., 1836.

THE THREE-FOLD CORD.

The Gospel binds the heart of the believer to virtuous obedience to God, by a three-fold cord, which is not easily broken. 1. By teaching that God governs the world, and all its wants, with reference to our greatest ultimate good, it produces that confidence in him, whose sure concomitant is filial love. 2. It places before the mind the divine universal benevolence, as a pattern of moral perfectness, and breathes this spirit through all its doctrines. 3. It places happiness, which is the grand object of human pursuit, and which alone makes life a present good,—this it places in obedience to the laws of Him, towards whom it inspires the before named confidence and love. "A three-fold cord is not quickly broken."—Eccl. iv. 12.—Gospel Sun.

Ignorance and prejudice go hand in hand. They are twin sisters. Where you find one you will the other. Those who are strongly prejudiced against any sentiment, are always ignorant of that sentiment.

EXTRACT FROM A LECTURE

On the universal diffusion of knowledge, delivered before the Utica Bazaar Institute, November 15, 1836.

BY A. R. BARTLETT.

One more consideration, and I have done with this division of my subject.

It is with considerable diffidence and hesitation that I approach this almost forbidden ground.—But since it demands our highest estimation and should receive our most candid attention, and inasmuch as my intention is to give offence to none, I hope none will be taken while I touch gently upon it.

The doctrine and precepts of Christianity, and a just appreciation of the character and attributes of our heavenly Father, are as absolutely necessary to the prosperity of a nation, as they are to the happiness of individuals. A man who is ignorant of these principles, is ignorant of every thing good. A nation that is destitute of this knowledge, is like a ship without a rudder, perfectly unmanageable. It cannot prosper. In fact, true religious knowledge embraces literature, the sciences, political and domestic economy, the social relations and moral obligations.

Religion! it is the light of eternal truth, which dispels the darkness of monkish abomination, heathen idolatry, maddening bigotry and stygian infidelity. It is our hope for time, our sure anticipation for eternity. It is the orphan's consolation, and the friend of the fatherless. It is the poor man's riches, and the rich man's plenty. It is the young man's best companion, and a staff for the aged. It is the safety of nations, and the highest bliss of the world. It is the breeze that wafts our frail barque across life's tempestuous ocean—it is the helmsman that guides us into the blissful haven of rest, where no winds howl nor tempests rage, but where all is peace, serenity and love.

But ignorance is also the author of certain doctrines, which it impiously calls religion; but which I shall take the liberty to call false religion. It assumes as many shapes as there are dispositions to embrace it—completely accommodating its doctrines to the multifarious passions of its advocates. It is very complex and contradictory, because its followers love mystery and ignorance. It is fond of secrecy, and has many secret wills in opposition to its revealed wills, which are known only to its favorites: they are consequently very much opposed to honest inquirers after truth, and frequently insult them by exclaiming, "O, it's a mystery that sinners cannot understand!" It is a great lover of missions, as its subjects "encompass sea and land to make one proselyte." And, what is the result? Why, they make him "two fold more the child of hell," than he was before.

Again; it assumes, many times, to be very tender hearted, and frequently absolves from all punishment, and its subjects profess great love for the souls of their neighbors, and an ardent solicitude that they should join "our church." It is very partial; having selected a very few, "without any foresight of faith or good works," as the objects of its highest favor: because its disciples love their brethren, and cannot bear the thought that all should be saved from their sins! It is also extremely revengeful; having "passed by and ordained the rest" to eternal hell fire, because its disciples cannot endure the dreadful torment of enjoying perfect bliss in company with that wicked, ungodly old neighbor?

But I forbear! I am sick with a picture so true, yet so horrid! Wisdom never conceived such thoughts. Knowledge never uttered such a sentiment. It would be tongue-tied with the most distant thought thereof! Charity, benevolence, mercy—all the finer feelings of the soul would be annihilated if such were truth.

And yet, such sentiments have been palmed off upon the ignorant and the unwary, as the genuine principles of true religion. Thousands have believed them, and trembled. Such is the effect of ignorance. Flee from it, my friends, as you would from the contaminating touch of guilt. Seek to destroy its influence by promoting and promulgating that wisdom which is from on high; and not only teach by precept, but by example. Practice pure religion at home and abroad, in public and in private—let wisdom be the man of your counsel, and happy are ye.

EXCOMMUNICATION AND DEFENCE.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON.—Four years ago, I was a believer in, and a zealous advocate of the doctrine of endless misery. But by becoming acquainted with Universalism and comparing it with the Scriptures, I became convinced that I had been blinded by prejudice, and ignorance of the doctrine I opposed. My attention was called to the subject, partly by misrepresentations and abuse from the pulpit, which were dealt out without measure upon Universalists, and which when less acquainted with their sentiments, I might have taken for truth. I watched the effect of prejudice, and popularity, and other causes which conspire to blind the human heart, for about two years, and found their influence very great. But I was a member of the Congregational church, and much attached to its members, among whom I had resided from my childhood; my relatives here, also, were mostly members of the same church, and as ignorant of the doctrine of Universalism as I had been. I knew I should be looked upon as a heretic and an outcast. I felt that I was no better than others, and while a doubt remained of the boundless love of Jehovah, and I was compelled to act upon some principle, I almost sank under the weight of my responsibility.

Thanks be to the Father of mercies, these clouds of darkness were removed, and my duty appeared clear as the noon-day. I became convinced that the doctrine of universal love is the only doctrine that will do to live by, and in which a Christian can imitate our heavenly Father and be perfect; and I almost felt it a privilege that I might suffer reproach for the cause of Christ. I embraced the first convenient opportunity of opening my mind to our pastor, the Rev. Mr. Dady, and such of our church members, as took the trouble to inquire about my belief.

Soon a delegation appeared from the church, to convince me of the awful consequences of continuing in the disbelief of the doctrine of endless misery. But I still continued to believe that the Lord is good unto all, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever; and consequently was summoned to appear before the church to receive trial, on the 25th of March last, as mentioned by your correspondent "D." in his article entitled, "Heresy defined." See No. 16, current volume of the Magazine and Advocate. I inquired if I should have an opportunity of speaking in my own defence, and was answered that I probably might, if I would say nothing against their "Confession of Faith." I replied, that I merely wanted to make a statement of my views before the church, and would not object to being judged according to the rules of their Confession, in a charitable and Christian-like manner. But when the time arrived, behold their charity!

It was the practice of the pastor, or Moderator, when a question was brought before the church, to say, "what is the pleasure of the church?" without previously expressing his opinion upon the subject. But when they commenced examination by a short mode of questioning, I answered in Scripture language; and then remarked that I wished to make a brief statement of my views in my own manner, that they might be thoroughly acquainted with my sentiments. To this the Moderator replied, that it was in the power of the church to say whether I might do so or not; and then proceeded in a long and labored argument, to show that it would be worse than useless.—"For," said he, "if unanswered, it may make an impression on the minds of some which will never be erased—and if we calculate to answer her, she may say something which it will take us three days to refute." Another objection was, that it would be a "waste of time"—precious time, reserved for more important topics—such as appointing the hour of commencing, next day, to get wood for their pastor—whether they could all get there by sunrise—whether they could wait till noon for their dinner, or whether they should carry a luncheon in their pockets, etc. Another objection was, that I might, if allowed, say something irrelevant to the point! Careful people! did they think, that by saying a few unnecessary words, I should bring a greater disgrace upon myself, than the censure of the whole church without saying any thing?

These were some of the principal objections urged; and though there were some few who expressed a willingness, and even a desire to hear my defence before condemning me, yet they were overruled by their bigoted leader and his obedient followers. They then resumed their questions, to which I quoted answers from the Bible, which they were pleased to term evasions, equivocations, etc. This did not please them, as they had requested me to answer "yes" or "no"; but as I did not like to condemn myself thus without a chance to tell the whole truth, I answered in Scripture language. Finding that they could not condemn me without condemning the Bible, they concluded to prove me guilty of heresy; but again failed for want of witnesses. They then proposed to postpone the remainder of the trial till the next church-meeting; but as I wished to have the affair brought to a close with as little trouble as possible, I concluded to admit their charges in the following particulars—viz: for denying the endless punishment of devils and wicked men in the coming world, and for believing that the final end of all mankind will be peace and happiness." Whereupon the Rev. Moderator appealed to each of the men and boys present, to know if they considered that heresy, to which they all answered in the affirmative; for they well knew by this time, that if they did not, they were liable to be charged with heresy, also, and condemned without a hearing. Consequently I was suspended from those blessed "privileges," for three months; during which time I wrote the following letter to Mr. Dady, but have received no answer.

I mention these things, not to return evil for evil, but to let people know how the righteous of this world—the self-styled favorites of Heaven, exercise charity towards those that differ from them in opinion. Because people are unacquainted with our sentiments, they are here, as every where, spoken against; and the prejudices of the unenlightened, are in favor of our opposers. Shall we therefore give up our rights, and sit down in silent stupor, and have our liberty taken from us, our names held forth to the world as a scorn and derision, friend after friend admonished not to associate with us, and the warm grasp of Christian affection exchanged for the cold side glance of the popular worldling, or more cruel shafts of jealousy? Does the example of our divine Master require this? I think not.

I will trust in the Lord, who has hitherto preserved me, and recompensed me with that peace of mind, that the friendship of the world alone, can never give nor take away. ALMINA PIERCE.

LETTER TO REV. MR. DADY.

SIR—After returning from the church-meeting, on the 25th of March, at which I was suspended from your communion, and notice given that my case would be attended to again in three months, I opened the Confession of Faith and read chap. 10, Art. 4.—"After any person hath been thus suspended from the sacraments, it is proper that the minister and Elders and other Christians should frequently converse with him....that it would please God to give him repentance." This gave me encouragement to hope that I should have a suitable opportunity to converse upon this important subject with you, if not with the whole church. And I reasonably expected, that, in proportion to your anxiety for my reformation, would be your zeal in trying to convince me of my error. But nearly three months have elapsed, and not a word has been said to me by you, or any member of your church, upon the subject of religion in any form. I am anxious to know why you took so decided a stand against me. How could you have known the sentiments of my heart? we never had but one short conversation on the subject, and that was several months previous to my suspension. And so little did the church in general know of my views, that when the proposal was made, not two witnesses could be found in the whole congregation to condemn me, as brother Sykes was providentially detained from meeting. It is said in the Confession of Faith, Chap. 10, Art. 21—"If any accused person feel unable to represent and plead his own cause to advantage, he may request any minister or elder belonging to the judicatory before which he appears, to prepare and exhibit his cause as he may judge proper." And you even went so far as to offer me this counsel. But I, supposing that a person whose mind and wishes were in opposition to my views, and who had pledged himself to support an opposite doctrine, was by no means suitable to make my defence—did not accept of your offer. If it was your intention to deprive me of a chance to "represent and plead my own cause," why did you not inform me of it when the offer was made? On the contrary, encouragement was given that I should have this opportunity.

We know that where the spirit of God is, there is liberty; and ought not a church-member, when tried before a church for difference of opinion, to have as much liberty as a thief or murderer when tried before a civil court? The liberty of defence, no tribunal, short of the inquisition, ever refuses. When you began to question me with regard to my belief, I told you it was my desire that the church should be fully acquainted with my sentiments, and wished to make a plain and simple statement of my views, with due respect to the church, and then in compliance with your rules cheerfully submit to your decision. And when you replied, "we want no instructions nor any lectures on Universalism—we know enough about that now!" I was astonished, and felt that I was publicly insulted. Where, Sir, did you learn enough about Universalism? Was it while visiting from house to house, telling the young ladies that no respectable people ever attend a Universalist meeting, and none that think any thing of themselves? Surely, then, if you think any thing of yourself, and act accordingly, you never attended one. Have you not, on the contrary, shut your eyes, stopped your ears, and prejudiced your mind as much as possible against Universalism and Universalists?

It appears to me that your answer, and other observations made there, clearly showed that Universalism was what you feared it to be. You knew too well, the power of the doctrine of God's unmerited and boundless love to man, to permit it to be presented to your church by one who had felt its influence. If the error I had embraced was a monster of so hideous a mien, it need only be seen to be hated. Why did you not let them hear the worst of it, from my own mouth, and then take the word of God, your Confession of Faith, Christian experience, reason, common sense, or all these combined, and convince me of my error; or at least show to others how beautiful truth is when compared with falsehood? Did you forget that the word of God is quick and powerful?

But perhaps it is not yet too late for you to convince me of my error; and I sincerely hope that a sense of the worth of the immortal soul—the awful tendency of the doctrines of the impartial and boundless love of God—the influence I may have upon others—and (may I add) the respectability of your station, will influence you to take one step with a view to bring about my reformation; at least, before you proceed to "inspire all with fear by the example of my punishment—warning the people to avoid all unnecessary intercourse with the one so cast out," according to your Confession of Faith, Chap. 10, Art. 7, Directory for worship. I hope you will answer this, and correct any mistakes under which I may labor; for I believe that my mind is open to conviction, and I desire, however expensive, to buy the truth and sell it not.

Yours, with due respect, ALMINA PIERCE.

From the Trumpet.

TO THE REV. THOMAS J. SAWYER,

Secretary of the Universalist Historical Society:

DEAR SIR,—It is well known that Universalism exists, to a considerable extent, in most of the great bodies of Protestants, besides our own particular denomination. It prevails in the Lutheran church of Germany; is found among the Reformed Protestant churches of France; in the English church; and among the Dissenters of Great Britain. The Roman Catholic church is supposed to exclude it altogether. But that it exists in that ancient and immense communion, the Greek church, will appear from the extract which I subjoin.

It is translated from a work published, 1816, at Stuttgard, in Germany, entitled, "Considerations sur la Doctrine et l'Esprit de l'Eglise Orthodoxe. Par Alexandre de Stourdza." 8vo. pp. 218. Of its author, Stourdza, I have been able to obtain no other account than that he is, or was, Counsellor of State, to the Emperor of Russia. His book is an exposition of the doctrine and practice of the Greek church, contrasted with those of the Roman Catholic: the whole intended to show the excellence of the former, and the error of the latter.—In the Introduction, he informs us that he wrote it to guard those who went to dwell at St. Petersburg, against certain errors that lurked there: meaning the Roman Catholic, which had crept in, by means, probably, of emigrants and visitors from the South.

While reading the following quotation, we must be careful to keep in mind, that, in what the author says upon future retribution, he is aiming against the Catholic tenet of purgatory—a purgatory where delinquents undergo a gross, material purification, and have their punishment commuted by the alms and prayers of the living. Some of his remarks may seem to bear equally against a cessation of punishment in any way whatsoever. But this is not his meaning; as it will be seen that he holds an ultimate extinction of all evil, and consequent end of all suffering, when God shall be all in all. What is more important to be observed,—he appears to speak, not only for himself, but also for the Greek, or as he calls it, the Orthodox church.

That I may not break the thread of his discourse, I insert his entire chapter on punishment and rewards; although but a part of it relates to the subject in view.

"Every thing shows that the order of things with which we are surrounded, is the fragment of a primitive scheme, infinitely more perfect. Physical nature is but the magnificent prison of man—that royal slave, fallen from his power and grandeur. It presents the mysterious aspect of an arrangement incomplete, which we cannot explain without going back to its origin, and looking forward into the future. Just as any single instant of human life is inexplicable, without a knowledge of what preceded and of what will succeed it, even so the collective existence of the human race, and that of the individuals who compose it, can be comprehended only by means of the doctrine of original sin, and of the penalties and rewards which await us in another life.

"Mankind has always had an instinctive apprehension of a future life, serving as a vindication of the supreme justice, it being an object of hope to the good and of terror to the evil. There exists not a single ancient tradition which does not bear vestiges of that universal belief, whether among savage colonies, or the most civilized nations. The indestructible sentiment of Just and Unjust, which is never satisfied upon this earth, dictates to all mortals that terrible note of appeal, common to all races and all languages. It pierces the vault of heaven, and repeats its echoes through the abysses of ages. The day will come, when the Word of life will respond to these echoes, and absorb them in its majestic concords; and it is from those two voices—of which the one invokes the Deity, and the other arraigns the creation,—that will arise the celestial accord of an eternal harmony.

"Certain modern writers have attempted to impair the sublimity of the doctrine taught by Christianity relative to the rewards and chastisements (chatiments) of a life to come, by bringing to view their affinity with all the fabulous Pagan traditions. But they did not consider that truth is one; and that its separate reflections only prove the reality and energy of the ray that produces them. They did not consider that the edifice of religion, masqued by the scaffolding of ages, existed long before the epoch at which its magnificent courts were opened to us.

"Other individuals, of an unreflecting turn, or of a compassionate temper, have risen in opposition to the doctrine of the eternity and rigor of the pains reserved for the sinner. This comes from their not having elevated their intelligence to the height of an order of things different from that which surrounds us. In reality, time and space, ideas purely relative, have ceased to exist with the soul that is disengaged from terrestrial ties.

"As soon as the soul has passed the threshold of matter, it enters on the domain of eternity. Now, it would be an attempt to measure it and to assign epochs to it,—it would be associating ideas the most contradictory, and supposing gradations in an order of things that are immutable. We are ignorant how long the souls of the dead participate of the visible world; consequently we know not what are the operations of grace towards them: "who hath ever fathomed the depths of the treasures of divine wisdom?"—but it is evident and incontestable that the empire of eternity excludes the possibility of a commutation of rewards and penalties. In order to express an opinion on that awful subject, it would be necessary to know the duration of evil. To attempt to penetrate this, is to become guilty of the most sacrilegious daring. As long as the cause continues, the consequences remain necessary and unalterable. This truth vindicates the doctrine of the perpetuity of pains, such as it is taught by the orthodox [i. e. Greek] church; of which we ought to imitate the wisdom and the humility. The time which man loses in inquiring into the evil which preceded his existence, would be better employed in combating it: and while we apologize for our frailties and crimes, and cherish them by the hope of a purification gross and material, we forget that the essential thing is, to sacrifice them to God. Evil is a corrosive ulcer which exists only negatively. It will cease when there shall be no more victims. How? That is the secret of the eternal God.

"Note: The Scripture points us to that epoch, but very mysteriously, as if beyond our reach. It is designated by the expression, And God shall be all in all.

"Before disputing boldly, then, upon the eternity of pains, and interpreting arbitrarily certain passages of the Gospel, which can never be conclusive, on account of the imperfection of all human language, which is framed on the relative ideas of time and space,—it would first be requisite to know what is the duration of evil. But to attempt to penetrate that, would be sacrilege, as we have said above. It only remains, then, for us to admire the wise course pursued by our church, which does not comment upon a doctrine that cannot be measured by our intelligence. The church of the West, [i. e. the Roman Catholic,] unhappily has not observed the same religious caution, and has seemed to blush at such a holy and reverential reserve. Impatient to possess and to inculcate positive ideas on a subject concerning which we cannot have positive ones, since it does not rest on terrestrial principles,—she has cherished and proclaimed the ambitious doctrine of expiations by the fire of purgatory." pp. 60-64.

I do not recollect that any notice has hitherto appeared among us, of the existence of Universalism in the present Greek church. How far it now prevails in that communion, I cannot say; but it is evident in the last three paragraphs of the above extract, that Stourdza means to involve the church, to a considerable extent at least, in the opinion that there is no other perpetuity of pains than the continuance of suffering for the unknown period in which evil endures; that evil itself will at length cease, in some way not explained to us; and that the Scripture points us, though very mysteriously, to the epoch when it shall be finished, and God become all in all.

I am yours very respectfully,
HOSEA BALLOU, JR.

CONSOLATION FOR MOURNERS.

We not unfrequently hear the assertion made that though Universalism may answer very well for people in the bright hour of prosperity—in the sunny days of earthly bliss—when no cloud of adversity is nigh, no storm of affliction assails; yet it will not suffice in seasons of affliction, when adversity presses heavily upon man, when earthly prospects are blasted, the bitter cup of sorrow presented, disease, and pain, and loss of friends follow each other in quick succession, and the pale king of terrors stares his intended victim full in the face. It is gravely asserted that man then needs something better and more substantial than Universalism, to support him, and give him comfort and resignation to the divine will.

We beg leave, however, here to enter our protest against such unsupported assertions, and to state our entire dissent therefrom. By whom are such assertions made? By those who know anything about the matter? By those who have ever tried the principles of Universalism and found them wanting? No, by no means: they are made by those who have never tried the doctrine; yes, even by those that know absolutely nothing more about the doctrine than they do of the inhabitants of the moon, and who, assuming to be umpires in matters of which they are totally ignorant, make assertions at random, not only entirely unsupported, but directly contrary to truth.

Now we not only affirm that the assertion under consideration is untrue; but that the direct reverse of it is the fact of the case, viz: That the opposite of Universalism cannot sustain and comfort the mind in the dark hour of affliction and sorrow, and that the fundamental principles of Universalism only, are capable of yielding true and substantial peace to the afflicted mind. Our opponents talk about the necessity of something better, some more substantial peace, than Universalism can give! But what can they point out better than this? What more cheering and consoling prospect can be presented to the mind? Does not this doctrine embrace all that heart could wish or soul desire? Can any greater good be even imagined than this holds up to view? All that the most capacious mind can ask or desire, is here embraced.

The real Universalist believes that all his afflictions and sorrows shall be limited and finite, and ultimately overruled for his good—that all partial evil shall result in final good—that all sorrow shall give place to joy; all misery be succeeded by happiness; all darkness, by light; all error, by truth; all death, by life—that finally every tear shall be wiped from off every face, and the whole intelligent creation, delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God, shall forever bask in the sunshine of Jehovah's glory and feast on the smiles of his love. While, therefore, he feels the rod of affliction, he leans on the staff of divine promise and mercy, and is assured that all shall terminate well.

If such views are inadequate to sustain the mind, in the hour of darkness and sorrow, we ask what other views are competent to sustain it? If these fail, where else can man go with the prospect of finding peace? Or, as the disciples said to Jesus, when asked if they also would leave him and go away, we may very properly ask, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." If we leave the doctrine of a world's salvation, which promises eternal life to the whole intelligent creation, to what other doctrine can we flee with any better prospect of finding consolation? Shall we flee to the doctrines of eternal death? Will the assurance that we are liable to, and millions of our race shall inevitably experience endless and immortal wretchedness, suffice to give consolation? Will the conviction that these temporal afflictions shall be succeeded by endless torments, bind up the bleeding heart of the mourner, extract the poison from the dart of adversity, and pour the radiant light of joy into sorrow's dark domain? Impossible. It would but add wretchedness to sorrow, bitterness to grief, agony to affliction, and madness to despair.

Now we not only feel assured that no other or better system than Universalism can be found to comfort the afflicted, to bind up the bleeding and cheer the sorrowing soul, but even that all the consolation and peace enjoyed by the very opposers of this system in these seasons of affliction, are derived from the fundamental principles of our faith. They (that is, our opposers) may not be aware of the fact—they may even stoutly deny it; but it is true notwithstanding. Now it is doubtless true, nor will any one deny the fact, that the believers in endless misery, many of them at least, enjoy some degree of consolation in seasons of affliction—some of them seem quite composed and happy. But from what source is their happiness derived? No one believes, nor will any one pretend that it is derived from the particular belief in endless misery, in itself considered. From what then is it derived? Why, from the confidence they feel in the divine goodness, and the hopes they entertain in the divine mercy. They hope God will overrule and sanctify their afflictions for good—they hope his mercy will not forsake, nor his goodness abandon them, but that he will have compassion on the workmanship of his hand. If they believe salvation is of works, although when they look upon themselves they see nothing which they have done to entitle them to eternal life, yet they think God's goodness is so great that he will condescend, imperfect as they are, to accept of them for the sake of his beloved Son. If they believe in particular election and reprobation, they cannot but indulge the hope that they are among the favored number of the elect; and if they lose a beloved child or kindred by death—why, they loved them so well—they were in truth so amiable—that God must have loved them equally as well; and though they gave no special evidence of being born again, or regenerated, yet God is so merciful and gracious that he will not let them go to hell. Thus they are continually drawing streams of comfort and consolation from the divine benevolence and mercy. And what are these, the divine benevolence and mercy, but the foundation, the basis, the two main pillars of the doctrine of Universalism? These are the fundamental principles of our doctrine; and being infinite in degree, immutable in their nature, and endless in duration, they form a basis and lay a foundation that can never be removed or jostled from its place. Our superstructure is proportioned to the foundation on which it rests, ample as the creation of God. And we rejoice that, in it, there is room not only for us, but for all, even for our enemies; and that as their house furnishes them with no consolation in the hour of affliction and sorrow, they can and do come to our mansion in such seasons to obtain that comfort which their own narrow dwelling denies them. We rejoice that when their limited and contracted fountain fails, they can come to ours, even to the broad ocean of infinite and exhaustless love, and drink freely, without the possibility of exhausting or in the least lessening the fountain. We would not deny them this privilege if we could. We would that more of them than do, would avail themselves of the privilege of coming to the fountain of universal and everlasting love and mercy, to "obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need"—to find the consolation they so much need in the day of affliction, and which can be obtained at no other fountain. We would by no means drive them away from the table if we could; but we would have them peaceable, and not grumble against us, because we have a superstructure of salvation and glory as broad as the foundation on which it rests, and sufficiently capacious to hold the whole family of man.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

A letter just received from Br. C. B. Brown, of Hastings, Oswego county, says—"I have just returned from Jefferson county, where I have been twenty-six days, travelled two hundred and seventy miles, and preached twenty-five discourses. I formed a brief acquaintance with many warm-hearted Universalists, and received substantial tokens of their good wishes for the extension of the doctrine of a world's salvation."

With such judiciously zealous and able pioneers as our amiable brother, the North must give up, and the cause of universal benevolence prosper in the minds, hearts and lives of its believers—a prosperity far greater and better than that of numerous converts merely speculative in faith, merely opposed to Partialism in principle, and reckless as ever in practice. This latter kind of Universalism can no more flourish in the absence of Partialism, than Partialism can flourish without a personal devil to drive its advocates to exertions in its support. But pure Universalism can stand and flourish of itself—and when received into warm hearts, needs no external impulse to render its possessor active and zealous. It is a well of living waters springing up eternally unto life and activity—a faith that works by that love which seeks the happiness of its objects, and purifies the heart, while it renders active the powers. Oh, Lord, give us more of this water and bread of life—increase in us all, this faith!

THE RECORD.

CONFERENCES.—The first Quarterly Conference of the Ontario Association was held at North Bloomfield, October 30th and 31st. Sermons were preached by Brs. Spaulding, Brown, [probably N.,] Roberts, [probably Henry,] and Chase.

A Conference was held at Scipio Centre, Cayuga county, November 3d and 4th. Br. H. Boughton was ordained. Introductory prayer by Br. Chase; sermon by Br. Montgomery; consecrating prayer by Br. Sanderson; charge and delivery of the Scriptures by Br. Chase; right hand of fellowship by Br. T. D. Cook. Five sermons were preached. The meeting is highly spoken of by Br. Sanderson of the Herald of Truth.

NEW SOCIETY.—A new society of able, zealous Universalists was formed, October 30th, in Lenox, Ohio. The number of members not stated. They enjoy the labors of Br. Beals.

NEW PREACHERS.—In addition to Brs. Hull, Schreiner and Gibson, named in No. 48, and to those named in the minutes of our ecclesiastical bodies; we can name Br. William Martin, of Munnsville, Madison county, who has been preaching quite acceptably for some time in that region. He is a modest young man, of good abilities, and irreproachable character. A physician (name forgotten) has also lately commenced preaching in Hamilton, same county, who promises fair to make an excellent preacher, and is already a good man. David H. Porter, of Habersham county, Georgia, has lately commenced preaching Universalism in that region. Br. Hanscom, noticed in our last Record, has so far regained his health, as to resume, in part, his ministerial labors. The attempt to injure his character, by slander, has been a benefit to him.

PER CONTRA.—Br. J. C. Newell, pastor of the societies in Wrentham, Dedham and Franklin, Mass., was attacked last June, with inflammation of the brain, from which his mental organs never recovered, though he regained his bodily strength. He died in the Worcester Lunatic Asylum week before last—and his funeral was attended on the following Sunday, November 27th, at Wrentham. Sermon by Br. Hosea Ballou, of Boston. He has left a widow, several orphans, and numerous friends and acquaintances long to deplore his departure, and remember his worth and virtues.

INSTALLATIONS.—On November 23d, the following brethren were installed as pastors of the Universalist societies in the places named. Br. George Hastings, in Hyannis, Mass. Br. J. G. Adams, in Claremont, N. H., sermon by Br. John Moore. Br. M. B. Newell, in Amsterdam, this State, sermon by Br. Rayner, of Troy.

REMOVALS.—Br. Samuel Brimblecom, of Westbrook, Me., has received an invitation to settle at Danvers New Mills, Mass.; and Br. Z. Thompson, of North Yarmouth, Me., to settle in Lowell, Mass. It is believed they will accept the invitations. Br. J. P. Atkinson has removed from somewhere to Meredith Bridge, N. H. Br. E. Wellington, from the same indefiniteness to Gaysville, (Stockbridge,) Vt. Br. Nathan Sawyer, of Medina, is now on a visit to South Reading, Vt., to which place he wishes all letters, etc., for him to be directed, until further notice. * * The Union will please copy. Br. W. Quail, late of Mottville, has removed to Parma Corners, Monroe county, where he wishes all letters, etc., intended for him, to be directed in future. He has engaged to preach to the societies in Parma and Ogden.

MEETING-HOUSES.—A brick house, thirty-eight by fifty-two feet, owned wholly by Universalists is being erected in Clarendon, Vt. Preparations are progressing to the building of another in Willingford. Another in Canton, Illinois, is expected to be completed next season. And the Lombard-street house in Philadelphia, has been completely repaired and modernized, at an expense of between two and three thousand dollars.

DEDICATIONS.—A Universalist meeting-house was dedicated in Yarmouth, Mass., November 24th. Another in Hopkinton, N. H.; sermon by Br. Hodsdon. There are notices for four dedications in the last Trumpet, all in this month—December.

ITEMS.—Br. C. Smith Brown has engaged to preach with the society in Harford, Cortland county, one-third of the time. Br. B. will continue to reside in Upper Lisle, Broome county.

The Universalist Watchman (there is another paper called the Watchman published in Montpelier, Vt.) has been purchased, with all its book accounts, by Dr. Joseph Wright, J. E. Palmer and Thomas S. Packard, who have removed it to Montpelier, Vt. Rev. B. H. Fuller, Editor; Revs. J. Moore, Lebanon, N. H., W. Skinner, Proctorsville, Russel Streeter, Woodstock, and K. Haven, Shoreham, (all of Vermont,) Associate Editors. It adopts the many headed system. Success to it and its publishers and Editors in every attempt to spread the knowledge of the truth.

The Glad Tidings, published in Pittsburg, Pa., and the Christian Telescope, published in Columbus, Ohio, are to be united, and published simultaneously in those two places, every two weeks, at $1.50 in advance. S. A. Davis, Pittsburg, M. A. Chappell, Columbus, Editors—and our excellent brother and correspondent, L. L. Sadler, Associate Editor. Good. May they prosper the cause and be prospered by it. A. B. SONGS OF ZION.

It will have been seen, by a notice in our last paper, that I have received the above collection of sacred music, by Br. Whittemore, and am now prepared to supply orders for this region. It has already run through an edition of one thousand copies, and a second of three thousand is passing off rapidly. Not being more than a mere lover of music, I cannot testify to the merits of the work, though I can recommend it, as having understood from various brethren that Br. W. is a proper person to get up such a work; and from several of our periodicals, that the songs of Zion deserve their name, and the patronage of all who wish to sing praises to our God in a scientific manner, with airs pleasing to the ear and inspiring to devotional feelings. Will those who are capable of judging the work, call and examine it?

On looking over its smooth and well printed pages, I discover that Br. W. has been pleased to dub an old favorite with my family name. In the name of my great-grandfather (I can trace my genealogy no further back) by the paternal side, and of all his numerous descendants bearing the name of Grosh, I tender him our united thanks for the compliment—though possibly Br. Whittemore forgot his own saying, that "Br. Grosh has no desire to glitter in borrowed diamonds." However, "Auld lang syne" is a good tune, and the compliment (like others of a similar character bestowed on other ministering brethren, in the Songs of Zion,) is a handsome one.

The following remarks on the conduct of singers in a choir, is taken from the preface. They are not inapplicable to some choirs in this region. The remark on singing by members of the congregation, in connexion with the choir, is worthy of attention. The practice should be more general—and would certainly have a highly beneficial and pleasing effect whenever followed.

A. B. G.

There are certain instructions, to which singing choirs in general have given little attention, that do not respect the art of singing, but their behaviour during the hours of public worship. It is a high breach of decorum, for the members of singing choirs to spend the time of prayer or of the sermon, in laughing, whispering, turning over books, and in things of like character,—a practice in which they are too often encouraged, by the example of their leaders. The curtains in front of the singing seats, are frequently made a screen for such conduct. There are no terms in which we can fully express our disapprobation of such a course. It is a great fault, that singers are separated too much from the congregation. We know of no reason, why all the members of a congregation who can sing should not join in that delightful service. The sublimest portions of praise, are those of well known doxologies, in which the whole congregation join. They produce an effect which the choir alone, will in vain attempt to produce.

* Assembled men, to the deep organ join,
The long-resounding voice, oft-breaking clear,
At solemn pauses, through the swelling bass;
And, as each mingling flame increase each,
In one united ardor rise to heaven."

THE STAR IN THE EAST.

Br. C. Hussey, of Lyndeborough, N. H., states that our friends in that vicinity are not only gaining in numbers, but increasing in faith, and zeal, and love; as their works abundantly prove. They are exerting themselves manfully to support the Star in the East, and yield its Editors and proprietors something more than a barely living patronage. Good—doubly good! for the Star is not only worthy of an increased circulation; but that increased circulation will very materially be a benefit, not to the cause alone, but also to all who are added to it. Remember this, friends of humanity, when you hesitate about subscribing for a paper which is bringing the prisoner from the prison-house, raising up the bowed down, consoling the mourner, gladdening the sorrowful, reforming the vicious, and dispelling the more than mortal agony of tormenting fears of endless woe, by pouring into the heaving bosom the knowledge and experience of God's perfect, boundless, endless, impartial love. And such a paper is the Star in the East—such are Universalist periodicals generally. It may seem like boasting for me to say so—but I speak not only of the editorial articles in them, and I speak of what I am persuaded is true—of what is testified to us weekly, from every quarter of the land, by those, too, who have been thus benefited by our periodicals. We say then to our brethren every where, support your periodicals—those at home first—and as many of them as you can afford to aid, do it.

Lim is referred to Magazine and Advocate, vol. iv. page 182, for an explanation of John 1: 1. The word "Word," (Greek, Logos), is by some rendered "wisdom," "reason," "the understanding," or "mind."—See for the latter rendering, this paper, vol. vi, page 203. Whatever should be its rendering, it is but a personification like that of wisdom, in Proverbs, so often quoted by our opposers as the language of God. The word being made flesh, is merely a Hebraism, denoting that the divine wisdom, reason, or mind was bestowed on a being who was flesh and blood—for who believes that the infinite God, who is a spirit, ever actually became a material mass—a body of flesh? Believing this will be sufficient, I add no more until more is asked for. A. B. G.

CELEBRATION OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

Liquidation of the Debt of the Universalist Meeting-House.

The Universalist society in this city have been long and deeply involved in debt for their meeting-house. Five years since, they were owing about $6000. They have struggled arduously to extinguish this debt, and have now reduced it to a little over $2000. They are induced now to call upon their friends and a liberal public, for further aid towards the accomplishment of that desirable object, in a manner which, while the charity will be scarcely felt by those conferring it, will greatly aid them in the payment of a burdensome debt, and in securing an unnumbered title to their house. They propose celebrating the anniversary of our Saviour's birth, by illuminating and trimming their meeting-house, a concert of sacred music, and a discourse adapted to the occasion, and to sell tickets of admission at Fifty Cents for each person; every dollar of which money, when received will be faithfully applied to the extinction of the debt. No person will be admitted on that evening without a ticket or the payment of the above sum. None who are friendly to the society will grudge their Fifty Cents* for so good an object: and there are few, indeed, but what can, if they choose, lay by that sum between this and Christmas Eve. The laboring classes, and even those in quite moderate circumstances, we doubt not, will be ready for the occasion. We affectionately invite not only our citizens generally, but our friends in all the adjacent towns, to be present and contribute their share. The favor will be gratefully acknowledged. Remember, friends, Saturday evening, December 24th, at half past 6 o'clock. As many hundred persons as attend, just half as many hundred dollars will it sink the debt.

By order of the Trustees of the First Universalist Society. S. BELBE, Jr., Secretary.

Utica, December 1, 1836.

* The Trustees first thought of fixing the price of tickets at $1 each, inasmuch as the doors are always opened freely on the Sabbath, and until now, have been on Christmas Eve. But some of them being of opinion that $1 would be a higher price than some (especially those with families to take along) would be willing to pay, they at length fixed the price at Fifty Cents. This, however, will not prevent those from paying a dollar who feel able and willing to do it, for so important an object, or even the bestowment of donations of $5, or $10, as all such donations will be thankfully received.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst. by Br. FRENCH in Denmark—Br. GUILD at South Norwich, and in the school-house near Br. Wetmore's in the evening—Br. A. G. CLARK at Hobart, at 10, A. M., and Hempfield, at 2, P. M.—Br. SIAS at South Champion, and at Copenhagen in the evening—Br. KINNEY at Cazenovia, and near Br. Ward's in the evening—Br. W. MARTIN in Munnsville, and in Clockville in the evening—Br. BRITTON in Adams village—Br. C. B. BROWN in Williamstown, and at Br. Cox's in the evening—Br. GROSH in New-Hartford.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst. by Br. GUILD in Unadilla village—Br. A. G. CLARK in Hartsottsville—Br. SIAS in Depauville at 10 A. M., and at French Creek in the evening—Br. KINNEY in Log city and in Leesville in the evening—Br. C. B. BROWN in Mexico, and in Parishville in the evening.

CONFERENCE AT CEDARVILLE, POSTPONED.—The Conference of the Otsego Association as now appointed to be held at Cedarville, will come on Thanksgiving day (December 15th). It is therefore postponed to one week later—viz: to meet on Wednesday and Thursday, the 21st and 22d inst.

Br. Waggoner's notice is omitted in consequence of the above, until we can hear from him. A. B. G.

CHRISTMAS EVE will be celebrated as follows:—in this city, the house illuminated and decorated, and a concert of sacred music; sermon by Br. SKINNER—in Eatonville; sermon by Br. W. H. WAGGONER.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONSOLATION TO THE MOURNER.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

Where now are fancy's ardent dreams,
Or hope's delusive bowers?
Borne sadly down on memory's streams,
Transient as Autumn flowers.

Alas! the loved and cherished die,
Cut off in life's green years,
While fresh and fair their morning sky
Without a cloud appears.

While pure from every stain of earth,
The sinless spirit seeks
The home of its immortal birth—
Where day eternal breaks.

Our stricken hearts would penetrate
The shadows of the tomb;
But all is dark and desolate,
And cold the gathering gloom.

The melody of friendship's voice,
Not from the grave is heard;
Loved tones that made our hearts rejoice,
Cease with the sleeping dead.

The radiance of the greeting eye
Shall feast our own no more—
The spirit speeds its flight on high,
Where angel forms adore.

Though mourners droop with woes of earth,
And hearts with grief are riven,
Spirits must pass the vale of death
To gain a home in heaven.

Dust must return to dust again,
Put off the cause of sin—
The soul divested of its clay,
Immortal joys begin.

Hark! hark! our Father's voice resounds
Throughout the rolling spheres—
Mortals come forth—what joyful sounds!
Oh! mourners dry your tears.

O, welcome home, thou heavenly ray,
Disrobed of flesh and sin—
O, welcome home," the angels say,
"You're clothed anew—come in!"

Now strike your golden harps to praise,
Angels and seraphim,
Let saints their joyful voices raise,
"Neath wings of cherubim.

The Son of God victorious is;
Sin, death and hell are slain!
Let shouts from earth to heaven arise,
And echo back again.

MISERIES OF A COMPOSITOR—BY ONE.

We hear a good deal of the miseries of Editors, but never of those of their humble conditors, the compositors; nevertheless, the latter have their grievances, and the philosophy and temper with which they are borne, are in striking contrast to the irritable petulance of their superiors of the quill.

By your leave, Mr. Editor, I will enumerate a few of the more manifold of the compositor's miseries. The employment of a compositor is of a two-fold nature—mechanical and mental. He commits to memory as much of his copy as can readily be retained by once reading over, and then proceeds to pick up the individual letters of which this portion is composed, attending at the same time to the punctuation, spelling and grammar. To do this successfully requires undivided attention, a quick eye, a ready hand, and untiring patience. Under the most favorable circumstances, this labor brings the compositor to a premature old age—his sight fails, his hand becomes tremulous, the sense of touch dulled, and the nerves lose their quickness and energy; this, with but few exceptions, is the necessary and inevitable result of his employment. But in addition to this, he is subject to many miseries from the ignorance, the caprice, or the carelessness of authors.

The compositor has a certain number of squares exacted from him as his days work, this is expected, whether his copy be clear or obscure, legible or illegible, punctuated or not. Upon these circumstances, his earnings, his bread, depends; and common humanity would dictate to authors, that their ministering servant, the compositor, should be assisted as much as possible in his humble labors for their present fame and future honor.

Illegible copy is, perhaps, the compositor's greatest misery, as it is frequently found in combination with every other fault. This is a universal failing, of which the literate and illiterate are alike guilty—in the former it is inexcusable. Another grievous fault in authors, is the attempt to give force to a feeble style, and clearness to an obscure one, by the frequent introduction of Italic words. This spoils the appearance of the printing, is alike insulting to the taste and discrimination of the reader, and is a sore evil to the purse of the poor compositor, as the Italic is often in a distant part of the office. This misery tries the temper more than illegibility, though not so serious in its results—the former may arise from incapability, the latter always from presumption and bad taste.

Another fault of third rate authors, and alas for the compositor, they are by far the most numerous, is continually insulting the King's English with scraps of foreign languages. This is the trick of the shallow pedant, who mistakes the acquisition of languages for knowledge, and the display of them for wisdom. Its chief effect upon the compositor is, that if every letter, accent and diphthong, be not legibly marked, he makes mistakes, his besotted ignorance is such that the connexion is here no aid to him. One more misery and we have done with the dolorous catalogue. Some authors (and their name is Legion, for they are many) cannot tell how a sentence will read till they see it in print—then, indeed, its errors are palpable, and they alter and amend with great zeal and perseverance, not reflecting that these alterations cost the compositor trouble, time, health and temper. Of those numerous perpetrations, which are the results of sheer ignorance, not rendered offensive by conceit or presumption, and which fall to the compositor's unhappy lot to shape into form and comeliness, we take no notice, they are evils inseparable from his condition, and are frequently sufficiently amusing to compensate, in some measure, for the loss they occasion.

The author whom the printer delights to honor, is one who writes legibly, with few erasures and interlineations; whose punctuation is systematic, and may always be depended upon; whose style is not inverted and unnatural, but flowing and easy, and readily retained in the memory; who uses Italic sparingly; foreign languages never, and who makes no alterations from the copy in the proof sheet;—such a man is the glory and pride of the printer, in him he sees no faults; the broad mantle of his merits covers all minor defects; and though his principles may be abominable, and his purposes detestable, he is at least sure of a good word from the compositor. G. P*.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on November 23d, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. ALBERT SPENCER, to Miss SARAH ANN TUTTLE, all of this place.

The printers unite in expressing their warmest thanks to the bride and bridegroom for a share of the wedding cake and wine, and their fervent wishes that the youthful pair may be blessed with a long, peaceful and happy union.

In Ellisburg, October 16th, by Rev. J. French, Mr. CLINTON CLARK, to Miss LYDIA MALVINA HILDRETH.

Also, in the same place and time, by the same, Mr. MORGAN L. WOOD, to Miss AURELIA LAMMON, all of Ellisburg.

In the town of Little Falls, Herkimer county, on the 30th ult., by George Petrie, Esq., Mr. CORNELIUS C. DELONG, to Miss AMANDA CASLER, all of Little Falls.

In Laurens, Otsego county, November 6, by Rev. E. King, of Oneonta, A. GOODSELL, Esq., of Fairport, Monroe county, to Miss BARBARA JOHNSON, of the former place.

In Volney, November 17th, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. ALEXANDER H. CRANE, to Miss HARRIET CARRIER, all of that town.

In Middleville, November 3d, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. DE LA F. AINSWORTH, to Miss CHARLOTTE KNIFFIN.

In Eatonville, November 24th, by the same, Mr. ALONZO WILCOX, to Miss MATILDA STAUNTON.

In Leyden, November 10th, by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, Mr. WILLIAM JENKS, to Miss MARY ANN KENT, all of Leyden.

DEATHS.

In Lowville, November 5th, FRANKLIN, son of Uriel and Catharine Petres, aged 3 years. The funeral was attended on the 7th, and the consolations of the "Gospel of the grace of God" were tendered to the afflicted parents and friends by the writer. C. B. B.

In South Champion, November 19, after a long and painful sickness, SARAH MARIA DIX, only daughter of Leonard and Dorothea Dix, in the 19th year of her age. This amiable young woman calmly viewing the approach of death, composedly resigned her spirit to the great Author of life, and sweetly fell asleep "in Jesus," to be clothed "in the resurrection" with immortality and eternal life. In this truly afflicting dispensation of divine Providence, the fond and doating parents are bereft of a pleasant and dutiful child, her brothers of a kind and affectionate sister, and the youth of an interesting and agreeable companion.

"When blooming youth is snatch'd away,
By death's resistless hand;
Our hearts the mournful tribute pay,
Which sorrow must demand."

The funeral was attended at the Universalist meeting-house and the evidences of a glorious and happy immortality for all mankind, were exhibited by the writer, to a numerous and sympathising congregation. The Lord bless these mourning friends, and save them from sorrowing even as others which have no hope.

At Sandy Creek, Oswego county, November 26th, of typhus fever, HARRIET ANTOINETTE, daughter of Br. John Curtis, aged 3 years. Around this very interesting and promising child entwined the strongest affections of its fond and doating parents, and on her rested many a fond hope; but, alas! the unrelenting hand of death has sundered the ties of nature and blasted their dearest earthly hopes. But though thus afflicted, they are not left to mourn without hope of meeting their departed child in a happier and better world, for "of such is the kingdom of heaven." The consolations of the Gospel of eternal life, were tendered to the mourning relatives, by Br. J. French, from Heb. ii: 14, 15, on the 21st ult.

"The hand that did its being give,
Has called it to the skies;
Yet in his purpose it shall live,
Though veiled from mortal eyes.
Then hush the sigh, and check the tear,
No more at fate repine;
For thou shalt meet thy child so dear,
And with her ever shine?" Communicated.

In Laurens, November 14th, Dr. SALMON HARRISON, in the 69th year of his age. He was a man of noble genius, of a firm and penetrating mind, and persevering in his pursuits. He was also a man of benevolence, and was well calculated to cheer and enliven the spirits of his patients, and to remove their maladies. An extensive circle of acquaintance solicited his aid and courted his friendship. For many years he had been a believer in the final salvation of all men, and in his last illness he became more firm and unshaken in his hopes. In his last address to his family and friends, he earnestly requested that his unshaken hope and faith in a world's salvation might be published to the world. Thus he fell asleep in Christ. He has left the companion of his youth and several children to lament the departure of a kind husband and a tender and affectionate parent. The consolations of the Gospel were presented to the family and a large collection of sympathising friends, by the writer of this article, from 2 Tim. i: 10. L. HYATT.

In Newport, at the residence of his father, November 7th, Mr. DAN POST, Jr., aged 35 years. The deceased for some time was afflicted with that wasting malady called consumption. His residence was near Cleveland, Ohio, where he, several weeks since, left his family—a wife and three children—and came to visit his parents and friends, thinking thereby to improve his health. But, alas! that God in whom he ever trusted, had ordained it otherwise. He desired to see the writer previous to his death, but when he appeared in his presence, his speech had already failed; for death, the destroying angel was lurking around his couch, and soon numbered him with the dead. His funeral was attended by the writer on the 9th, and the consolations of the Gospel exhibited from Rev. v: 13.

We pray God to prepare the hearts of the lone widow and her fatherless children to receive the melancholy news of the death of their best friend and protector, with composure and resignation. May all remember that they are only drinking out of that mixed cup which Providence has prepared for all, and look forward to the joyful period when universal humanity shall be adorned with the jewels of immortality. W. H. WAGGONER.

* * Will the Union and Sentinel please copy?

In Turin, November 18th, of a lingering consumption of many years, Widow EUNICE GRISWOLD, aged about 68 years. Mrs. Griswold never attached herself to any denomination; but for a number of years, as life's lamp began to burn dim, she gave a decided preference to the doctrine of the restitution. She was the affectionate mother and kind friend. The spirit of benevolence and good will inspired her heart, and regulated her life. She died as she had lived—a Christian. Her funeral was attended on the 20th, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the truly afflicted relatives and sympathising neighbors, by the writer, J. A. A.

THE PREACHER.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

By the late W. H. HORT, of Batavia, N. Y.

"For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." Matt. v. 20.

When a person sets himself up as a teacher, especially if his teaching be of a moral or religious nature, nothing is more common or just, than to inquire into the nature and tendency of his doctrines and practices. And if, on a candid investigation of the subject, it is found that his practice and precepts agree, and both are good, he who is well disposed will adopt his doctrine and follow his example.

After the author of our text made his appearance on the earth, he taught the world, that God was the author, preserver, and protector of all flesh—that he was "good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works"—"for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust." He taught his followers to imitate the example of their heavenly Father, "For I say unto you, (said he,) Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, pray for them who despitefully use and persecute you, that you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven."

He not only taught these heaven-born precepts by word, but carried them out in practice. He was patient under tribulation, and resigned in affliction. When he was reviled, he reviled not again. He loved those who persecuted him; yea, you may follow him through life, trace him through trials, pains and afflictions—for he was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief"—and you will find him at all times, possessing that spirit of love, which was the nature of his heavenly Father.—Follow him to Mount Calvary, and behold the cursed nails which pinned him to the cross! See the bloody spear thrust into his side by his enemies! Behold the accumulated torrent of grief and anguish that was poured upon him at this time! And in this case do you hear him breathing out woes and curses upon the heads of his enemies? No; he still loved them, and prayed for them who despitefully used and persecuted him—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!"

Thus, what he taught in theory, he lived in practice. Would to God that the self-same spirit reigned more generally among his professed followers, at the present day. He taught his disciples, on the Mount, that he came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law. For, saith he, "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." Then comes our text, "For I say unto you, except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." We shall divide our discourse into three parts.

1. Consider in what the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees consisted.

2. How, or in what manner, the Christian's righteousness must exceed theirs, and

3. What is meant by the kingdom of heaven.

1. The Pharisees were an ancient sect among the Jews, who were separated from the common people, by a more strict observance of the law of Moses. Although the time when this sect arose, is uncertain, yet I believe no doubts are entertained but that, when they first separated themselves from the common Israelites, their intentions were good. For what they taught in word, they lived in deed.

They soon, however, became corrupted, and the Saviour found them, as it were, sunk in the depths of iniquity. They were among the most violent of his opposers. He likened them unto whitened sepulchres which indeed appeared beautiful outside, but within were full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. They were strict in performing the requirements of the law, as far as outside appearance went, but within, their hearts were black and carnal. Their chief object was to gain the admiration and applause of men. For this purpose they paid tithes of mint, and anise, and cummin; but omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and fidelity; which things they ought to have done, while they left not the other undone. They bound heavy burdens, which were grievous to be borne, and laid them on men's shoulders, which they themselves would not move with one of their fingers. All their works they did to be seen of men—they made broad their phylacteries, and enlarged the borders of their garments—they loved the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. They considered themselves the particular favorites of Heaven, on account of their strict adherence to the letter, although they despised the spirit of the law. They considered their neighbors, who observed not all their rites, to be unworthy the love of their God; therefore they consigned them to the torments of a burning hell, while they supposed themselves should be received to the mansions of eternal bliss.

As I said before, they adhered strictly to the ceremonial law—to the performing of outward ceremonies—such as frequent washings, fastings, public and ostentatious praying, public alms deeds, searching after proselytes, etc.; meanwhile neglecting to perform the duties of mercy, charity, justice, humility, and other Christian virtues. Under this cloak of religion, they indulged themselves in every evil thought and action, cruelty, dishonesty, and oppression even of widows; for, saith the Saviour unto them, "Ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers—ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves." Thus you have the character, doctrine and righteousness of the Pharisees.

My hearers, turn your eyes, but for a moment, back upon the last half century, and observe the proceedings that have been carried on in these United States during that time: and I think you will be ready to say, that there was, and is a class in this our happy land, which resembles in too many respects the Pharisees of old.

Witness the far-famed, misnamed revivals of religion, which have literally deluged our country with bigotry and superstition. In them you will see verified the words of our Saviour, "ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves." How often do we see the converts who are brought out at these meetings and made to acknowledge and say they will serve the Lord, through fear of his endless wrath, turn back again to their former vices, and take to themselves, as it were, seven other spirits, worse than the first? And the latter state of these converts is worse than the former.

There is another respect in which the conductors of these meetings resemble the Pharisees of old. They bind heavy burdens on men's shoulders, grievous to be borne. They hesitate not to heap upon the shoulders of their neighbors, who chance to differ from them in opinion, burdens which are impossible for men to bear; yea, even the doctrine of endless misery. For they say, as did the Pharisees, we shall soon arrive at the port of heaven, there to bask in the sunshine of eternal joys, while you shall sink to the regions of eternal despair! It is by no means a pleasing task to relate these departures from the simplicity of the Gospel; but I must not shun to declare the whole counsel of God, even though it be to the pulling down of the strong holds of the adversary.

Before I leave this subject, I will introduce one circumstance which is left on record, wherein the righteousness of the Pharisee is clearly illustrated. "Two men went up into a temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, the other a publican. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus, with himself, God I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican; I fast twice in the week, and pay tithes of all I possess." In this case we see that the righteousness of the Pharisee consisted in exalting himself above the publican, considering himself more holy, and the peculiar favorite of God: for he fasted twice a week, and paid tithes of all he possessed. His language too clearly betrays the spirit of self-conceit; "stand by thyself, come not near unto me, I am more holy than thou." Having now considered the righteousness of the Pharisee, and shown it to consist in a form of outward ceremonies and boasts—they claiming to be the particular favorites of God to the exclusion of their humbler neighbors—we are now prepared,

2. To show what the righteousness of him must be, who would be a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus.

In the chapter from which we have selected our text, commencing at the 43d verse, it will be seen that the Saviour taught his followers precepts by which they might regulate their lives. "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good; and sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust. For if ye love them who love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect." In this we have the character or righteousness of the Christian laid down. He, in contradistinction to the righteousness of the Pharisee, is to extend his love to all, both friends and foes.

"Love your enemies." How sublime the precept! How lovely the sentiment appears to that person who has had his heart renewed by the influence of the holy spirit! "Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use and persecute you." How noble the action and motive! That men act from motives, will be denied by none; therefore there must be some inducement set before them, in order that they may become Christians—that they may love the Lord with all their hearts, and their neighbors as themselves. Is the doctrine of Partialism the proper inducement to be held out to men, that they may love their enemies? Let us examine it and see.

Partialism teaches that God loves but a part of his intelligent creation; the rest he hates, and will therefore consign them to the torments of an endless hell. Now, the command is, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." Approximate, as near as possible, unto his likeness. Then to carry Partialism out in practice, would be to love those alone whom God loves, and hate those whom he hates. Would this be acting in accordance with the precepts of the Gospel? O, say it not; think it not; 'tis false!

Then Partialism is not the proper incentive to lead people in the pathway of virtue; for I do say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that no person possessing natural affection, was ever led to love God, because he believed that he would make a part of the human family endlessly miserable. For confirmation of this fact, I would appeal to the conscience of each individual present, and press the question home to your hearts, Could you love that being who, you believed, would exercise all his powers, to make your brethren, your sisters, your parents, or your children miserable, unless you had lost all those tender ties which once bound your hearts together? I know your answer. Then, this is not the proper inducement to lay before people to lead them to love the Lord their God with all their hearts, and their neighbors as themselves.

Would you induce your neighbor to love your God? present him with God's true character; teach him that "the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works"—that "he is without variableness or shadow of turning"—that he "will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth"—that "he doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth"—that "God is love"—that "love worketh no ill to his neighbor," and that "God commendeth his love unto us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." This is the proper inducement to lead men to love God. "For herein is love, not that we loved him, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. And if God so loved us we ought also to love one another."—For "except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." The Pharisees limited their love, as well as that of their God, to a few individuals. But as the God of Christians encircles in the arms of his affection, the whole human family, we must imitate his example; otherwise we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. The Pharisee exalts himself above his neighbor; the Christian, on the contrary, must humble himself. "For whosoever exalteth himself, shall be abased; but whosoever humbleth himself, shall be exalted." The Pharisee attended to the letter of the law, to be seen of men; the Christian, on the contrary, must drink deep into the spirit of the law of love, to serve the Lord, not letting even his right hand know what his left doeth. In short, the Christian must have his affections elevated above the world, and centre in God. His heart must be renovated, inclined to revere, honor, worship and trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men. He must embrace him as his portion, love him supremely—must be ready at all times to bear his name through evil, as well as through good report—he must, at all times and under all circumstances, be resigned unto the will of his Maker. He must devote his time to promote the prosperity and happiness of his kindred nature, and extend the Gospel of his God, visiting the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions, and keeping himself unspotted from the world. In fine, the righteousness of the true Christian exceeds the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, as much as the blaze of the meridian sun outshines the feeble light of the glow-worm.

3. We now come to consider what is meant by the kingdom of heaven, or kingdom of God. Many have conscientiously believed that it refers to the immortal kingdom, beyond the resurrection. This view of the subject, however, I deem incorrect; for that this term was generally used to designate the kingdom of Christ, which was about to be established in the earth, and which was not far distant, is evident from the following passages—"Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. And in whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you, say unto them, the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." "And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that there be some that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." And when Jesus was asked by the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God should come, he answered them and said, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall they say, lo, here! or lo, there! for behold the kingdom of God is within [among] you."—"So likewise ye, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." "But wo unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men; for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering, to go in."—"In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, and saying, Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." I could multiply texts which are to the same import; but I trust I have produced enough to convince any candid mind, that the kingdom of heaven was established in the earth. And here permit me to introduce a few comments of Dr. A. Clarke upon the phrase. "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," referring to the prophecy of Daniel, vii: 13, 14, when the reign of Christ among men is expressly foretold. This phrase, and the kingdom of God, is the same thing—viz. the dispensation of infinite mercy, and manifestation of eternal truth, by Jesus Christ; producing the true knowledge of God, accompanied with that worship which is pure and holy, worthy of that God who is its instituter and its object. But why is this called a kingdom? Because it has its laws, all the moral precepts of the Gospel: its subjects, all who believe in Jesus Christ: and its king, the sovereign of heaven and earth.—But why is it called the kingdom of heaven? Because God designed his kingdom of grace here, should resemble the kingdom of glory above. And hence Christ teaches us to pray—"Thy will be done on earth as in heaven." The kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink, says St. Paul, it does not consist in the gratification of sensual passions, or worldly ambition, but is 'righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.' Now what can there be more than this in glory? Righteousness, without mixture of sin; peace, without strife or contention; joy in the Holy Ghost—spiritual joy, without mixture of misery. How then does heaven itself differ from this state? Answer, it makes the righteousness eternal, the peace eternal, and the joy eternal. This is the heaven of heavens. The phrase, kingdom of heaven, is frequently used by the rabbinical writers, and always means, the purity of divine worship, and the blessedness which a righteous man feels when employed in it. It is further added, this kingdom is at hand; the dispensation of the glorious Gospel was about to be opened, and the Jews were to have the first offer of salvation. This kingdom is also at hand with us, and whenever Christ crucified, is preached, then salvation is to be found. Jesus is proclaimed to thee, O man, as able and willing to save. Believe on his name, cast thy soul on his atonement, and enter into rest."

Thus we see the kingdom of heaven is established in the earth—that it is righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost—and before any man can enter into or enjoy the blessings therein contained, he must have righteousness that will exceed in quality the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees of old. He must love the Lord his God with all his heart; and his neighbor as himself. And in so doing he will find that "great peace have they who love the law of God"—that "wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Should it still be urged that the kingdom of heaven spoken of in our text, alludes to the kingdom of God to be enjoyed beyond the dark valley of the shadow of death; and even should it be proved beyond a doubt, that this is the proper sense of the phrase, it will not militate against the final reconciliation of all things: for certain it is that no person can enter into the immortal kingdom of God, without righteousness, unmixed with sin. And it will be observed that our text does not say, or even intimate that some will forever remain without righteousness; but simply, that without this righteousness, no man can enter the kingdom of heaven.

And here permit me, while upon this point, to introduce a few passages which show, beyond the reach of controversy, that the time will come, when all shall have righteousness, peace and joy—"Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else: I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength." "And in this mountain shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things—a feast of wines on the lees—of fat things full of marrow—of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations; he will swallow up death in victory: and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people will he take away from off all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it."—"So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Therefore, when the time comes that all shall have righteousness in the Lord, when death shall be swallowed up in victory, when tears shall be wiped from off all faces, all will have righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit. When this time shall come, then "every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain, and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." AMEN.

HUMAN HAPPINESS.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

How often do we hear it remarked, that this is a world of trouble, care and perplexity: yet I confess, for my own part, I am inclined to believe there is more happiness than misery in the world, and that there might be more, infinitely more; if we would all (or even all professing Christians) do what we could to render our fellow-creatures, who are less fortunate than ourselves, more comfortable and happy. Did we but follow in the steps of Him who went about doing good, healing the sick, comforting the distressed, feeding the hungry, enlightening the ignorant, and removing or softening the prejudices of the bigoted, what a world of suffering should we allay! Could the man of wealth, who spends his thousands in pursuit of a shadow, vainly mistaking it for happiness, realize the soul-felt satisfaction and peace of mind, which flows from the consciousness of having relieved the wants of one bowed down beneath the accumulated ills of sickness, poverty and neglect; how many who are now struggling to gain a scanty subsistence might not only be made cheerful and happy, but prove ornaments and blessings to society!

But it is not the wealthy alone, who are capable of contributing to the happiness of those around them; nor do those only on whom poverty has laid his iron grasp, stand in need of the kindness and assistance of others; we all, in a greater or less degree, depend upon our fellow-creatures for the necessary comforts of life, and there is no one so poor or so ignorant but may contribute to the happiness of another, and thereby enhance his own! for in proportion as we assist in bearing the burthens and sustaining the spirits of our fellow-travellers on the uneven journey of life, will the burthens be lightened and our spirits be sustained by the never-failing companion and solace of the good, an approving conscience.

LEAVEN.

BY REV. O. WHISTON.

"A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump."—Gal. v. 9.

Paul, in the above declaration, intended no doubt to set forth the influence of example, not only upon his brethren at Galatia, but upon society at large, and every observer of men and things can bear testimony to its truth.

When I see a professor of Universalism absent himself from the house of worship, without good reason, I wish to say to him—remember, you are of a society that are watching your example, and a little leaven may leaven the whole lump.

When I see the head of a family inhaling the intemperate draught, before his wife and children, I would he should remember that he is but a portion of that lump that may be leavened.

When I see in a society, a luke-warm Universalist—one that is "neither cold nor hot"—I wish he were out of the lump, for he is a bad leaven.

When I find a tattler in society—a busy-body in other men's matters—I expect soon to find a rising in the lump.

When I see a man bringing his politics into a religious society, I think he is putting his leaven into the wrong trough.

When I see a pugilistic minister, I think he is dispensing a leaven that will make his congregation light.

And lastly, when I see a society that does not pay their preacher but a small portion of his stipulated salary, I think that such leaven will make the minister's bread very sour, and his children very hungry.

LOVE.

If there is aught in this wide world that can soothe the troubled breast, and allay the sorrows of life, it is pure, unchanging love! That love which congenial hearts possess—the love that outlives time, and survives the storms of adversity and misfortune—that supports us when life is about to cease, with its hopes and pleasures. How happyfying to him whose bosom is rent by afflictions—who has long been wafted on the ocean of uncertainty and despair—to think that he is beloved—that some kindred spirit, far distant, breathes a silent prayer in unison with his, which is transported to him on the incense gale of love! This supports him in the hour of affliction—assuages all his grief, and quiets the troubles of his heart. O, all the passions which invade the human breast, there is none so conspicuous in its nature, and so happyfying in its influence, as love. Blest antidote of fear! the sweetener of existence, and the consoler in death! Without it, what is man? A monster, without name or race! Man possesses no attribute so conducive to felicity—so generous in nature—so unbounded in extent, as this. When struggling under the sorrows and misfortunes that frequently beset us in life—when the raging tempest beats heavily against our little bark—how often should we sink under the weight of our miseries, were it not for the all-absorbing principle of love—the love of friends, connexions, and country. The thought of being loved by some one, dearer than life itself, makes man strive against the furious storm—encounter the perils of the tempest—to reach the haven of peace and repose where the object of his affections reigns. It is this principle which sustains us amid the concatenation of evil events—soothes our sorrows—allays our misery—and mitigates our griefs.

Without the attribute of love in our bosoms, the world would present little to attract, and nothing to delight us. Was it not paramount to all others, society could not exist—the sweets of social intercourse would be dissolved—and the world itself be barren of amusement. Destitute of love, hope presents no flattering allurements; the charms of novelty no longer please us, and life would be a burden.

If, then, love of an earthly nature is a necessary ingredient in the cup of human happiness—if this love, which is subject to change and decay, is productive of such a degree of happiness—how unbounded will be our felicity when we bear the image of him, whose love is immutable and immortal—in whose smiles we shall forever bask through the wastless ages of a never-ending eternity!

MINISTERIAL EXCHANGES.

Considerable has been said within a few years, upon the subject of "pulpit exchanges" between preachers of different denominations. In a few instances such exchanges have been effected, but in cases when the sentiments of the one approximated very near to the other; as, for example, the Congregationalists (rarely) with the Baptists, the Free-will Baptists with the Methodists, and the Unitarians with the Restorationists. (I give these last what they claim, a separate stand, and their assumed cognomen.) Offers of exchange have been frequent upon more liberal principles, and extended charity; but as often refused peremptorily or evasively. The Baptists formerly, were willing to exchange freely with the Congregationalists; and the Methodists with either of the former. The Unitarians have been urgent to exchange with the more "orthodox" and "evangelical," and have even raised a bitter hue and cry of "bigotry," and "want of charity" towards them, because of their illiberality, etc.; and yet they have as invariably shown quite as illiberal and self-righteous spirit, when asked to exchange with Universalists; and have refused on precisely the same ground that they have themselves been denied. So, it seems, their liberality runs all one way—backwards, to those who are yet in the van in religious improvement. They even show no favor to those more liberal than themselves. They are the standard of true "liberality." Thus far may we go but no farther; for if we do, their expansive charity forthwith becomes circumscribed; for they have gone to the ne plus ultra of true "liberalism."

For one, I apprehend the conduct above alluded to is all wrong, and shows an extremely narrow and illiberal mind, and a great lack of that charity which "suffereth long, and is kind, which believeth all things, hopeth all things," and yet "never faileth." I would by no means justify free exchanges for the sake of disputation upon points at issue between different denominations. But what a vast variety of subjects are presented in the Gospel, which are calculated to edify and improve all classes of believers; and these, too, of a general character! And how much better would it argue for the truth, usefulness, and subduing and sanctifying power of Christianity, were those who profess to be its most zealous supporters, disposed to exhibit its greatest virtues—charity, and true liberality! But how little can we effect by all our zeal and devotion, if we come short of a maintenance of those principles of true greatness of character and nobleness of feeling which require us to "esteem others better than (or quite as good as) ourselves."

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE NIAGARA ASSOCIATION—EXTRA SESSION, 1836.

Convened at Gaines, Orleans county, N. Y., according to previous notice, November 16, 1836.

1. United in prayer with Br. Chase.
2. Appointed Br. Sanderson, Moderator, and Br. Tomlinson, Clerk.

3. Received and read the credentials of delegates from the societies of Shelby, Ridgeway, Gaines and Clarendon.

4. Appointed Mrs. Hammond, Proctor and Barray a committee for the arrangement of the public services upon the occasion.

5. Adjourned to meet again in Council immediately after the morning services.

6. Met agreeably to previous adjournment, and heard by the committee appointed to receive requests for letters of fellowship and ordination, the request of Br. A. C. Barry for ordination, and their report in favor thereof. Report accepted.

7. In the furtherance of the cause within the limits of this Association, it was unanimously

Resolved, That Br. Andrews be requested to visit the destitute societies and neighborhoods within the limits of this Association, for the purpose of supplying them with the preached word—and that we recommend, that such societies and neighborhoods do their duty to support him in the work—and also, that he report his success to a Conference that shall hereafter be appointed for the purpose.

8. Voted that the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication.

Sermons were preached upon the occasion by Brs. Potter, Chase, Hammond, Sanderson, Tomlinson and Queal.

Ordination was conferred upon Br. A. C. Barry. The services were as follows:—Hymn. Introductory prayer, Br. Chase. Hymn. Sermon, Br. Hammond. Consecrating prayer, Br. Potter. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures, Br. Chase. Right hand of fellowship, Br. Sanderson. Voluntary by the choir. Usual addresses by Br. Chase.

Ministering brethren present.—Br. Potter, Sanderson, Chase, Hammond, Queal, Spaulding, Kenicott, Barry, Dutcher, Andrews, Tomlinson.

Delegates.—Br. Zimmerman, Halsinger, Calkins, Lee, Farwell and Cur.

REMARKS.

The religious services as performed, were interesting, because instructing, and that much good was done we have no doubt. But while we rejoice in prospect of the good which may result from our united labors, to them that were strangers to the faith of the Gospel, without profession or pretension, we can but express our regret that coldness and indifference has seized upon some that profess to have faith—consequently they were not found in the sanctuary of their God, mingling their affections in that necessary and useful service, that should at all times characterize the Christian. This was not, as it should have been; because such practice is calculated to strengthen the objections so often urged against the faith of the Gospel, namely, its lack of power, to induce a healthful religious zeal and exercise. It would be well for all such as profess the faith of Abraham, and who show in their practice that they care more for the riches of the world, or the gratification of their selfishness, than for the riches of Christ and the success of his cause, "to examine themselves whether they be in the faith," and "to prove themselves," and know that they be not reproaches, and opposed to every good word and work. We trust we have made a necessary distinction in our remarks, and that we shall be understood. We have at Gaines, some faithful and devoted followers of our Lord Jesus Christ, who are ready and willing to make many sacrifices for the advancement of the good cause. By them we were joyfully received, and cheerfully provided with all things pertaining to our happiness—and to them we tender our unfeigned thanks; while to others who are cold and indifferent, we say—"Repent," and "turn to the Lord," and live. Brethren be faithful in the work of the ministry, in imparting to it your aid, both in pecuniary matters, and in attendance upon the preached word—and God through Christ, will enable you to triumph over false brethren, and over all the wily arts of the adversary. Truth will then run, and be glorified—knowledge shall be increased—and the world shall have peace. Amen.

R. TOMLINSON, Clerk.

TEMPERANCE:
 BY DR. A. W. BENTON.

In a note appended to my article on temperance, in the 14th No. of the Magazine and Advocate, for April 2, 1836, Br. Grosh seems to think that I may be ignorant of some "mysteries" connected with temperance societies, which it might be profitable for me to know. It is true that I have no knowledge to boast of; and I hope to grow wiser, as I grow older. I have read some of the publications of the N. Y. State Temperance Society, particularly the Magazine to which Br. G. refers in his note; but had not discovered any mystery, nor did I discover the harsh denunciatory spirit which he seems to attribute to it. One would almost be led to infer from his note, that the Executive Committee of the N. Y. S. T. S. had passed upon the makers and venders of ardent spirit, the "sentence of death without benefit of clergy."—Now if this construction be true, if this be the spirit which they exercise, I hope and pray that my understanding may be so illuminated that I may see it.

"Late as it is, I put myself at school,
 And feel some comfort not to be a fool."

And I can devoutly say,

"If I am wrong, O! teach my heart
 To find th' it better way."

Br. G. says that "the Executive Committee recommends temperance men to "shun the very sight" of venders and makers of ardent spirits, "to withhold their feet from their doors," and to treat them as they would "assassins and highway robbers." The words in italics is the language to which he refers. Let us then examine these words in the connexion in which they stand, and see if there is not some mitigation to his construction. In the Quarterly Temperance Magazine for February, 1834, page 11, we read, "Men indeed may be blind and deaf to all moral obligation, and the persuasion and counsels of their fellow-men; remain utterly unmoved amid the ruin, and miseries, and woes which the traffic in ardent spirit is diffusing over our beloved land: The widow and the fatherless may stretch forth their imploring hands in vain; the dying groans of the drunkard may fall upon their ear unnoticed; the poverty, the chains, the prison, the gallows, the wailings of the wretched victims of intemperance may pass in solemn review before them, and make no impression." In reference to such men, [i. e. dealers in spirit,] after having exhausted reason and persuasion in vain," they say, page 15, "They [i. e. members of temperance societies,] have associated in their minds the business of the distiller and retailer as possessing a kindred nature to that of the assassin and highway robber." And to enforce the duty of temperance men, to withhold their patronage from such men, they go on to say, "And why should they act on different principles," [not in a different manner] "in the one case than in the other?" "Were they thrown into a community of outlaws, who subsisted entirely by fraud and constant depredations on the property of their neighbors, would they not instinctively shun the very sight of these desperadoes?" Now the plain, and obvious, and only meaning of all this is, that the same principles which would lead us to shun the sight of assassins and robbers, would, when fully understood and put in practice, induce us to withhold our patronage from the vender of ardent spirits, after we had used "reason and persuasion in vain." And this is all they recommend.

"Withhold their feet from their doors." Page 9, same book, we read, "In a subsequent page we shall present, somewhat more in detail, the considerations which to us seems to make it imperative upon all who claim to be considered the advocates of the temperance society, and its doctrines of total abstinence, immorality of the traffic, etc., to withhold their feet from their neighbor's premises, wherever the immorality is practised."—"That is, withhold their feet from the grocery and store, for there the immorality is practised," and not from their dwellings. So much for Br. G's quotations.

Now, really, if there is any unpardonable harshness in all this, then truly my mind is so shrouded in ignorance that I cannot see it. Let us try a few more extracts, and a little more lengthy too, than his, and see if we can ascertain "what manner of spirit" the book is of. Page 7, we read, "The number of men, and of women too, who are willing to devote time, money, personal attention, unwearied solicitude and untiring effort, to take the drunkard by the hand, and by the force of pure and exalted benevolence compel him to reverse his nature and respect himself, is every day increasing." Page 9, speaking of the vender of spirit, it says, "Be assured that he may be and probably is, as moral and upright a man as yourself. Give him the light and information you possess, and he will not continue the traffic." Page 19, we read, speaking of our obligation to "love our neighbor as ourselves"—"Nor does the question of their good or bad moral character, enforce in the one case, or do away in the other, the ever binding obligation to love them as ourselves. Whatever may be their creed, circumstances or condition, they are each entitled to an equal proportion of our regard and love." Page 20, "And while it is painful to do ought to injure the feelings of any of God's creatures; yet as long as we hear the clanking of the prisoner's chains, and behold the towering scaffolds, and witness the black scene of murder, and theft, and assassination and death, occasioned by intemperance; we feel it our duty, having exhausted reason and argument in vain, to withhold all patronage from those who still persist in the manufacture and sale of ardent spirit. And while we are constrained by a regard to the highest and dearest interest of our families, our kindred, and our fellow-citizens, to take this public stand, we do it in the spirit of kindness, and without the most distant idea of casting any undue reproach, or indignity upon a hitherto respectable portion of community."

Reader, such is the language, judge of the spirit for yourself. As regards the charge which Br. G. brings against Dr. Hewett and others, I can only say it is truly heinous—but of the truth of it, I have no evidence but his assertion. As Br. Grosh thinks other topics more beneficial, and better suited to his paper, this will close what I have to say on this (in my estimation) important subject.

South Bainbridge, November 23, 1836.

REMARKS.

I regret that, in justice to myself, I am compelled to occupy more room, than I believe the subject otherwise deserves. That subject is not the temperance cause; nor even temperance societies in general; but, whether I have mistaken the meaning of some principles and measures avowed and recommended by the New-York State Temperance Society. Let this be kept in mind.

And lest any misunderstanding may arise on the subject, I here declare my belief, that Dr. Benton does understand their language as he represents, although I must think he does not understand it fully. I do not doubt either his sincerity or honesty, (and declare so thus publicly, as, in his private letter, he seems to think I have done it,) and never did intentionally intimate any thing against either—whatever his language may mean about my veracity where he speaks, above, of a certain assertion of mine. But of that in its place.

That our readers may the better judge for themselves, respecting the intent and spirit of the articles referred to in the Temperance Magazine, (not the spirit of "the book" for that contains articles, by other pens, and on other subjects,) I will give still further extracts, from the very connexion of the few words I quoted in my very brief note, to which the doctor replies above. I quote not from the work itself, but from memorandums I made at the time of perusing it—i. e. nearly three years ago.

"Many, it is evident, of the members of temperance societies do not fully discover all the consequences to which their new principles must inevitably lead them." "The position that the traffic is immoral must be sustained, or the whole affair falls to the ground. The inference that the laws authorizing the traffic are immoral, is not more fairly deducible from this, than is the proposition, that he who patronizes a rum-dealer is guilty of an immorality; yet among the thousands of temperance men we find few who feel any hesitation in entering a rum-dealer's shop to buy a pound of tea, or a gallon of molasses. In this they show less moral conscience than the rum-dealer himself." p. 8.

The reader will notice the jesuitical policy of making the pledge mean more, than its unsuspecting signer ever supposed it did mean—thus leading him, step by step, to measures he at first abhorred, until he is led to believe it immoral to purchase even the necessities of life from a dealer in intoxicating liquors! How immoral, the next extract will partially disclose, as well as continue the disclosure of the above named crafty policy.

"When you first heard the question of the immorality of the traffic discussed in a deliberative body, you was not prepared to pronounce against it the broad and sweeping denunciation of immorality. But now you can not only subscribe to this doctrine, you can even class those that continue the traffic, with thieves and murderers; but do you dare, in the face of day and before the eyes of thousands, to go into the strong hold of the thief and murderer, and there, in the midst of his ill-got gain, take hold of his bloody hand, and bid him God-speed in his work of devastation and death? Let us be permitted to urge upon you the indispensable importance of taking at once, such a course as shall indicate to your erring neighbor in a most unequivocal manner, the sense you entertain of his pursuit. You are probably aware that he does not hear your speeches or read your essays; your arguments therefore, though perfectly just and logical, have no effect at all upon your rum-selling neighbor, because he neither sees nor hears them, but there is an argument which you can make him see and feel and understand, that is the argumentum ad crumenam, or the argument of the purse, and it is one of no small efficiency with all classes. Now, unless you have used this argument in 'all consistent and proper ways' you have not come up to the spirit of that pledge, in which you stand bound to your fellow-reformers, and you are in all respects as censurable and as guilty, in the judgment of an enlightened conscience, as your neighbor who is but doing to-day what you did yesterday." pp. 9, 10.

Here the vender of intoxicating liquors is classed "with thieves and murderers;" to shake hands with him is called, taking "hold of his bloody hand," and the signer of the pledge is called on, to manifest "the sense he entertains of the dealer's pursuits," "in all consistent and proper ways," (a quotation from the pledge,) one of which "ways," only, is pointed out. Add to this the following extract.

"But why should they do this [patronize the maker and vender] any longer? They have declared the traffic in ardent spirit an immorality," etc. "They have associated in their mind the business of the distiller and the retailer, as possessing a kindred nature to that of the assassin and highway robber. And why should they act on different principles in the one case than in the other? Were they thrown into a community of outlaws, who subsisted entirely by fraud and constant depredations on the property of their neighbors, can there be a doubt what course they would pursue? Would they not instinctively shun the very sight of those desperadoes? And so far from associating with them on the terms of mutual interchange, would they not by precept and example, take the most effectual means to express their abhorrence of their unnatural employment?"

"To show the application of this principle to the present case, suppose our merchants to be engaged in the business of vending arsenic....Would you still connive at their inhuman conduct, by continuing your patronage?.....But all this is true of the traffic in ardent spirit, and more too. It is not only a poison which like arsenic destroys the body, but it debases and ruins the immortal soul."

Such is the language—what is its meaning—and what the natural and legitimate inference to be drawn from it?

If the vender of intoxicating liquors is really as bad as, or worse than, the robber, murderer and assassin, (as this language expressly declares,)—and if it is wrong for us to visit, on social terms, and right to “shun the very sight of,” murderers and assassins—why should we treat with more deference, courtesy and respect, those who are worse than they? Of what use is the above comparison, (which supposes “a community of outlaws” to be equal with the venders of intoxicating drinks—to pursue business of a “kindred nature” with that of the dealer in spirits,) but to induce us to treat dealers in intoxicating liquors equally with murderers? Nay, more—if he who buys “a pound of tea or a gallon of molasses” from the dealer in intoxicating liquors, does really “show less moral conscience” in so doing, “than the rum dealer himself,” and is really, “in all respects, as censurable and as guilty in the judgment of an enlightened conscience,” as the dealer himself—and if this dealer in intoxicating liquors is really to be classed “with thieves and murderers”—with “a community of outlaws”—“with the assassin and highway robber”—(all of which is strenuously and earnestly advocated in the above extracts—) then, is it not the imperious, absolute duty of these temperance societies to call on community to punish both the customer and the merchant as they would punish murderers and assassins? I can not see how this inference can be evaded. To my mind, it flows easily, naturally, legitimately and unavoidably from the language of the foregoing and other extracts. Especially when I consider that they add still further to the criminality of the dealer in intoxicating liquors, by declaring that he is as much worse than murderers and assassins, as the murder of immortal souls is worse than the mere taking of mortal life, I can not see how they can repudiate the idea of treating the maker or vender of ardent spirits as severely as they would pirates and assassins.

For these reasons, I can not agree with Br. Benton, in supposing that their comparisons and general language merely mean, that, “as you would instinctively shun the very sight of robbers and murderers, so you must only withdraw your patronage from those who are worse than they are.” True; they directly recommend no further action than this; but if they are sincere in what they say, and would “manifest the sense they entertain of the dealer’s pursuits” “in all consistent and proper ways,” they must treat even the customers of those who deal in intoxicating liquors, as they would treat murderers and assassins.

They may call it loving their neighbors as they do themselves—for even the inquisitors of Spain and Portugal burnt heretics “for the love of God and of immortal souls”—but their “pure and exalted benevolence” can not convince me that premises are right, which inevitably lead to conclusions that even their friends deem to be slander on their intentions.

My information respecting Dr. Hewett’s proposal, (that the nations of Europe should combine with the United States, to “declare the traffic in ardent spirits to be piracy, and treat it as such; deem every distiller a land pirate, and every retailer, a follower of pirates,”) was derived from the Philadelphian, of July 26, 1832, where it appeared under the head of “Temperance Millennium,” preceded and followed by approbatory remarks from the pen of the Editor, Rev. Ezra Stiles Ely, D. D. The proposal of Dr. Hewett was made at the anniversary of “The American Temperance Society,” held in Boston, that year. Dr. Hewett was the General Agent of the American Temperance Society at the time. See Magazine and Advocate, vol. iii, pages 254 and 255, where I first noticed this occurrence at length. If Dr. Benton has any doubts respecting the truth of my assertion, will he do me, the cause he advocates, and the public at large, the justice to search out this matter, and expose me if I have stated a falsehood? Brs. S. W. Fuller or A. C. Thomas will undoubtedly make the necessary search for him in the office and files of the Philadelphian, in the city of Philadelphia, and give him the result of their labors for publication.

In the last sentence of his letter, the Doctor conveys the idea, that I exclude the subject of temperance from our columns. Such is not the fact—though he may have so understood me. I objected to the spirit and denunciations of parts of his articles, which I suppressed, believing them injurious to the temperance cause. I objected to publishing long extracts from printed speeches that had been widely circulated in other papers. I believe, also, that we both can find more important and interesting subjects to advocate or oppose, than temperance societies—or even those temperance measures about which we differ. But I have never objected to a temperate, judicious, original article of any kind, calculated to benefit or promote the temperance cause. Even an article in favor of temperance societies, if calculated to promote the cause, never has been and never will be excluded from columns where there is room for it, over which I have the control. But I certainly do not desire to fill our columns with disputes like the present, between myself and a respected correspondent and brother, on the mere over-zealous measures of a temperance society, to the injury both of the temperance cause and of the paper.

I have finished. Frequently, as the Doctor’s articles were being published, have I wished to enter my dissent from his statements, and yet refrained to save room for other subjects. But he asked the insertion of the preceding letter as a matter of justice to himself, against the brief note to which it is a reply. I was anxious to gratify a man I esteem, and who deemed himself injured by me; but could not, in justice to myself, insert his letter without a reply. I knew it must be a long one, let me strive ever so much for brevity; but believed our readers would pardon me. I ask their indulgence, trust I shall have no occasion to ask it again, and certainly will endeavor to prove myself grateful for it, by writing better on some more agreeable subject. A. B. GROSH.

BR. LE FEVRE’S EUROPEAN TOUR.

We have not hitherto copied any of Br. Le Fevre’s letters, written during his tour in England, Holland, Russia, France, etc.; because, however interesting, they were extensively circulated by other papers among so many of our readers that it seemed unnecessary; and also, because they seldom embraced subjects intimately connected with our religious views and prosperity. The following is, in general an exception from the latter reason; and as it embraces at one view, a statement of the religious and political condition of England and Ireland, and the fullest accounts he has yet given of the English Unitarians, we venture to transfer it from the Universalist Union to our columns. New-York, May, 1836.

Messrs. EDITORS—I took an early opportunity on my arrival in London, of calling on a Unitarian clergyman, with whom I had formed a casual acquaintance, and to whom I am indebted for all the attentions which I received from the denomination. By him I was introduced to the resident clergy of London, and some in the vicinity. There are four chapels in the city of London, but vastly inferior in size to the churches of other denominations. I attended them in succession, but found very thin audiences. The only crowded house was that in which Mr. Fox officiated, a name not unknown to the Universalists of this country, from some of his published sermons. I am sorry to say, that however he may be admired as a speaker, his behaviour has been such as to destroy his usefulness as a minister of the Gospel, and the Unitarians as a body have been obliged to withdraw their fellowship from him. The misdemeanor of which he stands charged is closely allied to that contained in Mark x: 11. I went one morning out of curiosity to hear him; but the crowd was so dense, that I was obliged to stand near the door the whole time. He possesses great fluency of speech, preaches by the hour and without note. He advanced some most startling sentiments, and if I can tell what skepticism means, I should not hesitate to pronounce some parts of his discourse such. The building in which he officiates is considerably less than the Orchard or Bleecker-street churches. He understood the art of riveting the attention of his congregation; the most profound silence reigned till he closed his periods, when there would be a general motion of satisfaction, and almost amounting to a plaudit. His discourse was very desultory—history, biography, politics, being all brought forward to fill up the gaps between the different parts of his subject. There was now and then a fine burst of eloquence, and that was the only redeeming part of the performance. On making inquiry afterwards I found that my opinion of his skepticism was by no means singular, but that it was generally pretty well understood that such were his sentiments. I was very sorry to hear, from very respectable authority, that Thomas Southwood Smith, well known to our denomination as the author of the work on “Divine Government,” followed in his wake; I do not mean in his practice, but in his doctrine.

I was invited one evening to attend a private meeting of the Unitarian clergymen, who assemble once a month at each other’s houses, for the purpose of discussing subjects connected with their profession. It is simply a conversation on some previously given subject. The present inquiry was, what evidence have we that John Locke, the author of the “Essay on the Human Understanding,” was a Unitarian. One gentleman read an article of considerable length which he had prepared on the subject, and then each brought forward additional testimony. The evidence was pretty strong that Locke was a Unitarian in sentiment, though neither the spirit of the age nor his own disposition was in favor of its open and public avowal.

The gentleman to whose politeness I was indebted for the introduction above mentioned, also invited me to preach in his pulpit. He officiates in a small chapel at Newington, adjoining London; and I accepted the invitation. The day was very unfavorable, and the congregation did not exceed thirty people; if it had been very fair, I should have probably had twenty more. This was the only time I officiated during my residence in Europe; it was the only opportunity that was afforded me. The Unitarians in England are all Universalists, but they know not that name, nor any one that bears it. When the Unitarian clergy from the United States have visited England, their services have been in much demand, for they have been heard of by the reading community; whereas the Universalists are unknown. There were plenty of inquiries about Channing, Dewey, etc., but Ballou, Balfour, etc., were names unknown.—There has been a correspondence between American and English Unitarians, which has served to unite them; but the Universalists have had none, by the same distinctive appellation as themselves, with whom they could have epistolary intercourse. Again, I discovered a lurking prejudice against us, derived from American Unitarians. Whitman’s friendly letters are not unknown either in word or spirit. I have made these remarks with no unfriendly feelings towards the English Unitarians; but it may serve to solve a question which will arise in the minds of your readers, how it happened that I was so little engaged in my profession during my abode in London?

I inquired from such sources as I thought most likely to obtain information, about Rely, Murray and Winchester. Of the two former, I never met any one that had heard any thing, whilst most reading people were familiar with the name of the latter. During the last weeks of my residence in London, I received a letter from a Mr. Thom of Liverpool, who has been preaching Universalism to his congregation. He sent me a very pressing invitation to come and see him, and preach the word; but I had made such engagements that it was not convenient for me to comply with his request. I very much regretted that circumstances prevented the only chance afforded me of meeting a brother in the faith, and thus closed every avenue to my ministerial labors.

In concluding these letters, it may not be uninteresting to your readers, if I make some general remarks on the condition of England, etc. If you ask an Englishman what is the state of the country, he will tell you, prosperous; but if you look to facts you will come to the conclusion that it is wretched. In the first place, the hard-working man who gets employment, can scarcely supply, with all his industry the common wants of nature. He toils from dawn of day till night, and the amount of his labor furnishes a very scanty supply of the plainest food. But it is also a fact that thousands cannot get employment to obtain bread for their families. The poor-houses are thronged not merely with the feeble, the aged, the sick, and the dissolute, but with those who are both able and willing to work. As you travel in the coaches, you will see able bodied men follow for miles to get a few coppers for bread, and who would gladly get employment. The people of your country ought not, therefore, to judge hardly or deal roughly with those poor fellows that seek your shores; they may be sure that nothing but dire necessity will lead to expatriation. An Englishman has as much patriotism as any one in the world, and he only leaves the soil of his forefathers because that soil no longer offers that bosom to feed him. And if this is the case in England, in Ireland it is much worse—poverty and wretchedness there hold the throne of their empire. The sympathies of the British nation have been appealed to in behalf of the suffering Protestant clergy in Ireland, and the Bishop of London, represented their destitution so great, that a clergyman's son had actually to plant potatoes for his father! But the Bishop in his sympathies for the clergyman's son, who was so degraded that he had to work, forgot to mention, that tens of thousands of the people had no potatoes to plant. An Irish gentleman who had just left the north of Ireland, assured me that many would toil the whole day and run the chance of getting some broken victuals at night. If this is prosperity it is one sided, making the rich richer, and the poor poorer. It is difficult to make an Englishman sensible of the poverty and wretchedness that surrounds him. The partition walls which society has built up to prevent one class from looking into the concerns of another. In this way too many foreigners are deceived. They get introductions to English families in good circumstances, and they see them enjoying every comfort and living as Englishmen know how to live. Here their acquaintance with English affairs ends. They do not go into detail, nor are they brought into actual contact with those classes who are the objects of penury and want. Except the beggars in the streets, the mass of poverty is put out of sight. If what Pope says of government is true, "whatever is best administered, is best," and the general happiness and welfare of the people is to be the rule of judgment, there must be something very rotten in the administration of affairs. I have neither the ability nor the disposition to enter on "the affairs of state;" but I am very sure that if such a disposition of things is politically right, it is morally wrong. I am aware that there must and always will be rich and poor, comparatively, but desperate is the condition of that people where the services rendered to the rich will not give the poor bread.

In discoursing "on matters and things" in our Republic, there were few things which I could not conscientiously defend except slavery. All eulogium on freedom, equal rights and political advantages, was "beating the air," while the fact stood prominently forward, that slavery existed in the land of boasted freedom. It was in vain that I parried the thrushy pointing to the degraded and slavish condition of thousands in Europe, of the white population; this did not do away the fact. Admitting that all Europe were enslaved, that did not justify the principle; and the pretension to freedom in the United States was an "empty boast," while the rod of the oppressor was heard in the land. I must candidly avow that I felt my inability to defend this point. I hate slavery: I have sworn on the sacred altar of liberty an eternal warfare against it; it is against my feelings, my politics, my religion; as a philanthropist, a republican, and a Universalist my soul abhors it in every shape, color and degree; in view of it, home would lose its charms, my country its glory, and heaven its joys. It never can be reconciled to my feelings or compromised to meet the assent of my mind; if ever that takes place, my whole system must be revolutionized and I must become the character which I most on earth despise—a tyrant.

On the 29th day of March I embarked on board a steamboat and went down to Gravesend, to join the packet in which I had taken my passage for New-York. Our voyage was tedious enough. After beating about in the Channel a week in bad weather we had to put in to Falmouth. We lay here twenty-four hours during a gale of wind, and again set sail; but we experienced little but westerly winds, and some very rough weather, so that I did not arrive home before the 14th day of May. Nothing particular occurred during the passage, except the loss of one of the hands, the day before we made the land. The sea was smooth, the breeze moderate and all sail set. He had gone aloft and was busy on the fore-yard arm, when he fell. No one could assign a cause for his falling. Every effort was made to save him, but in vain. By the time the boat was lowered down, he had sunk to rise no more. Poor fellow, when within a day's sail of port, after the fatigues of the voyage, he found a watery grave. The accident cast a gloom over the whole crew and passengers; it was the only untoward circumstance that had befallen us. We had only half a dozen cabin passengers, but there were 180 in the steerage; there was much suffering from sea-sickness, and the measles broke out among the children, but there were no fatal cases, and before we arrived all were in good health and spirits.

Thus closes my European tour. I have been blessed with uninterrupted good health, have been gratified with once more beholding the face of my parents and relatives, and under the protection of a kind Providence have been restored to my family, my friends and the people of my charge; for all which favors I desire to be truly grateful.

Yours, etc.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

This mammoth, so famous for giving away Bibles at as high a price as they are sold at in the book-stores—for printing them without note or comment, yet publishing notes and comments at the heads of the pages and chapters—for being wholly religious, yet owning bonds, mortgages, houses, lands, and probably, could the truth be known, using its begged funds—begged to print the Bible—in erecting mills, etc.—this institution (not further to enumerate its faults) is about to apply for an act of incorporation, to the New-York legislature, the ensuing session. Shall it have one? Does it need one to carry on its benevolent projects? Will it be safe to trust such a large and wealthy institution with one? Should such a printing monopoly—already so destructive to the business of individual printers and sellers of the Bible—be armed with further power to break down honest men with small capitals not begged from community, and engross the whole market to itself, that it may print spurious editions when it pleases, almost with impunity? These are questions to be answered by the people—to them I commit the subject. Business will not now allow me further to remark upon the iniquities of the Bible society, or the dangers of giving it a charter; but I will resume the subject at another time.

The following are the remarks of the Editor of the Baptist Register on the subject—and though he might be willing to have it chartered, if it would refund to the Baptists the $50,000 it has retained of that denomination's funds after turning them out of the establishment, yet it is evident that that measure will not prevent it from serving some other denomination in a like manner as soon as it has the power. Still less will it secure individuals and community in general from its speculations in property and stocks, and encroachments on their rights and liberties.

"AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—Among the notices of intended applications to the New-York legislature, the ensuing Winter, for acts of incorporation, we find one given by this society. Perhaps the legislature will grant the application—perhaps they will not. Perhaps some of them may be disposed to inquire before the grant is made, how far they have done justice to the Baptist denomination—whether, while compelling them, by the late decision, to retire from the institution, they have returned to them any part of the large amount of funds which was contributed by them to enrich their treasury, which may be estimated at more than $300,000—whether the bequests alone given by the Baptists will not equal $50,000, when fully realized, and whether there has not been a large amount in addition to this, contributed by them in the different States of the Union, by donations of $500 and less from various individuals—by sums raised by many churches to make their pastors life members and life directors, and by countless contributions also of tens and fives down to one dollar, and from that to six cents—and whether this society would not do well before receiving such charter, if they have not done justice to the Baptists in this thing, to do so—or whether the society makes the application for this charter in order to guard against a suit in equity, should the Baptists be disposed to institute one? We believe our denomination have stood, and still stand, favorably before our legislature, in all their applications, because they meddle not with Cæsar's kingdom, but in the very spirit of their constitution they are dis-severed and kept aloof from it. But it is not so in the other denominations. There is a suspicion too frequently attached to them in their applications. They have once been blended with Church and State unions, and what has been once, in the opinion of many, may also be again. And if they should have fears in regard to the great Pedobaptist Bible society, and refuse them a charter, at least until they should do justice to the Baptist denomination, we should not be surprised.

PROFOUND ERUDITION.

Not long since a Methodist circuit preacher, not a hundred miles from Salisbury, Herkimer county, N. Y., fell in company with a Universalist, with whom he soon got into conversation on the subject of religion, the meaning of certain Scripture words and phrases, etc. The Universalist asked him if he could inform him what word in the Greek language the English word everlasting was translated from. "O yes," says the preacher, "it is from the Greek word Gehenna." Are you certain of it? "Yes." By whose authority do you translate Gehenna by the English word everlasting? "By the authority of Grove's Greek Lexicon." Query. Wonder if this preacher had ever been to a theological seminary.

REV. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, vs. UNIVERSALISM.

This distinguished individual, the leader of the sect of Campbellites, calling themselves "Disciples," and the quondam vanquisher of Robert Owen, has placed himself in a hostile attitude to Universalism in his paper, the "Millennial Harbinger," published at Bethany, Va. Something more than a year since he admitted into his columns an article in favor of Universalism, signed "Spencer," and replied to it in the same number. His reply was of so peculiar a character as to call forth a letter, addressed to him from Br. G. W. Montgomery. He published the letter and his reply in the February number of the Harbinger. And there the matter has rested until now, so far as the public was concerned. Nevertheless, he and Br. Montgomery have had an interview on the subject, and by mutual consent, Br. M., for reasons which will hereafter appear, was to choose a substitute to continue the discussion on the side of Universalism, and Mr. C. was to continue his opposition against, and the whole was to appear in some Universalist paper as well as in the Harbinger. Br. M. has recently made choice of myself to conduct the Universalist side of the controversy; the whole of which will in due time be published in this paper. I have addressed a private letter to Mr. C. to ascertain when it will suit his convenience to resume the discussion, as we do not wish to commence it in this paper till there is a prospect of its being continued uninterruptedly or nearly so, till it is finished. I expect to receive his answer soon, and that the discussion will be commenced in this paper very shortly. My reply to Mr. Campbell's last article is already prepared. D. S.

THE RECORD.

The Western General Convention met at Belpre, Washington county, Ohio, October 14th, 1836. Br. L. L. Sadler, Moderator, and Br. W. Y. Ennnett, Clerk. Appointed Br. L. L. Sadler, Standing Clerk; Br. W. P. Putnam, Treasurer; Brs. L. L. Sadler, A. A. Davis, W. H. Jolly, (ministers,) T. Burr, A. Coleman, M. Pond, and W. P. Putnam, (laymen,) delegates to the United States Convention in 1837; Brs. T. Strong, W. H. Jolly and C. Rogers, to designate the place for the next meeting of the Western Convention; and Br. Sadler to prepare the minutes, etc., for publication. Most of the minutes relate to the Western Union Seminary, at Philomath, Ind., which is involved in debt, and the affairs rather perplexed. It was referred back again to the Western Union Association, in whose limits it is located. Granted fellowship to Br. George N. Cox, of Elizabethtown, Va., and conferred ordination on Br. Eusebius Hoag, late of Pittsburg, Pa., now of Belpre, Ohio. Recommended to the various societies to raise and transmit funds to the Treasurer, to defray the travelling expenses of the delegates to the United States Convention. [A good measure.] Nine preachers present, among whom was Br. Schreiner, named in our last. Adjourned to meet on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in October, 1837.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Boston Association met at New-Rowley, Mass., Tuesday evening, November 1st. Brs. H. Ballou, Moderator; J. M. Austin, Clerk. Resolutions were passed in favor of reviving the Expositor, total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and the following report on literary and theological schools was unanimously adopted:—"That where circumstances render it convenient to establish and support schools for instruction in those branches of learning proper for young men entering the ministry, such institutions are desirable; and that they be recommended to the attention of our brethren." [Except the recommendation, and this embraces the true ground, my humble opinion. Not one theological seminary, but schools for instruction generally—erected, not by the ecclesiastical bodies of our denomination, but by those individual brethren who are in favor of them.] A letter of fellowship was granted to Br. John Pierce, of Lunenburg; and ordination conferred upon Br. Josiah W. Talbot, of Hollis. Occasional sermon, by Br. O. A. Skinner, voted to be published—Br. J. M. Austin selected to deliver the next. Ordination sermon by Br. H. Ballou. Fifteen preachers of the Association, and three visiting preachers present—lay delegates seven. Adjourned to meet the first Wednesday in November, 1837.

The Stratford Association met in Rochester, N. H., October 19th. Brs. J. H. Smith, (layman,) Moderator; W. S. Cilley, Clerk; Br. J. P. Atkinson, Standing Clerk. Received the first society in Wolfeborough into fellowship. Passed resolutions in favor of temperance and the Expositor. Six preachers present—six sermons delivered. A. B. G.

MEMOIR OF REV. JOHN FREEMAN.

Most of the edition that was printed of the above work, has been disposed of, either by sale or distribution into the hands of agents in different parts, for sale.—Many of those agents into whose hands the work was committed, have never been heard from since the Memoir was sent to them; consequently, cash enough has not yet been received for the work to pay the expenses of publication, and therefore the widow and orphans have not received anything on that account. All those who have received the above work for sale, and have not yet made returns, are requested to do so, as early as possible, and to send us an account of the number of books sold and the avails thereof, in order that I may pay the balance of the expenses of publication and have something to pay over to the widow of our late Br. Freeman. Where agents have not yet disposed of the whole number of copies sent them, they can keep what they have on hand for future sale; and where they are willing to pay for all they have had and assume the risk of the future sale of what they have on hand, they would accommodate me and greatly oblige the widow by so doing. I can yet supply a few more orders for that excellent work. D. SKINNER, Publisher and agent for the Widow Freeman.

BILLS TO DELINQUENTS.

We have this week commenced sending bills to all who have paid nothing on this or the last volume. For the present volume the terms are as yet $2., but we charge $2.50 in the bill, so that those who neglect to pay within the year, can, by referring to the bill ascertain how much they are indebted. Those who send the pay before the 1st of next month, will of course send but $2. for the present volume.

As Br. Skinner is anxious to close up his accounts, and as we are as anxious as ever to retain all good subscribers we have concluded jointly to make another

LIBERAL OFFER.

If subscribers owing for last year and this, and whose bills will be $5.00 at the end of the present year, will send us each $5.00 free of expense between this and the 1st of January next, they shall be credited in full for the two past and $1.00 on the next year. If those owing three years, and whose bills will be $7.50, will in like manner, send us $8.00 before the present year closes, they shall be credited in full for four years, i. e., the three past and the coming one, thus saving at least $1.00 each. Those who owe for more than that length of time, who still take and wish to continue, if previous to the 1st of January next, they will pay up for all the past at the rate of $2.25 per volume, and in advance for the next volume, they shall be discharged from our debt. This offer, it will be seen, applies only to those who continue their subscription for the next year, and who regard the time specified in the offer. Those who discontinue their papers, and those to whom we are at the expense and necessity of sending a travelling agent, will in all cases be expected to pay the full amount of the bills charged against them; unless in cases of poverty or misfortune, in which cases, when we are satisfied of the existence of the cause, we shall be willing to make any reasonable deduction. D. SKINNER.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

AGENTS.

For several reasons we have been desirous of appointing one or more local agents in every place where our paper is circulated, and have several times requested our subscribers in every place where we have not already an active agent to recommend some one of their number to us as such. In many instances, this request has been complied with, and we are pleased with the result. We shall commence publishing a list of authorized agents in the 1st number of next volume, and for the purpose of making that list as perfect as possible, we again call the attention of our subscribers to the subject, with the request that they will notify us before the 1st of January who they wish to have appointed as agent, except in places where we have already agents who are known as such; in such cases we shall publish their names unless we have orders to the contrary.

OUR LIST.

Will our agents please regulate their lists so far as practicable before the 1st of January next, that we may know how large an edition of the next volume to publish. We have before stated that we believe our efforts deserve an increase of subscribers, and shall make calculations accordingly, but it is necessary that we know as soon as the commencement of the volume pretty nearly how large the list will be. Another thing. We wish all present subscribers to bear in mind that they are considered subscribers for the next volume unless they order a discontinuance before the expiration of the present. A neglect to give this notice until some three or four numbers of another volume are issued makes a great derangement in the list, and is not in reality using the publishers according to the principles of honesty.

THANKSGIVING DAY—appointed by Governor Marcy for Thursday next, 15th inst., will be celebrated by an appropriate discourse, in the Universalist meeting-house in this city. Sermon by Br. Skinner, commencing at the usual hour. A. B. G.

A sale of shares in the Utica City Library—forfeited by their owners—will take place on Tuesday evening next, at the Library Room, No. 56 Genesee-street.

CELEBRATION OF CHRISTMAS EVE

Liquidation of the Universalist Meeting-House Debt

The Universalist society in this city have been long and deeply involved in debt for their meeting-house. Five years since, they were owing about $6000. They have struggled arduously to extinguish this debt, and have now reduced it to a little over $2000. They are induced now to call upon their friends and a liberal public, for further aid towards the accomplishment of that desirable object, in a manner which, while the charity will be scarcely felt by those conferring it, will greatly aid them in the payment of a burdensome debt, and in securing an unincumbered title to their house. They propose celebrating the anniversary of our Saviour's birth, by illuminating and trimming their meeting-house, a concert of sacred music, and a discourse adapted to the occasion, and to sell tickets of admission at Fifty Cents for each person; every dollar of which money, when received will be faithfully applied to the extinction of the debt. No person will be admitted on that evening without a ticket or the payment of the above sum. None who are friendly to the society will grudge their Fifty Cents for so good an object: and there are few, indeed, but what can, if they choose, lay by that sum between this and Christmas Eve. The laboring classes, and even those in quite moderate circumstances, we doubt not, will be ready for the occasion. We affectionately invite not only our citizens generally, but our friends in all the adjacent towns, to be present and contribute their share. The favor will be gratefully acknowledged. Remember friends, Saturday evening, December 24th, at half past 6 o'clock. As many hundred persons as attend, just half as many hundred dollars will it sink the debt.

By order of the Trustees of the First Universalist society. S. BLEBE, Jr., Secretary.

Utica, December 1, 1836.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. GUILD in Unadilla village—Br. A. G. CLARK in Halcottsville—Br. Sias in Depauville at 10 A. M., and at French Creek in the evening—Br. [Last week we gave The miseries of a Compositor, a place on our last page. This week, believing it will not only amuse some of our readers, but also explain why printers sometimes make such droll blunders, we give the miseries of a writer for the press. If any one would see the propriety of such blunders, let him but scrawl off, blur and blot the words misprinted, and he will see how nearly one word may be taken for a very different one.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE VICTIM OF A PROOF-READER.

"Foul murder hath been done—lo! here's the proof." Old Play.

Oh, for the good old times of typography, when operators in the art could render the ancients—when Caxton translated "Ye Seyge of Troye" from the language of Greece! Would that, in this latter age, when Champollion has deciphered the hieroglyphics of Egypt—when the spirit of inquiry is every where abroad—some one might be found, who could continue to shelter from typical aggression a writer for the press!

I am the victim of a proof-reader. The blunders of others and not my own, have placed me in a state of feeling akin to that of purgatory. Ever since I began to shave for a beard, I have been more or less afflicted with the cacothes scribendi; [itch for scribbling,] and I flatter myself that I have not always been unsuccessful in my writings. But my printed efforts have neither been honorable to my genius nor grateful to my vanity; "on the contrary, they have been quite the reverse." I have had the sweetest poems turned into thrice-sodden stupidity; sentences in prose, on which I doated in manuscript, have been perused in a deep perspiration, and with a positive loathing, in print. All this has arisen from a conspiracy which seems to have been formed against me by all the typographical gentlemen of the country. It is true, I write what Mrs. Malaprop might call an "ineligible hand;" for, to the pitiful minutiae of crossing t's, and dotting i's, I could never descend. I have often given directions to publishers that if a word was otherwise "past finding out," they should count the marks—but the plan failed, as have indeed all my plans for correct habits of thought before the public. If this narrative shall prove to be correctly printed, it will be the first article from my pen that has ever met with such an honor, and I shall be proportionably pleased.

Like all other mortals, I am penetrable to the arrows of Cupid. My heart is not encased with the epidermis of a rhinoceros, or the bull hides of Ajax; consequently I am what they call in romances a susceptible person. When I was nineteen, I fell in love—and as I found prose too tame a medium, too staid a drapery, for my thoughts, what could I do, but express to my fair one my passion in song? She was a beautiful creature—"a delectable arrangement of flesh and blood"—a country parson's daughter, with excellent tastes and accomplishments. She was fond of poetry, and so was I. This circumstance sent my fancy a wool-gathering for tropes, figures and emblems. Young ladies have a passionate admiration for genius—and I determined to show that I was not deficient in that particular; that I belonged of right to those who inherited the saying, "poeta nascitur non fit" [the poet is born, not made.] During the Spring of 18—, I was attacked with a perfect incontinence of rhyme. My lady-love was always my theme. But of all my compositions none satisfied me save the following, which I produced with great time labor and studious care. I think poorly enough of it now. Mr. Neal would call it twattle, and so do I.

"TO EMILY B—."

"Dear girl! an angel sure thou art—
The muse of every spell
Which brings one transport to my heart,
And bids my bosom swell.

"And oh, carnation on thy cheek
Its richest lustre lends;
And thy blue eyes forever speak
A welcome to thy friends.

"Alas! if fate should bid us part,
Life would be sought with me;
A load would rest upon my heart,
Without a smile from thee.

"Where shall I meet a leaf so fair
In nature's open page?
With thee the beautiful flower compare,
And e'en my grief assuage?

"Forgive, my love, this hasty lay,
And let its numbers be
Sweet monitors, that day by day,
Shall bid thee think of me!"

This production I sent to the village newspaper. I waited a long week, to see it appear. Finally, the important Wednesday arrived. I hastened to the office—but the affair was not published. I glanced with a hurried eye over the damp sheet, and found a notice at last, commencing with three stars turned up and down. It read thus:—

"The tribute to Emily, by J. S. is unavoidably postponed until our next, by a press of advertisements, for which we are thankful—since we do that kind of business, as likewise all sorts of job work, on the most reasonable terms—blanks, cards, hand-bills, and other legal documents being executed by us at the shortest notice. Not to digress, however, we would say to J. S., let him cultivate his talent, he has tremendous powers, but he writes a bad hand. He should make his penmanship like his poetry—perfect."

I had the curiosity to look into the advertising columns, to see what envious things of traffic had displaced my lines. There were but three advertisements—a sheriff's sale, a stray cow, and a wife eloped from bed and board. I read the sheriff's notice with that deep interest which these documents usually excite. It discoursed of lands, messuages and tenements, designated "by a line, beginning at the northwest corner of Mr. Jenkins' cow house—running thence north seventy-five chains, fourteen links—thence east twenty-nine chains, eleven links, to a stake and stones"—and so on to the end of the chapter.

Yet the notice filled me with exceeding great delight. I sent it to Emily; I told her that "J. S." was myself, but begged her not to mention it to a third person. She kept her secret as women usually do—in three days it was all over town that I had a piece, "that I had made out of my head," coming forth in the next week's newspaper, addressed to Emily Brinkerhoff.

Never did seven days roll more slowly around than the week's interval which followed the foregoing notice, in the "Elucidator of Freedom and Tocsin of the People." When it did finally come out, I sent Emily an affectionate note, with a copy of the paper, assuring her that the poem contained my real sentiments. I determined not to read it myself until I visited her in the evening. By great self-denial I kept my resolve, and when the young moon arose, bent my steps toward the mansion of my mistress.

She received me coldly. I was surprised and abashed. "What is the matter, Em?" I tenderly inquired; "did you get my billetdoux and the verses to-day?"

"Yes—they came safe."

"Well, how did you like them?"

"The note was kind and good, but the verses were foolish, ridiculous nonsense."

I was thunderstruck. I asked to see the paper. Emily arose and handed it to me—and, sitting down by the vine-clad window, patted her little foot angrily on the floor.

I opened the Elucidator and Tocsin, and read my poem. Solomon of Jerusalem! what inhuman butchery! what idiocy! But I will give the effusion as it was printed, "and shame the devil."

"TO EMILY B—."

"Dear girl! an angel sure thou art—
The muse of every spell;
That brags o'er trumpets to my heart,
And bids my bosom swell.

"And oh, darnation o'er thy cheek
Its rudest blister bends;
And thy blue eyes forever speak
A welcome to thy friends.

"Alas! if fate should bind us fast,
Life would be rough with me;
A load would rush upon my heart,
Without a smile from thee.

"Where could I meet a lump so fair
In nature's open passage?
With thee the barbarous flower compare,
And own my grief a passage?"

"Forgive my bore this nasty lay,
And let its numbers be
Sweet monitors, that drily dry
Shall bid thee think of me!"

J. S."

When I had read over this diabolical mass of stuff, I flew into an uncontrollable rage. In the blindness of my chagrin, I depreciated the judgment of Miss Emily; I thought every body could see the errors and detect them as readily as I did; and I said to my young friend that she must have been very stupid or inattentive not to see how the poem ought to read. This roused in her bosom "all the blood of all the Brinkerhoff's." She handed me my hat, and pointed significantly at the door. I went out at the aperture thus indicated and have never darkened it since. Emily is now the wife of a Connecticut school-master, who blows the pitchpipe and leads the choir on Sunday in her father's church.

This was my first passion, and my last, except that into which I have been roused every time I have sent a piece to be published. Yet I still love to console my dreary bachelorship by writing and seeing my thoughts in print: but I despair of ever seeing them rightly uttered. Fate, in that regard is against me, and probably always will be.

In Newport, December 1st, by Rev. D. Biddlecom, Mr. WILLIAM BOWEN, to Miss MARIA RIX.

DEATHS.

In Oxford, September 10th, JULIA S., daughter of Rev. N. Doolittle, aged 2 years. Thus is a lovely, interesting and very promising child, like a beautiful and tender flower, cut down by the destroying angel. Oh, how consoling the thought, that "of such is the kingdom of heaven."

G. M., Jr.

In Parma, November 12th, Mr. SAMUEL HUNT, aged 21 years. In the death of this amiable young man, his surviving friends have much reason to mourn, but not as those who have no hope of meeting again their departed friends in another and better world. He bore a long and painful sickness with cheerful resignation to the divine will; and without expectation of recovery, anxiously waited for the time to come when his spirit should wing its way to its Father and its God. May the presence of Him whose consolations are neither few nor small, afford them all needed comfort, and enable them to say, in sincerity, "not our wills, but thine, O God, be done."

W. Q.

In Pittsfield, Otsego county, November 18, Mrs. ABIGAIL DELONG, relict of Abram Delong, aged 50 years.

For several years the deceased had been afflicted with the lingering and wasting disease of consumption. Previous to her sickness she had no well grounded hope in the Gospel; i. e., she was not satisfied (and who can be?) in believing the doctrines of endless woe, neither was she persuaded that "God is the Saviour of all men." But during her illness, wishing to find something that would impart comfort to her troubled mind, she perused carefully and prayerfully that volume which (and which only) can give strength to the weak, peace to the troubled, and hope to the desponding. Suffice it to say, she became a believer in the cheering and death-disarming doctrine of the illimitable grace and unbounded goodness of her God. And when the hour of dissolution drew near, she expressed a willingness to depart for a better and happier world. Her funeral was attended on the 19th, by Br. M. B. Smith, and according to her request a discourse was delivered from 1 Cor. xv: 49.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered in So. Bainbridge, on the death of Sylvester Corbin, Esq.

By GEORGE MESSINGER, JR.

[Published by request.]

"How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" 1 Cor. xv: 35.

Death and the resurrection are what we fully believe every individual of the human family will certainly experience. For the Bible teaches, that both will invariably be realized by all, in the established order and mode of divine Providence. The voice of almighty God is, to every individual, "dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return;" and our divine Redeemer says, "the dead are raised."

My friends, it seems natural for us, at a time like this, to think and converse upon death. Although we are all deeply sensible we must die, yet death seems at a distance from us all; though we are constrained to acknowledge, it may be near. The time swiftly passes from infancy to age, from the cradle to the grave. A short period measures the longest life. The short duration of time allotted to man, bears no sensible comparison to endless duration. The interminable and happy life for which we hope, appears of immense consequence to every enlightened mind. If it were not for the Gospel, how gloomy would be a retrospect of the ravages of the destroying angel and the view of our future eternal prospects. What immense numbers of human beings have fallen! yea, what mighty nations, kingdoms, and vast empires have been cut down! Generation succeeds generation, and although millions die, yet, at the same time, millions are born. Fathers and mothers are laid in their tombs, and their sons and daughters are left to fill their stations.

"As leaves on trees, the race of man is found,
Now green in youth, now with'ring on the ground;
Another spring, another race supplies,
They fall successive, and successive rise;
So generations in their turns decay,
So these remain, when those are passed away."

Our sister, the companion of our departed brother, made her exit from this great theatre of action, but a few months since, and now, so soon, he is called to follow her. They were both much beloved and respected in life, and deeply lamented in death. Being both members of our church and society, we very much feel our loss, but fondly hope, it is their eternal gain. No more will they join their devotions with ours in our worshipping assembly; but they now belong to the great congregation above, and unite with congenial spirits, those flames of love, the holy angels that burn before the throne of the Eternal.

Our dear departed brother, whose obsequies have been duly attended, and respectfully performed, lies quietly in yonder burying-ground—he lies undisturbed—he sleeps in death—peace be to his ashes! Although he is dead, yet still he lives in the memory, esteem and affection of his kindred, and an extensive circle of friends. We all feel a pang of sorrow piercing our hearts. A good man has fallen. In the midst of his usefulness he was cut off. He acted well his part as a husband, a father, a citizen, and a member of society—for he was a kind husband, a good father, an active, public spirited, and useful citizen; and a pious Christian. He was fearless and independent in expressing his sentiments which were near his heart, being a sincere believer in the salvation of all. Truly may it be said, he was kind and generous to the poor, liberal, warm-hearted, and benevolent, and was that "noblest work of God," "an honest man." Hence he gave a practical illustration of the glorious faith he embraced. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." In view of the virtuous life, and peaceful end of our lamented brother, we can all say, "let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his." In an unexpected moment, and sudden manner, an arrow was sped from the hand of the destroying angel, and he fell a victim to this universal conqueror. Now the crimson current flows no more, those once active limbs are motionless, and that heart which was warmed with love to God and universal benevolence to man, and beat in unison with the most noble and generous sentiments, beats no more: and all that remains, is a cold and motionless memento of mortality. With what intense interest do we ask, "If a man die shall he live again?" Will our departed brother, with the rest of our kindred race, be raised to enjoy immortal beatitude?

Although man, in all ages, countries and conditions, has hoped to live, and be happy after death; yet he has not always had sufficient evidence upon which he could found his hope. And although philosophers and sages had reasoned, and poets had prophesied and sung of immortality, yet no certain light shone upon the darkness of the tomb, till Christ arose, and thus "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." Our text contains the very natural and important inquiry, "how are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" With what deep and heart-felt interest must this question be asked by every intelligent human being? This question proceeds upon the acknowledged supposition, that the dead will be raised, somehow or other. All Christian sects that have existed since the commencement of the Christian era, have acknowledged the resurrection in some form; yet, many crude and unintelligible opinions have been prevalent concerning it, but these are no part of the pure Gospel. Of all subjects contained in the Gospel, the RESURRECTION is vastly the most important. This momentous subject should be approached without the least prejudice, with reason, charity and candor; while in our researches after the truth, we have free access to the researches of philosophy, the dim light of nature, analogy and science, but above all to the lucid and brilliant light of REVELATION. Happy, truly happy is he who is perpetually under the influence of reason, candor and charity, whose independence never degenerates into obstinacy, his liberality into criminal indulgence, nor his humility into meanness; and who, in his researches after truth, has come to the glorious conclusion that holiness and unalloyed bliss will be as extensive and durable as intelligence.

In a savage, barbarous, civilized or enlightened state, how dear to man is the hope of immortal felicity! To it he clings with the strongest grasp. Ask the untutored children of nature, the aborigines of America; "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" And they will tell you; "As soon as we die, we expect to have youthful, healthy and immortal bodies prepared for us by the Great Spirit, who will give us our dogs and guns, and a great plenty of the best kind of game, among forests of evergreen, fanned by gentle breezes, and warmed by the southern sun, where we shall not want for any thing, but shall be perfectly happy."

Ask the enslaved, abused, and unhappy Africans, whose ancestors, or themselves, were cruelly torn from their native country, and they will tell you; "We expect our slavery will end at death, that we shall return to the land of our fathers, and enjoy our liberty, and regale ourselves in the country of our ancestors, where we shall again see all our kindred, and live with them forever. Then, we shall no more be obliged to toil under the lash of a master; and then, we shall be completely happy."

Ask the warlike Mahomedans, and they will tell you; "When we have passed through the gate of death, we believe we shall ascend to the shining abodes of extatic bliss which are composed of silver, and gold, and precious stones, whose walks are of the purest musk, and there we shall be fully gratified with all we desire and highly esteem here below."

Ask enlightened Christians; and they will tell you; "We believe we shall be raised by the mighty power of God to enjoy perfect and endless purity and bliss, in the bright morn of the resurrection, when the last loud trump shall sound. That then our bodies will be purely spiritual. And that in both body and mind, we shall be glorious, incorruptible and immortal, and throughout eternity remain the happy beings of light and love."

The anxious desire to exist after death, in happiness and immortality, is strongly fixed in the heart of every intelligent human being. Hence, the ardent wish for future bliss was implanted in man by his Creator. We believe that our heavenly Father would never have made a desire thus universal, which he intended never to gratify; and this is a strong reason in our minds, why he will raise the dead, and gratify this innocent desire of all his children.

The resurrection from the dead, was always true, but was unknown before Christ brought it to light. Before he came, it was shrouded in darkness, but when he rose, the clearest evidence of its truth shone brightly upon the world. A complete knowledge of this subject, or of our condition after being raised, cannot be reasonably expected in this life; for, at present, it is founded in faith. "Now faith is a confidence in things hoped for, and a conviction of things not seen." And, says St. John, "it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him." If our faith in the resurrection is not a knowledge of it, yet, the evidence is so clear and strong as to fully satisfy us that it is true.

We may argue a resurrection from evidences existing in nature, and also, from analogy and reason. But we never could derive clear evidence of its truth from these sources. Let us glance at some of the evidences existing in nature. It is acknowledged among philosophic naturalists, that all matter is filled with life, and that life is every where springing up in the midst of death. For instance; all the vegetable kingdom seems to die, and be brought to life again. If we look into the animal world and trace the chain of beings as far as we are capable, as it descends below man, we shall discover many insects and reptiles that seem to die, and afterwards live again. In the first stage of many insects, there is simply an elevation above dead matter; at length they rise from their groveling state, assume different forms, appear in beautiful attire, put on wings, regale themselves on different food, and spend a joyful season in the sunbeams. Such is the case with the worm that is converted into a beautiful butterfly. It improves and betters its condition through every stage it passes.

In this life, man does not undergo any such change as we see in many of the lower species; hence, he is to look forward to eternity for his final change. Although nature teaches that men shall be changed, yet it does not teach with what bodies they shall come, but it is evident this change will be for the better—for no animal assumes any state, or form for the worse, but always for the better. Worms grovel upon the earth, and pass through toil and pilgrimage. It is the period of their mortality; and is the foundation on which is to be erected a more refined and exalted mode of existence. When they change, they cease to be what they were. Their form becomes beautified, their mode of life improved, and their food better. They enjoy a new life, new scenery, and new pastime; it is their resurrection. In this state of existence, we, like worms grovel upon the earth, and are mortal. The bodies we now possess, are animated with mortal life, but our spiritual bodies will be animated with immortal life. That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward, that which is spiritual." As man's first body, in its original state, is death, which is made alive, and subject to dissolution, so the second body, is mortality brought into indissoluble life. We apprehend, it cannot appear more mysterious to be raised from the dead, than it does to be brought into the present state of existence. And, indeed, our future state may follow as a necessary consequence from our present one.

There have been many unscriptural opinions entertained upon the resurrection. One is, that a part of mankind will be corruptible and vessels of immortal dishonor; which we shall see is contrary to Scripture. I conclude my hearers will be the best satisfied with purely scriptural views upon this subject. And upon this momentous and deeply interesting theme, the light of revealed truth will be far more satisfactory to the sincere inquirer after truth, than the opinions of men, or the evidences existing in nature or analogy. The Christian goes from every other source of information which he may have studied, to his Bible, and there walks securely by the certain light of revealed truth. Here tired research may rest, while arguments, reasons and similitudes throng upon the mind. The greatest advantage in referring to nature, is, to see that it harmonizes with inspiration. Nature, as far as it goes, confirms the voice of inspiration; and in no instance contradicts it. Inspiration reveals many things that nature does not, and among the most important, is the resurrection. Our Lord is a true and faithful witness upon this subject, let us listen with reverence to his testimony. He says; "In the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." Matt. xxii: 30. Again, "when they rise from the dead, they.... are as the angels which are in heaven." Mark xii: 25. Again; "neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx: 36. Thus, our Lord gives us the assurance, that we shall be as the angels in heaven, and equal unto them; and also, that being children of the resurrection we shall be the children of God. In this testimony he plainly teaches immortality by saying, "neither can they die any more." And he expressly teaches the universality of this resurrection, by the expression, "all live unto him" [i. e. God.]

But the question returns, "how are the dead raised up and with what body do they come?" In answer to this, the apostle adduces the similitude of grain, as an illustration. He observes; "that which thou sowest, is not quickened, except it die. And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be." According to this, these mortal bodies will not be raised, for observe the expression, "thou sowest not that body that shall be." It is an obvious truth, that in grain, there is a new body, separate and living, after the death of the old. The apostle in a lucid manner proceeds to illustrate the resurrection from this analogy of grain. "And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare (or naked) grain, it may chance of wheat or of some other grain; but God giveth it a body, as it hath pleased him, and to every seed its own body." When we trace the growth of grain, we discover the consistency of the apostle's reasoning. The body of the grain dies, and only the refined part germinates, which becomes distinctly developed after the old body is dead, yet it was not a body of itself, because it constituted a part of the old body, so that without it, the old body could have no life, but without the death of the old, the new body could have no separate existence.

The apostle alludes to various bodies that are seen in the earth and heavens, as further illustrative of his subject, saying, "there are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another." That is, on earth there are bodies of flesh, those of men, beasts, fishes and birds, all of which are said to be glorious. And in the heavens, are the sun, moon, and stars, which are glorious celestial bodies. As the glory of the celestial bodies exceeds the glory of the terrestrial, so will our glorified spiritual bodies exceed our earthly bodies. This reasoning of the apostle does not, as some have supposed, allude to any difference there may be in the glory of those who will be raised, but the comparison is between this life, and the next. This is obvious from the application of St. Paul's reasoning upon grain. For he observes, "so also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." From this we conclude that a future incorruptible, glorious, honorable, and spiritual state of existence awaits us beyond death. "This mortal must put on immortality." This is clear proof of the correctness of the conclusion of the apostle's analogical reasoning, that man shall be renovated from the tomb. And this is farther confirmed thus, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Thus the scene of a pure, happy, and imperishable existence is opened plainly to our mental vision. And we can behold "an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us," yea, and all mankind; for, "as in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive." All must die, before they can live beyond the reach of death. Hence, we ought not to regard death as a terrific enemy, but as a friendly conductor to immortal joy by the appointed allotment of a kind providence. O, then, may God in his infinite goodness, through the instrumentality of our beloved Saviour, in the resurrection, transform us into his own holy and immortal image. Death the universal conqueror will be conquered, "swallowed up in victory," destroyed, abolished, and be no more. Not any thing then can remain in opposition to life—life immortal, incorruptible, glorious and happy.

The promise and gift of such a life, flow freely from a Father's love. O what inexhaustible stores of goodness and felicity are centered in Him! What endless testimony of his love is still scattered in the paths we have perambulated. There is not any thing opposes a conscious, happy and immortal futurity, for the evidences of nature demonstrate its truth, and consistency; analogy and reason are fruitful in its defence; and in God's inspiration we find evidence clear and decided. And no enlightened mind can doubt that the perfections of God harmonize with his works and word.—What then stands in the way of our hope of endless bliss? Not any thing.

Let this noble, inexhaustible theme engross our minds, encourage our hearts, and reconcile us to death. The subject is full of comfort to mourning friends; it dispels the gloom of the grave, and soothes and cheers our dying moments. O, God, wilt thou raise us with all our race to taste of heavenly joy, and sing the deathless song of redeeming love? So let it be.

ARGUMENT FOR CHRISTIANITY.

I have just finished the perusal of Br. I. D. Williamson's Argument for Christianity, and can truly say it is a feast of fat things full of marrow. This argument brings the subject home to our "bosoms and business"—and cold must be the heart of that individual who can read its "spirit-stirring" pages, and not feel the thrilling emotions of gratitude to the great Author of our holy religion, who has filled the universe with evidences of the truth of Christianity. By the side of a multitude of those evidences, brought to view in this little book, infidelity is like the gloom of midnight compared with the concentrated blaze of ten thousand suns. May its circulation be extensive, and long may it inspire the believer in divine revelation with confidence in the doctrine of immortality—and O, may it be the means of leading the bewildered votaries of error, to the exhaustless fountain of eternal life.

PULPIT ELOQUENCE.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

Br. SKINNER AND GROSH—Your readers have doubtlessly heard much of the Mississippi valley—of its great internal resources—its fertility of soil—its peculiar advantages—and its vast importance in regard to agricultural, commercial, and religious operations and interests; yet, it is probable, that many of them are not aware, that this valley includes the whole territory lying between the Alleghany ridge, and the Rocky Mountains. In the Western country, however, its jurisdiction is recognized to be thus extensive. It does not only embrace the narrow vale that lies contiguous to this chief of rivers, but all that vast region of country through which its numerous and majestic tributaries flow. Much is said in the East, about sending missionaries to the Mississippi valley, but it is not presumable, that most of the people are aware of what is implied in this name: and it would be well if they knew, that this valley included, as it were, the whole Western world; that when they are addressed in relation to "benevolent operations" in it, they may be led to inquire into the definite objects in view. For in many places there are old settlements and extensive towns, whose inhabitants think themselves as competent to instruct the Eastern people both in regard to temporalities and spiritualities, as do they of the East, to teach the people of the West.

Every country has its peculiarities and characteristics, that strike the attention and secure the interest of the traveling stranger. The Mississippi valley is not wholly destitute of these marked lineaments and distinguishing features, as every one will bear witness who has paid it a visit. And as it may not be wholly uninteresting to your readers, I will give a brief portraiture of Western eloquence, or rather a specimen of pulpit oratory—and they will then the better understand, how much the inhabitants of the great valley need the lights of the East, to improve their understandings, and perfect their attainments.

The preacher took for his text, Matt. xxiv: 37-39. "But as the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark; and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."

He spoke, firstly, of man's created state when dwelling in Eden's sweet bower, revelling in all the charms of a rural Paradise, and feasting himself on the rich and luxurious viands of a spontaneous production—free from toil, pain, and misery. He treated, secondly, of "the fall," his expulsion from the garden of bliss, his subjection to physical labor for subsistence, and his just exposure "to all the miseries of this life, death itself, and the pains of hell forever," as a suitable and proper punishment for his rash, his high handed, and presumptuous sin in plucking the prohibited fruit, "that brought death into the world, with all its woes." He spoke, thirdly, of the depravity that has been entailed on posterity on account of the defection of Adam—of their inability to do that which is well pleasing in the sight of God, until renovated by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and moulded anew by the Holy Spirit; and of the consequent wickedness of the world. He treated, fourthly, of the provisions that have been made for the redemption and salvation of the human race, and of the effectual door that has been opened through which sinners may flee from the wrath to come, as exhibited in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. He spoke, fifthly, of the awful consequences resulting to a neglect of such means of grace; and of disregarding the proffers of mercy and conditions of salvation, which led him to speak of death, of judgment, and of eternity.

Here he came to his text, and gave his audience to understand, that it had reference to that great and notable day for which all other days were made, when an assembled universe would stand before God for judgment, and have their doom pronounced according to merit or demerit—and to the carelessness, recklessness, and folly of men, as manifest in this life, in relation to their final destinies. In order to impress the subject deeply on the minds of his hearers, he took them back on imagination's wing, to primitive times, and placed them among the inhabitants that existed before the flood, to be the spectators of the awful tragedy that closed their career in overwhelming destruction. Said he, "Such was the wickedness of the world, that God repented that he had made man, and he resolved he would destroy these people from the face of the earth. But there was one righteous man, who feared God and kept his commandments. This man was that Noah, mentioned in the text. So God says to Noah—I have beheld, that the wickedness of the earth is great, and I will destroy man, and beast, and every living thing. I will fill the earth with a flood, that shall drown the whole world—for my spirit shall not always strive with man. Noah! go to work, and build you a boat, that when I pour out my wrath upon the ungodly, you, and your family, and such as you take in the boat with you, may escape unharmed. So Noah builds himself a boat, as the Lord commanded him. And the people laugh at Noah, and mock him, and sneer at him, and say, 'what are you building that great boat for? what do you think you will do with it? When will you have water enough for it to swim in? Build a boat to use on dry land! Ha! we guess you will have your labor for your pains.' Noah tells them the Lord has become angry with them; and is a going to destroy them with a flood, unless they repent, and if any would escape, they must build a boat, as an ark of refuge. This (says Noah) is my purpose: and if you do not prepare yourselves in this manner for escape, when the destroying flood comes, then you will want to get into my boat; but I cannot take you on board. So repent, and build you a boat, before it is everlastingly too late. But they laugh and jeer at Noah, and continue eating, and drinking, and marrying, and giving in marriage, and committing all kinds of abominations, till Noah gets his boat done. Now Noah and his family, and the animals and birds he had selected to preserve, go into the boat—and suddenly the windows of heaven are opened, and the fountains of the great deep are broken up—the rains descend—the floods rise—the waves roll and toss—and all the valleys begin to be covered with water. The people begin to be frightened and run to the hills. They remember what Noah told them; and they would not believe him. Now, they are afraid 'twill prove true. The rain pours down in torrents—the waters keep rising. They look around them, and wherever they turn their eyes, all is one vast sea. The flood keeps rising—the cattle are swept away—and every thing is threatened with destruction. The people get alarmed and they look out on the water, and there they see Noah in his boat, all safe—and they call out to Noah, 'Come over here with your boat! Come over here with your boat, Noah! let us get into your boat, Noah! Come here with your boat.' 'Ah, no!' says Noah, 'I cannot take you on board the boat now. I told you, when I was building the boat that there would be a flood, and that you had better repent and build a boat too—but you derided me, and laughed at my supposed folly. Now it is too late; I cannot take you in my boat. A little longer, and the rising flood will sweep you all away. Don't you wish you had built a boat for yourselves? See, I am here safe; and where are you? Alas! you will be drowned with the world in the great flood.' 'Oh! Noah! Come over here with your boat! Come over here with your boat! Don't let us die! Come here with your boat! let us get into your boat!' And the waters begin to break over the tops of the hills. Multitudes are swept away, and forever lost. Many climb up the trees—and as they see Noah lodged snugly in his boat, they cry again, 'Noah! Come over here with your boat! Come over here with your boat!' 'No!' says Noah, 'I cannot take you in the boat. Once you scoffed me, and now I will laugh at your calamity, and mock as your fear cometh; I will not come to your relief.' 'Well then,' say they, 'go along with your boat, if ye are a mind to be so contrary. We do not think there will be more than a shower after all.' The rest of the Sermon we leave to the reader to imagine.

Now, do you think that the Western people need such missionaries from the East to improve their style, and give them lessons on rhetoric and oratory? With such eloquence and genius, how rapid will be the cause of religion among men! What originality of thought! What soul-stirring descriptions! What appeals to passions!

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A PREACHER.....No. VIII.

I was reading at the table of the packet-boat, which runs from Buffalo to Rochester, when a stout, healthy, square-built man, with a Western accent, very unceremoniously thrust a Bible between my face and the book in which I was reading, with his finger fixed on the 14th verse of the first chapter of Genesis. We had, on leaving Buffalo in the morning, been obliged to take a line-boat from some unwonted delay in the arrival of the packet from the East; and on meeting the latter near Black Rock, I had noticed this individual as taking an active and rather consequential part in directing and overlooking the exchange of baggage from one boat to the other. He now held the Bible full in my face, without uttering a word—his finger acting the index to the very verse to which he designed to draw my attention. After being asked what he wanted, he replied, that he wanted "to know the philosophy of that passage."

Knowing that we had a class of men who pretended to more philosophy than religion, and who might certainly often claim more assurance than knowledge, I instantly recognized in this personage a member of that fraternity: and determined at once to see—and to let others see—the length and breadth, depth and height of his philosophy. In reply, therefore, to his question, it was simply said that the philosophy of the passage consisted in its assertion of the very obvious fact—that God created the sun, moon and stars. It was however quite plain from the way in which he had introduced the subject, that he had some motive not then explained—and it was not difficult to guess what it was. But having no right to presume what he intended, it was deemed best to let his philosophy take its own course, and develop his purposes in its own time.

He now put on an important aspect, and having drawn by some sarcasm, the attention of most of the passengers upon us, he looked around in a kind of triumph, and added—"Well, what philosophy was there in making a sun, etc., after three days? How could there be day and night before there was a sun—and if there could be, what was the use of having one?"

Answer—You are told beforehand, how there could be light or day, before there was a sun—and there is nothing unphilosophical or inconsistent in that account. It being as reasonable and as natural that light should be created before the sun, as at the same time, or afterwards. And though day and night to us, now obviously depend upon the existence of the sun as a sun—still it is consistent with sound philosophy to suppose, that all the usual phenomena of light might have succeeded its production, without the presence or being of the sun. Besides—there are philosophers who maintain that by day, we are not to understand the period between the apparent rising and setting of the sun—nor yet twenty-four hours—but a period of time—an age, a dispensation; and by the several days here named, a succession of ages.

The most profound attention was given by the passengers during all this time, and it was manifest that they felt a deep and lively interest in the subject of our conversation. But this indication of an important interest in the subject, was evidently disagreeable to our philosopher. And raising his voice, and affecting a malignant laugh, he uttered a number of coarse epithets in condemnation of Moses, or of some one else whom he supposed had written what he was pleased to call—"this silly story." "Why," said he, "was ever any thing more ridiculous than this silly story?" Answer—O yes, Sir, the pretension to philosophy without any knowledge of its principles. But what is there so very ridiculous in this history of the creation? "Ridiculous—why that a man should undertake to write the history of events which took place so long before he was born." But, Sir, are you serious in this remark? Did not Mr. Hume write the history of an immense number of events which transpired in England, long before he was born? And did not Gibbon write the history of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire—the whole mass of facts constituting his history having taken place ages before his birth? Recollect, Sir, that these men were philosophers of the school which you so much admire, and who would not, of course, do any thing to dishonor themselves, or bring discredit upon their histories. Can you, in view of all this, mean that it is ridiculous and unphilosophical to write a history of events that have already taken place? "Yes—what could Moses or any other man know about events that took place so long before they were born?"

Really, Sir, I had always supposed it was as philosophical to write a history of past events, as of any other. What would you think of the man who should attempt to write a history of future events?

"What should I think—why, I should think—;" and the philosopher came to a full stop, and looked very much as such a man may well be supposed to look—extremely silly. At the same moment the risibles of the passengers, which were screwed up to the utmost tension, suddenly gave way, and the philosopher was overwhelmed with an irresistible burst of laughter.

It was evident that, in the warmth of his feelings, he had forgotten to say something which he intended, respecting the Mosaic history. But what, we never learned, for his courage had now completely failed him, with his failure to render a clergyman and the Bible ridiculous. I returned to my book—the passengers generally made some passing remark on the conversation in which we had been engaged—our hero walked to the ladies' cabin to receive the condolence of his wife—and remained, during the rest of the day, a quiet and peaceable man.

THE NEXT VOLUME.

Extract of a letter from Rev. C. Hammond.

"I rejoice in your unabated zeal to improve your paper, and make it what it ought to be. For myself, I am at a loss to know how you expect to succeed; for, verily, I had concluded that there could not be, but a little, if any more, improvement in your paper. I shall feel an interest in your success proportionate to the merit your exertions may claim. You solicit my assistance the coming year, and ask how much, etc.? I can now, only say, all that you ask in forwarding subscribers' names and remitting money. Concerning communications, you may expect some.....There will, I believe, be no falling off of your subscribers in this section of the country."

KINDNESS.....No. IV.

"I was in prison, and ye came unto me."

Visiting the prison is another duty of kindness. The forms of misery among us which are produced by the closest confinement, present nothing which can compare with the horrors of a Jewish prison. They were dark, damp and terrible; every way calculated for misery: where the sufferer was not only loaded with chains, but frequently had his feet fastened in what are called stocks.

Now, from persons thus situated, there is in most minds a sort of estrangement. They are considered as outcasts from society; indeed, as cut off from its benefits, and there is a strong disposition to avoid them, lest their crimes cling to us.

This tendency of the human mind is directly met by the language of Jesus, at the head of this article. "I was in prison, and ye came unto me." I was in the most degraded situation in which mortal can be placed: even in the murderer's dungeon, and ye came unto me, and administered your kindness. Our Saviour manifestly teaches that even the pests of society are still men—that kindness, even when administered to the evil and the unthankful, is meritorious. The reason is plain—the mitigation of suffering is the business of kindness; and it is a matter of perfect indifference to that object, where the sufferer is, or who the sufferer is. Whether on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, or in Jerusalem—whether he fell among thieves and was stripped and wounded, or whether pretended friends did the same thing—whether he was in the dark damp vaults of a prison-house, or seated in the imperial chair—whether Jew or Gentile,—Pharisee or publican—priest or Samaritan; no matter, kindness bends the proud Pharisee, softens the feelings and melts the hard heart of the Priest and the Levite, and comes down to the wants and the woes of man.

Kindness does not, however, interfere with the administration of justice. It allows the guilty to be punished, but punished only with a view to their good. Therefore, as confinement is one thing, and unnecessary suffering under it, is quite another, kindness will wish the mitigation of those rigors of punishment which have no object but to oppress the sufferer. Much has been effected already in favor of humanity; but much still remains to be done. It has been perceived that it was much safer and easier to prevent crimes by inspiring good principles and correct motives of obedience, than to cure them by punishment. Hence, the most enlightened governments generally administer punishments with a view to restrain and reform, rather than to torture the criminal.

As far as the condition of the prisoner has, in these respects, been improved, so far has the doctrine of Christ been complied with. A few more Howards, to traverse continents, cross oceans, and to descend into the deep recesses of the prisoner's abode, and pour into the criminal's ear the sweet sounds of Gospel principles, will do much more towards reclaiming the victims of vice, than many unjust judgments. A few more benevolent souls, whose kindness prompts them to attempt the amelioration of mankind, by inculcating correct principles of punishment in the minds of the people, will do much towards alleviating human distress, lessening crime, degrading vice, exalting virtue, and producing a clearer system of government, by copying the holy precepts of the Gospel of Christ.

God grant that a few more philanthropists may engage in this work of kindness, such as he of whom the poet sings.

"O'er burning sands, deep waves, and wilds of snow,
A Howard journeying, seeks the house of woe:
Down many a winding step to dungeons dank,
Where anguish wails aloud and fetters clank,
To caves bestrewed with many a mouldering bone,
And cells whose echoes only learn to groan;
Where no kind bars a whispering friend disclose,
No sunbeam enters and no zephyr blows,
He treads, inemulous of fame or wealth,
Profuse of toil and prodigal of health."

SKETCH

Of the Life of Rev. David Thom, Liverpool, England.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

The following sketch of the life of the Rev. Mr. Thom, at present perhaps the most devoted and influential advocate of Universalism in England, was written at the request of the undersigned, communicated through Mr. J. Morrison of this city. Previous to the second session of the Universalist Historical Society, and consequently before I opened a correspondence with Mr. Thom, I solicited Mr. Morrison, who had been some time acquainted with him, to furnish me a sketch of his life for the use of the Society. This he was unable to do as he wished; and some months afterwards I received through his kindness the following sketch from Mr. Thom's own pen. It has remained in my possession from that time till the last session of the Historical Society when a resolution was passed instructing me to publish it in our religious periodicals. In performing this duty I can but say, I hope it will be read by our brethren generally with as much pleasure as it has by myself.

T. J. SAWYER,
Sec. Univ. Hist. Society.

My history has but few claims on public notice. Such as it is, it follows.

I was born at Glasgow, North Britain, on the 19th day of February, 1795. After having passed through the usual preparatory course of study, I entered the University of my native city in October, 1806; and attended in succession the literary and philosophical classes taught there.

Having been destined for the Scottish bar, I was placed in the office of a respectable solicitor in Glasgow, with a view to my becoming acquainted with the practical part of the legal profession.—The rather sudden death of my excellent father, in October, 1814, brought to an end all my forensic prospects, and compelled me to enter on a perfectly new career.

I had been trained from my earliest years to the love and practice of religion; my feelings and whole demeanor were what is commonly denominated serious; and my reading, without having been confined to any one particular topic, had chiefly embraced the subject of theology. Besides, my education, which had been of the most liberal kind, enabled me to adopt any of the learned professions. Under existing circumstances, I resolved to devote myself to the work of the ministry in the Established Church of Scotland, in the communion of which I had been brought up.

From the Winter of 1816, till the Summer of 1820, with the exception of rather more than a twelve-month which I spent as Tutor in the family of an amiable and distinguished nobleman, I was occupied in making preparations for the duties of my future profession. On the 9th day of July, 1820, I obtained license to preach the Gospel from the Presbytery of Glasgow; and, early in the month of January following, I became assistant to the Rev. Robert Clason, minister of the parish of Logie, near Stirling.

In Logie I continued rather more than two years. While there, two calls were given me. The one, to become minister of the Chapel of Ease at Ardock, parish of Muthil, Perthshire; and the other, to take charge of a new Scottish congregation in Liverpool. The latter I preferred; and was ordained to the office of the Christian ministry, by the Presbytery of Glasgow, on the 7th day of May, 1823.

A totally new view of things was now about to open up to me; and in connexion with this, I was to undergo trials of no ordinary kind. Little did I think, when I set foot in Liverpool, that there my mind was to become the subject of an almost complete revolution.

At first my popularity was very great. For several Sundays, the Music Hall in which I preached was crowded. This, of course, could not continue. But while the merely curious were dropping away, some of the sentiments which I was proclaiming were beginning to excite feelings of a peculiar kind in the minds of those who remained.

From the commencement of my theological career my leading desire had been, as it still is, never to utter from the pulpit a single sentiment to which my own heart did not thoroughly respond. I had been reared a strict Calvinist. I was intimately acquainted with the Calvinistic divinity. The system of the Genevese reformer, therefore, was the basis of my pulpit discourses. But while in Logie, I had found, that there was something about Calvinism which did not entirely satisfy my own conscience. Much investigation, and many conversations with persons of different religious persuasions, had been the result. Just before coming to Liverpool, Calvinism had in my mind been modified by my reception of John Barclay's, (of Edinburgh,) view respecting the assurance of faith.

In this there was nothing inconsistent with the standards, whatever there might be with the current theology of the Church of Scotland. The doctrine is laid down in the 18th chapter, 2d section of the Westminster Confession of Faith; and, still more expressly, in the answer to the 30th question of the Shorter Catechism. Besides, in one of my trial discourses preached on 1 John iv: 19; We love him because he first loved us, I took care so distinctly as I thought to state my views, as that none of my supporters might afterwards have occasion to say that I had deceived them.

It appears, however, from the result, that I had not been understood. As I continued from time to time to point out the necessary connexion between the reception of the testimony concerning Christ Jesus, and purgation of the conscience; and also to show, that the effect of the Gospel, when believed in, is not to improve human nature, but to control and subdue it, and this in consequence of its being the introduction into the mind of the first fruits of the divine nature; the opposition of some of those who had formerly been very affectionately disposed towards me, began to be exhibited. As I persevered in stating what I believed to be true, their hostility increased. At last matters came to an open rupture. The advice of the then Solicitor General, Sir Charles Wetherell, was taken, as to whether or not they could legally get rid of me. His answer having been unfavorable, they were forced to suspend hostile procedure; but I agreed, for the sake of peace, to accept a colleague. Rodney-street church, here, to which I had been appointed, was opened in December, 1824. Opposition to me increased. The congregation was divided into factions. At last, in April, 1825, I was accused at the bar of the Presbytery of Glasgow, of entertaining heretical sentiments. The charge consisted of nine articles. The Presbytery having heard both parties, sent Commissioners to Liverpool, who sat for three weeks examining witnesses. Counsel were employed on both sides at enormous expense.* The evidence taken in Liverpool was printed, and a curious document it is. Two hearings of the cause took place afterwards in Glasgow. On the 22d of September, 1825, the Presbytery, with two dissenting voices pronounced the sentence which will be found at the end of the second edition of my Three Questions. I ceased to be a minister of the Rodney-street Church.

A new congregation was immediately formed. My friends again occupied the Music Hall; and there I preached my two first sermons in connexion with them on the 2d day of October, 1825.

Hitherto I had been devotedly attached to the Church of Scotland, and had held views, which, although disliked by its ministers, are to be found in its standards.† But now my mind, set free from the trammels of an establishment, and kept from entangling itself with any sect of dissenters,

* The prosecution cost my antagonists between 1000 and 1100 pounds sterling; and the defence involved my friends in an outlay of between 260 and 300 pounds.

† My "Remarks," and "Memorial," both published in 1825, give a very accurate idea of the sentiments entertained by me at the time.

was about to be carried forward in the path of scriptural discovery.

In February, 1826, happening to peruse the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, my mind was forcibly struck with the distinction between the first Adam as having been made a living soul, and the last Adam as having been made a quickening spirit. And also, with the fact stated by the apostle, that what was spiritual, so far from having come first, was preceded by what was natural. "Was it possible that God intended no restoration through Christ, of what Adam had originally forfeited?" Although in a very rough and uncouth manner, the first sketch of the doctrine maintained in my Three Questions was struck out in the Spring and Summer of 1826.

Still I never doubted the ordinary doctrine of eternal punishment. I proclaimed it at different places in Scotland, to which country I paid a visit during the Summer of the year last mentioned. But subsequently following out the hints originally suggested by the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, the question of eternal torments was forced on my notice. I felt sadly puzzled respecting it. It was no small gratification to me, because a relief to my thoughts, when a Christian friend, in May, 1827, proposed that I should advert on the way in which Mr. Pope had been conducting his controversy with Priest Maguire. My letter to Mr. Pope, published anonymously, and which on the whole sold very well, was thus brought out. But this once off my hands, the questions respecting eternal torments returned. I read, I reflected on it. The ordinary doctrine at last gave way; but I could not at the time satisfy my mind farther. The alternative of annihilation to the wicked, or future happiness to all, presented itself. I could not decide. In this state of mental perplexity, I composed and published the first edition of my Three Questions proposed and answered, in the Spring of 1828.

The publication of this work drew down upon me a storm of opposition. The Presbytery of Glasgow a second time summoned me to its bar. Astonished and disgusted at such procedure, I not only declined attending, but published my answer to the Presbytery along with its letter to me. The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in high dudgeon, took up the matter. By that venerable body, (so styled in courtesy,) I was finally thrust out of the Scottish Establishment, on the 2d day of June, 1828. The sentence is at the end of my Three Questions, second edition.

Soon after the publication of the last named work my mind began to find its way through the intricacies of the subject. Annihilation, I perceived, was inconsistent with the scope and express language of Scripture. In the Spring or early part the Summer of 1829, so far as my memory serves me, I received my first full convictions of the truth of the doctrine of universal salvation.

About this time I attended the late Dr. Spurzheim's course of lectures on phrenology. Previously I had rather slighted the subject. But, in listening to that eminent and amiable man, I was astonished to find that phrenology actually proceeds on the principle of that distinction subsisting between soul and spirit, which Scripture itself had already taught me.

In the course of this year, (1829,) I became known to friends in America. For the attentions which I have received in that quarter, I feel most grateful. Although completely differing in my religious sentiments from my excellent friend and correspondent in New-York, Mr. John Morrison, I rejoice to take this opportunity of testifying my sense of the obligations under which he has laid me, by the transmission of periodicals and books, as well as by the valuable information which his letters contain. To Mr. Whitmore, Editor of the Boston Trumpet, Mr. Balfour of Charlestown, Massachusetts, and others, I am obliged for letters, books, notices of my publications, and other proofs of kindness. I only wish that the numerous and pressing avocations of the two gentlemen last named, had permitted them to continue their correspondence with me.

Be it observed, that until the opening up of the communication with America, I was progressing alone. With the exception of my congregation, all the members of which were less enlightened on the points spoken of than myself, I had not a single individual to whom I could open my lips on the subject.

What I had discovered in regard to universal salvation, I felt constrained in conscience to make known to my friends. But I was anxious to combine kindness with integrity. I endeavored, therefore, to teach my hearers as they were able to hear. Indeed, I rather strove to make them teach themselves. The result was, that God was pleased to convey light into the minds of many of them in succession, and that I lost but few of those who up to this time had continued to support me.

I had long contemplated writing on the subject of the assurance of faith. After being satisfied respecting the extent of Christ's redeeming love, the doctrine of universal salvation, I found, connected itself in my mind with Mr. Barclay's. I resolved to compose a work in which the two should be combined. The commencement was made, I think, in 1829. I know that I threw aside two manuscripts. At last I fell on a plan which pleased me. In writing on the subject, my mind opened up more and more. Aiming at teaching others, I discovered that I was teaching myself. Explanations, previously unthought of, were suggested. Remaining difficulties were cleared away. After three years of pretty laborious thinking, composition, and re-composition, in Spring, 1833, I was enabled to give the world (that is, to the few prepared and disposed to read it), my "Assurance of Faith, or Calvinism identified with Universalism."

Mr. Irving, of London, with whom at one time I had the pleasure of being acquainted, had been attracting much notice by his vagaries in regard to prophesying, and speaking with unknown tongues, while I was engaged in the preparation of the last named work. By some friends it was thought that I might advantageously write in opposition to him. For my own part, I deemed my exposure unnecessary; being satisfied that the evil would soon cure itself. Besides, it struck me, that the time for publishing had gone by. However, to gratify one most excellent friend, and with a view chiefly to benefit my own congregation, I published, early in 1832, the tract, entitled The Miracles of the Irving School shown to be unworthy of serious Examination. Strange to tell, it was more noticed by the reviewers than far more important productions have been.

My Assurance of Faith, as I had anticipated, fell almost still-born from the press. Not that it was unsold; for the sale more than remunerated me, and I am still disposing of the remaining copies. In one or two parts of the country it even attracted some little notice. But the reviews were silent as the grave respecting it, although copies were sent to them. With the exception of the Literary Gazette, the Gospel Magazine, and the Christian Pioneer, I am not aware that any of our European periodicals criticised it. "It is a dangerous book," said a very amiable and literary private friend to me; and on this principle it was regularly burked.

For the American reviews, by Mr. Whitmore, of Boston, and Mr. Sawyer, of New-York, the only two which I have seen, I desire to express my gratitude.

My only publication since The Assurance of Faith have been, the second edition of my Three Questions, kindly noticed in the New-York Christian Messenger, and a pamphlet which has just issued from the press, entitled "Why is Popery Progressing?" Every copy of the former was disposed of within a few days after it made its appearance; the fate of the latter remains yet to be seen. Judging from the fierce attack made upon me on Tuesday last by the Liverpool Standard, it is likely to take. And yet knowing the odium in which I am held on account of my religious sentiments, I never publish with any sanguine hopes of success.

I am contented quietly to sow the seed. Some more favored successor or successors must reap the harvest.

I intend publishing ere long, a work in one volume octavo, on the scriptural distinction between soul and spirit. My mind is much set on this. The materials collected by me for it are abundant. Many facts which have hitherto been regarded as strong holds by the skeptical party, I can show not only to be consistent with, but actually stated in, and laid down as fundamental principles by the word of God. The work will consist of two parts. Whether it is to be published or not, time must show.

Such is my history; if history, a few events of no particular interest may be called.

I am now in the forty-first year of my age, have been twice married, and am the father of two children. My constitution is far from being robust; indeed, I should not greatly err were I to say that it is exceedingly delicate. But I have attached friends, a natural determination of character, which nothing can daunt, a thorough conviction of the goodness of my cause, a consciousness of the rectitude of my intentions, and a decided reliance upon Him who hath manifested himself to be my heavenly Father. In so far as preachers of Universalism in England are concerned, I stand almost if not altogether, alone. But God is with me. In his hands I leave the event. If spared, and if supported by the kindness and purses of others, the public may rely on seeing more productions of my pen. If not, He with whom is the residue of the spirit, can never be at a loss for instruments by which to effectuate his blessed and gracious purposes. D. THOM.

THE UTILITARIAN.

PARTIALISM VERSUS UNIVERSALISM.

"There be many that say, Who will show us any good?" Ps. iv: 6.

Reader—thou of the long protracted patience—the day of deliverance is nigh at hand—even on the thresholds of the door; for—the words of the Utilitarian are nearly ended! "Amen!"

Believing that every thing God has made, was created for some purpose of profit and utility—that he made nothing in vain—I was induced to inquire into the utility of the various systems of religion in the world, one above or excelling another, believing that the most excellent, most useful one would be admitted by you to be the purest—to be his gift to man—while the less useful and less excellent would be regarded as manufactured by man, and partially imbued with a small portion of the genuine, in order to render it more current and acceptable. Beginning at atheism or pantheism, which may be considered the entire negation of religion, I have endeavored to show the utility of being religious—the utility of deism over polytheism—of Christianity in any form over deism—and of Protestant Christianity over Greek and Roman Catholic Christianity. One view yet remains to be taken of the subject before us; for I conceive that we have not yet reached the pure and the perfect, however high in the scale of excellence and utility we may have ascended. Protestantism embraces a vast number of divisions, many opposed to each other, so that all cannot be true. Of these, all contain a principle in common with Paganism, Mahomedanism and Papacy in general, which is opposed to another principle which I believe will be found the constituent principle, essence, sum and substance of the Gospel. I mean PARTIALISM, and its contrast, UNIVERSALISM. Our researches cannot, therefore, end but with this article: for

"There be many that say, who will show us any good?" in believing in Universalism, rather than in any other system of Protestant Christianity? The terms, Univer- salut and Partialist, embrace nearly the whole religious world. Universalists are often accused of a difference of sentiment among themselves—as if such variety of opinion was a crime; or as if our opposers were free from all differences and divisions. But is such the case? Look over the Pagan world, with its thousand different sects. They are Partialists. Look at the Jews and Mahomedans, with their dozen different sects, each. They are Partialists. Look at the Catholics, with their many different sects or orders, most of whom differ from each other—and at the Protestant Christians with their three hundred different sects, divided and subdivided again and again. These all, are Partialists. Yes; these thousands of different and differing sects of religionists, all believe in vindictive, angry Gods, a semi-almighty devil, and an endless hell or hells—they all are advocates of a partial in preference to a universal salvation. And the further removed from the religion of reason, nature and revelation, the more angry and numerous are their Gods—the more numerous and subtle their devils, and the more terrible and scorching hot are their hells!

And look even at our atheistical, pantheistical, deistical and skeptical brethren—they are nearer a belief in a partial than in a universal salvation, just as none is nearer a part of a certain number, than it is nearer to the whole of that number. Surely, if our Partialist brethren could see these facts clearly, they would say little about our differences of opinion, and less about our nearness to infidelity! But, to answer the question of our Partialist querists.

1. Negatively.—Universalism rejects equally, what Dr. Rush terms the “palsy of the believing principle” of the mind, so pernicious to the skeptic—and the equally pernicious over excitement of the same faculty, so fatal to the fanatic. Thus it is free from the dangerous inconsistency of both.

It rejects equally the false, bewildering worship of polytheism, and the worse idolatry of pantheism, of nature and of human reason. Thus is it free from all the debasing and paralyzing effects of these superstitions on the passions, affections, and understandings of these victims of misplaced devotion and misapplied worship.

It rejects equally, the cold, and gloomy belief in annihilation, imbibed by the deist and the atheist, in consequence of the insufficiency of nature to throw the light of its instructions beyond the grave, and the dreamy speculations of Elysium and a sensual paradise, held by Pagans, and taught, but not believed, by the philosophers and sages of Greece and Rome. And thus it is free from the fear of death, and the stoic apathy or bitter unreconciliation induced by a separation of friends, so common to both these systems.

It rejects all the limitations of God, and his designs and goodness, induced by merely studying the imperfect revelations of either nature or the Old Testament, (if we except obscure intimations in the prophets,) and of human reason unaided by the light of Heaven. Thus is it free from fears of the injustice of Providence—of the irremediable wrath of God, and of the continuance of evil to the final detriment of man's happiness.

It rejects the principles of Papacy, so full of arrogance in assumptions of infallibility—of intolerance and persecution, in domination over the minds and consciences of men—and so detrimental to knowledge, freedom and happiness, by confining the mind to the faith of ignorant predecessors, with all their errors of theory and practice. Thus it rejects the doctrine of total, innate and hereditary depravity; so paralyzing, when believed, to every desire to be or do good—so abhorrent to every man who loves the honest man, the playful child and the guileless infant smiling in its native innocence and simplicity.

As it rejects all proxies or substitutes in the performance of duty, it denies vicarious sufferings, imputed sin, imputed righteousness, and substituted acts in lieu of personal obedience and goodness—thus acknowledging no righteousness but that of God, or that which is in imitation of God's—and thus freeing itself from the pernicious influence of those errors on the lives and conduct of their believers. It is therefore a personal religion—perfectly free from all remnants of Papacy, and accordant with the principles of the reformation.

It rejects all that is vindictive and cruel in theology, and that is held in common by Partialists, whether Pagan, Turk, Jew or Christian. Angry Gods—subtle, spiritual devils, and scorching, endless hells, so terrifying to the timid—so abhorrent to the benevolent—so paralyzing to the devotions of the mild and amiable—so inefficient to reform the hardened—so nourishing to the passions of the revengeful, malignant and cruel—and so pernicious to virtue and morality in general—all these God-dishonoring, heart-withering and religion-destroying dogmas are unknown in Universalism, save as pernicious errors, “doctrines of devils,” “damnable heresies,” and remnants of Heathenism and Popery. Such is a small part of the negative good there is in believing in Universalism.

2. But there is also positive good in believing Universalism. For all that is amiable in character, reforming in influence, pleasing in contemplation, happyfying in practice, and beneficial in consequences, in each and all of the other systems of religion, are here retained in all their loveliness, in all their power, and in all their benefit. Nor are they merely freed from the pernicious and debasing alloys of error and of practice, with which they are there united and mixed up; but they are also extended to infinity, made durable as eternity, and are fixed as certainly as the throne and government of our God. I challenge the mention of a single particular of the above named character, with which this is not the case. Not one can be named; for not one exception exists. But for the satisfaction of the reader, and the exemplification of my position, I will name a few particulars in which this improvement is specially apparent.

Salvation.—What joys centre in this word! How the parents dot on it as the probable destiny of their children—how the child rejoices in it as the supposed condition of its parents! Now Universalism teaches this salvation for all sin, and all misery, and all imperfection—teaches it not only as the portion of a few, but of all—teaches it not only as probable, but as certain—and by teaching that man is the offspring of God, and the joint heir with Jesus, makes it extensive as infinity and lasting as eternity.

Punishment.—All the good there is, or can be, in this, is in its effects. Partialism sees no good effects, save in its reformation of a few. But Universalism recognizes it as the reformer of all to whom it is applied. It makes it certain—immediate—effectual. As a display of God's justice, punishment can neither be honorable to God, happyfying to his saints and angels, nor beneficial to his creatures who suffer it; unless it satisfies his divine justice. That justice ever does and ever will require the obedience of the transgressor. Now Universalism is the only system which teaches that punishment will secure the obedience, by certainly visiting, and certainly reforming the sinner—that the sinner will be made holy—the holy rejoice—God's justice be satisfied, and the universal Parent be honored and praised by the happiness and purity of his whole family, while he and they exist.

The motive to goodness.—Even admitting the fear of punishment to constitute a great portion of this motive, (which we deny, for fear purifies not the heart, but only restrains the hand;) still Universalism is superior to Partialism, for the following reasons. 1. Partialism represents punishment as distant—even in another state of being—while the sinner dreads most an immediate punishment. The benefit he expects to gain by iniquity, is immediate; and requires an immediate injury to overbalance its influence in his mind. 2. It represents punishment as uncertain and easily to be avoided by complying with certain conditions. These conditions the sinner expects to comply with some time or other; and therefore has very little dread of suffering by his transgression, while he is almost certain of gaining by it. Universalism, on the contrary, tells the sinner that he can not gain by iniquity, nor be happy in sinning—nor this only, but that punishment will immediately follow the act in the shape of evil consequences, and that these evil consequences are as certain as that effect follows a cause. Thus Universalism, when believed, is better calculated to restrain the sinner, than Partialism possibly can be.

But fear of punishment is not the motive of virtue—it is that love of God which casts out all fear. And no Partialist acquainted with both systems ever has denied that Universalism represents God, by far, more lovely than Partialism does. We most easily love that which is most lovely—consequently Universalism is superior to Partialism as a motive to goodness. Its rewards and punishments, both, are certain—are immediate—are proportioned to the deeds required by them—and are as immutable as the justice of God.

I might proceed in other particulars, till time and your patience failed me—but my object is not to think for you; but to set you to thinking for yourself—not to examine for you; but to lead you to a careful examination for yourself. I therefore close this already extended article with a brief exhortation—leaving to you, dear reader, the work of following on to know the utility of truth, by continuing, at your leisure, a pleasant work here just barely commenced.

Would you enjoy to the greatest possible extent and in their purest influence, the health of body, the soundness of mind, the expansion of intellect and the fulness of happyfying affection yielded by religion? You will find them all in the belief and practice of Universalism.

Would you enjoy the peaceable simplicity and happy unity of devotion yielded by the purest theism? You will find them united in Universalism.

Would you receive into your mind and affections the glorious perceptions arising from a hope of immortality and endless life—from the full perfections, glory and loveliness of God and his providences, as yielded by the teachings of nature and revelation combined, and addressed to the reason and religious feelings of man? You will find them by embracing the doctrine of Universalism.

Would you enjoy the freedom of mind and full exercise of your own judgment in matters of faith, free from all intolerance and domination—be personally religious, and personally responsible to God, alone, for your opinions and feelings—as yielded by Protestantism and the principles of the reformation? Be in faith and practice—in mind, heart and soul, a Universalist.

And would you enjoy all these invaluable blessings and privileges in their greatest, highest and fullest extent—without limitation, or mixture of evil—free from the pernicious principles and cruel errors of infidelity, Heathenism or Papacy? Go, examine, understand, and you will embrace Universalism. Live it; for it is the only system that is full of life—practice it; for it is the only system that can be practiced, consistent with virtue—and enjoy it; for it, only, can be enjoyed, as every good man desires enjoyment; and you will find that the name Universalist, is but another term for Christian; and that the true Christian is, and must be, in faith and in practice, in hope and in enjoyment, what his heavenly Father ever is, in deed and in truth, A UTILITARIAN. The words of the Utilitarian are ended. A. B. G.

WANT OF CANDOR.

A few days since I was in conversation with a young gentleman who is now a student of Union College, a Presbyterian, and fitting, or attempting to fit himself for the ministry. He appeared extremely ignorant of the doctrine of Universalism, as will be evident by the following question. He asked what possible use there could be in preaching, if this doctrine were true. For his part it was impossible for him to see or imagine any. I answered his question by saying that if the doctrine were true, that was the first and principal and an all-sufficient reason why it ought to be preached: inasmuch as truth is preferable to falsehood, and truth alone can sanctify—truth alone can make free from darkness, error and delusion—truth alone can give us substantial peace and hopes of future good—truth alone can reveal to us the true character of God, and destiny of man, and beget in the soul love supreme to God and universal to man; and certain am I that, of all sentiments ever taught in the world, Universalism, when correctly taught and sincerely believed, is best adapted to such noble ends.

The young theologian still protested that he could see no use in preaching if the doctrine was true. "Well, Sir, said I, suppose you were doomed to close and solitary confinement within the dark damp walls of a dungeon; and you supposed that confinement was for life—that you were never again to see the light of the sun, or the countenance of a friend, or hear the voice of kindness more; yet nevertheless, the truth is, that, in ten years, you are to be liberated and enjoy the light of the sun and all the joys of friendship and social life—would it be of no use to you to know this truth? Would you not bless the kind friend who would come and proclaim this joyful news of your release to you in prison? Would it not lighten the oppressive burden of your confinement, and seem to shorten the years of captivity? "No," said he, "if it were true, I should be liberated without being told of it, and I should rather not know it before hand."

Here was most assuredly a great want of candor; yea more, it was a want even of moral honesty. For rather than acknowledge what his own conscience, as well as common sense must have told him was the truth, he decided that despair was better than hope, and a lingering life and prospective death within the gloomy walls of a dungeon, preferable to prospective liberty and the assurance of days of happiness and peace!

He evidently saw the force and bearing of the question, and knew that if he answered it candidly and honestly, he should be obliged to allow that, on the supposition of the truth of Universalism, it was necessary to preach it; and rather than make such an acknowledgment, he chose to be uncandid and dishonest, for no one can believe that his answer was according to the honest convictions of his own conscience.

Candor is a distinguished virtue in any person, especially in a theologian, and the want of it a serious defect. The person who frankly acknowledges the force of an argument in an opponent, secures respect from all parties, and thereby gives evidence at least of his honesty and sincerity. But he who will disingenuously evade, equivocate and deny the force of an argument advanced by an opponent, not only shows himself to be destitute of magnanimity, but gives good reason to all to doubt his sincerity, and suspect his integrity and moral honesty on other occasions. The noble maxim of Washington, pater patriæ, will ever hold good, and I hope will never become unpopular in this country, "Honesty is the best policy." D. S.

REV. A. CAMPELL.

In our notice of this gentleman and Br. Montgomery, No. 48, page 383, language was used which may have caused some misunderstanding of the facts of the case. The notice, by Br. Skinner, in our last, has explained the matter in part. In addition to that, a letter received from Br. M. corrects the remainder. He says—"I did not challenge Mr. Campbell; for it would have been contrary to my usual course—but I simply requested him to receive more letters of inquiry from me.....I must affirm that I do not think he intended any disrespect to me by his remarks.....I close with the statement that, neither Mr. C. nor myself considered, that in wishing to continue my letters of inquiry, I had challenged him to a debate. I challenge no man—but if I am attacked, then I must defend 'the restitution of all things.'"

Another correction. A letter received by Br. Skinner from Mr. Campbell, states that he did propose an oral debate to one of our preachers in Boston, but he (the Universalist) preferred one in writing:

While on the subject, I will add—Mr. Campbell will be engaged, in January, in a discussion on the claims of Roman Catholicism—but after the first of February he will be ready to proceed in the discussion of Universalism with Br. Skinner. He would prefer an oral discussion at some central place; but sooner than forego the discussion entirely, will proceed as proposed, by the publication of both sides in the Harbinger and in the Magazine and Advocate. Therefore—what has already been published in the Harbinger, will be published in our columns early in January, when the discussion will proceed in regular order." A. B. G.

LITERARY THIEF.

"An Advocate" in our 48th and 49th numbers, has proved himself a plagiarist in his last article—and probably in his first. The following sentences in his last article are copied from "Smith on Divine Government."

"He who believes.....that a being of almighty power, unerring wisdom, and unbounded love, is seated at the helm of affairs, and is making every event promote, in its appointed measure, the highest happiness of all intelligent creatures, must possess perpetual serenity and peace. The storm of adversity may gather above him and burst upon his head; but he is prepared against it, and it can not dismay him. He knows that the evils which encompass him, are only blessings in disguise.—The fair face of nature smiles upon him with a brighter radiance." pp. 338-9. Boston edition of 1831.

"The person who habitually contemplates all mankind as the children of one common Father, and appointed to one common destiny, can not be a persecutor or a bigot." "To the utmost of his ability, he will enlighten the ignorant, correct the erring, sustain the weak, bear with the prejudiced, and reclaim the vicious." p. 335.

From what other work other portions of the article are copied, our informant saith not. The conduct of "Advocate" is so mean and shameful, that it needs no comments further than its exposure. Had he approved the ideas, and been unable to find better words to express them, why not mark them with inverted commas (") at the beginning, and quotations (") at the end? Nor can he plead ignorance—for he uses these marks in the communication, in other places, and professes some acquaintance with French, (pedantic phrases of which we struck out of the copy,) as well as English. May his detection be a warning to others—and this lesson teach him that there is no escape, no concealment for the evil-doer, that he may go and "sin no more." A. B. G.

THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

Mr. "Nobody in Particular," copied into our 43th number, current volume, and there credited to the Southern Evangelist, "made his first appearance on any stage," as the player folks would say, in the Herald of Truth. We cheerfully make this correction—especially as it affords us an opportunity of noticing that periodical as an excellent co-worker in the good cause, and its decided improvement (without meaning to disparage the merits of his predecessors) since Br. Sanderson assumed its superintendence.

We owe Br. Sanderson and his co-editors, too much gratitude for their former assistance as correspondents to this paper, not to feel kindly disposed toward them all. Even now, we have some excellent articles on hand for our next volume from the pen of Br. Chase, and the promise of more from him and Br. Montgomery—promises highly valued, as we know they will be well redeemed. May they, and Br. Sanderson, ever be blessed with all the success that sweetens labor—the full enjoyment of those blessings of Providence that render life desirable—and, to close with Spanish courtesy, but more than Spanish sincerity, thus blessed "may they live a thousand years."

P. S. Since the above was written, we have received another number of the Herald. It is to be removed from Geneva to Rochester—published simultaneously in that city and Auburn, on the same terms (as heretofore) as this paper—and with the additional aid of Brs. C. Hammond and A. C. Barry as Associate Editors. We welcome these latter brethren (known to our readers—particularly Br. Hammond—as correspondents of this paper) to the corps editorial—include them in the wishes above expressed—and hope for a continuance of the kindly feelings and pleasant relations heretofore existing between us. The extract from Br. Hammond's letter, in this paper, assures us of the fulfilment of our hope with regard to him. A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins—Send the current volume of the Universalist and Ladies' Repository to Mr. R. Lassel, Clayton, Jefferson county, N. Y. Mr. L. will account through this office. A. B. G.

ERRATUM.—In "Retrospection," published on page 368, No. 46, current volume, second column, line 22, for "flashes," read "blazes"—same column, line 41, for "incentive," read "inventive." A. B. G.

CELEBRATION OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

Liquidation of the Universalist Meeting-House Debt

The Universalist society in this city have been long and deeply involved in debt for their meeting-house. Five years since, they were owing about $600. They have struggled ardently to extinguish this debt, and have now reduced it to a little over $200. They are induced now to call upon their friends and a liberal public, for further aid towards the accomplishment of that desirable object, in a manner which, while the charity will be scarcely felt by those conferring it, will greatly aid them in the payment of a burdensome debt, and in securing an unnumbered title to their house. They propose celebrating the anniversary of our Saviour's birth, by illuminating and trimming their meeting-house, a concert of sacred music, and a discourse adapted to the occasion, and to sell tickets of admission at Fifty Cents for each person; every dollar of which money, when received will be faithfully applied to the extinction of the debt. No person will be admitted on that evening without a ticket or the payment of the above sum. None who are friendly to the society will grudge their Fifty Cents for so good an object; and there are few, indeed, but what can, if they choose, lay by that sum between this and Christmas Eve. The laboring classes, and even those in quite moderate circumstances, we doubt not, will be ready for the occasion. We affectionately invite not only our citizens generally, but our friends in all the adjacent towns, to be present and contribute their share. The favor will be gratefully acknowledged. Remember friends, Saturday evening, December 24th, at half past 6 o'clock. As many hundred persons as attend, just half as many hundred dollars will it sink the debt.

By order of the Trustees of the First Universalist society, S. BEEBE, Jr., Secretary.

Utica, December 1, 1835.

FIRST VOLUME OF THE UNION.

The first volume of the "Universalist Union" closed on the 5th of November inst. An extra edition was printed through the volume, and the proprietors find that they have from one hundred to two hundred perfect copies which they can dispose of. As the paper needs an extension of its list, to remunerate those engaged in conducting it, the undersigned would respectfully appeal to the Universalist public for such aid as can be consistently rendered, without injury to kindred periodicals. It is believed that in many places where the Union does not now circulate, individuals may be found to take it, who are not now taking any paper. As some inducement to ministering brethren and others to seek out those, we will furnish five copies of the second volume of the Union, and one copy of the first volume, for every $10. remitted free of expense. Postmasters would generally, without doubt, forward the amounts. The first volume of the Union, commences the foreign correspondence of Br. Le Fevre, which renders the volume more interesting and worthy of preservation. The second volume commenced on the 12th of November, 1836, and is printed in large quarto form, well adapted for binding. Specimen numbers will be furnished to those who may wish them. Letters should be addressed the undersigned, "No. 2 Chatham-square, foot of Bowery, New-York." New-York, November, 1836. P. PRIER and Co.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst. by Br. MARTIN in Durhamville—Br. DELONG at Burlington Flats, and in the schoolhouse near Br. THOMAS (Exeter) in the evening—Br. KIRKEY at South Otsego—Br. C. B. BROWN at Palermo, and at the Peat school-house in the evening.

CHRISTMAS EVE will be celebrated as follows:—in this city, the house illuminated and decorated, and a concert of sacred music; sermon by Br. SKINNER—in Eatonville; sermon by Br. W. H. WAGGONER—in Clinton; sermon by Br. S. R. SMITH—in the Union meeting-house on Burlington Flats; sermon by Br. M. B. SMITH—in Perrysburg, Ohio; sermon by Br. D. R. BIDDLECOM—in the new Universalist meeting-house in Fulton; sermon by Br. EATON—at Parma Corners; sermon by Br. QUAK.

POETRY.

From the Herald of Truth.

A TRIBUTE

To the memory of JACOB CHASE, who departed this life, October 25, 1836.

BY REV. JACOB CHASE, SON OF THE DECEASED.

A dear father has sunk in the silence of death,
No more shall I see him below;
We have parted, and he has returned to his home,
Where the cold blasts of trouble ne'er blow.

He has left me to mourn 'mid the tempests of life,
For the absence of him I revere;
He has left me 'mid anguish, and troubles, and cares,
By his presence no more to be cheered.

But his counsels in life I would never forget,
They are seasoned with wisdom and love;
And the lessons he taught me, he practised himself,
Till he soared to the regions above.

He adored our kind God, and he honored his name;
He rejoiced in the hope that is sure;
For fifty-five years, his belief was the same;
It was drawn from a source that is pure.

He believed in a God whose one nature was love,
And a Saviour who died for all men—
In a heaven of praise, in the regions on high,
And a sure recompense for all sin.

He believed that the world had a Saviour in Christ—
That he came to redeem it from sin—
That he ne'er would give o'er till the victory was won,
And the last wandering outcast brought in.

His affections were tender, unwavering and strong,
While his charity reached all his foes;
He was affable, social, kind-hearted, sincere;
In his soul cruel hatred ne'er rose.

He embraced the great cause of unlimited grace,
While a Murray and Winchester stood
As the only bold heralds of infinite truth,
On this side of the wide rolling flood.

But he's gone to that rest which his soul longed to share,
And has left all loved objects behind;
But the trumpet will sound and the dead all arise,
And the world in God's praise be combined.

Then why should I grieve for the absence of him:
Who has finished his course here below,
Since the time will soon come, when all beings shall meet,
And then I to his presence shall go.

A SKETCH.

It was a dark and gloomy night in the month of December. The bleak wind howled and the frost had driven the inhabitants of the city from the streets to a more comfortable place by the fireside. The mother had hushed the last cries of her infant babe, and no sound of footsteps was to be heard, save the measured tread of the "guardian of the night," as he paced his rounds to watch over the safety of ten thousand sleepers around him.

"Fire! fire!" cried the watchman, and "fire! fire! fire!" was echoed and re-echoed through every street and lane of the city. Then came the sound of bells, the rattling of engines, and the hurried footsteps of many who ran to the scene of desolation. It was a large and elegant mansion, whose exterior gave evidence that it was the dwelling place of wealth and pleasure. But the destroying element was at work. The dark column of smoke rose from the roof and curled through every crevice, giving fearful evidence that the whole structure would soon be a sheet of flame. * * * A cry was heard; at an upper window appeared a female calling for help. Quick as thought the ladder was raised—the daring fireman ascended, and seizing the object of his pursuit in his arms brought her to the ground. "Thank Heaven," said a sweet voice, "I am safe, I have escaped the flame, and I will not murmur if my goods are destroyed." She turned to her deliverer, and was about to give him her warm thanks for his successful exertions in her behalf; but ere she had pronounced half a sentence, a death-like paleness came over her countenance and she trembled like an aspen leaf as she cried, "My child! oh! where is my child?" Had the lightnings of heaven struck the building in an instant to the ground, the effect would not have been more visible than was that of this fearful question. It ran like an electric shock through the multitude, and in breathless silence eye was turned to eye, as each waited for the answer. "Where is my child?" again asked the frantic mother. But the child came not. Never, no, never, shall I forget the look of unutterable anguish which came over the features of that mother as the truth flashed upon her mind, that her dear boy was yet in the burning building. Tears gushed from her eyes like waters from the fountain. She wrung her hands in agony indescribable. She wept aloud like a very infant, and she fell senseless upon the ground.

Reader, behold in this a picture of the condition of that mother, who has escaped, as she thinks, the flames of endless perdition, and opens her eyes upon the startling fact, that her child is still exposed to the infernal fires. She looks upon herself as trembling upon the brink of the burning pit. She is, as she believes, plucked from her danger by the strong arm of the Saviour. She thanks God for her deliverance. She shouts for joy. She kneels to give thanks to her Saviour; but the voice of thanksgiving is hushed, and the voice of praise dies upon her lips, as the awful thought rushes upon her mind, that her child is behind, and the storm of infinite wrath is gathering and blackening around its head. Oh! where then are the mother's joys? and where that peace which flows like a river to those that believe? There may be joy in the reflection that self is safe, but it is evanescent as the joy of the mother who was rescued from the burning building, and soon opened her eyes upon the fact, that she had left her babe behind. It is worthy of serious consideration, whether such can be the effect of that Gospel which gives rest to the soul, and concerning which the apostle hath said, there is "all joy and peace in believing." Rest assured that there are no such trials as these for those that believe in the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. He rejoices that himself is safe, and he looks forward and believes that the glorious Captain of salvation shall ride on in the chariot of his redeeming grace, till the last tear shall be wiped from the eyes of weeping humanity, and the last lingering sigh of sorrow dies upon the ear. The parent is safe; the child also is safe, and all created human beings are safe in the arms of their Father and their God. Amen, even so let it be.—Union.

A SKETCH.

Mirth, smiles and music were in the parlor of the Richland Mansion, on the bright evening when Edward Harcourt was united to his Eloise; beauty and health were on their features, gladness and love in their hearts. Many a matron's blessing went with them as they left the village; and they came to a home of neatness, plenty and peace. The angel of love erected there her viewless altar, and Edward and Eloise were true worshippers, while God was not forgotten, who giveth the sweets of friendship, and the joys of domestic harmony. The good book was read; the prayer uttered; the hymn sung, and the balmy sweets of sleep came to conscious innocence.

A change came over the beauty of that home. The Bible was read by one alone, while the tears of grief fell on its leaves—the prayer was said, but with trembling voice and choked utterance—the heart was too sad to sing, and sleep came but to bring troubled dreams. Why was it? Whence this change? I will tell thee, and let my words be heeded—they are the words of caution. Edward had entered the halls of festivity when the wine flowed free, and the song rose high; he turned away from the red cup, and said the tempting chalice should not touch his lips. But the evil hour came—the voice of ridicule was maddening, and he tasted—drank—and the beauty of his existence departed. Time went on—the inclination for the bowl became a passion—business was neglected, home dishonored, and God profaned. The wife is wretched, and the husband is no more a man.

Reader! I know thee not, but yet I love thee and seek thy good, for have we not all one Father? Hear me when I say—Beware, beware the wine cup, and its kindred; beneath its crimson wave there is hid a sting. "Show not thy valiantness in wine, for wine hath destroyed many."—Ladies' Repository.

A delicate child, pale and prematurely wise, was complaining on a hot morning, that the poor dew drops had been too hastily snatched away, and not allowed to glitter on the flowers like other happier dew drops that live the whole night through, and sparkle in the moonlight, and through the morning onwards to noon day. "The sun," said the child, "has chased them away with his heat—or swallowed them in his wrath." Soon after came rain and a rainbow; whereupon his father pointed upwards—"See," said he, "there stand the dew drops gloriously reset—a glittering jewellery—in the heavens; and the clownish foot tramples on them no more. By this my child, thou art taught that what withers upon earth blooms again in heaven." Thus the father spoke, and knew not that he spoke prefiguring words; for soon after, the delicate child, with the morning brightness of his early wisdom, was exhaled, like a dew drop, into heaven.

Virtue and vice are two things that can never amalgamate; and he who loves the one can never practise the other.

SKEPTICISM.—"The dogmatist," says Watts, "is sure of everything, and the skeptic believes nothing." Both are likely to be wrong, but we need not impute wrong motives to either. Skepticism may be assumed as an excuse for immorality; but Faith also may be assumed as a substitute for good works. To say that the doubters are all profligates, and the orthodox all hypocrites, would be equally removed from truth and liberality. As the worldly temptations all lean towards an acquiescence in received opinions, those who profess them, should be the last to suspect the motives of those who differ from them. Both may be good Christians, if they will but think each other to be such.—Tin Trumpet.

Our thoughts should always be such as we would, at all times, be willing to have known to all men.

Peace of mind and honest reputation, are better sources of enjoyment than mere wealth, and yet how many yield them up for the idol gold.

Lose no time; be always employed in something useful; cut off all unnecessary actions.

DEATHS.

In Brookfield, on the 23d of November, Mrs. ELIZABETH BLANDING, aged 71 years. The deceased had been a worthy and respected member of the Baptist church for many years, but died a firm believer in the restitution of all things to holiness and peace.—Communicated.

ANOTHER PATRIOT AND CHRISTIAN GONE.

It becomes my painful duty to announce in an appropriate manner, the death of my honored and aged father, JACOB CHASE, who departed this life in the town of Lee, Oneida county, N. Y., on the 25th of October last, in the 85th year of his age.

The subject of this notice was born, November 8, 1751, in the town of (what was then called, Narragansett No. 6, afterwards Petersham, but now) Templeton, Worcester county, Mass. He served faithfully in the revolutionary struggle for civil and religious liberty, and came out of that "furnace of affliction" with honor to himself and satisfaction to those under whom he served, though then but a mere youth.

He was educated "after the strictest sect" a "close communion Baptist," and at the age of 24, united with the Baptist church in Sutton, then under the pastoral care of one Elder Ingals. He remained a zealous member of said church for about five years, during which time he had the opportunity of hearing a brief oral discussion between Elder Winchester, then a Baptist clergyman, and a layman, whose name I have forgotten; and from that time he was never satisfied with his limited creed. At the age of about 30, he became fully convinced of the truth of Universalism. He was personally and intimately acquainted with Mr. Winchester, who was converted to Universalism about the same time, and with father Murray; and he enjoyed frequently, the benefits of their ministerial labors; and I am bound in respect to his memory, to say, that I never knew any layman, and but few clergymen who could repeat from memory one-half the amount of Scripture that he could, or that knew better how to apply it. In fact, the Bible was his constant companion, and almost the only book that I ever knew him to read. Religion was his whole theme, and he seemed to think but very little about anything else. And this continued to be the case, even when his natural faculties were so far exhausted with the infirmities of age, that he could not identify his own children or remember their names. He was an attentive and affectionate husband, a kind and indulgent father, a peaceable and friendly neighbor, and an exemplary Christian. But he is gone—his lamp of life has become extinct. May his good instructions, examples and virtues, be long remembered by all who knew him.

Since my father is no more among us in this world, I shall no longer add the Junior to my name, but shall ever subscribe WISDOM PERSONIFIED.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

"Say unto wisdom, thou art my sister."—Prov. vii: 4.

Among all the feeling and affecting representations of wisdom, that ever fell from the pen of inspiration, there are none which appear to us to be more graphic, forcible and convincing, than the above from the writings of Solomon. We would therefore, invite the reader's serious attention to a few remarks, which shall be offered with a view to set the subject in its proper light. And we hope that our labor will not be wholly unavailing.

Who that possesses a heart that is human, and knows any thing of those endearing and interesting ties that bind the most tender and refined affections of the soul to a sister, can avoid being sensibly and profitably touched with this admirable personification of heavenly wisdom? We may be told in the imperious voice of Heaven's messenger, to "get wisdom"—we may be repeatedly informed by the wise and the good, that "her price is above all rubies," and that "all her paths are peace"—that she will clothe us with the enviable and imperishable robe of superlative honor—and all this may pass over the careless mind, like the vernal breeze over the rock in the desert, without stirring the sensibilities, or touching the affections, or waking up the drowsy feelings of man's moral nature. But when she is presented to the "mind's eye," in the fondly cherished, ever admired, and lovely figure of a sister, who can remain unmoved? Who can barbarously thrust her from his bosom, or even suffer her to depart from him? Oh! reader, whoever thou art, be persuaded to retain this important truth ever in thy remembrance, that wisdom is thy sister; and do not fail of treating her accordingly. Own the connexion, and profit by it, and never suffer her departure. While she is with thee, no foe can deceive thee, no tyrant enslave thee, no ruthless intruder destroy thy comfort or disturb thy repose. Her exalted capacities are equal to every emergency, her merits are beyond comparison, and her intrinsic value numbers can never compute. Her experience renders her society of incalculable importance; for, when the Almighty prepared the starry heavens—when he established the clouds above—when he appointed the foundations of the earth, she was with him, and was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him. O who, that knows her charms, and has shared in the joys that her presence affords, does not exult and rejoice with exceeding great joy, in being permitted to call her, in truth, his sister?

Dear reader, permit me to say to you—if she finds in thy house, a permanent home—in thy warm affections, a resting place; she will amply reward thee for all thy kindness and attention. She will ever watch with the most vigilant solicitude over thy dearest interests and highest happiness. In perplexing difficulties, she will promptly aid thee—in dangerous enterprises, she will cheerfully instruct thee—through the changing and fluctuating scenes of mortal life, she will kindly guide thee. She will teach thee to be humble in prosperity, patient in adversity, mild in the exercise of power and authority, and to ever render obedience to the dictates of virtue and the demands of charity. She will ever stand ready to teach thee the best means of preserving and promoting bodily health and vigor. She will smooth the wrinkled pillow of a sick bed with her soft and trusty hand. She will soothe thy waning existence with the voice of truth, She will wipe from thy marble brows, in thy expiring moments, the clammy perspiration, and when she can do no more for thee on earth, she will conduct thee in peace and safety, through the dark valley and shadow of death, and then, soar with thee to the bright regions of perfection and glory immortal.

How transporting and glorious the thought, that the happy time will surely come, when every lonely, sorrowing, and sighing son and daughter of earth's broad surface, will gladly, feelingly, and affectionately "say unto wisdom, thou art my sister!"

For such a time our prayers ascend,
And faith conducts those prayers on high;
Father of all, let grace descend,
And bring this promised season nigh!

LETTER

To Rev. Theophilus Fisk, Editor of the Southern Evangelist.

Royalton Centre, October 7, 1836.

DEAR SIR—In the July number of your paper, I find a notice of the proceedings of the Niagara Association, with a call for a reply to certain remarks you have made, touching the business of this body. And, as you have politely forwarded to me the number containing your request, (though directed to a distant post office) I infer that you depend upon me for the desired information. Wishing to gratify you in so reasonable a request, as well as some others who have appeared to misunderstand the subject, I will quote your language by way of introduction, and accompany the same with such an explanation, as the nature of the case seems to require.

You say "the committee of discipline reported no complaint. Indeed? and what has become of the case they had before their august tribunal at their last session, of a ministering brother whom not one of them ever saw, and against whom they preferred charges, although he never was in the bounds of their Association since it was formed, and was at the time they were attempting to fix odium upon him, six hundred miles from them! No complaint—what becomes of their record of last year? Have they expunged its inquisitorial proceedings, respecting an individual they never saw? We pause for a reply."

"The ministering brother," against whom charges were preferred in June, 1835, before the Niagara Association, and sustained by satisfactory proof, is the Rev. Theophilus Fisk, the author of the above extract, who was supposed to reside at that time, some where in the New-England States. The nature of the charges was, that the Rev. T. Fisk, had solicited and obtained patrons for papers that he never published; that he had received, in person, advance pay for the same, and also through the medium of the post-office to a considerable amount from our brethren, in Middleport, Knowlesville, and elsewhere; that Mr. John Craig, had written to him for an explanation of his conduct, and the cause for not publishing the work he had paid for, and that he received a very saucy and unprovoked reply to his inquiries from Mr. Fisk, who was then residing in New-York. The Council took the subject into consideration, and voted to refer the case to the Association of which Mr. Fisk was a member, and in which he resided, for their disposal, and authorized me to forward the business to such body. I did so. I forwarded the complaint to the Clerk of the Massachusetts Convention, agreeably to his request. What disposal they have made, or intend to make of it, I know not. They have had one session since the business was before them, but Mr. Fisk was then, I believe, in the Southern States.

Such, Mr. Fisk, is the character of a proceeding, which you call "inquisitorial." Be that as it may, such an inquisition will never injure you, provided, that you are innocent of the charges against you. If so, you are prepared to give an explanation of your conduct—you think it strange, that the committee of discipline should report "no complaint." Would you not have thought more strange, if this Association had passed a resolution disfellowshipping you, when they did not claim the right, because of your distant residence?

Again—you inform your readers, that you are a stranger in this Association, and that charges were brought against you by those who never saw you. What then? Because you have taken money from strangers, without returning an equivalent according to your promise, have strangers no right to complain? But, it so happens that some of that "inquisitorial" Council have seen you, and that, too, within the limits of this Association, where you have preached a number of times. I am one of that number. I conclude, therefore, this unpleasant reply, by assuring you, that the opinion of this Association was, that you had dealt unjustly with your patrons and friends; that the practice of issuing one proposal after another for the publication of papers, obtaining by this means a considerable amount of advance pay, and then not publishing the same, nor refunding back the money, was immoral, and highly unbecoming the character of a Universalist clergyman. And if, because we value the moral standing of ministers more than the personal friendship or fellowship of any individual, we must be reproached as inquisitors, and receive the lash of your displeasure, we are prepared for the trial which awaits us.

C. HAMMOND.

KINDNESS.....No. V.

"Weep with them that weep."

There is another particular which the Gospel insists on, as an occasion for the exercise of kindness. It is mourning.

There is a peculiar loneliness and depression of mind consequent upon the loss of friends, which in many instances, sublimates into a melancholy of the most hopeless and incurable kind. Now, while every thing like levity should be forborne in the house of sorrow; still the affectionate conversation of candid and sensible friends, is both proper and highly useful. They insensibly draw aside the mind from brooding over its grief; and though they cannot remove sorrow, they may alleviate its pungency and assist the mind to recover its wonted activity and attention to ordinary concerns.

There are few places or occasions, where an affectionate minister of religion can really do more immediate good, than in the house of mourning. But it too often happens, that he seizes on such occasions for proselyting the afflicted; or what is much worse, he endeavors to excite terrors and alarms in the mind already borne down by the weight of its own misfortunes. And this he does, by hinting doubts of the future well-being of the deceased, or construing the calamity into a divine judgment for some unrepented sin in the unhappy survivors. Of such we must say, in the strong language of Job—"Miserable comforters are ye all."

Probably a more efficient instrument of comfort may be found in some neighbor, whose long tried friendship secures a welcome with the afflicted. Here an acquaintance with the peculiarities of the mind which may distinguish the mourner, will suggest suitable expedients to adapt the discourse to the occasion, and touch only those strings which vibrate in unison with present things and circumstances. Such means are every way calculated "to heal the broken-hearted and comfort all that mourn."

Thus we have endeavored, in a few numbers, to give an epitome of the duties of humanity; and we cannot but admire that arrangement of Providence which has suspended so many comforts upon their free and cheerful exercise. In this condition of our nature, paradoxes meet and solve each other. We experience the keenest anguish in seeing human suffering, yet we take a kind of solemn pleasure in mingling with scenes of sorrow. Is it asked why? It is by kindness or by sympathy, to alleviate or share the pains of others. This is seen in the parable of the man travelling from Jerusalem to Jericho. Those who had no fellow-feeling, "passed by on the other side;" but he who could "feel another's wo," went to him, "and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine." Go, and do likewise. EIMI.

UTICA, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1836.

END OF VOLUME SEVEN.

This number ends the publishing labors of our first year, as proprietors of the Magazine and Advocate, and invites us to a brief retrospection. Events passed—blessings enjoyed—cares surmounted—actions performed, meet the mental view. The past is unalterable. Its only use can be, to guide us in endeavoring to improve what is to come. May wisdom and grace be given us from on High, thus to use it!

The retrospect does not present objects as bright, as did the anticipation—but neither are they as dark, as were our forebodings. For instance—We have lost some good subscribers we hoped to have retained. But we have also lost some bad ones; and this loss is a saving gain to us. Nor is this all. In most cases, we have obtained those whose actions prove them good, in their stead. And though we have not an increase of subscribers as we hoped for; their number is not decreased, an event we also feared. Nor is this all. We are persuaded, from the payments of our subscribers within the year, that, however good our list was a year ago, it is now better—we have gained more good subscribers than we have lost; and lost more bad ones than we have gained. Hence, though our expenses have been increased by extra efforts to render the paper more useful and interesting to its readers, yet, even if our list has not been increased, our income within the year has been, by the mindfulness of subscribers, who did not disappoint our dependence on them. We thank God devoutly, and feel a pleasing depth and weight of gratitude to our promptly paying subscribers, and active and faithful agents, whenever we think of this fact! Their promptitude and activity have saved us from embarrassments under the unexpected rise in the markets, our extra and current expenses; to meet which we had no other aid than theirs. Heaven bless them, for thus performing their duty! May those yet in arrears, not feel displeased at these heartfelt praises on their fellow-subscribers; for until out of debt, we shall need such aid, and they can deserve just such thanks from us another year—even now by paying what is our due.

We are sensible that, notwithstanding we have, in general, done all we promised, we have nevertheless been prevented from doing much we had intended to do. And though we have avoided some evils, which we feared we might be led to commit through inadvertency or error of judgment; we have also to lament many errors of omission, for which we shall endeavor hard to atone, by our future vigilance and fidelity. May our patrons, who have had reason to find fault with us, and who have given us no reason to find fault with them, bear with us a while longer, and try us for another year. As for those who, like us, have faults to atone for, may they with us, endeavor by their future good conduct, to excel us in effacing the injuries of the past. It is a glorious labor—one that makes angels rejoice—to reform the past evil into good; and we shall try hard, by the blessing of Heaven, not to be excelled in it by any of our subscribers.

With these promises of our own amendment, and hopes of the amendment of others who need it—believing that we will be able to do, another year, much we omitted doing this year; and to avoid, in the next volume, many of the errors committed in the present—thankful to God for his blessings—grateful to our agents and subscribers for their favors—relying on a continuance, and even hoping for an increase of patronage—and greeting all our readers, in deep sincerity and feeling, with the compliments of this joyous season, we close THE LABORS OF THE YEAR. A. B. G.

WICKEDNESS OF HEART.

We lately gave an example of great want of candor in a young man who is preparing himself for a Presbyterian minister. We now propose giving our readers another part of the conversation which we then held with the same young man, to which even charity itself can hardly give so mild a name as that of want of candor: and I know of no more appropriate phrase to express its character than the one heading this article.

I would, however, advertise the reader that, by wickedness of heart I do not mean native and inborn depravity, but only that perverse disposition and vitiated inclination which a false education and a most demoralizing and wicked creed have engendered.

After we had conversed a considerable length of time on the subject of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, the following conversation in substance ensued:—

Presbyterian.—Well, Sir, if I believed that doctrine, (Universalism,) I should consider it my duty to kill myself as quick as possible and go to heaven at once.

Universalist.—No, my friend, you are mistaken, you certainly would not—you will take back that remark—it was a hasty and rash one—one which I am sure neither your judgment nor conscience can approve. Reflect one moment on the subject—see where the remark will lead you to, and I am very confident you will take it back.

Pres.—No, I shall not take it back—it is my deliberate conviction and judgment; and I certainly should consider it my duty to kill myself at once if I believed that doctrine.

Univ.—Duty, Sir, duty! On what ground would you rest the moral obligation to perform such a duty as that?

Pres.—On the ground that I could more directly secure my happiness thereby; and the promotion of happiness is the duty of all.

Univ.—Call you that duty which is a direct violation of the laws and commandments of God? Might not the thief with the same propriety say that the possession of stolen goods would promote his happiness, and therefore it was his duty to steal? But are you certain that the violation of the known law and command of God in the destruction of your own life would promote your happiness?

Pres.—Why, I should certainly be saved and go to glory, if your doctrine be true.

Univ.—Not with that temper and disposition which such an act would exhibit. For "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." And you must remember that "whosoever doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong that he hath done; and there is no respect of persons with God." He will render to every man according to his works. But, Sir, if on the supposition of Universalism being true, you would deem it your duty to kill yourself in order to get to heaven, will you inform me why you would not alike deem it your duty to kill yourself in order to get to heaven, if you were sure the doctrine of particular election and reprobation were true, and knew you were one of the elect?

Pres.—O, that would be very different. I could not know positively that I was one of the elect.

Univ.—But my question was predicated of the supposition that you knew yourself to be one of the elect.

Pres.—But that is what no one can know.

Univ.—Neither can any one know positively that Universalism is true. We may firmly believe it true. And your statement was not if you knew, but if you believed Universalism were true, you would consider it your duty to kill yourself at once. Now if the mere belief of Universalism would lead you to such an act, would not the knowledge that you were one of the elect be still more likely to produce that effect?

Pres.—No, for if I were to commit suicide that very fact would prove that I was not one of the elect.

Univ.—Not at all, Sir. For that which was from all eternity ordained as a truth, and which you knew to be true, could not be disannulled, or proved untrue by any thing you could do. And besides, your Confession of Faith declares that the elect were chosen to salvation "without any foresight of faith, or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereunto."

Pres.—I do not think the cases are parallel.

Univ.—If they are not, then the difference is altogether against you; for although Calvinism may possibly lead to suicide, Universalism, rightly understood, never can. For the Universalist, so far from wishing to violate the law of God, or feeling discontented with his lot, his duties or his length of days, sees in every event of life the goodness of God displayed; believes that all the ills and sorrows of life shall ultimately tend to his good; deems it his duty to seek to preserve that life that God has given him, and to do all the good during its continuance to his fellow-beings in his power; is assured that he shall live just as long and no longer than it is best he should live; that God's time for his departure is the best possible time; and therefore he feels perfectly reconciled and resigned to the will of God, knowing that his will is the best possible good of each and every creature he has made. To him therefore "Death's ever welcome, though life still is sweet."

After our conversation had progressed thus far, this young candidate for the Presbyterian ministry still insisted on and reiterated his declaration that if he believed in the certain salvation of all men he would certainly kill himself at once. Alas, thought we, for the piety and devotion and love to God and religion, of such professors! This young man professed to love God most devoutly and sincerely, and yet virtually declared that if it were not for the fear of hell, or if he were certain of ultimate happiness for himself and all men, he would voluntarily and freely violate the law of God, forswear his allegiance to him, destroy the life with which he had been kindly entrusted; that he would not live on earth to do the good in his power; that he cared nothing about human society, or the state of morals, or the temporal happiness of mankind; in short, that no other motive of feeling actuated him than that of the purest selfishness—that it was for self alone that he lived—for self alone would he die—that to escape hell and reach heaven was his sole and only aim—that aside from this he regarded neither God nor man, and as little did he regard the laws of either! Well, young man, thought we, if this be the true picture of thyself, God is wise enough to read and know thy heart, and good enough to not let thee believe in any other system than that which restrains thy outward conduct through the influence of slavish fear, while at "heart thou art in the gall of bitterness, and the bonds of iniquity."

Should these remarks ever meet the eye of the young man referred to, he will know their author and recall his own sentiments when he sees them in print. And we beseech him to review them in prayerful retirement, with the eye of a philosopher and the conscience of a Christian.

We have no unkind feelings towards him. We wish him well in this life, and immortal felicity in the next. But we are satisfied the sentiments he uttered in the conversation above narrated, if they are his real and sincere sentiments, must have proceeded from wickedness of heart, and that therefore, his "heart is not right with God." We are willing, however, to allow that their wickedness is not native depravity of soul, but a corruption that has been infused into his soul by a wicked and most abominable creed; and that it there adheres and there will remain, till he "purges out the old leaven of Phariseeism," renounces his corrupting creed and "gets him a new heart."

D. S.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

In justice to our own feelings, we cannot close volume seven without noticing those to whom it really owes nearly all the interest it possesses, and by whose labors it has been enabled to effect much of the good, its circulation has accomplished. Few readers have a definite idea of the amount of labor bestowed on our paper by our correspondents. They see a series of essays continued from week to week and remember the pleasure and retain the useful impressions of the perusal—but the form and size of our pages too often lead them to undervalue the amount of matter they thus read. “Honor to whom honor is due,” is our motto.

Take, then, any common sized 12mo. book—or a tract of the American Tract Society—as an example. One volume of this paper contains matter enough to fill about two thousand six hundred such pages, (making our paper much cheaper than even the Tract Society's publications!), or about equal to six or eight volumes of common sized novels—such as are sold at from fifty cents to a dollar each, when first issued from the press. Of course, each column of our paper will average more than two such book pages. Of the one thousand two hundred and forty columns of the present volume, Br. S. R. Smith has furnished, as Editor and correspondent, about seventy-five columns—the Author of Notes on Sacred Subjects, about fifty—Br. Austin, thirty-two, besides the prize tale—Br. Peck, twenty-one—Br. L. C. Browne, eighteen—Brs. Hammond, Whitney and Eimi, each, seventeen—Br. Lewis, fourteen—and under this amount much interest and information has been communicated by Brs. Sadler, S. W. Fuller, C. Spear, G. Rogers, Sanderson, A. Clark, Curtis, Holmes, Bullard, Montgomery, Eaton, Tomlinson, Townsend, Whiston, Potter, P. Morse, Hosea Ballou, Asher Moore, J. French, C. B. Brown, C. S. Brown, Messenger, Dr. Benton, T. D. Cook, O. Roberts, G. L. Platt, T. B. Robbins, Professor S. N. Sweet, J. Wallace, W. E. Manley, T. J. Smith, W. S. Balch, J. Britton, etc., besides about one hundred male contributors of articles expressly written for this paper.

Our female contributors are less numerous, but equally good--Mrs. Scott who has given us nine columns, mostly poetry, besides her prize tale--Miss Rounseville who has given us nine columns--Mrs. Porter, besides the prize poem, about five columns--Mrs. Whiston, A Sister, Mrs. Stephens, and one or two others, are all we can name among our female writers.

These here named and alluded to—about ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY IN ALL—deserve and have our warmest thanks for their labors, and our kindest and best wishes for their welfare. We hope not one will forget that this is not a discharge, but an invitation for them to continue their favors to ourselves and readers till we again can heartily wish them “a Merry Christmas” and “a Happy New Year.”

PUBLICATION DAY.—Remember, the publication day will be changed to Friday, instead of Saturday, after this volume. Religious Notices must be sent so as to reach us on Tuesday, instead of Wednesday—and obituary and hymenial notices on Friday, instead of Saturday, as heretofore, to be inserted in the following number. The first number of volume Eight will be dated on Friday, January 6th, 1837. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PREPOSITION vs. CONJUNCTION.

In the publication of hymenial notices, some of our brethren have thought proper, of late, to use the conjunction and instead of the preposition to. As Br. Skinner, in the 40th number of this paper, considers it an improper innovation upon established custom, I beg to be indulged in the expression of my opinion also. Br. S. says, "We read for example, married, on the — inst., Mr. A— and Miss B—, and Mr. G. and Mrs. D—." True, such examples may be found in some papers of late, and so may the phrase, "Top not come down," be found in Matt. xxiv: 17. But, although this passage was used by a shrewd clergyman to prove the divine disapprobation of top-knots, worn by females in ancient times, it was without force, because it was selected without regard to its connexion or meaning. Now it appears to me, that one quotation has about as much to do with its connexion as the other, unless the first was taken from a notice in which there was a mistake in writing or printing.

I must frankly confess that I prefer the conjunction to the prepositional, and for the following reasons: 1. It is desirable the public should know that the lady was married to the gentleman, as much as that the gentleman was married to the lady. And it must be peculiarly gratifying to the lady, if she is pleased with the union, since many young women are drawn or driven into marriage obligations against their will.

2. There is as much propriety in pleasing the vanity of a woman, as that of a man. The preposition fails to accomplish this object, because in notices of this kind, her name is not only last in order, but it is not said that she is married at all.

3. The old form of marriage notices probably originated in a want of respect for the female character, and seems better adapted to the ancient than the present time. Wherever Christianity prevails in its purity, the female character is placed on a level with that of the male. But how can we express a perfect equality in hymenial notices without the use of the conjunction?

If the conjunction is wanting in perspicuity, it may be proper to add the phrase, to each other; but for one, I think it sufficiently clear without any addition.

J. WHITNEY.

REMARKS.

Well, Br. Whitney, although we read that man was created first then the woman, and that man is the head of the woman, (1 Cor. xi: 3,) and therefore perceive the propriety of mentioning the man first, yet have thou thine own way in this matter. As thou art now separated from thy better half, it must be some consolation to know that she is married to thee as well as thou to her. I will not therefore attempt the refutation of thy reasoning till ye meet again. Though in sooth it is seldom we meet with a married man who has not a wife. As thou art now, for a season, far separated from thy companion, I will not, for the time being, attempt to remove or thwart thy purpose of gallantry, in which thou seemest so anxious to "please the vanity of the women." However, I have not a doubt but thou wilt yet be in favor of the proposition, and that, before many months, if thy wife come not to thee, thou wilt come to her. D. S.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

We have so repeatedly noticed this truly excellent and independent monthly, and are unable from want of time to read the December number now before us, before our paper goes to press, that we can only refer to the past, promise an extract in future, and inform those who may wish to subscribe for the work, that a new volume begins in January—price Five dollars per annum. They will certainly get the worth of their money, if the next volume is as excellent as the past—and from its continual improvements, we think it will be better. The Knickerbocker forms two volumes per year, of 500 pages each. The subscription to a single volume, (for six months,) is three dollars.

MONEY WANTED.

We beg leave respectfully and reluctantly to say, that we have a heavy payment to make on the first of January—and several others within a few months thereafter. As we have no means, but the income of the paper, to meet these payments, we hope all indebted to this establishment, and able to assist us, will remember us in our day of need.

G. and H.

NOTICE TO DISCONTINUING SUBSCRIBERS.—They are but few—but even to them we shall send the first number of volume 8, (and no more, until ordered,) in hopes that each one will use it to get a new subscriber in his stead—and perhaps re-order the paper for himself.

As all who will not have ordered their papers stopped before the 1st of January, will be, by the terms of subscription, considered subscribers to the next volume, we hope no one will back out, after the first number is sent to him, without, at least, getting one, if not more, new subscribers in their stead.

THE 53d SATURDAY.—Remember, there are fifty-three Saturdays in the present year, while fifty-two papers complete the volume—consequently, there will be one week in which no paper will be published at this office.

CELEBRATION OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

The anniversary of our Saviour's birth will be celebrated at the Universalist church in this city, this evening, by dressing and illuminating the house, and a short address by Rev. Mr. Skinner, and a concert of sacred music under the direction of Mr. Lyon, a well known and skillful performer and teacher of music, assisted by many of the best musicians in the place. The entire proceeds of the concert to be appropriated towards the extinguishment of the meeting-house debt. A general attendance of our friends and a liberal public, both from city and country, is respectfully solicited. Price of tickets, fifty cents each. Exercises to commence at precisely half past six o'clock. Tickets may be had at this Office, the store of E. S. Barnum and Son, S. Beebe's Auction Room, Eagle Tavern, National Hotel, Utica Library, or at the door of the church.

LETTER FROM BR. C. B. BROWN TO EDITORS.

Hastings, December 5, 1836.

DEAR BRETHREN—It has now been more than eight years since I became a believer in God's impartial, universal grace, and the final holiness and happiness of a ransomed universe. Since then I have been called to pass through scenes of prosperity and adversity, and I think I can, from experience, testify to the truth of the declaration so frequently made that Universalism is "good to live by." This remark is often made by the opponents of our doctrine, connected however with its counterpart, viz. that it will "not do to die by." Respecting this last statement, I shall say nothing at present, never having been brought to test its value in a dying hour—but in respect to the first, I know that it is good to live by—good in the vale of poverty—good when our beloved friends are languishing on the bed of sickness—and when they are taken from us by the paralyzing hand of death, and their silent remains consigned to the dreary mansions of the dead, then—O, then, how good, how consoling, how comforting the hope, the confident belief, that we shall meet them on the happy shores of immortality, that the bond of social affection will again be united and perpetuated in a happier and a better world—that sin shall be finished—the devil destroyed—death swallowed up in the victory of life, and the "whole creation delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God!"

"O glorious day, O blessed hope,
My heart leaps forward to the thought;
When on that happy, happy land,
We'll no more take the parting hand."

When lean poverty with its manifold inconveniences press hard upon the believer in the unlimited goodness of his heavenly Father—when fair-weather friends, and self-righteous religionists pass by on the other side with a contemptuous sneer, then how good, how comforting the reflection, that they too are children of the same common Father—that they will be humbled, subdued, reconciled and gathered into the "one fold," where there will be "one Shepherd," where love, unmingled love will be the reigning principle, and heart-felt obedience to God the precious fruit. When beloved children, kind parents, and affectionate companions fade away by the ravages of disease, and we are forever deprived of their sweet and agreeable company on our pilgrimage of mortal life—when we are called to drop affection's tear over the silent remains of kindred dust, and witness the certain destiny of human glory, and the end of all our sublunary enjoyments—at such a time as this, how comforting that faith which is the "substance of things hoped for," the "evidence of things not seen." Here the thorny path of mortal life is strewn with the rose of heavenly consolation—here a living spring of joy is opened in the parched ground of hopeless sorrow—here the elastic springs of life receive new energy, new vigor, and with rapture we exclaim "blessed is the name of the Lord, who has sent his anointed to bind up the broken-hearted and comfort all that mourn."—While I live, give me this blessed doctrine—deprive me of every thing else, rather than this—O let me bind this "precious faith" to my heart—let me have this for my girdle, my breast-plate, my shoes, my helmet and sword; then come poverty, come sickness, or loss of friends; yea, come death itself, and I am "persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus my Lord." THE DRUNKARD.

How often do we hear it said of this class of our fellow-sinners—"He is no one's enemy but his own"—"he injures no one but himself." Are these expressions correct? Alas, no. How dearly must others pay for the drunkard's guilty revels.

What bitter tears are shed by his sorrowing relatives and friends—how many sighs are heaved over his downfall, in the secret watches of the night—what heart-rending forebodings and gloomy terrors does he awaken in the breasts of kindred and friends, while he himself is stupid—inebriate—or careless and indifferent! The father groans in agony over his son's drunken revels and late hours, as his hoary head turns restless on the pillow, and his strained ear hearkens late at night, to hear whether his guilty child is coming home to his repose. The mother's heart is filled with the very bitterness of woe, as she thinks of him she nourished at her breast and dandled on her knee, now roaming in the devious ways of dissipation and ruin, and bringing her gray hairs in sorrow and shame to the grave. And as the wind howls, and the sleety snow or rain beats against the casement, she dies ten thousand deaths, in the fear that he, her child, may now be lying on the cold ground, self-disabled, a victim to the fury of the storm. The brother—the sister—the wife—the child—oh, who may tell the heart-breaking grief and shame a drunkard inflicts on them! The friend—what are his bitter reflections as he sees the companion of his youthful sports, day after day, running the rapid career that leads to mania a potu, delirium tremens, insanity, ruin, and a DRUNKARD'S GRAVE! Who, in view of all these melancholy facts—facts abundant around every drunkard, and continued month after month, and year after year, will dare to say that the drunkard "injures no one but himself"? Is it not notorious that few crimes injure more innocent persons, and injure them more deeply, painfully, and protract that injury longer, than drunkenness? 1. 3. 5.

NEW PREACHER—AND AGENT.

BR. GROSH—It gives me pleasure to inform you of yet another conversion in the ministry. Br. Edward Edwards, of Lenox, near Clockville, Madison county, a Protestant Methodist preacher, who has served as a faithful soldier in the ranks of the enemy for fourteen years, has just commenced preaching the doctrine of the restitution. Br. Edwards is a man of "good report," and "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." Long may he live to build up the faith he once destroyed, and to guide the wandering prodigal to the inexhaustible store-house overflowing with a Father's love and goodness.

Yours, very respectfully, W. MARTIN.
Munnsville, December 13.

[By request of Br. Denton and others of our subscribers in that vicinity, we appoint Br. Edwards to act as our agent in the vicinity of his labors and travels. Br. Denton, Postmaster at Clockville, will please still to act as our agent also, as heretofore. G. and H.]

OLD LEAVEN.

"Purge out the old leaven, that ye may become a new lump."

A certain Scotch physician had this for a maxim—"There be but twa things necessary for here and hereafter. Keep de boovils open, that wool do for here; keep the conscience clean, an' that wool do for de hereafter."

Every one knows how necessary it is for the health of the body to occasionally purge out the old leaven of bad humors. But as Paul was not a physician of the body, I suppose he intended the above prescription to promote the health of the inner man. The slightest observer of the present state of moral health in community, will acknowledge, that a little purging with a view to expel the old leaven, may be as salutary for us, as it was for Paul's Corinthian brethren.

When I see a warm advocate of temperance societies selling the poison to his intemperate neighbor, I conclude he is not entirely a new lump.

When I see a man who has signed the total abstinence pledge, having now and then a peculiar odor in his breath, I prognosticate that the condition of his primæ viæ is bad, and that he has not been sufficiently cathartised to make him a new lump.

When I see a professor of religion, treating with contempt all who do not subscribe to his creed, I think the old leaven of the Pharisee is fermenting within, and that his case requires a drastic purge before he can become a new lump.

When I see a believer in Universalism, acting in the support of Partialism, attending their meetings to the neglect of his own, I wonder when he will become a new lump.

When I hear a preacher speak disrespectfully of the talents of one more celebrated than himself, I am certain his leaven is sour, whether new or old, and for his own benefit he should use some appropriate purgative—perhaps in alterative doses.

When I hear a preacher often complaining that his society do not pay his salary, I mistrust his preaching may be too much like the fallen lump; or may be, while he has been anxious to purge out the old leaven among his hearers, he has omitted to fill them with new, consequently they are a cold lump. MOSES.

MARRIAGES.

In Norway, Herkimer county, December 8th, by Rev. William H. Waggoner, Mr. MORRIS M. PENDILL, of Byron, Genesee county, to Miss MARY M. CARPENTER, daughter of Asabel Carpenter, of the former place.

In Alabama, Genesee county, October 26, by Rev. C. Hammond, Dr. SAMUEL Z. ROSS, to Mrs. JOANNA BULTER, both of Royalton.

In Royalton, October 27, by the same, Mr. ERASTUS WELCH, to Miss LEANORA GATES, both of that town.

DEATHS.

In Madison, November 16, 1836, Mr. JOHN MARBLE aged 70 years. He was an affectionate husband, a kind father and a generous friend—long a resident of this town, he was universally beloved and esteemed by all who knew him. He died as he lived, without an enemy; the noblest work of God, an honest man. Although he never united with any particular denomination of Christians, he believed, as he practiced, those great maxims laid down by our Saviour, "love thy neighbor as thyself"—"do as thou wouldst be done unto." Ever grateful for the blessings bestowed by our beneficent Creator, he was never known to murmur during a long and protracted illness, with the dealings of Providence, but was perfectly resigned to the will of God, in life and in death.

In Ridgeway, November 20th, Mr. ALMOND D. BROWN in the 26th year of his age. Br. Brown was a member of the Universalist society in this town, and a consistent and firm believer in the doctrine of universal redemption. Though afflicted for some time with a disease that was supposed to be incurable, yet he bore the same with great patience and resignation. He was visited in his last days by many who were extremely anxious to destroy his faith in Universalism, and who employed the usual means to effect a change in his belief; but all their prayers, and tears, and doubts availed them nothing—nothing but another confirmation of the supporting power of universal grace in the hour of death. On being informed that he could not probably survive but a short time, he called his companion to his bedside, and exhorted her to read and believe, Heb. viii: 10, 11, 12. Having given directions pertaining to the interests of his wife and two children, he departed in peace for the spiritland. The grace of God as revealed in the second covenant was exhibited to the mourning circle, and a large congregation of people who assembled at the funeral, on the 22d, by the writer. C. H.

In this village, on the 8th December, the Hon. JOSHUA HATHAWAY, aged 75 years. It has never fallen to our lot, to announce the death of an individual in our county, who has filled so large a place in public life, or whose integrity of character and active public services through a long series of years has rendered so highly esteemed and venerated.

On the day of the battle of Bennington, and at different subsequent periods, to the close of the revolutionary struggle, he bore arms in the cause of liberty. Emigrating to this place in 1795, the history of the county, political and civil, bears honorable testimony of his course. At the bar, on the bench, and in the field, he has "acted well his part," and has ever retired, with strong assurances of the confidence and esteem of his contemporaries, and the public. He died, as he lived, with an unshaken confidence of salvation, through the alone merits of Jesus Christ.—Rome Telegraph.
